The Articles which have no initials attached to them are written by the Editor.
The present work has been conducted on the same principles, and is designed mainly for the use of the same persons, as the "Dictionary of Greek and Roman Antiquities." It has been long felt by most persons engaged in the study of Antiquity, that something better is required than we yet possess in the English language for illustrating the Biography, Literature, and Mythology, of the Greek and Roman writers, and for enabling a diligent student to read them in the most profitable manner. The writings of modern continental philologists, as well as the works of some of our own scholars, have cleared up many of the difficulties connected with these subjects, and enabled us to attain to more correct knowledge and more comprehensive views than were formerly possessed. The articles in this Dictionary have been founded on a careful examination of the original sources; the best modern authorities have been diligently consulted; and no labour has been spared in order to bring up the subject to the present state of philological learning upon the continent as well as at home.

A work, like the present, embracing the whole circle of ancient history and literature for upwards of two thousand years, would be the labour of at least one man's life, and could not in any case be written satisfactorily by a single individual, as no one man possesses the requisite knowledge of all the subjects of which it treats. The lives, for instance, of the ancient mathematicians, jurists, and physicians, require in the person who writes them a competent knowledge of mathematics, law, and medicine; and the same remark applies, to a greater or less extent, to the history of philosophy, the arts, and numerous other subjects. The Editor of the present work has been fortunate in obtaining the assistance of scholars, who had made certain departments of antiquity their particular study, and he desires to take this opportunity of returning his best thanks to them for their valuable aid, by which he has been able to produce a work which could not have been accomplished by any single person. The initials of each writer's name are given at the end of the articles he has written, and a list of the names of the contributors is prefixed to the work.

The biographical articles in this work include the names of all persons of any importance which occur in the Greek and Roman writers, from the earliest times down to the extinction of the Western Empire in the year 476 of our era, and to the extinction of the Eastern Empire by the capture of Constantinople by the Turks in the year 1453. The lives of historical personages occurring in the history of the Byzantine empire are treated with comparative brevity, but accompanied by sufficient references to ancient writers to enable the reader to obtain further information if he wishes. It has not been thought advisable to omit the lives of such persons altogether, as has usually been done in classical dictionaries; partly because there is no other period short of the one chosen at which a stop can conveniently be made; and still more because the civil history of the Byzantine empire is more or less connected with the history of literature and science, and, down to the capture of Constantinople by the Turks, there was an interrupted series of Greek writers, the omission of whose lives and of an account of their works would be a serious deficiency in any work which aspired to give a complete view of Greek literature.

The relative length of the articles containing the lives of historical persons cannot be fixed, in a work like the present, simply by the importance of a man's life. It would be impossible to give within any reasonable compass a full and elaborate account of the lives of the great actors in Greek and Roman history; nor is it necessary: for the lives of such persons are conspicuous parts of history and, as such, are given at length in historical works. On the contrary, a Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography is peculiarly useful for the lives of those persons who do not occupy so prominent a position in history, since a knowledge of their actions and character is oftentimes of great importance to a proper understanding of the ancient writers, and information respecting such persons cannot be obtained in any other quarter. Accordingly, such articles have had a space assigned to them in the work which might have been deemed disproportionate if it were not for this consideration. Woodcuts of ancient coins are given, wherever they could be referred to any individual or family. The drawings have been made from originals in the British Museum, except in a few cases, where the authority for the drawing is stated in the article.

More space, relatively, has been given to the Greek and Roman Writers than to any other articles, partly because we have no complete history of Greek and Roman Literature in the English language, and partly because the writings of modern German scholars contain on this subject more than on any other a store of valuable matter which has not yet found its way into English books, and has, hitherto, only partially and in a few instances, exercised any influence on our course of classical instruction. In these articles a full account of the Works, as well as of the Lives, of the Writers is given, and, likewise, a list of the best editions of the works, together with references to the principal modern works upon each subject.

The lives of all Christian Writers, though usually omitted in similar publications, have likewise been inserted in the present Work, since they constitute an important part of the history of Greek and Roman literature, and an account of their biography and writings can be attained at present only by consulting a considerable number of voluminous works. These articles are written rather from a literary than a theological point of view; and accordingly the discussion of strictly theological topics, such as the subjects might easily have given rise to, has been carefully avoided.

Care has been taken to separate the mythological articles from those of an historical nature, as a reference to any part of the book will show. As it is necessary to discriminate between the Greek and Italian Mythology, an account of the Greek divinities is given under their Greek names, and of the Italian divinities under their Latin names, a practice which is universally adopted by the continental writers, which has received the sanction of some of our own scholars, and is moreover of such importance in guarding against endless confusions and mistakes as to require no apology for its introduction into this work. In the treatment of the articles themselves, the mystical school of interpreters has been avoided, and those principles followed which have been developed by Voss, Buttmann, Welcker, K. O. Müller, Lobeck, and others. Less space, relatively, has been given to these articles than to any other portion of the work, as it has not been considered necessary to repeat all the fanciful speculations which abound in the later Greek writers and in modern books upon this subject.

The lives of Painters, Sculptors, and Architects, have been treated at considerable length, and an account is given of all their works still extant, or of which there is any record in ancient writers. These articles, it is hoped, will be useful to the artist as well as to the scholar.

Some difficulty has been experienced respecting the admission or rejection of certain names, but the following is the general principle which has been adopted. The names of all persons are inserted, who are mentioned in more than one passage of an ancient writer: but where a name occurs in only a single passage, and nothing more is known of the person than that passage contains, that name is in general omitted. On the other hand, the names of such persons are inserted when they are intimately connected with some great historical event, or there are other persons of the same name with whom they might be confounded.

When there are several persons of the same name, the articles have been arranged either in chronological or some alphabetical order. The latter plan has been usually adopted, where there are many persons of one name, as in the case of Alexander, Antiochus, and others, in which cases a chronological arrangement would stand in the way of ready reference to any particular individual whom the reader might be in search of. In the case of Roman names, the chronological order has, for obvious reasons, been always adopted, and they have been given under the cognomens, and not under the gentile names. There is, however, a separate article devoted to each gens, in which is inserted a list of all the cognomens of that gens.

In a work written by several persons it is almost impossible to obtain exact uniformity of reference to the ancient Writers, but this has been done as far as was possible. Wherever an author is referred to by page, the particular edition used by the writer is generally stated; but of the writers enumerated below, the following

Names of Places and Nations are not included in the Work, as they will form the subject of the forthcoming "Dictionary of Greek and Roman Geography."

LIST OF COINS ENGRAVED IN THE FIRST VOLUME.

In the following list AV indicates that the coin is of gold, AR of silver, AE of copper, 1Æ first bronze Roman, 2Æ second bronze Roman, 3Æ third bronze Roman. The weight of all gold and silver coins is given, with the exception of the aurei and denarii, which are for the most part of nearly the same weight respectively. When a coin has been reduced or enlarged in the drawing, the diameter of the original coin is given in the last column, the numbers in which refer to the subjoined scale: those which have no numbers affixed to them are of the same size in the drawing as the originals.

ABARIS.

ABE'THAS ('Aeóras), a surname of Apollo, derived from the town of Abae in Phocis, where the god had a rich temple. (Hesych. s. v. 'Aeó; Herod. viii. 38; Paus. x. 35. § 1, &c.) [L. S.]

ABADDON MAGISTER. [Porphyrius.]

ABANDRON (Aβανδρον), the son of Pascas, became tyrant of Sicyon after murdering Clcinias, the father of Aratus, n. c. 264. Aratus, who was then only seven years old, narrowly escaped death. Abantidas was fond of literature, and was accustomed to attend the philosophical discussions of Diocles and Aristote, the dialectician, in the agora of Sicyon: on one of these occasions he was murdered by his enemies. He was succeeded in the tyranny by his father, who was put to death by Nicocles. (Plat. Arat. 2. 3; Paus. ii. 6. § 2.)

ABARIS ('Abaris), son of Seuthes, was a Hyperborean priest of Apollo (Herod. iv. 36), and came from the country about the Caucasus (Ov. Met. v. 86) to Greece, while his own country was visited by a plague. He endowed with the gift of prophecy, and by this as well as by his Scythian dress and simplicity and honesty he created great sensation in Greece, and was held in high esteem. (Strab. vii. p. 301.) He travelled about in Greece, carrying with him an arrow as the symbol of Apollo, and gave oracles. Toland, in his History of the Druids, considers him to have been a Druid of the Hebrides, because the arrow formed a part of the costume of a Druid. His history, which is entirely mythical, is related in various ways, and worked up with extraordinary particulars: he is said to have taken no earthly food (Herod. iv. 38), and to have ridden on his arrow, the gift of Apollo, through the air. (Lobeck, Aethnophauz, p. 314.) He cured diseases by incantations (Plat. Charmid. p. 156, n.), delivered the world from a plague (Suidas, s. v. "Abaris"), and built at Sparta a temple of Yovn xéteipa. (Paus. iii. 13. § 2.) Suidas and Eudocia ascribe to him several works, such as incantations, Scythian oracles, a poem on the marriage of the river Hebrus, expiatory formulæ, the arrival of Apollo among the Hyperboreans, and a prose work on the origin of the gods. But such works, if they were really current in ancient times, were no more genuine than his reputed correspondence with Phalaris the tyrant. The time of his appearance in Greece is stated differently, some fixing it in Ol. 3, others in Ol. 21, and others again make him a contemporary of Croesus. (Bentley, On the Epist. of Phalaris, p. 34.) Lobeck places it about the year b.c. 576, i.e. about Ol. 52. Respecting the perplexing traditions about Abaris see Klopfer, Mythologisches Worterbuch, l. p. 2; Zapf, Disputatio historiae de Abaridis, Lips. 1707; Larcher, en Herod. vol. iii. p. 446. [L. S.]

ABAS (Aba). 1. A son of Metaneira, was changed by Demeter into a lizard, because he mocked the goddess when she had come on her wanderings into the house of her mother, and drank eagerly to quench her thirst. (Nicander, Theriac; Natal. Com. v. 14; Ov. Met. v. 450.) Other traditions relate the same story of a boy, Ascalnbus, and call his mother Misme. (Antonin. Lib. 23.)

2. The twelfth King of Argos. He was the son of Lyneus and Hypermestra, and grandson of Danaus. He married Ocaleia, who bore him two sons, Acrisius and Proetus. (Apollod. ii. 2. § 1; Hygin. Fab. 170.) When he informed his father of the death of Danaus, he was rewarded with the shield of his grandfather, which was sacred to Hermes. He is described as a successful conqueror and as the founder of the town of Abae in Phocis (Paus. x. 35. § 1), and of the Pelasgic Argos in Thessaly. (Stath. ix. p. 431.) The fame of his warlike spirit was so great, that even after his death, when people... revolted, whom he had subdued, they were put to flight by the simple act of showing them his shield. (Virg. Aen. iii. 286; Serv. ad loc.) It was from this Abas that the kings of Argos were called by the patronymic Abintids.

ABAS (Ἀβάς). 1. A Greek sophist and rhetorician about whose life nothing is known. Suidas (s. v. Ἀβάς; compare Eudocia, p. 51) ascribes to him ἔργα ἀναγραφόμενα and a work on rhetoric (ῥήματα). What Photius (Cod. 186. p. 150, b. ed. Bekker) quotes from him, belongs probably to the former work. (Compare Wala, Rhetor. Graec. vii. 1. p. 203.)

2. A writer of a work called Troiaca, from which Servius (ad Aen. ix. 264) has preserved a fragment.

[ L. S.]

ABASCANTUS (Ἀβασκάντεως), a physician of Lugdunum (Lyons), who probably lived in the second century after Christ. He is several times mentioned by Galen (De Compos. Medicam. secund. Locos, ix. 4. vol. xiii. p. 278), who has also preserved an antidote invented by him against the bite of serpents. (De Antid. ii. 12. vol. xiv. p. 177.) The name is to be met with in numerous Latin inscriptions in Gratian's collection, five of which refer to a freedman of Augustus, who is supposed by Linnæus (Ad Elench. Medic. med. vet. a J. A. Kuhn (Hist. Med. vet. section, ed. 1703). Abdias was called too the first Bishop of Edessa, who is supposed by Eusebius to have been the author of an apocryphal book, entitled The History of the Apocalyptic contest. This work claims to have been written in Hebrew, to have been translated into Greek by Eutropius, and thence into Latin by Julius Africenus. It was however originally written in Latin, about A. D. 910. It is originally printed in Fabricius, Codex Apocryphas Novi Test. p. 402. 8vo. Hamb. 1703. Abdias was called too the first Bishop of Babylon.

[ A. J. C.]

ABELLO, the name of a divinity found in inscriptions which were discovered at Commagene in Phrygia. (Gruter, Index s. v. 37; J. Scaliger, Lociorum Antiqunarum, i. 9.) Buttmann (Mythologus, i. p. 167, &c.) considers Abello to be the same name as Apollo, who in Crete and elsewhere was called Ἀείδας, and by the Italians some Dorians Apollo (Vest. s. v. Apollinum; Eustath. ad Il. ii. 99), and that the deity is the same as the Gallic Apollo mentioned by Caesar (Bell. Gall. vi. 17), and also the same as Belas or Belenus mentioned by Tertullian (Apolog. 23) and Herodian (viii. 3; comp. Capitol. Maximin. 22). As the root of the word he recognises the Spartan Βέλας, i. e. the sun (Hevych. s. v.), which appears in the Syriac and Chaldaic Belus or Baal.

ABERCIUS, ST. (Ἄβερκιος), the supposed successor of St. Papias in the see of Hierapolis, flourished A. D. 150. There are ascribed to him, 1. An Epistle to the Emperor Marcus Aurelius, of which Baronius speaks as extant, but he does not produce it; and, 2. A Book of Discourses (Βιβλία Αποκαθηκέων) addressed to his Clergy; this latter is lost. See Illust. Eros. Orient. Script. Vide a P. Holloco. Dnac. 1636. [ A. J. C.]

ABGARUS, A'BGRUS, A'BGARUS, or A'BGARUS (Ἄβγαρος, Ἄβγαρος, Ἄβγαρος), a name common to many rulers of Edessa, the capital of the district of Osrhoene in Mesopotamia. It seems to have been a title and not a proper name. (Procop. Bell. Pers. ii. 12.) For the history of these kings see Bayer, ' Historia Osrhoena et Edessena ex nummis illustrata,' Petrop. 1789. Of these the most important are:

1. The ally of the Romans under Pompey, who treacherously drew Crassus into an unfavorable position before his defeat. He is called Augustus by Dion Cassius (xl. 29), Augustus the phylarch of the Arabs in the Parthian history ascribed to Appian (p. 34. Schirv.), and in the Syriac by Plutarch. (Crass. 21.)

2. The contemporary of Christ. See the following article.

3. The chief, who resisted Mehdurates, whom Claudius wished to place on the Parthian throne; he is called a king of the Arabs by Tacitus (Ann. xii. 12. 14), but was probably an Osrhoenean.

4. The contemporary of Trajan, who sent presents to that emperor when he invaded the east, and subsequently waited upon him and became his ally. (Dion Cass. lvii. 18. 21.)

5. The contemporary of Caracalla, who acted cruelly towards his nation, and was deposed by Caracalla. (Dion Cass. lxiv. 12.)

A'BGRUS, Toparch of Edessa, supposed by Eusibius to have been the author of a letter written to our Saviour, which he found in a church at Edessa and translated from the Syriac. The letter is believed to be spurious. It is given by Eusibius. (Hist. Eccl. i. 13.)

A'BLA (Ἄβλα), the nurse of Hyllus, a son of Hercules. She built a temple of Hercules at Ira in Messenm, for which the Herclid Cresphontes afterwards honored her in various other ways, and also by changing the name of the town of Ira into Abin. (Paus. iv. 30. § 1.)

ABELUX or ABILEUX (Ἀβιλεύς), a noble Spaniard, originally a friend of Carthage, betrayed the Spanish hostages at Seguntum, who were in the power of the Carthaginians, to the Roman generals, the two Scipios, after deceiving Bostar, the Carthaginian commander. (Liv. xxii. 22; Polyb. iv. 99. &c.)

A'BISARES or A'BISARES (Ἄβισαρος), called Embrasius (Εμβρασίος) by Diodorus (xiv. 99), an Indian king beyond the river Hysaspes, whose territory lay in the mountains, sent embassies to Alexander the Great both before and after the conquest of Poms, although inclined to expose the side of the latter. Alexander not only allowed him to retain his kingdom, but increased it, and on his death appointed his son as his successor. (Arrian, Anab. v. 8. 20. 29; Curt. vii. 12. 13. 14. ix. 1. x.)

ABISTAMENES was appointed governor of Cappadocia by Alexander the Great. (Curt. iii. 4. 1.)

He is called Abiam in Arrian. (Anab. ii. 4.)

Grohovius conjectures that instead of Abistamento Cappadocia proposito, we ought to read Abia a magna Cappadociae, &c.

ABITIANUS (Abiōtiávns), the author of a Greek treatise De Urinis inserted in the second volume of Ideler’s Physici et Medici Graeci Minorum, Berol. 8vo. 1842, with the title Περί Ὀφρων Πραγματείας Ἀριστή τοῦ Σαραθύνου παρά μεν Τροίδος Ἀλλὰ Ἰμπίνη τοῦ Σωκῆ ὁτί καὶ Αλλὰ παῖδον τοῦ Σωκῆ, παρά δὲ Ἰταλίου Ἀμπρίκιον. He is the same person as the celebrated Arabic physician Aviceana, whose real name was Abu ʿAll ál Sufa. 375 (A.D. 900 or 905–937), and from whose great work Keil ál-Koání fi l-Tebb, ʿArab médisina, this treatise is probably translated.

[W. A. G.]

ABLAVIUS (Abíałívvs). 1. A physician on whose death there is an epigram by Thesibod in the Greek Anthology (vii. 559), in which he is considered as inferior only to Hippocrates and Galen. With respect to his date, it is only known that he must have lived after Galen, that is, some time later than the second century after Christ.

[W. A. G.]

2. The illustrious Πλατωνίστας, the author of an epigram in the Greek Anthology (ix. 762) “on the quoit of Achelephades.” Nothing more is known of him, unless he be the same person as Aballibus, the Novatian bishop of Nicea, who was a disciple of the rhetorician Troilus, and himself eminent in the same profession, and who lived under Honorius and Theodosius II., at the end of the fourth and the beginning of the fifth centuries after Christ. (Socrates, Hist. Eccl. vii. 12.)

[P. S.]

ABLAVIVS. 1. Prefect of the city, the minister and favourite of Constantine the Great, was murdered after the death of the latter. (Zosimus, ii. 40.) He was consul A.D. 331. There is an epigram extant attributed to him, in which the reigns of Nero and Constantine are compared. (Anth. Lat. n. 261, ed. Meyer.)

2. A Roman historian, whose age is unknown, wrote a history of the Gothic, which is sometimes quoted by Jervandes as his authority. (De Reb. Gotic. iv. 14. 23.)

ABRADDRAS (Abiádrdras), a king of Susa and an ally of the Assyrians against Cyrus. His wife Pantheia was taken on the conquest of the Assyrian camp, while he was absent on a mission to the Bactrians. In consequence of the honorable treatment which his wife received from Cyrus, he joined the latter with his forces. He fell in battle, while fighting against the Egyptians. Inconsolable at her loss, Pantheia put an end to her life, and her example was followed by her daughter Medea. It is mother is stated differently: Hlygiant persons, is said to have been derived. (Suidas, s. v. Abroton.)

ABRADA'TAS (Abiádrdras), and was still in use in the same kind as Abrota had worn, which was called aphabroma (afpaGpupa), the daughter of Onan.

ABRO'TA (Abiádrdras), a rich person at Algos, from whom the province Ἀραβιών ἄνθρωπος, which was applied to extrava¬ gaut persons, is said to have been derived. (Suidas, s. v. Abroton.)

ABRONYCHUS (Abiádrdras), the son of Lyseicles, an Athenian, who was stationed at Thermopylae with a vessel to communicate between Leonidas and the fleet at Artemision. He was subsequently sent as ambassador to Sparta with Thumiesto and Aristides respecting the fortifications of Athens after the Persian war. (Herod. viii. 21; Thuc. i. 91.)

ABRO'TA (Abiádrdras), the daughter of On¬chus, the Bocotian, and the wife of Nius, king of Magars. On her death Nius commanded all the Magarian women to wear a garment of the same kind as Abrota had worn, which was called aphabroma (aphabroma), and was still in use in the time of Plutarch. (Quaest. Graec. p. 353 a.)

ABRTRONUM (Abiádrdras), a Thracian harlot, who according to some accounts was the mother of Thumiesto. There is an epigram pre¬ served recording this fact. (Plut. Them. i. Athen. xiii. 576, c.; Aelian, V. H. xii. 43.) Plutarch also refers to her in his Επομοίων (p. 753 d.) and Lucian speaks of a harlot of the same name (Dial. Mercedr. 1.)

ABRUPOLIS, an ally of the Romans, who attacked the dominions of Perses, and laid them waste as far as Amphipolis, but was afterwards driven out of his kingdom by Perseus. (Liv. xiii. 18. 30. 41.)

ABSEUS. [Gigalantes.]

ABSTERUARUS. [Tiburtius Asebimarus.]

ABSYRTUS or APSYRTUS (Abiádrdras), a son of Acetes, king of Colchia, and brother of Medea. His mother is stated differently: Hylig—ACACALLIS.

anus (Ptol. 13) calls her Ipsia, Apollodorus (i. 9. §28) Idya, Apollonius (iii. 241) Asteroeides, and others Heato, Neaera, or Eurylyte. (Schol. ad Apollon. l. c.) When Medea fled with Jason, she took her husband Absyrtus with her, and when she was nearly overtaken by her father, she murdered her brother, cut his body in pieces and strewed them on the road, that her father might thus be detained by gathering the limbs of his child. Temi, the place where this horror was committed, was believed to have derived its name from τέµων, "cut." (Apollod. i. 9. §24; Ov. Trist. iii. 9; compare Apollon, iv. 336, &c. 460, &c.) According to another tradition Absyrtus was not taken by Medea, but was sent out by his father in pursuit of her. He overtook her in Corcyra, where she had been kindly received by King Alcinos, who refused to surrender her to Absyrtus. When he overtook her a second time in the island of Minerva, he was slain by Jason. (Hygin. Fab. 23.) A tradition followed by Pacuvius (Cic. de nat. v. 19), Justin (xiii. 5), and Dionysius (iv. 45), assigns the name of Acacallis to Medea, who was murdered by Meleager, Aegialeus. [L. S.]

ABULI'TES ('AjQouAhrj), the satrap of Susa, was one of the ambassadors sent to Alexander, but he and his son Oxyathes were afterwards executed by Alexander for the crimes they had committed in the government of the satrapy. (Curt. v. 2; Arrian, Anab. iii. 16. vii. 4; Dio. xvi. 65.)

ABUBA'RIA (A'BoAuvria), the satrap of Susiana, surrendered Susa to Alexander, when the latter approached the city. The satrapy was restored to him by Alexander, but he and his son Oxyathes were afterwards executed by Alexander for their crimes they had committed in the government of the satrapy. (Curt. v. 2; Arrian, Anab. iii. 16. vii. 4; Dio. xvi. 65.)

ABURNA VALENIS. [VALEN.] ABYD'ENUS (AB'ydouhnus), a Greek historian, who wrote a history of Assyria (Ἀσσυριακά). The time at which he lived is uncertain, but we know that he made use of the works of Megasthenes and Berosus; and Cyrilus (udv. Julian. pp. 6, 9) states, that he wrote in the Ionic dialect. Several fragments of his work are preserved by Eusebius, Cyrilus and Syncellus: it was particularly valuable for chronology. An important fragment, which clears up some difficulties in Assyrian history, has been discovered in the Armenian translation of the Chronicle of Eusebius. The fragments of his history have been published by Scaliger, "De Emendatione Temporum," and Richter, "Bereis Chaldacorum Historiae," &c., Lips. 1825.

ACACALLIS (Ἀκακαλίς), daughter of Minos, by whom, according to a Cretan tradition, Hermes begot Cydon; while according to a tradition of the Tegetastes, Cydon was a son of Tegetes, and immigrated to Crete from Tegae. (Paus. viii. 53, §2.) Apollo begot by her a son Mileius, whom, for fear of her father, Acacallis exposed in a forest, where wolves watched and suckled the child, until he was found by shepherds who brought him up.

ACACIUS.

(Asstapouos,) a rhetorician, of Caesarea in Cappadocia. (Antonin. Lib. 30.) Other sons of her and Apollo are Amphitheus and Garamas. (Apollon. iv. 1490, &c.) Apollodorus (iii. 1, §2) calls this daughter of Minos Acalla (Ἀκαλλά), but does not mention Miletus as her son. Acacallis was in Crete a common name for a marquis. (Ath. xvi. p. 681; Heusch, a. n.)

ACACIUS (Ἀκακίος), a rhetorician, of Caesarea in Palestine, lived under the emperor Julian, and was a friend of Libanios. (Suidas, s. v. Ἀκακίος, Ἀκαλλᾶς: Εὐναπίος, Ακακίος Βίοι.) Many of the letters of Libanios are addressed to him. [B. J.]

2. A Syrian by birth, lived in a monastery near Antioch, and, for his active defence of the Church against Arianism, was made Bishop of Berrhoea, A. D. 373, by St. Eusebius of Samosata. While a priest, he (with Paul, another priest) wrote to St. Epiphanius a letter, in consequence of which the latter composed his Panarion (A. D. 374-6). This letter is prefixed to the work. In A. D. 377-8, he was sent to Rome to confute Apollinarius before Pope St. Damasus. He was present at the Oecumenical Council of Constantinople A.D. 381, and on the death of St. Melitius took part in Flavian's ordination to the See of Antioch, by whom he was afterwards sent to the Pope in order to heal the schism between the churches of the West and Antioch. Afterwards, he took part in the persecution against St. Chrysostom (Socrates, Hist. Ecc. vi. 16), and again compromised himself by obtaining as successor to Flavian, Porphyryus, a man unworthy of the episcopate. He defended the heretic Nestorius against St. Cyril, though not himself present at the Council of Ephesus. At a great age, he laboured to reconcile St. Cyril and the Eastern Bishops at a Synod held at Berrhoea, A.D. 432. He died A.D. 437, at the age of 116 years. Three of his letters remain in the original Greek, one to St. Cyril, (extant in the Collection of Cennell by Mainel, vol. iv. p. 1056) and two to Alexander, Bishop of Hierapolis. (Ibid. pp. 819, 830, c. 41. 55, §129, 143.)

3. The One-eyed (ὁ Μονοφάνας), the pupil and successor in the See of Caesarea of Eusebius A.D. 340, whose life he wrote. (Socrates, Hist. Ecc. ii. 4.) He was able, learned, and unscrupulous. At first a Semi-Arian like his master, he founded afterwards the Homoean party and was condemned by the Semi-Arians at Seleucia, A.D. 359. (Socrates, Hist. Ecc. ii. 39. 40; Sozomen, Hist. Ecc. iv. 22. 23.) He subsequently became the associate of Aetius [Ἀέτιος], the author of the Anomocon, then deserted him at the command of Constantius, and, under the author of the Anomocon, then deserted him after being at the head of the Orphan Asylum of that city. He distinguished himself by defending the Council of Chalcedon against the emperor Basiliscus, who favoured the Monophysite heresy. Through his exertions Zenus, from whom Basileus had usurped the empire, was restored (A.D. 477), but the Monophysites meanwhile had gained so much strength that it was deemed advisable to issue a formula, conciliatory from its indefiniteness, called the Henoticem, a.d. 482. Acacius was led into other concessions, which drew upon him, on the accession of John Talain, against whom he supported the claims of Peter Mongus to the See of Alexandria, the anathema of Pope Felix II. a.d. 484. Peter Mongus had gained Acacius’s support by professing assent to the canons of Chalcedon, though at heart a Monophysite. Acacius refused to give up Peter Mongus, but retained his see till his death, a.d. 486. There remain two letters of his, one to Pope Simplicius, in Latin (see Conciliorum Nova Collectio à Monaci, vol. v. p. 982), the other to Peter Fullo, Archbishop of Antioch, in the original Greek. (Ibid. p. 1121.)

5. Reader at (a. d. 390), then the Bishop of Meltene (A. D. 431). He wrote a. d. 431, against Nestorius. His zeal led him to use expressions, apparently savouring of the contrary heresy, which, for a time, prejudiced the emperor Theodosius II. against St. Cyril. He was present at the Oecumenical Council of Ephesus a.d. 431, and constantly maintained its authority. The remain of his productions a. d. 474. (Mansi.)

ACACELIUS (Ακακελίως), a surname of Hermes (Callim. Hyg. in Dion. 143), for which Homer (Ili. xvi. 185; Od. xxiv. 10) uses the form dekakeles (Δεκακήλης). Some writers derive it from the Arcadian town of Acacesium, in which he was believed to have been brought up by king Acaces; others from Κακας, and assign to it the meaning: the god who cannot be hurt, or who does not hurt. The same attribute is also given to Prometheus (Hes. Theog. 614), whence it may be inferred that its meaning is that of benefactor or deliverer from evil. (Compare Spanh. ad Callim. i. 28; Aelian, N. Hist. ii. 24; L. S.)

ACACETUS. [Acacetus.]

ACAMAS (Ἀκαμας). 1. A son of Theseus and Phaedra, and brother of Demophon. (Diod. iv. 62.) Previous to the expedition of the Greeks against Troy, he and Diomedes were sent to demand the surrender of Helen (this message Homer ascribes to Menelaus and Odysseus, II. xi. 189, &c.), but during his stay at Troy he won the affection of Laodice, daughter of Priam (Parthen. Nic. Erot. 16), and begot by her a son, Manitus, who was brought up by Aethra, the grandmother of Acamas. (Schol. ad Lyogroph. 499, &c.) Virgil (Aen. ii. 262) mentions him among the Greeks concealed in the wooden horse at the taking of Troy. On his return home he was detained in Thrace by his love for Phyllis; but after leaving Thrace and arriving in the island of Cyprus, he was killed by a fall from his horse upon his own sword. (Schol. ad Lyogroph. l. c.) The promontory of Acamas in Cyprus, the town of Acanmentum in Phrygia, and the Attic tribe Acanantis, derived their names from him. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Ακαμάτων; Paus. i. 5, § 2.) He was painted in the Lesche at Delphi by Polycnetus, and there was also a statue of him at Delphi. (Paus. x. 26. § 1, x. 10. § 1.)

2. A son of Antenor and Theano, was one of the bravest Trojans. (Hom. II. ii. 823, xii. 160.) He avenged the death of his brother, who had been killed by Ajax, by slaying Promachus the Boeotian. (II. xiv. 476.) He himself was slain by Meuronis. (II. xvi. 542.)

3. A son of Eanorus, was one of the leaders of the Thracians in the Trojan war (Hom. II. ii. 844, v. 462), and was slain by the Thracian Ajax. (Ili. vii. 38, 40.)

ACANTHUS (Ἀκάνθος), the Lacedaemonian, was victor in the διαμαχας and the διάγχος in the Olympic games in OL 15, (a.c. 720), and according to some accounts was the first who ran naked in these games. (Paus. v. 8, § 3; Dionys. vii. 72; African, aπ̣δ Εκαδήμου p. 143.) Other accounts ascribe this to Orsippus the Megarim. (Ossar. u.) Thucydides says that the Lacedaemonians were the first who contended naked in gymnastic games. (i. 6.)

ACARNAN (Ἀκαρνάν), one of the Epigones, was a son of Alcmone and Calirroe, and brother of Amphiocera. Their father was murdered by Phegeus, when they were yet very young, and Calirroe prayed to Zeus to make her sons grow quickly, that they might be able to avenge the death of their father. The prayer was granted, and Acarnan with his brother slew Phegeus, his wife, and his two sons. The inhabitants of Psophis, where the sons had been slain, pursued the murderers as far as Tegea, where however they were received and rescued. At the request of Achelons they carried the necklace and peplus of Harmonia to Delphi, and from thence they went to Epirus, where Acarnan founded the state called after him Acarnania. (Apollod. iii. 7, § 7—4; Or. Met. ix. 413, &c.; Thucyd. ii. 102; Strab. x. p. 492.)

ACASTUS (Ἀκαστός), a son of Pelias, king of Iolcus, and of Anaxibia, or as others call her, Philomache. He was one of the Argonauts (Apollod. i. 9, § 10; Apollon. Rhod. i. 294, &c.), and also took part in the Calydonian hunt. (Or. Met. viii. 305, &c.) After the return of the Argonauts his sisters were seduced by Medea to cut their father in pieces and boil them; and Acastus, when he heard this, buried his father, drove Jason and Medea, and according to Pausanias (vii. 11) his sisters also, from Iolcus, and instituted funeral games in honour of his father. (Hygin. Fab. 24 and 273; Apollod. i. 9, § 27, &c.; Paus. iii. 18, § 9, vii. 20, § 9, v. 17, § 4; Or. Met. xii. 409, &c.) During these games it happened that Astypanda, the wife of Acastus, who is also called Hippolyte, fell in love with Peleus, whom Acastus had purified from the mur-of Eurytion. When Peleus refused to listen to her addresses, she accused him to his husband of having attempted to dishonour her. (Apollod. iii. 13. § 2, &c.; Pind. Nem. iv. 90, &c.) Acastus, however, did not take immediate revenge for the alleged crime, but after he and Peleus had been chasing on mount Pelion, and the latter had fallen asleep, Acastus took his sword from him, and left him alone and exposed, so that Peleus was nearly destroyed by the Centaurs. But he was saved by Chiron or Hermes, returned to Acastus, and killed the latter shut up Acca Laurentia, then the most beautiful and most notorious woman, together with her was followed by one sacred to the Lares, (Macrob. Sat. l. c.; compare Müller, Ebrukier, ii. p. 103, &c.; Hartung, Die Religion der Römer, ii. p. 144, &c.) [L. S.]

L. ACCIUS or ATTIIUS, an early Roman tragic poet and the son of a freedman, was born according to Jerome n. c. 170, and was fifty years younger than Pacuvius. He lived to a great age; Cicero, when a young man, frequently conversed with him. (Brut. 28.) His tragedies were chiefly imitated from the Greeks, especially from Aeschylus, but he also wrote some on Roman subjects (Praetextata); one of which, entitled Brutus, was probably in honour of his patron D. Brutus. (Cic. de Leg. ii. 21, pro Arch. 11.) We possess only fragments of his tragedies, of which the most important have been preserved by Cicero, but sufficient remains to justify the terms of admiration in which he is spoken of by the ancient writers. He is particularly praised for the strength and vigour of his language and the sublimity of his thoughts. (Cic. pro Planc. 24, pro Sest. 56, &c.; Hor. Ep. ii. 1. 56; Quintil. x. § 97; Gell. xiii. 2.) Besides these tragedies, he also wrote Annales in verse, containing the history of Rome, like those of Ennius and three more works, "Libri Didascallion," which seems to have been a history in poetry, "Libri Praetextation" and "Parurga"; of the latter no fragments are preserved. The fragments of his tragedies have been collected by Stephanus in "Frag. vet. Poet. Lat." Paris, 1654; Maittaire, "Opera et Frmg. vet. Poet. Lat." Lond. 1713; and Bothe, "Poet. Scenici Latin," vol. v. Lips. 1834: and the fragments of the Didascalia by Madvig, "De L. Attii Didascallii Comment." Hafniae, 1851.

T. ACCIUS, a native of Pisaurnum in Umbria and a Roman knight, was the accuser of A. Cluentius, whom Cicero defended n. c. 66. He was a pupil of Hermagoras, and is praised by Cicero for accuracy and fluency. (Brut. 25, pro Cluent. 23, 31, 57.)

ACCO, a chief of the Senones in Gaul, who induced his countrymen to revolt against Caesar, n. c. 53. On the conclusion of the war Acco was put to death by Caesar. (Bell. Gall. vi. 4, 44.)

ACCOLEIA GENS is known to us only by coins and inscriptions. On a denarius we have the name P. Accelius Lariscus, and in two inscriptions a P. Accelius Euhemerus, and a L. Accelius Alascantus.

ACERATUS("Ακερατός γραμματικός"), a Greek grammarian, and the author of an epigram on Hector in the Greek Anthology. (vii. 188.) Nothing is known of his life. [P. S.]

ACERBAS, a Tyrian priest of Hercules, who married Elissa, the daughter of king Motus, and sister of Pygmalion. He was possessed of considerable wealth, which, knowing the avarice of Pygmalion, who had succeeded his father, he concealed in the earth. But Pygmalion, who heard of these hidden treasures, had Acerbas murdered, in hopes that through his sister he might obtain possession of them. But the prudence of Elissa saved the treasures, and she emigrated from Phoceria. (Justin. xviii. 4.) In this account Acerbas is the same person as Sicaena, and Elissa the same as Dido in Virgil. (Aen. i. 343, 348, &c.) The names in Justin are undoubtedly more correct than in Virgil; for Servius (ad Aen. i. 343) remarks, that Virgil here, as in other cases, changed a foreign name into one more convenient to him, and that the real name of Silenus was Sicharbus, which seems to be identical with Acerbus. [Dio R.; PYGMALION, &c.] [L. S.]

ACERONIA, a friend of Agrippina, the mother of Nero, was drowned in n. c. 58, when an unsuccessful attempt was made at the same time to drown Agrippina. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 4; Dion Cass.
Lx. 13.)

CN. ACERRO'NIUS PROCULUS, consul
a. d. 37, the year in which Tiberius died (Tac.
Ann. vi. 45; Suet. Tib. 73), was perhaps a descendant of the Cn. Aceronius, whom Cicero mentions in his oration for Tullius, n. c. 71, as a \( \text{optimus maximus} \). (16, &c.)

ACERESC/COMES (Ἀκερεσκόμης), a surname of Apollo, expressive of his beautiful hair which was never cut or shorn. (Hom. I. xx. 59; Pind.
Pyth. iii. 26.) [L. S.]

ACISANDE (Ἀκίσανδη), a native of Cyrene, who studied under Ptolichus of Corcyra (Paus. vi. 3.
§ 57). Plutarch (Sympos. ii. 3 § 8) speaks of a work of his respecting Libya (περὶ Ἀλιβαί), which may probably be the same work as the history of Cyrene. The time at which he lived is unknown.

AC'ESSAS (Ἀκεσσᾶς), a native of Salamis in Cyprus, famed for his skill in weaving cloth with variegated patterns (polymitarios). He and his son Helicon, who distinguished himself in the same art are mentioned by Athenaeus. (ii. p. 48, b.)
Zenobius speaks of both artists, but says that Acesas (or, as he calls him Aceses, Ἀκεσσῆς) was a native of Patara, and Helicon of Carystus. He tells us also that they were the first who made a peplus for Athens Polias. When they lived, we are not informed; but it must have been before the time of Euripides and Plato, who mention this peplus. (Eur. Hebr. 468; Plut. Enulath. § 6.) A specimen of the workmanship of these two artists was preserved in the temple at Delphi, bearing an inscription to the effect, that Pallas had imparted marvellous skill to their hands. [C. P. M.]

AC'ESSIAS (Ἀκεσσίας), an ancient Greek physician, whose age and country are both unknown.
It is ascertained however that he lived at least four hundred years before Christ, as the proverb Ἀκισσᾶς ἐδεικτέ, Aceses eured him, is quoted on the authority of Aristophanes. This saying (by which only Aceses is known to us,) was used when any person's disease became worse instead of better under medical treatment, and is mentioned by Suidas (s. v. Ἀκεσσίας), Zenobius (Proverb.
Contil. i. § 52), Digenianus (Proverb. ii. 5), Mi-chellus (Proverb. ii. 22), and Pindarchus (Proverb, quibus Alexander, nisi sunt, § 98). See also Proverb. a Cod. Boll. § 82, in Gaisford's Parumplographi Graeci; Svo. Oxon. 1836. It is possible that an author bearing this name, and mentioned by Athenaeus (xii. p. 516, c.) as having written a treatise on the Art of Cooking (διεσπατικα), may be one and the same person, but of this we have no certain information. (J. J. Baier, Adag. Medic. Cent. 4to. Lips. 1718.) [W. A. G.]

AC'ESSUS (Ἀκεσσὺς), a surname of Apollo, under which he was worshipped in Elis, where he had a splendid temple in the agora. This surname, which has the same meaning as ἀκεστὸρ and ἀλεξανδρ, characterised the god as the arrestor of evil. (Paus. vi. 24, § 5.) [L. S.]

ACESC'THES, a son of the Sicilian river-god Crimisus and of a Trojan woman of the name of Egesta or Segesta (Virg. Aen. i. 193, 550,
v. 38, 711, &c.), who according to Servius was sent by her father Hippotes or Poasatos to Sicily, that she might not be devoured by the monsters, which infested the territory of Troy, and which had been sent into the land, because the Trojans had refused to reward Poseidon and Apollo for having built the walls of their city. When Egesta arrived in Sicily, the river-god Crimisus in the form of a bear or a dog begot by her a son Acestes, who was afterwards regarded as the hero who had founded the town of Segesta. (Comp. Schol. ad Lycephr. 951, 963.) The tradition of Acestes in Dionysius (i. 52), who calls him Aestesus (Ἀγε-στορ), is different, for according to him the grandfather of Aestesus quarrelled with Lacedemon, who slew him and gave his daughters to some merchants to convey them to a distant land. A noble Trojan however embarked with them, and married one of them in Sicily, where she subsequently gave birth to a son Acestus. During the war against Troy Aestus obtained permission from Priam to return and take part in the contest, and afterwards returned to Sicily, where Aeneas on his arrival was hospitably received by him and Elymus, and built for them the towns of Aestus and Elymus.
The account of Dionysius seems to be nothing but a rationalistic interpretation of the genuine legend.
As to the inconsistencies in Virgil's account of Acestes, see Heyne, Excurs. l. on Aen. v. [L. S.]

ACESTODORUS (Ἀκεστόδωρος), a Greek historical writer, who is cited by Plutarch (Them.
18), and whose work contained, as it appears, an account of the battle of Salamis among other things.
The time at which he lived is unknown.
Stephanus (s. v. Μηδέα πόλις) speaks of an Acestodorus of Megalepolis, who wrote a work on cities (περὶ πόλεων), but whether this is the same as the above-mentioned writer is not clear.

ACESTOR (Ἀκεστὸρ), a surname of Apollo which characterises him as the god of the healing art, or in general as the averter of evil, like ἀκεστός.
(Eny. Androm. 901.) [L. S.]

ACESTOR (Ἀκεστὸρ), surnamed Sneas (Σέκας), on account of his foreign origin, was a tragic poet at Athens, and a contemporary of Aristoph.
anes. He seems to have been either of Thracian or Mysian origin. (Aristoph. Aes. 31; Schol. ad loc.; Vespas. 1216; Schol. ad loc.; Phot.
and Suid. s. v. Ζέκας : Welcker, Die Griech.
Tragöd. p. 1032.) [R. W.]

ACESTOR (Ἀκεστὸρ), a sculptor mentioned by Pausanias (vi. 17, § 2), who having executed a statue of Alexibius, a native of Heracle in Arcadia, who had gained a victory in the pentathlon at the Olympic games, was born at Cnossus, or at any rate exercised his profession there for sonic?
(Paus. v. 15, § 4.) He had a son named Amphion, who was also a sculptor, and had studied under Ptolemy of Corinth (Paus. vi.
3 § 2); so that Acestor must have been a contemporary of the latter, who flourished about Ol.
82. (n. c. 452.) [C. P. M.]

ACESTORIDES (Ἀκεστορίδης), a Corinthian, was made supreme commander by the Symcurians in n. c. 317, and banished Agathocles from the city. (Diod. xix. 5.)

ACESTORIDES wrote four books of mythical stories relating to every city (τὰς καὶ πολύ μνακότας). In these he gave many real historical ACHAEUS ('Axaaios), according to nearly all accounts, as well as those which were merely mythical, but he entitled them μυστακά to avoid calumny and to indicate the pleasant nature of the work. It was compiled from Conon, Apollodorus, Protagoras and others. (Phot. Bibl. cod. 189; Tzetz. Chil. vii. 144.)

ACHAEA (Axya), a surname of Demeter by which she was worshipped at Athens by the Gephyraeans who had emigrated thither from Bocotia. (Herod. v. 61; Plat. Is. et Ostr. p. 378, n.)

2. A surname of Minerva worshipped at Luceria in Apulia where the donarium and the arms of Diomedes were preserved in her temple. (Aristot. Herod. Narrat. 117.)

3. Acis. (L. S.)

ACHAEUS (Axaaios), son of Andromachus, according to most traditions a son of Xuthus and Creusa, and consequently a brother of Ion and grandson of Hellen. The Achaeans regarded him as the author of their race, and derived from him their own name as well as that of Achaia, which was formerly called Aegeaull. When his uncle Aeleus in Thessaly, whence he himself had come to Peloponnesus, died, he went thither and made himself master of Phthiotis, which now also received from him the name of Achaia. (Paus. vii. 1. § 2; Strab. viii. p. 383; Apollod. l. 7. § 3.) Servius (ad Aen. i. 242) alone calls Achaia a son of Jupiter and Pithia, which is probably miswritten for Phthia. (L. S.)

ACHAIUS (Axyaiao), as a son of Andromachus, was by his sister Laodice married Seleucus Callinicus, the father of Antiochus the Great. Achaia himself married Laodice, the daughter of Mithridates, king of Pontus. (Polyb. iv. 51. § 4, vii. 22, § 1.) He accompanied Seleucus Ccnninus, the son of Callinicus, in his expedition across mount Taurus against Attalus, and after the assassination of Seleucus revenged his death; and though he might easily have assumed the royal power, he remained faithful to the family of Seleucus. Antiochus the Great, the successor of Seleucus, appointed him to the command of all Asia on this side of mount Taurus, n. c. 223. Achaia recovered for the Syrian empire all the districts which Attalus had gained; but having been falsely accused by Hermeas, the minister of Antiochus, of intending to revolt, he did so in self-defence, assumed the title of king, and ruled over the whole of Asia on the side of the Taurus. As long as Antiochus was engaged in the war with Ptolemy, he could not march against Achaia; but after a peace had been concluded with Ptolemy, he crossed the Taurus, united his forces with Attalus, deprived Achaia in one campaign of all his dominions and took Sardis with the exception of the citadel. Achaia after sustaining a siege of two years in the citadel at last fell into the hands of Antiochus n. c. 214, through the treachery of Bolis, who had been employed by Sosibius, the minister of Ptolemy, to deliver him from his danger, but betrayed him to Antiochus, who ordered him to be put to death immediately. (Polyb. iv. 2. § 6, iv. 48, v. 40. § 7, 42, 57, vii. 15—16, vili. 17—23.)

ACHAEUS (Axyaiao) of Eretria in Euboea, a tragic poet, was born n. c. 494, the year in which Aeschylus gained his first victory, and four years before the birth of Euripides. In n. c. 477, he contended with Sophocles and Euripides, and though he subsequently brought out many dramas, according to some as many as thirty or forty, he nevertheless only gained the prize once. The fragments of Achean contain much strange mythology, and his expressions were often forced and obscure. (Athens, p. 451, c.) Still in the satyrical drama he must have possessed considerable merit, for in this department some ancient critics thought him inferior only to Aeschylus. (Diog. Laer. ii. 153.) The titles of seven of his satyrical dramas and of ten of his tragedies are still known. The extant fragments of his pieces have been collected, and edited by Urlich, Bonn, 1834. (Suidas, s. v.)

This Achean should not be confounded with a later tragic writer of the same name, who was a native of Smyrna. According to Suidas and Phavorinus he wrote ten, according to Eudocia fourteen tragedies. (Urlich, ibid.)

ACHAEUMENES (Axyaiewes). 1. The ancestor of the Persian kings, who founded the family of the Achaemenidae (Axyaiewidae), which was the noblest family of the Pasargadie, the noblest of the Persian tribes. Achaeumenes is said to have been brought up by an eagle. According to a genealogy given by Xerxes, the following was the order of the descent: Achaemenes, Teipes, Cambyses, Cyrus, Teipes, Ariarandes, Arsanes, Hystaspes, Darius, Xerxes. (Herod. i. 125, vii. 11; Aelian, Hist. Anim. xii. 21.) The original seat of this family was Achaemienia in Persia. (Steph. s. v. Axyaiewes.) The Roman poets use the adjective Achaemenus in the sense of Persian. (Hom. Carm. i. 14, xiii. 8; Or. Ar. Am. i. 296, Met. iv. 212.)

2. The son of Darius I. was appointed by his brother Xerxes governor of Egypt, n. c. 484. He commanded the Egyptian fleet in the expedition of Xerxes against Greece, and strongly opposed the prudent advice of Demaratus. When Egypt revolted under Inarus the Libyan in n. c. 460, Achaemenes was sent to subdue it, but was defeated and killed in battle by Inarus. (Herod. iii. 12, vii. 7, 97, 236; Dio. xi. 74.)

ACHAEUMENIDES or ACHAEUMENIDES, a son of Ahamnnes of Ithaca, and a companion of Ulysses who left him behind in Sicily, when he fled from the Cyclops. Here he was found by Aeneas who took him with him. (Virg. Aen. iii. 613, &c.; Or. Ex Pont. i. 2. 25.)

ACHAICUS, a surname of Laumus.

ACHAIUS (Axyaiao), a philosopher, who wrote a work on Ethics. His time is unknown. (Diog. Laer. vi. 99; Theodor. Arte. a. s. n. 911, ed. Schulze; Clem. Alex. Strom. iv. p. 406, d.)

ACHELOUS. 1. A surname of the Sirens, the daughters of Acheleus and a muse. (Ov. Met. v. 552, xiv. 87; Apollod. i. 7. § 10.)

2. A general name for water-nymphs, as in COLUMNA (x. 263), where the companions of the Pegassidae are called Acheleides. (L. S.)

ACHELOUS (Axyeulos), the god of the river Acheleus which was the greatest, and according to tradition, the most ancient among the rivers of Greece. He with 3000 brother-rivers is described as a son of Oceanus and Thetys (Theog. 340), or of Oceanus and Gaea, or lastly of Helios and Gaea. (Nautal. Com. vii. 2.) The origin of the river Acheleus is thus described by Servius (ad Virg. Georg. i. 9; Aen. viii. 390): When Acheleus on one occasion had lost his daughters, the Sirens, and in his grief invoked his mother Gaea, she received him to her bosom, and on the spot where she received him, she caused the river bearing his name to gush forth. Other accounts about the origin of the river and its name are given by Stephanus of Byzantium, Strabo (x. p. 450), and Plutarch. (De Flum. 22.) Achelous the god was a companion with Hercules and the Nereus for Deianira, and fought with him for the bride. Achelous was conquered in the contest, but as he possessed the power of assuming various forms, he metamorphosed himself first into a snake and then into a bull. But in this form too he was conquered by Hercules, and deprived of one of his horns, which however he recovered by giving up the horn of Amalthea. (Ov. Met. i. 8, &c.; Apollod. i. 8, § 1, ii. 7, § 5.) Sophocles (T Recruon. 9, &c.) makes Deianira relate these occurrences in a somewhat different manner. According to Ovid (Met. ix. 67), the Naiads changed the horn which Hercules took from Achelous into the horn of plenty. When Theseus returned home from the Calydonian chase he was invited and hospitably received by Achelous, who related to him in what manner he had created the islands called Echinades. (Ov. Met. viii. 547, &c.) The various rivers and descendants of Achelous are spoken of in several articles. Virgil (Aen. vi. 297) proposes a very ingenious interpretation of the legends about Achelous, all of which according to him arose from the nature of the river itself. It resembled a bull's voice in the noise of the water; its windings and its reaches gave rise to the story about his forming himself into a serpent and about his horns; the formation of islands at the mouth of the river requires no explanation. His conquest by Hercules last refers to the embankments by which Hercules confined the river to its bed and thus gained large tracts of land for cultivation, which are expressed by the horn of plenty. (Compare Voss, Mytholog. Briefe, lixii.) Others derive the legends about Achelous from Egypt, and describe him as a second Nilus. But however this may be, he was from the earliest times considered to be a great divinity throughout Greece (Hom. Il. xxii. 194), and was invoked in prayers, sacrifices, on taking oaths, &c. (Epic. Eclog. viii. 11.) For Zeus usually added to each oracle he gave, the command to offer sacrifices to Achelous. (Ephorus, l. c.) This wide extent of the worship of Achelous also accounts for his being regarded as the representative of sweet water in general, that is, as the source of all nourishment. (Virg. Georg. i. 9, with the note of Voss.) The contest of Achelous with Hercules was represented on the throne of Amyclae (Paus. iii. 18. § 9), and in the treasury of the Megarians at Olympia there was a statue of him made by Dattas of cedar-wood and gold. (Paus. vi. 19. § 9.) On several coins of Acrania the god is represented as a bull with the head of an old man. (Comp. Philost. Imag. n. 4.) [L. S.]

ACHÆNÉIDES. [Achæmenides.]

ACHERON ('Ax<ioyn). In ancient geography there occur several rivers of this name, all of which were, at least at one time, believed to be connected with the lower world. The river first located in this light was the Acheron in Thessaly, in Epirus, a country which appeared to the earliest Greeks as the end of the world in the west, and the locality of the river led them to the belief that it was the entrance to the lower world. When subsequently Epirus and the countries beyond the sea became better known, the Acheron or the entrance to the lower world was transferred to other more distant parts, and at last the Acheron was placed in the lower world itself. Thus we find in the Homeric poems (Od. x. 513; comp. Pans. i. 17. § 5) the Acheron described as a river of Hades, into which the Pyrripphegeton and Cocytus are said to flow. Virgil (Aen. vi. 297, with the note of Servius) describes it as the principal river of Tartarus, from which the Styx and Cocytus sprang. According to later traditions, Achelous had been a son of Helios and Gaea or Demeter, and was changed into the river bearing his name in the lower world, because he had refreshed the Titans with drink during their contest with Zeus. They further state that Ascalaphus was a son of Achelous and Orphne or Gorgyna. (Natal. Com. iii. 1.) In later writers the name Achelous is used in a general sense to designate the whole of the lower world. (Vitr. Ann. vii. 312; Cic. post redit. in Senat. 10.; C. Nepos, Dion. 10.) The Etruscans too were acquainted with the worship of Achelous (Acherusia) from very early times, as we must infer from their Acheruntid lirii, which among various other things treated on the defilement of the souls, and on the libations and sacrifices (Acheruntic aperium) of which this water was to be affected. (Müller, Etrusk. ii. 27, &c.) The description of the Acheron and the lower world in general in Plato's Phaedo (p. 112) is very peculiar, and not very easy to understand. [L. S.]

ACHÆRUSIA (A<e<reuvrèia, or 'A<reou<sia), a name given by the ancients to several lakes or swamps, which, like the various rivers of the name of Achelous, were at some time believed to be connected with the lower world, until at last the Acherusia came to be considered to be in the lower world itself. The lake to which this belief seems to have been first attached was the Acherusia in Thrace, through which the river Acheron flowed. (Thuc. i. 46; Strab. vii. p. 324.) Other lakes or swamps of the same name, and believed to be in connection with the lower world, were near Hermione in Argolis (Paus. ii. 35. § 7), near Hermione in Bithynia (Xen. Anab. vi. 2. § 2; Diod. xiv. 31), between Cumae and Cape Miscum in Campania (Plini. H. N. iii. 5; Strab. v. p. 243), and lastly in Egypt, near Memphis. (Diod. i. 96.) [L. S.]

ACHILLAS (A<yiавlлнs), one of the guardians of the Egyptian king Ptolemy Dionysus, and commander of the troops, when Pompey fled to Egypt, b. c. 48. He is called by Caesar a man of extraordinary daring, and it was he and L. Septimius who killed Pompey. (Caes. B. C. iii. 104; Liv. Epit. 104; Dion Cass. xliii. 4.) He subsequently joined the exarch Pothisus in resisting Caesar, and having had the command of the whole army entrusted to him by Pothisus, he marched against Alexandria with 20,000 foot and 2000 horse. Caesar, who was at Alexandria, had not sufficient forces to oppose him, and sent ambassadors to treat with him, but these Achillas murdered to remove all hopes of reconciliation. He then marched into Alexandria and obtained possession of the highest part of the city. Meanwhile, however, Arsinoe, the younger sister of Ptolemy, escaped from Caesar and joined Achillas; but dissensions breaking out between them, she had Achillas put to death by Ganymedes a eunuch, b. c. 47, to whom she then entrusted the command of the forces. (Caes. B. C. iii. 103—112; B. Alex. 4; Dion Cass. xlii. 36—40; Lucan x. 519—523.)

ACHILLES (A<yiавллнs). In the legends about
Achilles, as about all the heroes of the Trojan war, the Homeric traditions should be carefully kept apart from the various additions and embellishments with which the gaps of the ancient story have been filled up by later poets and mythographers, not indeed by fabrications of their own, but by adopting those elements from accepted traditions, details, by which oral tradition in the course of centuries had variously altered and developed the original kernel of the story, or those accounts which were peculiar only to certain localities.

Homeric story. Achilles was the son of Peleus, king of the Myrmidones in Phthiotis, in Thessaly, and of the Nereid Thetis. (Hom. II. xx. 206, &c.) From his father's name he is often called Πελείτης, Πελείτης, or Πελεύς (Hom. II. xviii. 316; i. 1; i. 197; Virg. Aen. ii. 263), and from that of his grandfather Aeacus, he derived his name Αἰκιδες (Αἰκιδες, ll. ii. 660; Virg. Aen. i. 99). He was educated from his tender childhood by Phoebus, who taught him eloquence and the arts of war, and accompanied him to the Trojan war, and to whom the hero always showed great attachment. (ix. 406, &c.; 409, &c.) In the burning art he was instructed by Cheiron, the centaur. (xi. 632.) His mother Thetis foretold him that his fate was either to gain glory and die early, or to live a long but inglorious life. (ix. 410, &c.) The hero chose the latter, and took part in the Trojan war, from which he knew that he was not to return. In fifty ships, or according to later traditions, in sixty (Hygin. Fab. 97), he led his hosts of Myrmidones, Helennes, and Achaeans against Troy. (i. 681, &c., xvi. 168.) Here the swift-footed Achilles was the great bulwark of the Greeks, and the worthy favourite of Athena and Hem. (i. 195, 203.) Previous to his dispute with Agamemnon, he ravaged the country around Troy, and destroyed twelve towns on the coast and eleven in the interior of the country. (ix. 328, &c.) When Agamemnon was obliged to give up Chryseis to her father, he showed that he resented her absence from Achilles, who succoured her on the persuasion of Athena, but at the same time refused to take any further part in the war, and shut himself up in his tent. Zeus, on the entreaty of Thetis, promised that victory should be on the side of the Trojans, until the Achaeans should have honoured her son. (i. 26, to the end.) The affairs of the Greeks declined in consequence, and they were at last pressed so hard, that Agamemnon advised them to take to flight. (ix. 17, &c.) But other chiefs opposed this counsel, and an embassy was sent to Achilles, offering him rich presents and the restoration of Briseis (ix. 119, &c.; but in vain. At last, however, he was persuaded by Patroclus, his dearest friend, to allow him to make use of his men, his horses, and his armour. (xvi. 49, &c.) Patroclus was slain, and when this news reached Achilles, he was seized with unspeakable grief. Thetis comforted him, and promised new arms, which were to be made by Hephaestus, and Iris appeared to rouse him from his lamentations, and exhorted him to rescue the body of Patroclus. (xviii. 166, &c.) Achilles now rose, and his thundering voice alone put the Trojans to flight. When his new armour was brought to him, he reconciled himself to Agamemnon, and hurried to the field of battle, disdaining to take any drink or food until the death of his friend should be avenged. (xix. 155, &c.) He wound-ACHILLES, (Ἀχιλλής), a son of Lyson of Athens, who was believed to have first introduced in his native city the custom of sending peace offerings (Πόλεμος ἔρημος, 333.) Several other and more credible accounts, however, ascribe this institution with more probability to other persons.

ACHILLES TATIUS (Ἀχιλλέας Τάτιος), or as Suidas and Endoea call him Achilles Statius, an Alexandrine rhetorician, who was formerly believed to have lived in the second or third century of our era. But as it is a well-known fact, which is also acknowledged by Photius, that he imitated Heliodorus of Eneas, he must have lived after this writer, and therefore belongs either to the latter half of the fifth or the beginning of the sixth century of our era. Suidas states that he was originally a Pagan, and that subsequently he was converted to Christianity. The truth of this assertion, as far as Achilles Tatius, the author of the romance, is concerned, is not supported by the work of Achilles, which bears no marks of Christian thoughts, while it would not be difficult to prove from it that he was a heathen. This romance is a history of the adventures of two lovers, Chlorophon and Leucippus. It bears the title Τὰ κατὰ Λευκόππην καὶ Χλοροφόππην, and consists of eight books. Notwithstanding all its defects, it is one of the best love-stories of the Greeks. Chlorophon is represented in it relating to a friend the whole course of the events from beginning to end, a plan which renders the story rather tedious, and makes the narrator appear affected and insipid. Achilles, like his predecessor Heliodorus, disdained having recourse to what is marvellous and improbable in itself, but the accumulation of adventures and of physical as well as moral difficulties, which the lovers have to overcome, before they are happily united, is too great and renders the story improbable, though their arrangement and succession are skilfully managed by the author. Numerous parts of the work however are written without taste and judgment, and do not appear connected with the story by any internal necessity. Besides these, the work has a great many digressions, which, although interesting in themselves and containing curious information, interrupt and impede the progress of the narrative. The work is full of imitations of other writers from the time of Plato to that of Achilles himself, and while he thus trusts to his books and his learning, he appears ignorant of human nature and the affairs of real life. The lutes of decency and morality are not always paid due regard to, a defect which is even noticed by Photius. The style of the work, on which the author seems to have bestowed his principal care, is thoroughly rhetorical: there is a perpetual striving after elegance and beauty, after images, puns, and antitheses. These things, however, were just what the age of Achilles required, and that his novel was much read, is attested by the number of MSS. still extant.

A part of it was first printed in a Latin translation by Annuial della Croce (Craccius), Leyden, 1544; a complete translation appeared at Basel in 1554. The first edition of the Greek original appeared at Heidelberg, 1601, two years printed together with similar works of Longus and Parthenius. An edition, with a voluminous though rather careless commentary, was published by Saldence to have been certainly a Christian. (c. 2. 150, &c.) It exists only in Greek, or rather (if the above conjecture as to its author be correct) it has only been published in that language. It consists of three hundred and four chapters, and professes to be derived from what has been written on the same subject by the Indians, Persians, and Egyptians. It was translated out of Greek into Latin about the year 1160, by Leo Tuscus, of which work two specimens are to be found in Casp. Bartheii, edition of the Onomasticon et Eorum Inscriptionum in enarrandis Expeditionibus a Gallis in Barbariae Obsidiones (Becro, 1684). ACIDALIA, a surname of Venus (Virg. Alex. i. 720), which according to Servius was derived from the well Acidalius near Orchomenus, in which Venus used to bathe with the Graces; others connect the name with the Greek ἄκτικας, i.e. cares or troubles. ACIDINUS, a family-name of the Manlia gens. Cicero speaks of the Acidini as among the first men of a former age. (De leg. agr. ii. 24.) 1. L. MANLIUS ACIDINUS, praetor urbana in b. c. 210, was sent by the senate into Sicily to bring back the consuls Valerius to Rome to hold the elections. (Liv. xxvi. 25, xxvii. 4.) Cornelius, the leader of the Gauls, who invaded Thrace and Macedonia in b. c. 280. He and Brennus commanded the division that marched into Paeonia. In the following year, b. c. 279, he accompanied Brennus in his invasion of Greece. (Paus. x. 19. § 4, § 5, § 23, § 1, &c.) the triune P. Porcius Laeca from entering the city in an ovation, which the senate had granted him. (Liv. xxviii. 33, xix. 1—3, 13, xxii. 7.)

2. L. MANLIUS ACIDINUS FULVIANUS, originally belong to the Fulvia gens, but was adopted into the Manlia gens, probably by the above-mentioned Acidinus. (Vell. Pat. ii. 8.) He was praetor B. C. 183, and had the province of Hispamia Citerior allotted to him, where he remained till B. C. 186. In the latter year he defeated the Celtiberi, and had it not been for the arrival of his successor would have reduced the whole people to subjection. He applied for a triumph in consequence, but obtained only an ovation. (Liv. xxxvii.
35, xxxix. 21, 23.) In B. C. 183 he was one of the ambassadors sent into Gallia Transalpina, and was also appointed one of the triumvirs for founding the Latin colony of Aquileia, which was however not founded till B. C. 131. (Liv. xxxix. 54, 55, xl. 34.) He was consul B. C. 179, (Liv. xl.
43.) with his own brother, Q. Fulvius Flaccus, which is the only instance of two brothers holding the consulship at the same time. (Fast.
Capitol.; Vell. Pat. ii. 8.) At the election of Acidinus, M. Scipio declared him to be virum tomanum, egregiosum cineum. (Cic. de Or. ii. 64.)
3. L. MANLIUS (ACIDINUS), who was quaestor in B. C. 168 (Liv. xiv. 18), is probably one of the two Manlii Acidini, who are mentioned two years before as illustrious youths, and of whom one was the son of M. Manlius, the other of L. Manlius.
(Liv. xii. 49.) The latter is probably the same as the quaestor, and the son of No. 2.
4. ACIDINUS, a young man, who was going to Pursue his studies at Athens at the same time as young Cicero, B. C. 45. (Cic. ad Att. xii. 32.) He is perhaps the same Acidinus who sent intelligence to Cicero respecting the death of Marcellus. (Cic. ad Fam. iv. 12.)
ACILIA GENs. The family-names of this gens are AVIDOL, BALBUS, and GLABRIO, of which the last two were undoubtedly plebeian, as members of these families were frequently tribunes of the plebs.
ACILIANUS, MINUCIUS, a friend of Pliny
the younger, was born at Brixia (Brescia), and was the son of Minvius Macrinus, who was enrolled by Vespasian among those of praetorian rank. Acilius was successively quaestor, triune, and praetor, and at his death left Pliny part of his property. (Plin. Ep. i. 14, ii. 16.)
ACINDYNUS, GREGOIRUS, (Γρηγόριος
'Ακίνδυνος), a Greek Monk. A. D. 1341, distinguished in the controversy with the Hesychast or Quietist Monks of Mount Athos. He supported and succeeded Barlaam in his opposition to their views. Acilius was successively quaestor, triune, and praetor, and at his death left Pliny part of his property. (Plin. Ep. i. 14, ii. 16.)
ACONDYNUS, GREGOIRUS, (Γρηγόριος
'Ακίνδυνος), a Greek Monk. A. D. 1341, distinguished in the controversy with the Hesychast or Quietist Monks of Mount Athos. He supported
and succeeded Barlaam in his opposition to their views. (Comp. Horn. iii. 8. § 8; Suseca, Oed. 449.)
ACOMNATUS. [NICETARIS.] ACONTES or ACONTIUS (Ακόντης or Ακόντιος), a son of Lycon, from whom the town of Acontium in Arcadia derived its name. (Apol-
. l. 10, 1; Steph. Byz. s. c. 'Ακόντιος.) [L. S.] ACONTIUS (Θυρήνιος), a beautiful youth of the island of Crete. On one occasion he went to Delos to celebrate the annual festival of Diana, and fell in love with Cydippe, the daughter of a noble Athenian. When he saw her sitting in the temple attending to the sacrifice she was offering, he threw before her an apple upon which he had written the words "I swear by the sanctuary of Diana to marry Acontius." The nurse took up the apple and handed it to Cydippe, who read aloud what was written upon it, and then threw the apple away. But the goddess had heard her word, as Acontius had wished. After the festival was over, he went home, distracted by his love, but he waited for the result of what had happened and took no further steps. After some time, when Cydippe's father was about to give her in marriage to another man, she was taken ill just before the nuptial solemnities were begun, and this accident was repeated three times. Acontius, informed of the occurrence, hastened to Athens, and the Delphic oracle, which was consulted by the maiden's father, declared that Diana by the repeated illness 750, &c.) a son of Fannus and Synacthis. He was beloved by the nymph Galatae, and Polyphemus
the Cyclop, jealous of him, crushed him under a huge rock. His blood gushing forth from under the rock was changed by the nymph into the river Acis or Ajaxius at the foot of Mount Aetna.
This story does not occur any where else, and is perhaps no more than a happy fiction suggested by the manner in which the little river springs forth from under a rock.
ACOME 'NES (Ακόμης), a surname of certain nymphs worshipped at Elys, where a sacred enclosure contained their altar, together with those of other gods. (Paus. v. 18. § 4.) [L. S.] ACOMNDIDS, one of the three Cyclopes (Liv.
Fast. i. 288), is the same as Pyramus in Virgil (Aen. viii. 426), and Argus in most other accounts of the Cyclopes. [L. S.] ACOTES (Ακότης), according to Ovid (Met.
iii. 582, &c.) the son of a poor fisherman in Maconia, who served as pilot in a ship. After landing at the island of Naxos, some of the sailors brought with them on board a beautiful sleeping boy, whom they had found in the island and whom they wished to take with them; but Acoteis, who recognised in the boy the god Bacchus, dissuaded them from it, but in vain. When the ship had reached the open sea, the boy awoke, and desired to be carried back to Naxos. The sailors promised to do so, but did not keep their word. Hereupon the god showed himself to them in his own majesty;
vinces began to twine round the vessel, tigers appeared, and the sailors seized with madness, jumped overboard. Notwithstanding this Acoteis alone was saved and conveyed back to Naxos, where he was initiated in the Bacchic mysteries and became a priest of the god. Hyginus (Fab. 134), whose story on the whole agrees with that of Ovid, and all the other writers who mention this adventure of Bacchus, call the crew of the ship Tyrrhenian pirates, and derive the name of the Tyrrhenian sea from them. (Comp. Hom. Hymn. in Bacch. : Apol-
. l. 10, 1; Steph. Byz. s. c. 'Ακόντιος.) [L. S.] ACIS. (Ακίς), according to Ovid (Met. xi.}. meant to punish Cydippe for her perjury. The maiden then explained the whole affair to her mother, and the father was at last induced to give his daughter to Accontius. This story is related by Ovid (Herc. 20, 21; comp. Trist. iii. 10. 78)
and Aristaeus (Epist. x. 10), and it is also said in a special form by one of the later poets, especially of Callimachus, who wrote a poem with the title Cydippe. The same story with some modifications is related by Antoninus Liberalis (Metam. 1) of an Athenian Hermocrates and Ctesylla. (Comp. Cresylla and Buttmann, Mythol. ii. p. 115.) A'CORIS (Α'ΚΟΡΗ), king of Egypt, entered into alliance with Evagora, king of Cyprus, against their common enemy Artaxerxes, king of Persia, about a. c. 355, and assisted Evagora with ships and money. On the conclusion of the war with Evagora, a. c. 376, the Persians directed their forces against Egypt. Acrisias formed a large army to oppose them, and engaged many Greek mercenaries, of whom he appointed Chabrias general. Chabrias, however, was recalled by the Athenian, who together with the lieutenant of Pharnnaxes, who was appointed by Artaxerxes to conduct the war.
When the Persian army entered Egypt, which was not till a. c. 373, Acrisias was already dead.
(Diod. xv. 2-4, 8, 9, 29, 41, 42, Theopom. op.
Hist. cod. 176.) Synellus (p. 76, a. p. 257, i.) assigns thirteen years to his reign.
ACREA (Α'ΚΡΑΙΑ). 1. A daughter of the river-god Asterion near Mycenae, who together with her sisters Kboea and Prosymna acted as nurses to Hera. A hill Acrea opposite the temple of Hem near Mycenae derived its name from her.
(Plut. i. 17, § 2.)
2. Acras and Acrasus are also attributes given to various goddesses and gods whose temples were situated upon hills, such as Zeus, Hera, Aphrodite, Pallas, Artemis, and others. (Paus. i. 13, § 4, ii. 24, § 1; Apollod. i. 9, § 26; Vitruv. i. 7; Spanheim, ad Callim. Hymn in Jov. 82.) ACRAPHUS (Α'ΚΡΑΦΟΟΣ), a son of Apollo, to whom the foundation of the Boeotian town of Acracphius was ascribed. Apollo, who was worshiped in that place, derived from it the surname Acracphius or Acracphiacus. (Steph. Byz. s. v.
A'KRAPHUS; Paus. ix. 23, § 3, 40, § 2.)
ACRAGAS (Α'ΚΡΑΓΑΣ), a son of Zeus and the Oceanid Asterope, to whom the foundation of the town of Agrigentum in Sicily was ascribed.
(Steph. Byz. s. v. Α'ΚΡΑΓΑΣ.) ACRAGAS, an engraver, or chaser in silver, spoken of by Pliny. (xxxii. 12. § 55.) It is not known either when or where he was born. Pliny says that Acragas, Boeotus and Myx were considered of little inferior to Mentor, an artist of great note in the same profession; and that works of all three were in existence in his day, preserved in different temples in the island of Rhodes.
Those of Acragas, who was especially famed for his representations of hunting scenes on cups, were in the temple of Bacchus at Rhodes, and consisted of cups with figures of Bacchae and Centaurs graven on them. If the language of Pliny justifies us in inferring that the three artists whom he classes together lived at the same time, that would fit the age of Acragas in the latter part of the fifth century B. C., as Myx was a contemporary of Phidias. (C. P. M.) ACRATOPHORUS (Α'ΚΡΑΤΟΦΟΡΟΣ), a surname of Dionysus, by which he was designated as the giver of unmixed wine, and worshipped at Phigaleia in Arcadia. (Paus. viii. 38, § 4.)
ACRA'TOPOTES (Α'ΚΡΑΤΟΠΟΤΗΣ), the drinker of unmixed wine, was a hero worshipped in Mu-nychus in Attica. (Pompeo, op. Athen. ii. p. 329.)
According to Plutarchus (v. 19), who calls him simply Acratus, he was one of the divine companions of Dionysus, who was worshipped in Attica.
Pausanias saw his image at Athens in the house of Polytion, where it was fixed in the wall. (L. S.) ACRATUS, a freedman of Nero, who was sent by Nero A. D. 64, into Asia and Achaia to plunder the temples and take away the statues of the gods.
(Tac. Ann. iv. 45, xvi. 23; comp. Dion Chrys.
Rheod. p. 614, ed. Reiske.)
ACRION, a Lucrian, was a Pythagorean philosopher. (Cic. de Fin. v. 29.) He is mentioned by Valerius Maximus (viii. 7, ext. 3, from this passage of Cicero) under the name of Arionus, which is a false reading, instead of Acrion.
ACRISIONEIS, a patronymic of Dannae, daughter of Acras. (Verg. Aeni. vii. 410.) Homer (II. xiv. 319) uses the form 'Ακρίσιον, ACRISIONAIDES, a patronymic of Perseus, grandson of Acrasius. (Ov. Met. v. 70.)
ACRISIUS (Α'ΚΡΗΣΙΟΣ), a son of Alax, king of Argos and of Oenea. He was grandson of Ly¬ ceus and great-grandson of Danaus. His twin-brother was Proctus, with whom he is said to have quarrelled even in the womb of his mother. When Abas died and Acrisius had grown up, he expelled Proctus from his inheritance; but, supported by his father-in-law Iobates, the Lycean, Proctus returned, and Acrisius was compelled to share his kingdom with his brother by giving up to him
Tynthos, while he retained Argos for himself.
An oracle had declared that Dannae, the daughter of Acrisius, would give birth to a son, who would kill his grandfather. For this reason he kept Danae shut up in a subterraneous apartment, or in a brazen tower. But here she became mother of Perseus, notwithstanding the precautions of her father, according to some accounts by her uncle Proctus, and according to others by Zeus, who visited her in the form of a shower of gold. Acri-sius ordered mother and child to be exposed on the wide sea in a chest; but the chest floated inland the island of Seriphia, where both were rescued by Dictys, the brother of king Polydetes.
(Comp. Polym. i. 32; Strabo p. 429.) The story of this myth exists before the time of Acrisius, and that he was only the first who regulated the affairs of the amphictyonies, fixed the towns which were to take part in the council, gave to each its vote, and set-led the jurisdiction of the amphictyonies. (Comp. L Libanius, OraI. vol. iii. 472, ed. Usakos.) ACRON, a king of the Caeconines, whom Romulus himself slew in battle. He dedicated the arms of Acrón to Jupiter Feretrius as Spera Opina. (See Dict. of Ant. p. 833.) Livy mentions the circumstance without giving the name of the king. (Plut. Rom. 16; Serv. ad Virg. Aen. vi.
860; Liv. i. 10.)
ACRON (Α'ΚΡΟΝ), an eminent physician of Agrigentum, the son of Xenon. His exact date ACROPOLITA.

is not known; but, as he is mentioned as being contemporary with Empedocles, who died about the beginning of the Peloponnesian war, he must have lived in the fifth century before Christ. From Sicily he went to Athens, and there opened a philosophical school (εσκύλης). It is said that he was in that city during the great plague (v. c. 430), and that large fires for the purpose of purifying the air were kindled in the streets by his direction, which proved of great service to several of the sick. (Plut. De Is. et Osir. 80; Oribas. Synopsis, vi. 24, p. 97; Arius, tetrab. ii. serm. i. 94, p. 223; Paul Aegin. ii. 35, p. 406.) It should however be borne in mind that there is no mention of this in Thucydides (ii. 49, &c.), and, if it is true that Empeodocles or Simonides (who died v. c. 467) wrote the epitaph on Acron, it may be doubted whether he was in Athens at the time of the plague. Upon his return to Agrigentum he was

ANON. ΗΤΤΟΡΟΟ ΑΝΩΝ ΑΚΡΟΠΟΛΙΤΗΝ ΠΑΤΡΟΣ ΑΧΡΟΥ ΚΡΙΤΕΙΥ ΚΡΗΜΗΣ ΑΧΡΟΥ ΠΑΤΡΙΟΣ ΑΕΡΩΣ ΙΣΟΥΣ. The second line was sometimes read thus: "ΑΧΡΟΠΟΛΙΤΗΣ ΚΑΡΟΦΥΣ ΤΥΜΒΟΥ ΑΧΡΟΥ ΚΑΤΑΚΕΛ." Some persons attributed the whole epigram to Simonides. (Suid. s. c. ΑΚΡΟΠΟΛΙΤΟΣ; Bao. Φοιδαρ, ap. Villas. Ann. Gr. i. 49; Dio. Liiert. vili. 65.) The sect of the Empires, in order to boast of a greater antiquity than the Dogmatici (founded by Thessalus, the son, and Polybus, the son-in-law of Hippocrates, about v. c. 400), claimed Acron as their founder (Pseudo-Gal. Introd. 4, vol. xiv. p. 683), though they did not really exist before the third century a. D. [PHILINUS: SERA-
RON.] Plain falls into this anachronism. (II. N. xxi. 4.) None of Acron's works are now extant, though he wrote several in the Doric dialect on Medical and Physical subjects, of which the titles are preserved by Suidas and Eudocia. [W. A. G.]

ACRON, HELLÉNIUS, a Roman grammarian, probably of the fifth century a. D., but whose precise date is not known. He wrote notes on Homer, and also, according to some critics, the scholia which we have on Pindar. The fragments which remain of the work on Homer, though much mutilated, are valuable, as containing the remarks of the elder critics, as well as those of Q. Terentius Scaurus and others. They were published first by A. Zaretii, Milan, 1474, and again in 1486, and have often been published since in different editions; perhaps the best is that by Geo. Fabricius, in his ed. of Homer, Basel, 1555, Leipzig, 1571. A writer of the same name, probably the same man, wrote a commentary on Terence, which is lost, but which is referred to by the grammarians Charisius. [A. A.]

stantinus Acropolita the elder, belonged to a noble Byzantine family which stood in relationship to the imperial family of the Ducas. (Acropolita, 97.) He was born at Constantinople in 1220 (16. 39), but accompanied his father in his sixteenth year to Nicaea, the residence of the Greek emperor John Vatatzes Ducas. There he continued and finished his studies under Theodorus Exapterigus and Niciphorus Blemmida. (16. 32.) The emperor employed him afterwards in diplomatic affairs, and Acropolita showed himself a very discreet and skilful negotiator. In 1255 he commanded the negotiation between the emperor Michael, despot of Epirus, and the emperor Theodore Ducas, son and successor of John. But he was made prisoner, and was only delivered in 1260 by the mediation of Michael Palaeologus. Previously to this he had been appointed great logotheta, either by John or by Theodore, whom he had instructed in logic. Meanwhile, Michael Palaeologus was proclaimed emperor of Nicaea in 1260, and in 1261 he expelled the Latins from Constantinople, and became emperor of the whole East; and from this moment Georgius Acropolita becomes known in the history of the eastern empire as one of the greatest diplomatists. After having discharged the function of ambassador at the court of Constantine, Lewis, the young Bulgarians, he retired for some years from public affairs, and made the instruction of youth his sole occupation. But he was soon employed in a very important negotiation. Michael, afraid of a new Latin invasion, proposed to pope Clemens IV. to reunite the Greek and the Latin Churches; and negotiations ensued which were carried on during the reign of five popes, Clemens IV. Gregory X. John XXI. Nicolaus III. and Martin IV., and the happy result of which was almost entirely owing to the skill of Acropolita. As early as 1275 Acropolita was sent to pope Gregory X. and in 1274, at the Council of Lyons, he confirmed by an oath in the emperor's name that that confession of faith which had been previously sent to Constantinople by the pope had been adopted by the Greeks. The reunion of the two churches was afterwards broken off, but not through the fault of Acropolita. In 1282 Acropolita was once more sent to Bulgaria, and shortly after his return he died, in the month of December of the same year, in his 62nd year.

Acropolita is the author of several works: the most important of which is a history of the Byzantine empire, under the title Κρομινδος δι υπερ των διαφωνίας, that is, from the taking of Constantinople by the Latins in 1204, down to the year 1261, when Michael Palaeologus delivered the city from the foreign yoke. The MS. of this work was found in the library of Georgius Contameneus at Constantinople, and afterwards brought to Europe. (Fabricius, Bibli. Graec. vol. vili. p. 708.) The first edition of this work, with a Latin translation and notes, was published by Theodorus Douza, Lugd. Batav. 1614, 8vo, but a more critical one by Leo Allatius, who used a Vatican MS. and divided the text into chapters. It has the title Κεραυνον του Ακροπολιτου του μεγαλου λογοθετου χροικη συγγραφη, Georgii Acpolitae magae Logothetas, Historia, &c. Paris, 1651. fol. This edition is reprinted in the "Corpus Byzantinorum Scriptorum," Venice, 1729, vol. xii. This chronicle contains one of the most remarkable periods of Byzantine history, but it is so short that it seems to be only an abridgment of another work of the same author, which is lost. Acropolita perhaps composed it with the view of giving it as a compendium to those young men whose scientific education he superintended, after his return from his first embassy to Bulgaria.

The cause of this misfortune is differently stated: according to some accounts it was because he had seen Artemis while she was bathing in the vale of Gangra, while the discovery of which the goddess changed him into a stag, in which form he was torn to pieces by his own dogs. (Ov. Met. iii. 155, &c.; Hygin. Fab. 181; Callim. H. in Pallas. 110.) Others relate that he provoked the anger of the goddess by his boasting that he excelled her in hunting, or by his using for a feast the game which was destined as a sacrifice to her. (Eurip. Baceb. 320; Diod. iv. 81.) A third account stated that he was killed by his dogs at the command of Zeus, because he sniped for the hand of Semele. (Auson. op. Apollod. iii. 4. § 4.) Paussanias (i. 2. § 8) saw near Orchomenus the rock on which Actaeon used to rest when he was fatigued by hunting, and from which he had seen Artemis in the bath; but he is of opinion that the whole story arose from the circumstance that Actaeon was destroyed by his dogs in a natural fit of madness. Palaephatus (s. v. Actaeon) gives an absurd and trivial explanation of it. According to the Orchoemenian tradition the rock of Actaeon was haunted by his spectre, and the oracle of Delphi commanded the orchoemenians to bury the remains of the hero, which they might happen to find, and fix an iron image of him upon the rock. This image still existed in the time of Paussanias (ix. 38. § 4), and the Orchoemenians offered annual sacrifices to Actaeon in that place. The manner in which Actaeon and his mother were painted by Polygnotus in the Lesche of Delphi, is described by Paussanias. (x. 39. § 2; comp. Müller, Oecol. p. 346, &c.) 2. Son of Melissus, and grandson of Abron, who had fled from Argos to Corinthus for fear of the tyrant Phoebus. Archias, a Corinthian, enamoured with the beauty of Actaeon, endeavoured to carry him off; but in the struggle which ensued between Melissus and Archias, Actaeon was killed. Melissus brought his complaints forward at the Isthmian games, and praying to the gods for revenge, he threw himself from a rock. Hereupon Corinth was visited by a plague and drought, and the oracle ordered the Corinthians to propitiate Poseidon, and avenge the death of Actaeon. Upon this hint Archias emigrated to Sicily, where he founded the town of Symaeae. (Plut. Amat. Narr. p. 772; comp. Paus. v. 7. § 2; Thucyd. vi. 5; Strab. viii. p. 360.)

ACTAEUS (A'ktae'us). A son of Erichthonus, and according to Paussanias (i. 2. § 5), the earliest king of Attica. He had three daughters, Aegrawol, Herse, and Pandrosus, and was succeeded by Cecrops, who married Agameles. According to Apollodorus (iii. 14. 1.) on the other hand, Cecrops was the first king of Attica. [L. S.]

ACTEA, the concubine of Nero, was a freedwoman, and originally a slave purchased from Asia Minor. Nero loved her far more than his wife Octavia, and at one time thought of marrying her; whence he pretended that she was descended from king Attalus. She survived Nero. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 12, 46, xiv. 2; Suet. Nerb. 26, 50; Dion Cass. ix. 7.)

ACTAEON, a surname of Apollo, derived from Actium, one of the principal places of his worship. (Ov. Met. xiii. 715; Strab. x. p. 451; compare Burmann, ad Propert. p. 343.) [L. S.]

ACTI'SANES (Akt'isanes), a king of Ethiopia, who conquered Egypt and governed it with justice. He founded the city of Rhinocolura on the confines of Egypt and Syria, and was succeeded by Mendes, an Egyptian. Diodorus says that Actisanes conquered Egypt in the reign of Amasis, for Me rides an Egyptian. Diodorus says that Acti-fines of Egypt and Syria, and was succeeded by lie founded the city of Rhinocolura on the con¬

be meant. (Diod. i. 60; Strab. xvi. p. 759.)

ACTITUS. [Artius.]

ACTOR. (Actor.)

1. A son of Deion and Diomed, the daughter of Xuthus. He was thus a brother of Asteropeia, Aenetus, Phylacus, and ecephalus, and husband of Aspasia, father of Amenitas, and grandfather of Pharnaces. (Apollod. ii.

3. 10; Pind. Od. ix. 75; Hom. Ili. xi. 785, xvi. 14.)

2. A son of Phorbas and Hyrmine, and husband of Melione. He was thus a brother of Auges, and father of Eurytus and Cteatus. (Apollod. ii.

7. 2 § 2; Paus. v. i. § 8, viii. 14. § 6.)

3. A companion of Amnis (Virg. Aen. ix. 500), who is probably the same who in another passage (xii. 94) is called an Auruncan, and of whose conquered land Turnus made a boast. This story seems to have given rise to the proverbial saying

"Actoris spoliun" (Juv. ii. 100), for any poor which we ought perhaps to read Ammosis. At all events, Amasia, the contemporary of Cyrus, canuot

be meant. (Diod. i. 60; Strab. xvi. p. 759.)

ACTORIDES or ACTORION (Actorilas or Actoridon), are patronymic forms of Actor, and are generally given to descendants of an Actor, such as Patroclus. (Or. Met. xiii. 373; Trist. i. 9.

M. ACTORIUS NASO, seems to have written a life of Julius Caesar, or a history of his times, which is quoted by Suetonius. (Jul. 9, 52.)

The time at which he lived is uncertain, but from the way in which he is referred to by Suetonius, he would almost seem to have been a contemporary of Caesar.

ACTUARIUS (Actuarius). the surname by which an ancient Greek physician, whose real name was Johannes, is commonly known. His father's name was Zacharias; he himself practised at Constantinople, and, as it appears, with some degree of credit, as he was honoured with the title of Actuarius, a dignity frequently conferred at that court upon physicians (Diet. of Ant. p. 611, b.) Very little is known of the events of his life, and his date is rather uncertain, as some persons reckon him to have lived in the eleventh century, and others bring him down as low as the beginning of the fourteenth. He probably lived towards the end of the thirteenth century, as one of his works is dedicated to his tutor, Joseph Racordytes, who lived in the reign of Andronicus II. Palaeologus, a. 1281—1282. One of his school-fellows is supposed to have been Apeocausus, whom he des-scribes (though without naming him) as going upon an embassy to the north. (De Meth. Med.

Proc. in ii. ii. pp. 150, 169.)

The first work extant is the "De Petri Auribus, yngens vel Beato Petri et Alcibades, et visi als et de Acts, "De Actinibus et Affectibus Spiritus

Animalis, ejusque Nutritions." This is a psychological and physiological work in two books, in which all his reasoning, says Freind, seems to be founded upon the principles laid down by Aritotle, Galen, and others, with relation to the same subject. The style of this tract is by no means impure, and has a great mixture of the old Attic in it, which is very rarely to be met with in the later Greek writers. A tolerably full abstract of it is given by Barchusen, Hist. Med. Dial. 14. p. 336, &c. It was first published, Venet. 1547, Bvo, in a Latin translation by Jul. Alexandrinus de Neustain. The first edition of the original was published, Par. 1557, 8vo. edited, without notes or preface, by Jac. Gouyly. A second Greek edition appeared in 1774, 8vo. Lips., under the care of J. F. Fischer. Ideler has also inserted it in the first volume of his Physici et Medici Graeci Minor, Borel. 8vo. 1841, and the first part of J. S.

Bernardis, Historiae Medicinae Criticas, ed. Genes, may also be seen. 1755, 8vo. contains some Greek Scholia on the work.

Another of his extant works is entitled, "De Methodo Medendi," in six books, which have hitherto appeared complete only in a Latin translation, though Dietz had, before his death, collected materials for a Greek edition of this and his other works. (See his preface to Galen De Dissec. Muse.) In these books, says Freind, though he chiefly follows Galen, and very often "Acius and Paulus Aegineta without naming him, yet he makes use of whatever he finds to his purpose both in the old and modern writers, as well

barbarians as Greeks; and indeed finds many things that are not to be met with elsewhere. The work was written extempore, and designed for the use of Apeocausus during his embassy to the north. (Proef. i. p. 139.) A Latin translation of this work by Corn. H. Mathiatus, was first published Venet. 1554, 4to. The first four books appear sometimes to have been considered to form a complete work, of which the first and second have been inserted by Ideler in the second volume of his Phys. et Med. Gr. Min. Berol. 1842, under the title "De Strophiis Patrocinis," &c. Of which the Greek extracts in H. Stephens's Dictionarium Medicum, Par. 1864, 8vo. are probably taken. The fifth and sixth books have also been taken for a separate work, and were published by themselves, Par. 1539, 8vo. and Basil. 1540, 8vo. in a Latin translation by J. Ruellius, with the title "De Methodo Methodicius Compositionem." An extract from this work is inserted in Fernel's collection of writers De Fabris, Venet. 1576, 5o.

His other extant work is "De Ursini," in seven books. He has treated of this subject very fully and distinctly, and, though he goes upon the plan which Theophilius Protostepathus had marked out, yet he has added a great deal of original matter. It is the most complete and systematic work on the subject that remains from antiquity, so much so that, till the chemical improvements of the last hundred years, he had left hardly anything new to be said by the moderns, many of whom, says Freind, transcribed it almost word for word. This work was first published in a Latin translation by Ambrose Leo, which appeared in 1519, Venet. 4to, and has been several times reprinted; the Greek original has been published for the first time in the second volume of Ideler's work quoted above. Two Latin editions of his collected works are said by Chonant (Hauzhus der Bä-cherhunde für die Ältere Medicin, Leipzig, 1841), to have been published in the same year, 1556, one at Paris, and the other at Lyons, both in 8vo. His three works are also inserted in the Medicina...

ADEIMANTUS occurs as a surname of C. Porius who was quaestor of Scipio, and was condemned of peculium. (Liv. xxxviii. 55.) Aculeo, however, seems not to have been a regular family-name of the Pricia gens, but only a surname given to this person, of which a similar example occurs in the following article.

C. ACULEO, a Roman knight, who married the sister of Helvia, the mother of Cicero. He was surprised by no one in his day in his knowledge of the Roman law, and possessed great acuteness of mind, but was not distinguished for other attainments. He was a friend of L. Licinius Cæsus, and was defended by him upon one occasion. The son of Aculeo was C. Visellius Varro; whence it would appear that Aculeo was only a surname given to the father from his acuteness, and that his full name was C. Visellius Varro Aculeo. (Cic. de Or. i. 43, ii. 1, 65; Brut. 76.)

ACUMENUS (Ἀκουμένος), a physician of Athens, who lived in the fifth century before Christ, and is mentioned as the friend and companion of Socrates. (Plat. Phædr. init.; Xen. Memor. iii. 18, § 2.) He was the father of Eryximachus, who was also a physician, and who is introduced as one of the speakers in Plato's Symposium. (Plat. Protag. p. 315, c. 5; Symp. p. 176, c.) He is also mentioned in the collection of letters first published by Leo Allatius, Paris, 1637, 4to., with the title Epist. Socrati et Socratianorum, and again by Orellius, Lips. 1815. 8vo. ep. 14. p. 31. [W. A. G.]

ACUSILAS (Ἀκουσίλας), of Argos, one of the latter Greek logographers (Dict. of Ant. p. 315, a.), who probably lived in the latter half of the sixth century B.C. He is called the son of Cynara or Scabrus, and is reckoned by some among the Seven Wise Men. Suidas (s. v.) says, that he wrote Genealogies from bronze tablets, which his father was said to have dug up in his own house. Three books of his Genealogies are quoted, which were for the most part only a translation of Hesiod into prose. (Clem. Strom. vi. p. 629, a.) Like most of the other logographers, he wrote in the Ionic dialect. Plato is the earliest writer by whom he is mentioned. (Symp. p. 178, b.) The works which bore the name of Acusilas in a later age, were spurious. (s. v. Κανῖσιος Μάλτος, Ἰστὸριας, Κανῖσιος.) The fragments of Acusilas have been published by Sturtz, Gome, 1787; 2nd ed. 1824; and Sturtz, "Museum Criticum," l. c. p. 216, 226.

M. ACUTIUS, tribune of the plebs b. c. 401, was elected by the other tribunes (by co-optation) in violation of the Trebonian lex. (Liv. v. 10; Dict. of Ant. p. 366, a.)

ADA (Ἄδα), the daughter of Hecontommas, king of Caria, and sister of Mausolus, Artemisia, Idrieus, and Pixonadas. She was married to her brother Idrieus, who succeeded Artemisia in b. c. 351 and died b. c. 344. On the death of her husband she succeeded to the throne of Caria, but was expelled by her brother Pixonadas in b. c. 340; and on the death of the latter in b. c. 335 his son-in-law Orontobates received the satrapy of Caria from the Persian king. When Alexander entered Caria in b. c. 334, Ada, who was in possession of the fortress of Alinda, surrendered this place to him and begged leave to adopt him as her son. After taking Halicarnassus, Alexander committed the government of Caria to her. (Arr. Anab. i. 29; Bod. xvi. 42, 74; Strab. xiv. pp. 656, 657; Plut. Alex. 120.)

ADEARUS, or ADDARUS (Ἄδαρος or Ἀδαρός), a Greek epigrammatist poet, a native most probably of Macedonia. The epitaph Macedonia is appended to his name before the third epigram in the Var. MS. (Anth. Gr. vi. 228); and the subjects of the second, eighth, ninth, and tenth epigrams agree with this account of his origin. He lived in the time of Alexander the Great, to whose death he alludes. (Anth. Gr. vii. 240.) The fifth epigram (Anth. Gr. vii. 305) is inscribed Ἰδαρον Μητροναύς, and there was a Mitylenacan of this name, who wrote two prose works Περί Ἀγαλματοτιμών and Περί Διαψευσίων. (Athen. xiii. p. 606, a. xi. p. 471, r.) The time when he cannot live was fixed with certainty. Reiske, though on insufficient grounds, believes these two to be the same person. (Anth. Gr. vii. 226, 255, viii. 51, 238, 340, 305, x. 20; Bruneau, Anth. ii. p. 224; Jacobs, xiii. p. 831.) [C. P. M.]

ADAMANTELIA. [ἈΜΑΛΤΗΔΙΑ.]

ADAMANTIUS (Ἀδαμαντίος), an ancient physician, bearing the title of Τητοροστίνος (τητορόστινος λόγων σοφοτης), Socrates, Hist. Eccles. vii. 15, for the meaning of which see Dict. of Ant. p. 807. Little is known of his personal history, except that he was by birth a Jew, and that he was one of those who fled from Alexandria, at the time of the expulsion of the Jews from that city by the Patriarch St. Cyril, a. d. 415. He went to Constantinople, was persuaded to embrace Christianity, apparently by Atticus the Patriarch of that city, and then the Patriarch of Alexandria. (Socrates, Hist. Eccles. iii. 13. § 2.) He was the father of Eryximachus, who lived in the time of Alexander the Great, to whose death he alludes. (Plut. Alex. 17; Protag. 337, c.) He is the author of a Greek treatise on physiognomy, Φυσιογνωμικαί, in two books, which is still extant, and which is borrowed in a great measure (as he himself confesses, i. Prooem. p. 314, ed. Fr.). from Polemo's work on the same subject. It is dedicated to Constantius, who is supposed to have fabricated it (Biblioth. Graeca, vol. ii. p. 171, xiii. 34, ed. v.). to be the person who married Phæcida, the daughter of Theodosius the Great, and who reigned for seven months in conjunction with the Emperor Honorius. It was first published in Greek at Paris, 1340, 4vo., then in Greek and Latin at Basle, 1544, 4vo., and afterwards in Greek, together with Aelian, Polemo and some other writers, at Rome, 1545, 4to.; the last and best edition is that by J. G. Frauenius, who has added to it his collection of the Scriptores Physiognomiae Veteres, Gr. et Lat., Altenb. 1780, 8vo. Another of his works, Περί Ἀρδυσου, De Ventis, is quoted by the Scholiast to Hesiod, and an extract from it is given by Aetius (tutb. i. serm. 3, c. 163); it is said to be still in existence in manuscript in the Royal Library at Paris. Several of his medical prescriptions are preserved by Orisius and Aetius. [W. A. G.]

ADEIMANTUS (Ἀδείμαντος). 1. The son of Ocytoes, the Corinthian commander in the invasion of Greece by Xerxes. Before the battle of Thermopylae he threatened to sail away, but was bribed by Themistocles to remain. He opposed Themistocles with great insolence in the council which the commanders held before the battle of Salamis. According to the Athenians he took to flight at the very commencement of the battle, but this was denied by the Corinthians and the other Greeks. (Herod. viii. 5, 56, 61, 94; Plut. Them. 11.)

2. The son of Leucolophus, an Athenian, was one of the commanders with Alcibíades in the expedition against Andros, b.c. 407. (Xen. Hell. i. 4, § 21.) He was again appointed one of the Athenian generals after the battle of Arginusae, b. c. 406, and continued in office till the battle of Aegospotami, b. c. 405, where he was one of the commanders, and was taken prisoner. He was the only one of the Athenian prisoners who was not put to death, because he opposed the decree for cutting off the right hands of the Lacedaemonians who might be taken in the battle. He was accused by many of treachery in this battle, and was afterwards impeached by Conon. (Xen. Hell. i. 7, § 1, ii. 1, § 30-32; Paus. iv. 17, § 2, x. 9, § 5; Dem. de fals. leg. p. 401.; Lys. c. Alc. pp. 143, 21.)

Aristophanes speaks of Admetes in the "Frogs" (1513), which was acted in the year of the battle, as one whose death was wished for; and he also calls him, apparently out of jest, the son of Leucolophus, that is, "White Crest." In the "Protogoras" of Plato, Admetes is also spoken of as on that occasion (p. 315, e.).

ADGANDESTRUS, a chief of the Catti, offered to kill Arminius if the Romans would send him poison for the purpose; but Tiberius declined the offer. (Tac. Ann. ii. 83.)

ADHERBAL (Αρδέβας). 1. A Carthaginian commander in the first Punic war, who was placed over Drepana, and completely defeated the Roman consul P. Claudius in a sea-fight off Drepana, b.c. 249. (Polyb. i. 49—52; Diod. Ed. xxiv.)

2. A Carthaginian commander under Mago in the second Punic war, who was defeated in a sea-fight off Carteia, in Spain, by C. Laelius in b.c. 206. (Liv. xxviii. 30.)

3. The son of Micipsa, and grandson of Masinissa, had the kingdom of Numidia left to him by his father in conjunction with his brother Hempsal and Jugurtha, b. c. 113. After the murder of his brother by Jugurtha, Adherbal fled to Rome and was restored to his share of the kingdom by the Romans in b. c. 117. But Adherbal was again stripped of his dominions by Jugurtha and besieged in Cirta, where he was treacherously killed by Jugurtha in b. c. 112, although he had placed himself under the protection of the Romans. (Sall. Jug. 5, 13, 14, 24, 25, 26; Liv. Ep. 63; Diod. Exc. xxxiv. p. 605, ed. Wess.)

ADIATORIX (Αδιατωτριξ), son of a tetrarch of Gahtis, belonged to Antony's party, and killed all the Romans in Heraclea shortly before the battle of Actium. After this battle he was led as prisoner in the triumph of Augustus, and put to death with his younger son. His elder son, Dyteutus, was subsequently made priest of the celebrated goddess in Comana. (Strab. xii. pp. 543, 558, 559; Cic. ad Fam. ii. 12.)

ADMETE (Αδμητα). 1. A daughter of Oceanus and Theys (Hesiod. Theog. 349), whom Hyginus in the preface to his fables calls Admeto and a daughter of Pontus and Thalassa.

2. A daughter of Eurytheus and Antimache or Admete. Heracles was obliged by her father to fetch for her the girdle of Ares, which was worn by Hippolyte, queen of the Amazons. (Apollod. ii. 5, § 9.) According to Tzetzes (ad Lyogphr. 1327), she accompanied Heracles on this expedition. There was a tradition (Athen. xv. p. 447), according to which Admete was originally a priestess of Hera at Argos, but fled with the image of the goddess to Samos. Pirates were engaged by the Argives to fetch the image back, but the enterprise did not succeed, for the ship when laden with the image could not be made to move. The men then took the image back to the coast of Samos and sold it away. When the Samians found it, they tied it to a tree, but Admete purified it and restored it to the temple of Samos. In commemoration of this event the Samians celebrated an annual festival called Tomen. This story seems to be an invention of the Argives, by which they intended to prove that the worship of Hera in their place was older than in Samos. [L. S.]

ADMETUS (Αδμητος), a son of Pheres, the founder and king of Phéræ in Thessaly, and of Periclemyene or Clymene. (Apollod. i. 8, § 2, § 9, § 14.) He took part in the Cydonian chase and the expedition of the Argonauts. (Apollod. i. 9, § 16; Hygin. Fab. 14. 178.) When he had succeeded his father as king of Phéræ, he sued for the hand of Alcætis, the daughter of Pheres, and was betrothed to her on condition that he should come to her in a chariot drawn by lions and bears. This task Admetus performed by the assistance of Apollo, who served him according to some accounts out of attachment to him (Schol. ad Eurip. Alcest. 2; Callim. b. in Apoll. 46, &c.), or according to others because he was obliged to serve a mortal for one year for having slain the Cyclops. (Apollod. iii. 10, § 4.) On the day of his marriage with Alcætis, Admetus neglected to offer a sacrifice to Artemis, and when in the evening he entered the bridal chamber, he found there a number of snakes rolled up in a lump. Apollo, however, reconciled Artemis to him, and at the same time induced the Moiræ to grant to Admetus deliverance from death, if at the hour of his death his father, mother, or wife would die for him. Alcætis did so, but Kora, or according to others Hères, brought her back to the upper world. (Apollod. i. 9, § 15; compare Alcætis.) [L. S.]

ADMETUS (Αδμητος), king of the Molossians in the time of Themistocles, who, when supreme at Athens, had opposed him, perhaps not without insult, in some suit to the people. But when flying from the officers who were ordered to seize him as a party to the treason of Pausanias, and driven from Coreyra to Ephira, he found himself upon some emergency, with no hope of refuge but the house of Admetus. Admetus was absent; but Pthinia his queen welcomed the stranger, and bade him, as the most solemn form of supplication among the Molossians, take her son, the young prince, or wife would die for him. Alcætis did so, but Kora, or according to others Hères, brought her back to the upper world. (Apollod. i. 9, § 15; compare Alcætis.)

ADMETUS (Αδμητος), a Greek epigrammatist, who lived in the early part of the second ADONIS.

1. A surname of Bacchus, signifies the Ruler. (Annu. Epigr. xxi. 6.)

2. Adonis is sometimes used by Latin poets for Adonis. (Plant. Menoech. i. 2. 35; Catull. xxi. 5.)

ADONIS (A'donéus), according to Apollodorus (iii. 14. § 3) a son of Cinnyrus and Medamene, according to Hesiod (ap. Apollod. iii. 14. § 4) a son of Phoenix and Altheaepheus, and according to the cyclic poet Panyasis (ap. Apoll. l. c.) a son of Theias, king of Assyria, who begot by his own daughter Smyrna. (Myrrha.) The ancient story ran thus: Smyrna had neglected the worship of Aphroditae, and was punished by the goddess with an unnatural love for her father. With the assistance of her nurse she contrived to share her father's bed without being known to him. When he discovered the crime he wished to kill her; but she fled, and on being nearly overpowered, prayed to the gods to make her invisible. They were moved to pity and changed her into a tree called ομορφα. After the lapse of nine months the tree burst, and Adonis was born. Aphrodite was so much charmed with the beauty of the infant, that she concealed it in a chest which she entrusted to Persephone; but when the latter discovered the treasure she had in her keeping, she refused to give it up. The case was brought before Zeus, who decided the dispute by declaring that during four months of every year Adonis should be left to himself, during four months he should belong to Persephone, and during the remaining four to Aphrodite. Adonis however preferring to live with Aphrodite, also spent with her the four months over which he had control. Afterwards Adonis died of a wound which he received from a boar during the chase. Thus far the story of Adonis was related by Panyasis. Later writers furnish various alterations and additions to it. According to Hyginus (Fab. 58, 164, 251, 271), Smyrna was punished with the love for her father, because her mother Cencreisa had provoked the anger of Aphrodite by extolling the beauty of her daughter above that of the goddess. Smyrna after the discovery of her crime fled into a forest, where she was changed into a tree from which Adonis came forth, when her father split it with his sword. The dispute between Aphrodite and Persephone was according to some accounts settled by Calliope, who was appointed as mediator between them. (Hygin. Poet. Astron. ii. 7.) Ovid (Met. x. 390, &c.) adds the following features: Myrrha's love of her father was excited by the furies; Lucina assisted her when she gave birth to Adonis, and the Naids anointed him with the fluid which trickled from the tree. Adonis grew up a most beautiful youth, and Venus loved him and shared with him the pleasures of the chase, though she always cautioned him against the wild beasts. At last he wounded a boar which killed him in its fury. According to some traditions Ares (Mars), or, according to others, Apollo assumed the form of a boar and thus killed Adonis. (Serv. ad Verg. Ec. x. 18; Ptolem. Hecyrae. l. p. 306, ed. Gale.) A third story related that Dionysus carried off Adonis. (Planckes op. Plat. Sympos. iv. 5.) When Aphrodite was informed of her beloved being wounded, she hastened to the spot and sprinkled nectar into his blood, from which immediately flowers sprang up. Various other modifications of the story may be read in Hesiod. (Schol. Apoll. vi. 7.) Theocritus (Idyl. xv.), Dion (Idyl. i.), and in the scholiast on Lyophon. (539, &c.) From the double marriage of Aphrodite with Ares and Adonis sprung Priapus. (Schol. ad Apoll. Rhod. i. 9, 32.) Besides him Golgo and Beroe are likewise called children of Adonis and Aphrodite. (Schol. ad Theoor. xv. 100; Nonni Dionys. xii. 155.) On his death Adonis was obliged to descend into the lower world, but he was allowed to spend six months out of every year with his beloved Aphrodite in the upper world. (Orph. hymn. 55, 16.)

The worship of Adonis, which in later times was spread over nearly all the countries round the Mediterranean, was, as the story itself sufficiently indicates, of Asiatic, or more especially of Phoenician origin. (Lucian, de dea Syr. e. 6.) Thence it was transferred to Assyria, Egypt, Greece, and even to Italy, though of course with various modifications. In the Homeric poems no trace of it occurs, and the later Greek poets changed the original symbolic account of Adonis into a poetical story. In the Asiatic religions Adonis was the fructifying principle of nature, and Adonis appears to have reference to the death of nature in winter and its revival in spring—hence he spends six months in the lower and six in the upper world. His death and his return to life were celebrated in annual festivals (Ἀδωνεία) at Byblos, Alexandria in Egypt, Athens, and other places. [L. S.]

ADRASTEIA (A'drasteia), a Cretan divinity who was worshipped in all the island, but especially at Adar, a town near Mount Actaeon. (Plut. Timol. 12; Diodor. xiv. 37.) Hyschelus (i. p. 22) represents the god as the father of the Palici. According to Aelian (Hist. Anim. xi. 20), about 1000 sacred dogs were kept near his temple. Some modern critics consider this divinity to be of eastern origin, and connect the name Adraustus with the Persian Adar (fire), and regard him as the same as the Phoenician Aдramелет, and as a personification of the sun or of fire in general. (Bochart, Geograph. Sacra, p. 520.) [L. S.]

ADRANTUS, ADRANTUS or ADRAS-TUS, a contemporary of Athismaeus, who wrote a commentary in five books upon the work of Theophrastus, entitled την ἡμέρα, to which he added a sixth book upon the Niconian Ethics of Aristotle. (Athen. xv. p. 673, ed. with Schweighauser's note.)

ADRASTEIA (Ἀδραστεία). 1. A Cretan nymph, daughter of Melissenus, to whom Rhea entrusted the infant Zeus to be reared in the Dic-taean grotto. In this office Adrasteia was assisted by her sister Ida and the Curetes (Apollod. i. 1, § 6; Callimach. Hymn. in Iov. 47), whom the scholiast on Callimachus calls her brothers. Apollonius Rhodius (iii. 132, &c.) relates that she gave to the infant Zeus a beautiful globe (ὄρθιον) to play with, and on some Cretan coins Zeus is represented sitting upon a globe. (Spanh. ad Callim. i. c.)

2. A surname of Nemeus, which is derived by some writers from Adrastus, who is said to have built the first sanctuary of Nemeus on the river Asopus (Strab. xiii. p. 380), and by others from...
ADRASTUS. [Adrastus.]

ADRASTUS ('A5pa<rros), a son of Talus, King of Argos, and of Lysimache. (Apollod. i. 9. § 13.) Pausanias (ii. 6. § 3) calls his mother Lysimachus, and Hyginus (Fab. 69) Eurynyme. (Comp. Schol. ad Eurip. Phoen. 423.) During a feud between the most powerful houses in Argos, Talus was slain by Amphiarous, and Adrastus being expelled from his dominions fled to Polybus, then king of Sieyon. When Polybus died without heirs, Adrastus succeeded him on the throne of Sieyon, and during his reign he is said to have instituted the Nemean games. (Hom. II. ii. 572; Pind. Nem. ix. 30, &c.; Herod. v. 67; Paus. ii. 9. § 4.) Afterwards, however, Adrastus was reconciled to Amphiarous, gave him his sister Eriphyle in marriage, and returned to his kingdom of Argos. During the time he reigned there it happened that Tydeus of Calydon and Polyneices of Thebes, both fugitives from their native countries, met at Argos near the palace of Adrastus, and came to words and from words to blows. On hearing the noise, Adrastus hastened to them and separated the combatants, in whom he immediately recognised the two men that had been promised to him by an oracle as the future husbands of two of his daughters; for one bore on his shield the figure of a boar, and the other that of a lion, and the oracle was, that one of his daughters was to marry a boar and the other a lion. Adrastus therefore gave his daughter Deipyle to Tydeus, and Argoa to Polyneices, and at the same time promised to lead each of these princes back to his own country. Adrastus now prepared for war against Thebes, although Amphiarous foretold that Tydeus and Polynices would not survive the war. (Paus. ix. 9. § 4.) The legends about Adrastus and the two wars against Thebes have furnished most ample materials for the epic as well as tragic poets of Greece (Paus. ii. 9. § 3), and some works of art relating to the stories about Adrastus are mentioned in Pausanias. (iii. 10. § 7, x. 10. § 2.)

From Adrastus the female patronymic Adrastinae was formed. (Hom. ii. v. 412.)

ADRASTUS ('A5pa<rros), a son of the Phrygian king Gordius, who lived unintentionally killed his brother, and was in consequence expelled by his father and deprived of everything. He took refuge as a suppliant at the court of king Croesus, who purified him and received him kindly. After some time he was sent out as guardian of Atys, the son of Croesus, who was to deliver the country from a wild boar which had made great havoc all around. Adrastus had the misfortune to kill prince Atys, while he was aiming at the wild beast. Croesus pardoned the unfortunate man, as he saw in this accident the will of the gods and the fulfilment of a prophecy; but Adrastus could not endure to live longer and killed himself on the tomb of Atys. (Herod. i. 55—45.)

ADRIA'NUS. [Adrianus.]

ADRIA'NUS, a Greek rhetorician born at Tyre in Phoenicia, who flourished under the emperors M. Antoninus and Commodus. He was the pupil of the celebrated Herodes Atticus, and obtained the chair of philosophy at Athens during the lifetime of his master. His advancement does not seem to have impaired his mutual regard; Herodes declared that the unfinished speeches of his scholar were "the fragments of a colossus," and Adrianus showed his gratitude by a funeral oration which he pronounced over the ashes of his master. Among a people who ravedled one another in their zeal to do him honour, Adrianus did not shew much of the discretion of a philosopher. His first lecture commenced with the modest encomium on himself πατιν ει διδασκαλος γραμματι, while in the magnificence of his dress and equipment he affected the style of the hierophant of philosophy. A story may be seen in Philostratus of his trial and acquittal for the murder of a beggar sophist who had insulted him: Adrianus had reported by styling such insults δογματα κωπέως, but his pupils were not content with weapons of AECIDES.

AECIDES (Aaleถอน), the son of Amarys, king of Epirus, succeeded to the throne on the death of his cousin Alexander, who was slain in Italy. (Liv. viii. 24.) Aecides married Phthia, the daughter of Menon of Pharsalus, by whom he had the celebrated Pyrrhus and two daughters, Deidameia and Troia. In B. C. 317 he assisted Polyphemus in restoring Olympias and the young Alexander, who was then only five years old, to Macedonia. In the following year he marched to the assistance of Olympias, who was hard pressed by Cassander; but the Epiphati disliked the service, rose against Aecides, and drove him from the kingdom. Pyrrhus, who was then only two years old, was with difficulty saved from destruction by some faithful servants. But becoming tired of the Macedonian rule, the Epiphati recalled Aecides in B. C. 313; Cassander immediately sent an army against him under Philip, who conquered him the same year in two battles, in the last of which he was killed. (Paus. i. 11; Diod. xix. 36, 74; Plut. Pyrrh. i. 2.)

AECUS (Aałак), a son of Zeus and Aegina, a daughter of the river-god Asopus. He was born in the island of Oenone or Oenopion, whither Aegina had been carried by Zeus to secure her from the anger of her parents, and whence this island was afterwards called Aegina. (Apollod. iii. 12. § 6; Hygin. Fab. 52; Paus. ii. 29. § 2; comp. Nonn. Dionys. vi. 212; Orv. Met. vii. 113, vii. 472, &c.) According to some accounts Aecus was a son of Zeus and Europa. Some traditions related that at the time when Aecus was born, Aegina was not yet inhabited, and that Zeus changed the ants (μυρμήγκαι) of the island into men (Μυρμιδόνες) over whom Aecus ruled, or that he made men grow up out of the earth. (Hes. Fargm. 67, ed. Götting; Apollod. iii. 12. § 6; Paus. i. c.) Ovid (Met. vii. 520; comp. Hygin. Fab. 52; Suid. l. c. p. 375), on the other hand, supposes that the island was not uninhabited at the birth of Aecus, and states that, in the reign of Aecus, Ilem, son of Aegina, ravaged the island bearing the name of the latter by sending a plague or a fearful dragon into it, by which nearly all its inhabitants were carried off, and that Zeus restored the population by changing the ants into men. These legends, as Müller justly remarks (Aeginotica), are nothing but a mythical account of the colonisation of Aegina, which seems to have been originally inhabited by Pelasgians, and afterwards received colonists from Phthiotis, the seat of the Myrmidones, and from Phlius on the Asopus. Aecus while he reigned in Aegina was renowned in all Greece for his justice and piety, and was frequently called upon to settle disputes not only among men, but even among the gods themselves. (Pind. Isth. vii. 48, &c.; Paus. iii. 30. § 5.) He was such a favourite with the latter, that, when Greece was visited by a drought in consequence of a murder which had been committed (Diod. iv. 60, 61; Apollod. iii. 12. § 6), the oracle of Delphi declared that the calamity would not cease unless Aecus prayed to the gods that it might; which he accordingly did, and it ceased in consequence. Aecus himself showed his gratitude by erecting a temple to Zeus Panhellenium on mount Panholle- lentinum (Paus. ii. 30. § 4), and the Argonauts afterwards built a sanctuary in their island called Aecaeum, which was a square place enclosed by walls of white marble. Aecus was believed in later times to be buried under the altar in this sacred enclosure. (Paus. ii. 29, § 5.) A legend preserved in Pindar (Or. viii. 39, &c.) relates that Apollo and Poseidon took Aecus as their assistant in building the walls of Troy. When the work was completed, three dragons rushed against the wall, and while the two of them which attacked those parts of the wall built by the gods fell down dead, the third forced its way into the city through the part built by Aecus. Hereupon Apollo prophesied that Troy would fall through the hands of the Aecids. Aecus was also believed by the Aeginetans to have surrounded their island with high cliffs to protect it against pirates. (Paus. ii. 29, § 5.) Several other incidents connected with the story of Aecus are mentioned by Ovid. (Met. vii. 506, &c. ix. 435, &c.) By Enkleis Aecus had two sons, Telamon and Pelesus, and by Phocais a son, Phocus, whom he preferred to the two others, who contrived to kill Phocus during a contest, and then fled from their native island. (Pl. xii. 25; Hor. Carm. ii. 13, 22.) According to Plato (Gorg. p. 533; compare Apol. p. 41; Isoc. Eury. 5) especially for the shades of Europeans. In works of art he was represented bearing a sceptre and the keys of Hades. (Apollod. iii. 12, § 6; Pind. Isidum. vii. 47, &c.) Aecus had sanctuaries both at Athens and in Aegina (Paus. ii. 29, § 6; Hesych. s. v.; Schol. ad Pind. Nem. xiii. 155), and the Aeginetans regarded him as the tutelary deity of their island. (Pind. Nem. viii. 22.)

AEAEDA (Aeacida), a female philosopher of the new Platonic school, lived in the fifth century after Christ at Alexandria. She was a relation of Syrianus and the wife of Hermias, and was equally celebrated for her beauty and her virtues. After the death of her husband, she devoted herself to relieving the wants of the distressed and the education of her children. She accompanied the latter to Athens, where they went to study philosophy, and was received with great distinction by all the philosophers there, and especially by Proclus, to whom she had been betrothed by Syrianus, when she was quite young. She lived to a considerable age, and her funeral oration was pronounced by Damascius, who was then a young man, in hexameter verses. The names of her sons were Ammonius and Helliodorus. (Suidas, s. a.; Damascius, ap. Phot. cod. 242, p. 341, b. ed. Bekker.)

AEDESIA (Aedesisia), a Platonic or perhaps merely correctly an Eclectic philosopher, who lived in the fourth century, the friend and most distinguished disciple of Iamblichus. After the death of his master the school of Syria was dispersed, and Aedesia fearing the real or fancied hostility of the Christian emperor Constantine to philosophy, took refuge in divination. An oracle in hexameter verse represented a pastoral life as his only retreat, but his disciples, perhaps calming his fears by a metaphorical interpretation, compelled him to resume his instructions. He settled at Pergamus, where he numbered among his pupils the emperor Julian. After the accession of the latter to the imperial purple he invited Aedesia to continue his instructions, but the declining strength of the sage being unequal to the task, two of his most learned disciples, Chrysanthus and Euneius, were sent by his own request to supply his place. (Eunap. Vit. Aedesia.)

AEDESUS (Aedesus), a Cappadocian, called a Platonic or perhaps more correctly an Eclectic philosopher, who lived in the fourth century, the friend and most distinguished disciple of Iamblichus. After the death of his master the school of Syria was dispersed, and Aedesia fearing the real or fancied hostility of the Christian emperor Constantine to philosophy, took refuge in divination. An oracle in hexameter verse represented a pastoral life as his only retreat, but his disciples, perhaps calming his fears by a metaphorical interpretation, compelled him to resume his instructions. He settled at Pergamus, where he numbered among his pupils the emperor Julian. After the accession of the latter to the imperial purple he invited Aedesia to continue his instructions, but the declining strength of the sage being unequal to the task, two of his most learned disciples, Chrysanthus and Euneius, were sent by his own request to supply his place. (Eunap. Vit. Aedesia.) father, who, when Polytechnus came in pursuit of his wife, had him bound, smeared with honey, and thus exposed him to the insects. Addon now took pity upon the sufferings of her husband, and when her relations were on the point of killing her for this weakness, Zeus changed Polytechnus into a pelican, the brother of Aedon into a whoop, her sister into a nightingale. This mythus seems to have originated in mere etyinologies, and is of the same class as that about Philomel and Proene.

[Aeetes or Aeeta (Aietanes), a son of Helios and Perseis. (Apollod. i. 9. § 1; Hes. Theog. 957.) According to others her mother's name was Pessa (Hygin. Proef, p. 14, ed. Stavoren), or Antiope. (Scloth. ad Pind. Od. xiii. 52.) He was a brother of Circe, Pasiphas, and Perseis. (Hygin. l. c.; Apollod. l. c.; Hom. Od. x. 156, &c.; Cic. de Nat. Deor. iv. 19.) He was married to Idyia, a daughter of Oceanus, by whom he had two daughters, Medea and Chalciope, and one son, Abythus (Hesiod. Theog. 950.; Apollod. i. 9. 23.). He was king of Cokhis at the time when Phrixus brought herih the golden fleece. At one time he was expelled from his kingdom by his brother Penes, but was restored by his daughter Medela.

[Aeetis, Aeetias, and Aetyna, are patronymic forms from Aeetes, and are used by Roman poets to designate his daughter Medea. (Ov. Met. vii. 396, Heroid. vi. 103; Val. Flacc. viii. 233.)

AEGA (Aege), according to Hyginus (Poet. Astr. ii. 13) a daughter of Oleus, who was a descendant of Hephaestus. Aega and her sister Helice nursed the infant Zeus in Crete, and the former was afterwards changed by the god into the constellation called Capella. According to other traditions mentioned by Hyginus, Aega was a daughter of Melisseus, king of Crete, and was chosen to suckle the infant Zeus; but as she was found unable to do it, the service was performed by the goose Amathen. According to others, again, Aega was a daughter of Helios and of such dazzling brightness, that the Titans in their attack upon Olympus became frightened and requested their mother Gaia to conceal her in the earth. She was accordingly confined in a cave in Crete, where she became the nurse of Zeus. In the fight with the Titans Zeus was commanded by an oracle to cover himself with her skin (aegis). He obeyed the command and raised Aega among the stars. Similar, though somewhat different accounts, were given by Eunomus and others. (Eratosth. Catast. 13; Antonin. Lib. 38; Lacon. Inst. i. 23, § 19.) It is clear that in some of these stories Aega is regarded as a nymph, and in others as a goat, though the two ideas are not kept clearly distinct from each other. Her name is either connected with aig, which signifies a goat, or with aig, a gate of wind; and this circumstance has led some critics to consider the myth about her as made up of two distinct ones, one being of an astronomical nature and derived from the constellation Capella, the rise of which brings storms and tempests (Arct. Phain. 150), and the other referring to the goat which was believed to have suckled the infant Zeus in Crete. (Compare Buettmann in Ideer's Ursprungs- und Beständigkeit der Sternnamen, p. 309; Böttiger.)

AEGEIA.

Aegeion, a son of Uranus by Gaia. Aegeon and his brothers Gyges and Cottus are known under the name of the Uranids (Hes. Theog. 502, &c.), and are described as huge transformers with a hundred arms (Aeropyrgai) and fifty heads. (Apollod. i. 1. § 1; Hes Theog. 146, &c.) Most writers mention the third Uranid under the name of Briareus instead of Aegeon, which is explained in a passage of Homer (Il. i. 403, &c.), who says that men called him Aegeon, but the gods Briareus. On one occasion when the Olympian gods were about to put Zeus in chains, Thetis called in the assistance of Aegeon, who compelled the gods to desist from their intention. (Hom. Il. i. 398, &c.) According to Hesiod (Theog. 154, &c. 617, &c.), Aegeon and his brothers were hated by Uranus from the time of their birth, in consequence of which they were concealed in the depth of the earth, where they remained until the Titans began their war against Zeus. On the advice of Gaia Zeus delivered the Uranids from their prison, that they might assist him. The hundred-armed giants conquered the Titans by hurling at them three hundred rocks at once, and secured the victory to Zeus, who thrust the Titans into Tartarus and placed the Heacotonchaetes at its gates, on, according to others, in the depth of the ocean to guard them. (Hes. Theog. 617, &c. 815, &c.) According to a legend in Pansanias (ii. 1. § 6, ii. 4. § 7), Briareus was chosen as arbitrator in the dispute between Poseidon and Helios, and adjudged the Isthmus to the former and the Acrocorinthus to the latter. The Scholion on Apollonius Rhodius (i. 1165) represents Aegeon as a son of Gaia and Pontus and as living as a marine god in the Aegean sea. Ovid (Met. ii. 10) and Philostratus (Vit. Apollon. iv. 6) likewise regard him as a marine god, while Virgil (Aen. x. 565) designates him among the giants who stormed Olympus, and Callimachus (Hygmn. in Dion. 141, &c.) regarding him in the same light, places him under mount Aetna. The Scholion on Teocritus (Idyl. i. 65) calls Briareus one of the Cyclopes. The opinion which regards Aegeon and his brothers as only personifications of the extraordinary powers of nature, such as are manifested in the violent commotions of the earth, as earthquakes, volcanic eruptions and the like, seems to explain best the various accounts about them. (L. S.)

AEGAUS (Aegaeus), a surname of Poseidon, derived from the town of Aegae in Euboea, near which he had a magnificent temple upon a hill. (Strab. ix. p. 493; Virg. Aen. iii. 74, where Servius erroneously derives the name from the Aegean sea.)

AEGEIDES (A Gedon), a patronymic from Aegaeus, and especially used to designate Theseus. (Hom. II. i. 253; Ov. Heroid. iv. 59, ii. 67; compare Akoxus.)

AEGHERE or EGERIA, one of the nymphs in Roman mythology, from whom, according to the legends of early Roman story, Numa received his instructions respecting the forms of worship which he introduced. (Liv. i. 19; Val. Max. i. 2. § 1.) The grove in which the king had his interviews with the goddess, and in which a well gushed forth from a dark recess, was dedicated by him to the Camenae. (Liv. i. 21.) The Roman legends, however, point out two distinct places sacred to Aegeria, one near Aricia (Virg. Aen. vii. 761, &c.; Ovid, Fast. iii. 263, &c.; Strab. v. p. 239; Plut. Num. 4; Lactant. i. 22. § 1), and the other near the city of Rome at the Porta Capena, in the valley now called Cappelletta, where the sacred shield had fallen from heaven, and where Numus was likewise believed to have had intercourse with his beloved. (Plut. Num. 13; Juv. iii. 12.) Ovid (Met. xx. 431, &c.; compare Strab. l. c.) relates that, after the death of Numus, Aegeria fled into the shady grove in the vale of Aricia, and there disturbed by her lamentations the worship of Diana which had been brought thither from Tauris by Orestes, or, according to others, by Hippolytus. Virgil (Aen. vii. 761) makes Hippolytus and Aegeria the parents of Virbius, who was undoubtedly a native Italian hero. This is one of the most remarkable instances of the manner in which the worship of a Greek divinity or hero was engrained upon and combined with a purely Italian worship. Aegeria was regarded as a prophetic divinity, and also as the giver of life, whence she was invoked by pregnant women. (Estus. a. v. Lycurgus; compare Virg. Georg. i. 453.) The name of Aegeria first occurs at Spises near Marburg, 1834; Hartmann, Die Heilig. der Römer, ii. p. 203, &c., and 213, &c.) [L. S.]

AEGEUS. [AEGESTUS.]

AEGEUS (Aryēs). 1. According to some accounts a son of Pandion, king of Athens, and of Pylia, while others call him a son of Scyrius or Phenius, and state that he was only an adopted son of Pandion. (Paus. i. 5. § 3, &c.; Schol. ad Lycophr. 494; Apollod. iii. 15. § 5.) Pandion had been expelled from his kingdom by the Metionids, but Aegaeus in conjunction with his brothers, Pallas, Nysus, and Lycus restored him, and Aegaeus being the eldest of the brothers succeeded Pandion. Aegaeus first married Meta, a daughter of Hoples, and then Chalciope, the daughter of Oeneus, and succeeded Pandion. (Paus. i. 5. § 3; Ac.; Schoi. ad Ith. vii. 18, Ac., with the Schoi.) Aegaeus was restored, but died soon after. (Plut. Thes. 3.)

2. The eponymic hero of the phyle called the Aegaeidae at Sparta, was a son of Oeolycus, and is only this difference in the accounts, that, according to some, he was the leader of the Cadmean colonists at Sparta, while, according to Herodotus, they received their name of Aegaeids from the later Aegaeus, the son of Oooleus. (Pind. Pyth. v. 101; Isth. vii. 10, &c., with the Schol.)

3. The hero at Sparta previous to the Dorian conquest. There is only this difference in the accounts, that, according to some, he was the leader of the Cadmean colonists at Sparta, while, according to Herodotus, they received their name of Aegaeids from the later Aegaeus, the son of Oooleus. (Pind. Pyth. v. 101; Isth. vii. 10, &c., with the Schol.)

AEGI'ALE or AEGIALCIA (Aegialea). 1. A daughter of Acratias and Amphithea, or of Aegialeus the son of Acratas, whom she bears the surname of Aegialea. (Hom. II. v. 412; Apollod. i. 8. § 6, 9. § 13.) She was married to Diomedes, who, on his return from Troy, found her living in adultery with Cometes. (Estath. ad II. v. p. 566.) The hero attributed this misfortune to the anger of Aphrodite, who had wounded in the war against Troy, but when Aegiale went so far as to threaten his life, he fled to Italy. (Schol. ad Lycophr. 610; Ov. Met. xiv. 476, &c.) According to Dictys Cretensis (vi. 2), Aegiale, like Clytemnestra, had been seduced to her criminal conduct by a treacherous report, that Diomedes was returning with a Trojan woman who lived with him as his wife, and on his return to Argos Aegiale expected to be thus received. (Hist. 389) She is described as the type of a bad wife. [L. S.]

AEGI'ALDEUS (Aegialea). 1. A son of Acratias and Amphithea or Demaena. (Apollod. i. 9. § 13; Hygin. Fab. 71.) He was the only one among the Epigones that fell in the war against Thebes. (Apollod. iii. 7. § 3; Paus. ix. 5. § 7; compare Acratas.) Aegialeus was worshipped as a hero at Pegae in Megaris, and it was believed that his body had been conveyed thither from Thebes and been buried there. (Paus. i. 44. § 7.)

2. A son of Inachus and the Oceanid Melia, from whom the part of Peloponnesus afterwards called Aegiae derived its name of Aegialea. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 1.) According to a Sicilian tradition he was an autchothon, brother of Phoroneus and first king of Sicily, to whom the foundation of the town of Aegialea was ascribed. (Paus. ii. 5. § 5, vii. 1. § 1.)

3. A son of Aesctes. [AESCTVS.] [L. S.]

AEGI'DIUS, a Roman commander in Gaul under Majorinus. (A. d. 457—461.) After the death of the latter, he maintained an independent sovereignty in Gaul, and was elected by the Franks as their king, after they had banished Childeric. Four years afterwards, Childeric was restored; but Aegidius did not oppose his return, and he retained his influence in Gaul till his death. (Gregor. Turon. ii. 12.)
AEGINETA.

AEGIDU CHOS or AEGIOCHOS (Ἀγιδουχος or Ἀγιοχος), a surname of Zeus, as the bearer of the Aegis with which he strikes terror into the impious and his enemies. (Hom. II. i. 202, ii. 157, 375, &c.; Pind. Isth. iv. 99; Hygin. Post. Astr. ii. 15.) Others derive the surname from αἴγης and δυσή, and take it as an allusion to Zeus being fed by a goat. (Spanh. ed Callim. Hymn. in Jov. 49.) [L. S.] AEOLUS (Ὠλος or Ἀεώλος), or AEGUMUS (Ὠλος or Ἀεώλος), one of the most ancient of the Greek physicians, who is said by Galen (De Différ. Puls. i. 2, iv. 2. 11. vol. viii. pp. 498, 716, 752) to have been the first person who wrote a treatise on the pulse. He was a native of Veia in Lucania, and is supposed to have lived before the time of Hippocrates, that is, in the fifth century before Christ. His work was entitled Πελοπίδωμα, De ψυχωτικία (a name which alone sufficiently indicates its antiquity), and is not now in existence. Callimachus (ap. Athen. xiv. p. 643, e.) mentions an author named Aegineta, who wrote a work on the art of making cheesecakes (παγενεωτο κρέα αγγρυμμα), and Piny mentions a person of the same name (II. N. vii. 49), who was said to have lived two hundred years; but whether these are the same or different individuals is quite uncertain. [W. A. G.]

AEGI'NIUS (Ἀγινιος), the mythical ancestor of the Doric race, who is described as their king and lawgiver at the time when they were yet inhabiting the northern parts of Thessaly. (Pind. Pyth. i. 124, v. 96.) When involved in a war with the Lapithae, he called Heracles to his assistance, and promised him the third part of his territory, if he delivered him of his enemies. The Lapithae were conquered, but Heracles did not take for himself the territory promised to him by Aegimius, and left it in trust to the king who was to preserve it for the sons of Heracles. (Apollod. ii. 7, § 7; Diod. iv. 37.) Aegineta had two sons, Dymas and Pamphylus, who migrated to Peloponnesus and were regarded as the ancestors of two branches of the Doric race (Dymas and Pamphylus), while the third branch derived its name from Hyllus (Hylléeus), the son of Heracles, who had been adopted by Aegimius. (Apollod. ii. 8, § 3; Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. i. 121.) Respecting the connexion between Aegimius and Heracles, see Müller, Dor. i. 33, &c.

There existed in antiquity an epic poem called "Aegimius," of which a few fragments are still extant, and which is sometimes ascribed to Hesiod and sometimes to Cercopes of Miletus. (Athen. xii. p. 503; Steph. Byz. s. v. 'Αγίηνιος.) The main subject of this poem appears to have been the war of Aegimius and Heracles against the Lapithae. (Greek. ed insulting. ed. ed. II. N. vii. 49, &c.; Müller, Dor. i. 33, &c.; Wack. Der Einges. Cycles, p. 266, &c.) The fragments are collected in Dindorf, Diet. Gr. epich. Poes. der Grisch. bis zur Zeit Alex. p. 56, &c. [L. S.]

AEGINGA [AEGUS] [AEGUS] AGINEA, a surname of Artemis, under which she was worshipped at Sparta. (Paus. iii. 14. § 3.) It means either the hunteess of chamois, or the wielder of the javelin (αγινες). [L. S.]

AEGINETA, a modeller (factor) mentioned by Piny. (H. N. xxxv. 11. s. 40.) Scholars are now pretty well agreed, that Winkelmann was mistaken in supposing that the word Aeginetas in the passage of Piny denoted merely the country of some artist, whose real name, for some reason or other, was not given. His brother Pasion, a painter of some distinction, was a pupil of Erginos, who had been colour-grinder to the artist Nearchus. We learn from Putearah (Avut. 13), that Nearchus was a friend of Aristotle of Siyean, who was elected praetor of the Achaean league in 243. We cannot therefore be in assuming, that Aegineta and his brother flourished about Ol. cxxl. c. 220. (K. O. Müller, Arch. der Kunst, p. 131.) [C. P. M.]

AEGINETA PAULUS. [PAULUS AGINEA.]

AEGIOCHUS. [AEGUSCHUS.]

AEGIPAN (Αγιπας), that is, Goat-Pan, was according to some statements a being distinct from Pan, while others regard him as identical with Pan. His story appears to be altogether of late origin. According to Hyginus (Pab. 155) he was the son of Zeus and a goat, or of Zeus and Aegina, the wife of Pan, and was transferred to the stars. (Hygin. Post. Astr. ii. 13, &c.) Others again make Aegipan the father of Pan, and state that he received his name from this son who represents half goat and half fish. (Entostich. Catast. 27.) When Zeus in his contest with the Titans was deprived of the sinews of his hands and feet, Hermes and Aegipan secretly restored them to him and fitted them in their proper places. (Apollod. i. 6. § 3; Hygin. Post. Astr. i. c.) According to a Roman tradition mentioned by Plutarch (Parallel. 22), Aegipan had sprung from the incestuous intercourse of Valeria of Tusculum and her father Valerius, and was considered only a different name for Silvanus. (Comp. Pan, and Voss. Mythol. Briefe, i. p. 80, &c.) [L. S.]

AEGISTHUS (Αγισθος), a son of Thyestes, who unwittingly begot him by his own daughter Pelopia. Immediately after his birth he was exposed by his mother, but was found and saved by shepherds and suckled by a goat, whence his name Aegisthus (from αγισθω and αγισθω, to be begotten by, and dx′f, a goat). From this circumstance he was called Aegisthus, who was elected praetor of the Achaean league in 13), and was regarded as the ancestor of two branches of the Doric race (Dymas and Pamphylus), while the third branch derived its name from Hyllus (Hylléeus), the son of Heracles, who had been adopted by Aegimius. (Apollod. ii. 8, § 3; Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. i. 121.) Respecting the connexion between Aegimius and Heracles, see Müller, Dor. i. 33, &c. [L. S.]

Homer appears to know nothing of all these tragic occurrences, and we learn from him only that, after the death of Thyestes, Aegisthus ruled as king at Mycenae and took no part in the Trojan expedition. (Od. iv. 518, &c.) While Agamemnon, the son of Atreus, was absent on his expedition against Troy, Aegisthus seduced Clytemnestra, the wife of Agamemnon, and was so wicked as to offer up thanks to the gods for the success with which his criminal exertions were crowned. (Hom. Od. iii. 383, &c.) In order not to be surprised by the return of Agamemnon, he sent out spies, and when Agamemnon came, Aegisthus invited him to a repast at which he had him treacherously murdered. (Horn. Od. iv. 524, &c.)

Then Aegisthus, finding that Agamemnon returned home and avenged the death of his father by putting the adulterer to death. (Horn. Od. i. 28, &c.; compare Agamemnon, Clytemnestra, Orchistes.)

[A. S.]

AEGLE (Άγκλή). 1. The most beautiful of the Naiads, daughter of Zeus and Nereus. (Virg. Eclog. vi. 20), by whom Hecules begot the Charites. (Paus. i. 38. § 1.)

2. A sister of Phaethon, and daughter of Helios and Clymene. (Hygin. Fab. 154, 156.) In her grief at the death of her brother she and her sisters changed into poplars.

3. One of the Hesperides. (Apollod. ii. 5. § 11; Serv. ad Aen. iv. 464; comp. Heroides.)

4. A nymph, daughter of Panopes, who was beloved by Theseus, and for whom he sought Ariadne. (Plut. Thea. 20; Athen. xii. p. 557.)

AEGLE (Άγκλή), one of the daughters of Aegeus (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 40. § 31) by Lympeia, the daughter of the Sun, according to Hermippus (op. Schol. in Aristoph. Plat. 701), or by Epione, according to Suidas. (s. v. Βριτή.)

She is said to have derived her name Aegle, "Brightness," or "Splendour," either from the beauty of the human body when in good health, or from the honour paid to the medical profession. (J. H. Meibom. Comment. in Hippocr. § 6; comp. H. N. i6mj.)

AEGLES (Άγκλῆς), or AEGLE'TES (Άγκλῆτες), that is, the radiant Splendour, by Epionc, according to Suidas. (s. v. Βριτή.)

AEGORGUS (Άγοργος), the goat-eater, a surname of Dionysus, at Potniae in Boeotia.

AEGO'CERUS (Άγοικήρος), descriptive of his figure with the horns of a goat, a surname of Dionysus, at Potniae in Boeotia. (Cell. v. 9; Val. Max. i. 8, ext. 4.)

AEGO'BOLUS (Άγοιβόλος), one of the signs of the Zodiac. (Lucan, ix. 536; Lucr. v. 614; C. Caes. Germ. in Astr. 213.)

AEGO'PHAGUS (Άγοιφαγός), a surname of Pan, descriptive of his figure with the horns of a goat, but is more commonly the name given to one of the signs of the Zodiac. (Lucan, ix. 536; Lucr. v. 614; C. Caes. Germ. in Astr. 213.)

AEGO'PIRUS (Άγοιπίρος), a pan of wine, served at the Olympic games.

AEGUS (Άγος). 1. (Caes. Bell. Civ. iii. 59, 60.) Aegus was afterwards killed in an engagement between the encampment of Caesar and Pompey. (iii. 64.)

AEGYPTUS (Άγυπτός), a son of Belus and Clymene, and twin-brother of Danaus. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 4; Tzetz. ad Lyceph. 389, 1155.)

Aegus was assigned to Danaus the sovereignty of Libya, and to Aegyptus he gave Arabia. The latter also subdued the country of the Melampodes, which he called Aegypt after his own name. Aegyptus by his several wives had fifty sons, and it so happened that his brother Danaus had just as many daughters. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 5; Hygin. Fab. 170.)

Danaus had reason to fear the sons of his brother, and died with his daughters to Argos in Peloponnesus. Thither he was followed by the sons of Aegyptus, who demanded his daughters for their wives and promised faithful alliance. Danaus complied with their request, and distributed his daughters among them, but to each of them he gave a dagger, with which they were to kill their husbands in the bridal night. All the sons of Aegyptus were thus murdered with the exception of Lynceus, who was saved by Hypermnestra. The Danads buried the heads of their murdered husbands in Lerna, and their bodies outside the town, and were afterwards purified of their crime by Athena and Hermes at the command of Zeus. (Paus. ii. 24. § 3), who saw the monument under which the heads of the sons of Aegyptus were believed to be buried, says that it stood on the way to Larissa, the citadel of Argos, and that their bodies were buried at Lerna. In Hyginus (Fab. 169) the name of Danaus is somewhat different from that of his brother. Aegyptus formed the plan of murdering Danaus and his daughters in order to gain possession of his dominions. When Danaus was informed of this he fled with his daughters to Argos. Aegyptus then sent out his sons in pursuit of the fugitives, and enjoined them not to return unless they had slain Danaus. The sons of Aegyptus laid siege to Argos, and when Danaus saw that further resistance was useless, he put an end to the hostilities by giving to each of the besiegers one of his daughters. The murder of the sons of Aegyptus then took place in the bridal night. There was a tradition at Patrae in Achaea, according to which Aegyptus himself came to Greece, and died at Arcos with grief for the fate of his sons. The temple of Serapis at Patrae contained a monument of Aegyptus. (Paus. vii. 21. § 6.)

AEIMNESTUS (Άιμνήστος), a Spartan, who killed Mardonius in the battle of Platea, B.c. 479, and afterwards fell himself in the Messenian war. (Herod. ix. 64.)

Aelianus, Plutarch (Arist. 19) calls Arimnestus (Άιμνήστος).

AE'LLA GENS, plebeian, of which the family-names and surnames are CATUS, GALLUS, GRACILIS, LAMIA, LIGUR, PAR'TUS, STAIJNUS, STILO, TUBERO.

AELIANUS.

Under the empire the Aelian name became still more celebrated. It was the name of the emperor Hadrian, and consequently of the Antonines, whom he adopted.

It is doubtful to which family P. Aelius belonged who was one of the first plebeian quaestors, B.C. 409. (Liv. iv. 54.)

AELIANUS was together with Amandus the leader of an insurrection of Gallic peasants, called Bagaudae, in the reign of Diocletian. It was put down by the Caesar Maximianus Herrulius. (Epit. x. 13; Aurel. Vict. de Cain. 39.)

AELIANUS, Caspelius, prefect of the Praetorian guards under Domitian and Nerva. He excited an insurrection of the guards against Nerva, in order to obtain the punishment of some obnoxious persons, but was killed by Trajan with his accomplices. (Dion Cass. l. xvi. 3, 5.)

AELIANUS, Claudius (Klaudios Alia¬nês), was born according to Suidas (s. v. Alia¬nês) at Praeneste in Italy, and lived at Rome. He calls himself a Roman (V. ii. xii. 25), as possessing the rights of Roman citizenship. He was particularly fond of the Greeks and of Greek literature and oratory. (V. ii. i. 32, xii. 25.) He studied under Pausanias the rhetorician, and imitated the eloquence of Nicostatus and the style of Dion Chrysostom; but especially admired Herodes Atticus more than any. He taught rhetoric at Rome in the time of Hadrian, and hence was called ἀφοβονητής. So complete was the command he acquired over the Greek language that he could speak as well as a native Athenian, and hence was called ἀμελῆστατος οὐκ ἀμέλεσθαι (Philost. V. ii. 31.) That rhetoric, however, was not his forte may easily be believed from the style of his works; and he appears to have given up teaching for writing. Suidas calls him Ἀρείπης (Pontifex). He lived to above sixty years of age, and had no children. He did not marry, because he would not have any. There are two considerable works of his remaining: one a collection of miscellaneous history (Ποικιλὴ ἱστορία) in fourteen books, commonly called his "Varia Historia," and the other a work on the peculiarities of animals (Περὶ ζῴων ἱδρύσεως) in seventeen books, commonly called his "De Animalium Natura." The former work contains short narrations and anecdotes, historical, biographical, antiquarian, &c., selected from various authors, generally without their names being given, and on a great variety of subjects. Its chief value arises from its containing many passages from works of older authors which are now lost. It is to be regretted that in selecting from Thucydides, Herodotus, and other writers, he has sometimes given himself the trouble of altering their language. But he tells us he liked to have his own way and to follow his own taste, and so he would seem to have altered for the mere sake of putting something different. The latter work is of the same kind, scrappy and gossipy. It is partly collected from older writers, and partly the result of his own observations both in Italy and abroad. According to Philostratus (in Vit.) he was scarcely ever out of Italy; but he tells us himself that he travelled as far as Aegypt; and that he saw at Alexandria an ox with five feet. (De Anim. xi. 40; comp. xi. 11.) This book would appear to have become a popular and standard work on zoology, since in the fourteenth century Manuel Philes, a Byzantine poet, founded upon it a poem on animals. At the end of the work is a concluding chapter (ἐπὶ ἔργον), where he states the general principles on which he has composed his work:—that he has spent great labour, care, and thought in writing it;—that he has preferred the pursuit of knowledge to the pursuit of wealth; and that, for his part, he found much more pleasure in observing the habits of the lion, the panther, and the fox, in listening to the song of the nightingale, and in studying the migrations of cranes, than in mere heaping up riches and being numbered among the great:—that throughout his work he has sought to adhere to the truth. Nothing can be imagined more deficient in arrangement than this work: he goes from one subject to another with the least link of a connexion, as (e.g.) from elephants (xi. 15) to dragons (xi. 16), from the liver of mice (ii. 56) to the uses of oxen (s. 57). But this absence of arrangement, treating things ποικίλα ποικίλαι, he says, is intentional: he adopted this plan to give variety to the work, and to avoid tedium to the reader. His style, which he commends to the indulgence of critics, though free from any great fault, has no particular merit. The similarity of plan in the two works, with other internal evidences, seems to show that they were both written by the same Aelian, and not, as Voss and Valckenaer conjecture, by two different persons.

In both works he seems desirous to inculcate moral and religious principles (see V. ii. vii. 44; De Anim. vi. 2, vii. 10, 11, ix. 7, and Epitology); and he wrote some treatises expressly on philosophical and religious subjects, especially one on Providentia (Προβολήν) in three books (Suidas, s. v. Ἀλειανὸς), and one on the Divine Manifestations (Περὶ θείων ἐφαρμογῶν), directed against the Epicureans, whom he alludes to elsewhere. (De Anim. vii. 44.) There are also attributed to Aelian twenty letters on husbandry and such-like matters (Ἀγρονομικὰ ἐπιστολάτοι), which are by feigned characters, are written in a rhetorical unreal style, and are of no value. The first edition of all his works was by Conrad Gesner, 1556, fol., containing also the works of Herodotus, Ptolemaeus, Adamantius and Melampus. The "Varia Historia" was first edited by Camillus Persius, Rome, 1545, 4to.; the principal editions since are by Perizonius, Leyden, 1701, 8vo., by Gronovius, Leyden, 1731, 2 vols. 4to., and by Kuhn, Leipzig, 1780, 2 vols. 8vo. The De Animalium Natura was edited by Gronovius, Lond. 1744, 2 vols. 4to., and by J. G. Schneider, Leipzig, 1784, 2 vols. 8vo. The last edition is that by Fr. Jacobs, Jena, 1832, 2 vols. 8vo. This contains the valuable materials which Schneider had collected and left for a new edition. The Letters were published apart from the other works by Aldus Manutius in his "Collectio Epistolarium Oecumenicum," Venice, 1499, 4to.

The Varia Historia has been translated into Latin by C. Gesner, and into English by A. Fleming, Lond. 1576, and by James Saley, 1665; this last has been reprinted more than once. The De Animalium Natura has been translated into Latin by Peter Gillius (a Frenchman) and by Conrad Gesner. It does not appear to have been translated into English.

There has also been attributed to Aelian a work called Ἀρχαγορὰ τοῦ Ἡρώδου, an attack on an effeminate man, probably meant for Elagabalus. (Suidas, s. v. Ἀρριής.)

[A. A.]
AEELIANUS.

AEELIANUS, LUCIUS, one of the thirty tyrants (a. d. 259-268) under the Roman empire. He assumed the purple in Gaul after the death of Postumus, and was killed by his own soldiers, because he would not allow them to plunder Moguntiacum. Trebellius Pallio and others call him Lollianus; Echkel (Doctr. Num. vii. p. 448) thinks, that his true name was Laelianus; but there seems most authority in favour of L. Aelianus. (Eratrop. ix. 7; Trebell. Pol. Tivg. Tnr. 4; Aurel. Vict. de Caes. 33, Epit. 32.)

AEELIANUS MECCIIUS (Aeulius Callinus), an ancient physician, who must have lived in the second century after Christ, as he is mentioned by Galen (De Theriaca ad Pamphil. init. vol. xiv. p. 299) as the eldest of his tutors. His father is supposed to have also been a physician, as Aelianus is said by Galen (De Dier. Muscul. c. 1. p. 2. ed. Diet.) to have made an epitome of his father's anatomical writings. Galen speaks of that part of his work which treated of the Dissection of the Muscles as being held in some repute in his time (ibid.), and he always mentions his tutor with respect. (ibid. c. 7, 22, pp. 11, 57.) During the prevalence of an epidemic in Italy, Aelianus is said by Galen (De Theriaca et Fusc. ibid.) to have used the Theriaca (Dict. of Ant. art. Ther. icis) with great success, both as a means of cure and also as a preservative against the disease. He must have been a person of some celebrity, as this same anecdote is mentioned by the Arabic Historian Abû l-Farràj (Histor. Compend. Dynast. p. 77), with exactly the same circumstances except that he makes the epidemic to have broken out at Antioch instead of in Italy. None of his works (as far as the writer is aware) are now extant.

AEELIANUS, PLAUTIUS, offered up the prayer as pontifex, when the first stone of the new Capitol was laid in a. d. 71. (Tac. Hist. iv. 53.) We learn from an inscription (Gruet, p. 453; Orelli, n. 750), that his real name was PLANTUS Silvanus Aelianus, that he held many important military commands, and that he was twice consul. His first consulship was in a. d. 47; the date of his second is unknown.

AEELIANUS TACTICIUS (Aelianus Tacticius) was most probably a Greek, but not the same as Claudius Aelianus. He lived in Rome and wrote a work in fifty-three chapters on the Military Tactics of the Greeks (Περὶ Ἐπιγραμμικῶν Τάξεων Ἐλληνσιῶν), which he dedicated to the emperor Hadrian. He also gives a brief account of the constitution of a Roman army at that time. The work once, he says (Diod. xxxii.), from a conversation he had with the emperor Nerva at Frontinus's house at Forumim. He promises a work on Naval Tactics also; but this, if it was written, is lost. The first edition of the Tactics (a very bad one) was published in 1592; the next, much better, was by Franciscus Robortellius, Venice, 1592, 4to., which contains a new Latin version by the editor, and is illustrated with many cuts. The best edition is that printed by Elzovir at Leyden, 1613. It is usually found bound up with Leo's Tactica (Lco).

It was translated into Latin first by Theodorus of Thessalonica. This translation was published at Rome, 1487, together with Vegetius, Frontinus, and Modestus. It is printed also in Robortellus's edition, which therefore contains two Latin versions. It has been translated into English by Capt. John Bingham, Lond. 1616, fol., and by Lord Dillon, 1614, 4to. AEELIUS DIONYSIUS. [Dionysi].

AEELIUS DONATUS. [Donatus.]

AEELIUS LAMPRIDIUS. [Lampridius.]

AEELIUS MARCIANUS. [Marcianus.]

AEELIUS MAURUS. [Maurus.]

AEELIUS PROMOTUS (Aelius Probus), an ancient physician of Alexandria, of whose personal history no particulars are known, and whose date is uncertain. He is supposed by Villison (Anecd. Graec. vol. ii. p. 179, note 1) to have lived after the time of Pompey the Great, that is, in the first century before Christ; but others he is considered to be much more ancient; and by Choulant (Handbuch der Aelriiandkunde für die Altere Medicin. Ed. 2. Leipzig, 1840, 8vo.), on the other hand, he is placed as late as the second half of the first century after Christ. He is most probably the same person who is quoted by Galen (De Compos. Medic., second. Lois. iv. 7, vol. xii. p. 750) simply by the name of dèlès. He wrote several Greek medical works, which are still to be found in manuscript in different libraries in Europe, but of which none (as far as the writer is aware) have ever been published, though Kühn intended his works to have been included in his collection of Greek medical writers. Some extracts from one of his works entitled Δωμαμπορ, Medicinalia Formularum Collectio, are inserted by C. G. Kühn in his Addit. ad Elench. Med. Vit. a. A. Fabricio in "Hed. Gr." Echbel, and by Bonna in his Tractatus de Scoroito, Verona, 1781, 4to. Two other of his works are quoted or mentioned by Hieron. Mercurialis in his Variae Lectiones, iii. 4, and his work De Venenat et Morbis Venenatos, i. 16, ii. 2; and also by Schneider in his Prefaces to Nicander's Theriaca, p. xi., and Alorapharmacos, p. xiv. [W. A. G.]

AEELLO. [Harpfihar.]

AEELLOPUS (Aellos), a surname of Iris, the messenger of the gods, by which she is described as swift-footed like a storm-wind. Homer uses the form ἄδδος. (Ili. viii. 400.) [L. S.]

AEELIUS. [Timothus Aelius.]

AEELMILIA. 1. A vestal virgin, who, when the sacred fire was extinguished on one occasion, prayed to the goddess for her assistance, and miraculously rekindled it by throwing a piece of her garment upon the extinct embers. ( Dionys. ii. 68 ; Val. Max. i. 1. 37.)

2. The third daughter of L. Aemilius Paullus, whose second husband, the noble Camillus, was the wife of Scipio Africanus I. and the mother of the celebrated Cornelia, the mother of the Gracchi. She was of a mild disposition, and long survived her husband. Her property, which was large, was inherited by her grandson by adoption, Scipio Africanus II., who gave it to his own mother Papiria, who had been divorced by his own father L. Aemilius.

* Δωμαμπορ is a word used by the later Greek writers, and is explained by Du Cange (Gloss. Med. et Infus. Graec.) to mean vis, virtus. It is however frequently used in the sense given to it in the text. See Leo, Conspect. Medic. i. 11. ap. Erminius. Anecd. Med. Graec. pp. 153, 157.*
AEMILIANUS.

(Polyc. xxiii. 12; Diod. Exc. xxxi.; Val. Max. vi. 7. 11; Plut. Aem. 2; Liv. xxxviii. 57.)

3. The third daughter of L. Aemilius Paullus Macedonicus was a little girl when her father was appointed consul a second time to conduct the war against Perseus. Upon returning home after his election he found her in tears, and upon inquiring the reason she told him that Perseus had died, which was the name of her dog; whereupon he exclaimed "I accept theomen," and regarded it as a pledge of his success in the war. (Cic. de B. J. xxxvi. 57.)

vi. 7. § 1; Plut. Aem. 10.

(Acm. Div. 10.)

AEMILIANUS. 1. The son of L. Aemilius Paullus Macedonicus, who received the name of Aemilius on account of the persuasiveness of his language (S' αιμιλιανος λόγος).

This Aemilianus is represented as one of the two vestal virgins, Marcia and Lelia, to commit the same crime, but these two were acquitted by the pontifices, when Aemilia was condemned, but were subsequently condemned by the praetor L. Cassius. (Plut. Quaest. Rom. p. 264; Liv. Epit. 68; Orosius, v. 15; Ascon. in C. Mil. p. 46, ed. Orelli.)

AEMILIA GEN'S, originally written AMLI-elia, one of the most ancient patrician houses at Rome. Its origin is referred to the time of Numa, and it is said to have been descended from Marmereus, who received the name of Aemilus on account of the perspicacity of his language (S' αιμιλιανος λόγος). This Marmereus is represented as one of the ten sons of the Aemilius. (Sil. Itin. viii. 297.)

It seems pretty clear that the Aemilii were of Sabine origin; and Festus derives the name Marmereus from the Os can, Marmers in that language being the same as Mars. The Sabines spoke Os can, and the Persians derived their name Marmeez from the Sabines. (Sil. Itin. viii. 297.)

Of the family of the Aemilii, the names Buca, Lepidus, Paullus, and Scaurus are the only ones that occur on coins.

AEMILIA'NUS. 1. The son of L. Aemilius Paullus Macedonicus, was adopted by P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus, and thus was called P. Cornelius Scipio Aemilianus Africannus. (Scipio.)

2. The governor of Pannonia and Moesia in the reign of Gallus. He is also called Aemilianus; and on coins we find as his praenomen both Marcus and Caicus. On one coin he is called C. Julius Aemilianus; but there is some doubt about the genuineness of the word Julius. (Eckhel, vii. p. 572.)

He was born in Mauritania about a. d. 206. He defeated the barbarians who had invaded his province, and chased them as far as the Danube, A. D. 235. He distributed among his soldiers the booty which was the name of his dog; whereupon he exclaimed "I accept theomen," and regarded it as a pledge of his success in the war. (Cic. de B. J. xxxvi. 57.)

3. Of the thirty tyrants (A. D. 259—268) was compelled by the troops in Egypt to assume the purple. He took the surname of Alexander or Alexandrinus. Gallienus sent Theodotus against him, by whom he was taken and sent prisoner to Gallienus. Aemilianus was strangled in prison. (Trebel. Poll. Trig. Tyr. 22, Gallien. 4, 5.)

AEMILIA'NUS (also Aemilius) in the fifth century after Christ, and is known as a physician, confessor, and martyr. In the reign of the Vandals King Hunneric (A. D. 477-484), during the Arian persecution in Africa, he was most cruelly put to death. The Romish church celebrates his memory on the sixth of December, the Greek church on the seventh. (Mor. Rom. ed. Baron.; Victor Vitensis, De Pers. Scipio, v. 1, with Rainwart's notes, Paris. 8vo. 1694; Bavins, Nomenclator Sacrorum Professionis Medicorum.)

[W. A. G.]

AEMILIA'NUS (Almilanos), a native of the town of Nicos, and an epigrammatic poet. Nothing further is known about him. Three of his epigrams have been preserved. (Antol. Graec. vii. 623, ix. 218, 765.)

AENEAS (Alfendrak), a patronymic from Aeneas, and applied as a surname to those who were believed to be descended from him, such as Aesculapius, Augustus, and the Romins in general. (Virg. Aen. ix. 653; Orb. Ec. Pont. i. 35; Met. xv. 682, 695.)

AENEAS (Aitelas). Homeric Story. Aeneas was the son of Anchises and Aphrodite, and born on mount Ida. On his father's side he was a great-grandson of Tros, and thus nearly related to the royal house of Troy, as Priam himself was a grandson of Tros. (Hom. I. xx. 215, &c., ii. 920, v. 247, &c.; Hes. Theb. 1067, &c.) He was educated from his infancy at Dardanus, in the house of Alcathous, the husband of his sister. (Ili.

xiii. 463, &c.) At the beginning of the war of the Greeks against Troy he did not take any part in it, and the poet intimates that there existed an ill feeling between him and Priam, who did not pay sufficient honour to Aeneas. (H. xiii. 469, &c., xx. 181.) This probably arose from a decrees of destiny, according to which Aeneas and his descendants were to rule over Troy, since the house of Priam had drawn upon itself the hatred of Cronion. (H. xx. 307.) One day when Aeneas was tending his flocks on mount Ida, he was attacked by Achilles, who took his cattle and put him to flight. But he was rescued by the gods. This event, however, and the admonition of Apollo, roused his spirit, and he led his Dardanians against the Greeks. (H. xx. 89, &c., 190, &c., ii. 819, &c.) Henceforth he and Hector are the great bulwarks of the Trojans against the Greeks, and Aeneas appears beloved and honoured by gods and men. (H. xl. 56, xvi. 619, v. 180, 467, vi. 77, &c.) He is among the Trojans what Achilles is among the Greeks. Both are sons of immortal mothers, both are at feud with the kings, and both possess, besides of divine origin. (H. v. 265, &c.) Achilles himself, to whom Hector owns his inferiority, thinks Aeneas a worthy competitor. (H. xx. 175.) The place which Aeneas occupies among the Trojans is well expressed in Philostratus (Her. 13), who says that the Greeks called Hector the hand, and Aeneas the soul of the Trojans. Respecting the brave and noble manner in which he protects the body of his friend Pandaros, see H. v. 299. On one occasion he was engaged in a contest with Diomedes, who hurled a mighty stone at him and broke his hip. Aeneas fell to the ground, and Aphrodite hastened to his assistance (H. v. 305), and when she too was wounded, Apollo carried him from the field of battle to his temple, where he was cured by Leto and Artemis. (H. v. 345, &c.) In the attack of the Trojans upon the wall of the Greeks, Aeneas commanded the fourth host of the Trojans. (H. xii. 98.) He avenged the death of Anchises by slaying Oenomaus and Aphareus, and hastened to the assistance of Hector, who was thrown on the ground by Ajax. The last feat Homer mentions is his fight with Achilles. On this as on all other occasions, a god interposed and saved him, and this time it was by Poseidon, who although in general hostile towards the Trojans, yet rescued Aeneas, that the decrees of destiny might be fulfilled, and Aeneas and his offspring might one day rule over Troy. (H. xx. 178, &c., 305, &c.) Thus far only is the story of Aeneas to be gathered from the Homeric poems, and far from alluding to Aeneas having emigrated after the capture of Troy, and having founded by the side of the Tiber a new kingdom, the poet distinctly intimates that he conceives Aeneas and his descendants as reigning at Troy after the extinction of the house of Priam. (Comp. Strab. xiii. p. 608.)

Lesser Stories. According to the Homeric hymn on Aphrodite (257, &c.), Aeneas was brought up by the nymphs of mount Ida, and was not taken to his father Anchises, until he had reached his fifth year, and then he was, according to the wish of the goddess, given out as the son of a nymph. Xenophon (De Venat. 1. § 18) says, that he was instructed by Cheiron, the usual teacher of the heroes. According to the "Cypris," he even took part in carrying off Helen. His bravery in the war against the Greeks is mentioned in the later traditions as well as in the earlier ones. (Hygin. Fab. 116; Philostr. E. c.) According to some accounts Aeneas was not present when Troy was taken, as he had been sent by Priam on an expedition to Phrygia, while according to others he was requested by Aphrodite, just before the fall of the city, to leave it, and accordingly went to mount Ida, carrying his father on his shoulders. (Dion. Hal. i. 48.) A third account makes him hold out at Troy to the last, and when all hopes disappeared, Aeneas with his Dardanians and the warriors of Ophryphon withdrew to the citadel of Pergamus, where the most costly treasures of the Trojans were kept. Here he repelled the enemy and received the fugitive Trojans, until he could hold out no longer. He then sent the people ahead to mount Ida, and followed them with his warriors, the images of the gods, his father, his wife, and his children, hoping that he would be able to maintain himself on the heights of mount Ida. But being threatened with an attack by the Greeks, he deserted the city to them, in consequence of which he surrendered his position and was allowed to depart in safety with his friends and treasures. (Dionys. i. 46, &c., Aelian, V. H. iii. 22; Hygin. Fab. 254.) Others again related that he was led by his hatred of Paris to betray Ilios to the Greeks, and was allowed to depart free and safe in consequence. (Dionys. l.c.) Livy (i. 1) states, that Aeneas and Antenor were the only Trojans against whom the Greeks did not make use of their right of conquest, on account of an ancient connexion of hospitality existing between them, or because Aeneas had always advised his countrymen to restore Helen to Menelaus. (Comp. Strab. l.c.)

The farther part of the story of Aeneas, after leaving mount Ida with his friends and the images of the gods, especially that of Pallis (Palladis, Paus. ii. 25, &c.) presents as many variations as that relating to the taking of Troy. All accounts, however, agree in stating that he left the coasts of Asia and crossed over into Europe. According to some he went across the Hellespont to the peninsula of Pallene and died there; according to others he proceeded from Thrace to the Arcadian Orchomenus and settled there. (Strab. l.c.; Paus. viii. 13. § 8; Dionys. Hal. i. 49.) By far the greater number of later writers, however, anxious to put him in connexion with the history of Latium and to make him the ancestral hero of the Romans, state that he went to Italy, though some assert that the Aeneas who came to Italy was not the son of Anchises and Aphrodite, and others that after he landed in Italy he returned to Troy, leaving his son Ascanius behind him. (Lycurgus, 1226, &c.; Dionys. l. c. 53; Liv. i. 1.) A description of the wanderings of Aeneas before he reached the coast of Latium, and of the various towns and temples he was believed to have founded during his wanderings, is given by Dionysius (l. 50, &c.), whose account is on the whole the same as that followed by Virgil in his Aeneid, although the latter makes various embellishments and additions, some of which, as his landing at Carthage and meeting with Dido, are irreconcilable with chronology. From Pallene (Three), where Aeneas stayed the winter after the taking of Troy, and founded the town of Aeneia on the Thermaic gulf (Liv. xl. 4), he sailed with his companions to Delos, Cythera (where he founded a temple of AENEAS (Avelae) GAZAEUS, so called from his birth-place, 4th a. d. 487. He was at first a Platonist and a Sophist, being a disciple of the philosopher Hierocles (as appears from his Theophrastus, Galland, p. 629) and a friend of Preobras (as we know from his Epistles). His date thus ascertained is confirmed by his stating, that he had heard speak some of the Confessors whose tongues Hierocles had cut out, 6th a. d. 484. (Jow. Ant. VII. i. 9.) When he was sent by the Roman Emperor to compose a dialogue, On the Inviolability of the Soul and the Resurrection of the Body, called Theophrastus from one of the interlocutors. This appeared first in a Latin version by Ambrosius Cunndulensis, 8vo., Ven. 1513, and 4to, Basel. 1516. The original Greek, with the Latin version of Wolf, fol. AENEAS SILVIUS, son of Silvius, and grandson of Ascanius. He is the third in the list of the mythical kings of Alba in Latium, and the Silvii regarded him as the founder of their house. (Liv. i. 3.) Dionysius (i. 71) ascribes to him a reign of 31 years. (Comp. Virg. Aen. 484. He notes of Boissonade, 8vo. Par. 1836. AENEAS (Alveae), surmamed TACTICUS (δ Τακτικός), a Greek writer, whose precise date is not known. Xenophon (Heil. vii. 3. § 1) mentions an Aeneas of Sympolias, who wrote about the time of the battle of Marathon, a. d. 490. What a. d. C. Marcus did himself by his bravery and skill as general of the Macedonians, Casaubon supposes this Aeneas to be the same, and the supposition is confirmed by a passage (Comment. Poliorc. 27) where he speaks familiarly of an Aecadian provincialism. But, however this may be, the general character of this work, the names he mentions, and the historical notices which occur, with other internal evidence, all point to about this period. He wrote a large work on the whole art of war, στρατινεία διδασκαλία, or περὶ τῶν στρατηγικῶν ὑμηρόματα (Polyb. x. 49; Sinuas, κ. a. Alveae), consisting of several parts. Of these only one is preserved, called τακτικά των πολεμικῶν ὑμηρόματα περὶ τῶν χωρίων πολεμοθρέων ἀντίκροι, commonly called Commentarii Polioereias. The object of the book

The sceptic began and ended in universal doubt. He was equally removed from the academic who denied, as from the dogmatic philosopher who affirmed; indeed, he attempted to confound both in one, and refute them by the same arguments. (Sext. Emp. i. 1.) Truth, he said, was not to be desired for its own sake, but for the sake of a certain repose of mind (ευρεταία) which followed on it, an end which the sceptic best attained in another way, by suspending his judgment (ευρετικόν), and allowing himself literally to rest in doubt. (i. 4.) With this view he must travel over the whole range of moral, metaphysical, and physical science. His method is the comparison of opposites, and his sole aim to prove that nothing can be proved, or what he termed, the έρωτούθενα of things. In common life he may act upon φανερώθεν with the rest of men: nature, law, and custom are allowed to have their influence; only when impelled to any vehement effort we are to remember that, here too, there is much to be said on both sides, and are not to lose our peace of mind by grasping at a shadow.

The causes of scepticism are more fully given under the article Pyrrhon. One of the most remarkable of its features was its connexion with the later philosophy of the Ionian school. From the failure of their attempts to explain the phenomena of the visible world, the Ionian philosophers were insensibly led on to deny the order and harmony of the visible world, the Ionian philosophers were insensibly led on to deny the order and harmony of things.
Met. mankind. Here again Aenesidemus seems to lose the sons of Aeolus, as Athamas (Ov. iv. 233.), probably meaning to illustrate it by the motion of the world was said to work by a principle of change, the principle of motion working internally. It was very natural then that the spects, proceeding from the only 4ρνικα which remained to him, should suggest an explanation of the outward world, derived from that of which alone he was certain, his own internal sensations. The mere suggestion of a probable cause might seem inconsistent with the distinction which the sceptics drew between their own absolute uncertainty and the probability spoken of by the Academicians: indeed, it was inconsistent with their metaphysical paradoxes to draw conclusions at all: if so, we must be content to allow that Aenesidemus (as Sextus Empiricus implies) got a little beyond the dark region of scepticism into the light of probability.

Other scattered opinions of Aenesidemus have been preserved to us, some of which seem to lead to the same conclusion. Time, he said, was τὸ δυ and τὸ τρόπων σῶμα (Pyr. Hyp. iii. 17), probably in allusion to the doctrine of the Stoics, that all really existing substances were σώματα: in other words, he meant to say that time was a really existing thing, and not merely a condition of thought. This was connected with the principle of change, which was inseparable from a notion of time: if so, it had a real existence (and upon its existence the whole system depended), the other must likewise have a real existence. In another place, adapting his language to that of Heraclitus, he said that "time was air" (Sext. Emp. ad loc. Log. iv. 233.), probably meaning to illustrate it by the imperceptible nature of air, in the same way that the motion of the world was said to work by a subtle and invisible fire. All things, according to his doctrine, were but φασικα which were brought out and adapted to our perceptions by their mutual opposition: metaphorically they might be said to shine forth in the light of Heraclitus's fire. He did not, indeed, explain how this union of opposites made them sensible to the faculties of man: probably he would rather have supported Eunicus mentioned by Pollux, (x. 100.) as the originator of the town of this name, and his wife of Aeneas, by whom she had a son, whom we are to explain the motions of the planets by the music of the spheres. 11. Or if the cause be seen, it cannot be shewn to exclude other hypotheses: we must not only prove the cause, but dispose of every other cause. 111. A regular effect may be attributed to an irregular cause: as if one were to explain the motions of the heavenly bodies by a sudden impulse. 1V. Men argue from things seen to things unseen, assuming that they are governed by the same laws.

Sextus Empiricus has preserved his argument against our knowledge of causes, as well as a table of eight methods by which all a priori reasonings might be confuted, as many arguments whatever may be by the διὰ τρόπων. I. Either the cause given is unseen, and not proven by things seen, as if a person were to explain the motions of the planets by the music of the spheres. 11. Or if the cause be seen, it cannot be shewn to exclude other hypotheses: we must not only prove the cause, but dispose of every other cause. 111. A regular effect may be attributed to an irregular cause: as if one were to explain the motions of the heavenly bodies by a sudden impulse. 1V. Men argue from things seen to things unseen, assuming that they are governed by the same laws.

V. Causes only mean opinions of causes, which are inconsistent with phenomena and with other opinions. VI. Equally probable causes are accepted or rejected as they agree with this or that preconceived notion. VII. These causes are at variance with phenomena as well as with abstract principles. VIII. Principles must be uncertain, because the facts from which they proceed are uncertain. (Pyrrh. Hyp. i. 17, ed. Fabr.)

It is to be regretted that nothing is known of the personal history of Aenesidemus. A list of his works and a sketch of their contents have been preserved by Photius. (Cod. 212.) He was the author of three books of Παραπερατήρια, and is mentioned as a recent teacher of philosophy by Aristocles. (Apud Euseb. Praeparat. Evang. xiv. 10.) It is to Aenesidemus that Sextus Empiricus was indebted for a considerable part of his work.

[§ J.]

AELENTE (Αελέντη), a daughter of Euseus, and wife of Aeneas, by whom she had a son, Ceyzens, the founder of the town of this name. (Apolon. Rhod. i. 950; Orph. Argon. 502, where she is called Aemippe.)

AE'RTCUS (Αερτευς), a Greek poet of the old comedy, whose play Ονδες is referred to by Suidas. (s.v. Аρτευς.) He seems to be the same as Eumenes mentioned by Pollux. (x. 100.)

AE'NIDES, a patronymic from Aeneas, which is applied by Valerius Flaccus (iii. 4) to the inhabitants of Cyzices, whose town was believed to have been founded by Ceyzen, the son of Aeneas.

AE'O'LDIDES (Αιολίδης), a patronymic given to the sons of Aeolis, as Athanas (Ov. Met. iv. 511), Magnes (Paus. vi. 21 § 7), Macenaeus (Ov. Met. ix. 566), Miseneon (Verg. Aen. vi. 164), AEOLUS.

Sisyphus (Ov. Met. xii. 26; Hom. Il. vi. 154), Cretheus (Hom. Od. xi. 237), Iocastus (Tzetza ad Lycophr. 732); and to his grandsons, as Cephalus (Ov. Met. vi. 621), Odysseus (Verg. Aen. vi. 529), and Phryxus. (Val. Placc. i. 286.) Aeolis is the patronymic of the female descendants of Aeolus, and is given to his daughters Canace and Aleyyone. (Ov. Met. xi. 573; Heroid. xi. 5.) [L. S.]

AEOLUS (AloAoy). In the mythical history of Greece there are three personages of this name, who are spoken of by ancient writers as connected with one another; but this connexion is so confused, that it is impossible to gain a clear view of them. (Muller, Orchom. p. 139, &c.) We shall follow Diodorus, who distinguishes between the three, although in other passages he confounds them.

1. A son of Hellen and the nymph Orseis, and a brother of Dorus and Xuthus. He is described as the ruler of Thessaly, and regarded as the father of the Aeolians in that country; and is given to his daughters Canace and Alcyone. (Ov. Met. xi. 7.) [L. S.]

2. According to some accounts a son of Hipotes, and is given by Hyginus. (Fab. 238, 242) Aeolus had a son, Glaucus, and it is said that he was the father of Polyphontes, who also forced Merope to become his wife. (Callim. Hymn. in Del. 26.)

3. According to some accounts he was the grandson of Mimas the son of Aeolus. Arne, the daughter of this second Aeolus, afterwards became mother of a third Aeolus. (Comp. Paus. ii. 34. § 3.) In another passage (v. 7) Diodorus represents the third Aeolus as a son of Hipotes.

4. According to some accounts a son of Hipotes, or, according to others, of Poseidon and Arne, the daughter of the second Aeolus. His story, which probably refers to the emigration of a branch of the Aeolian family to the west, is thus related: Arne declared to her father that she was with child by Poseidon, but her father disbelieving her statement, gave her to a stranger of Metapontum in Italy, who took her to his native town. Here she became mother of two sons, Bocotus and Aeolus (iii.), who were adopted by the man of Metapontum in accordance with an oracle. When they had grown up to manhood, they took possession of the sovereignty of Metapontum by force. But when a dispute afterwards arose between their mother Arne and their foster-mother Autolyte, the two brothers slew the latter and fled with their mother from Metapontum. Aeolus went to some islands in the Tyrrhenian sea, which received from him the name of the Aeolian islands, and according to some accounts built the town of Lipara. (Diod. iv. 97, v. 7.) Here he reigned as a just and pious king, behaved kindly to the natives, and taught them the use of sails in navigation, and foretold them from signs which he observed in the fire the nature of the winds that were to rise. Hence, says Diodorus, Aeolus is depicted in mythology as the ruler over the winds, and it was this Aeolus to whom Ovid alludes during his wanderings. A different account of the matter is given by Hyginus. (Fab. 186.)

In these accounts Aeolus, the father of the Aeolian race, is placed in relationship with Aeolus, the ruler and god of the winds. The groundwork on which this connexion was formed by the poets and mythographers, is found in Homer. (Od. x. 2, &c.) In Homer, however, Aeolus, the son of Hipotes, is neither the god nor the father of the winds, but merely the happy ruler of the Aeolian island, whom Cronion had made the master of the winds, which he might soothe or excite according to his pleasure. (Od. x. 21, &c.) This statement of Homer and the etymology of the name of Aeolus from δέλας were the cause, that in later times Aeolus was regarded as the god and king of the winds, which he kept enclosed in a mountain. It is therefore to him that Juno applies when she wishes to destroy the fleet of the Trojans. (Verg. Aen. i. 79.) The Aeolian island of Homer was in the time of Pausanias believed to be Lipara (Paus. x. xi. § 3), and this or Strongyle was accordingly regarded in later times as the place in which the god of the winds dwelled. (Verg. Aen. viii. 416, i. 52; Strob. vi. p. 276.) Other accounts place the residence of Aeolus in Thrace (Apollo Rhod. i. 954, iv. 765; Callim. Hymn. in Del. 26), or in the neighbourhood of Rhegium in Italy. (Tzetza ad Lycophr. 732; comp. Diod. v. 8.)

The following passages of later poets also show how universally Aeolus had gradually come to be regarded as a god: Ov. Met. i. 264, xi. 746 xiv. 223; Val. Flacc. i. 575; Quint. Smyr. xiv. 475. Whether he was represented by the ancients in works of art is not certain, but we now possess no representation of him. [L. S.]

AEPTYUS (Afrorats). 1. One of the mythical kings of Arcadia. He was the son of Elijatus (Pind. Ol. vi. 54), and originally ruled over Phaeaces on the Alpheius in Arcadia. When Cleitor, the son of Azau, died without leaving any issue, Aepytus succeeded him and became king of the Arcadians, a part of whose country was called after him Aepytis. (Paus. viii. 4. § 4, 34. § 3.) He is said to have been killed during the chase on mount Sepia by the bite of a venomous snake. (Paus. viii. 4. § 4, 16. § 2.) He was still shown in the time of Pausanias, and he was anxious to see it, because it was mentioned in Homer. (Ht. ii. 4.)

2. The youngest son of Cresentheus the Helmid, king of Messenia, and of Merope, the daughter of the Arcadian king Cypselus. Cresentheus and his other sons were murdered during an insurrection, and Aepytus alone, who was educated in the house of his grandfather Cypselus, escaped the danger. The throne of Cresentheus was in the meantime occupied by the Helmid Polyphantes, who also forced Merope to become his wife. (Apoll. ii. 8. § 5.) When Aepytus had grown to manhood, he was enabled by the aid of Holeas, his father-in-law, to return to his kingdom, punish the murderers of his father, and put Polyphantes to death. He left a son, Glaucus, and it was from him that subsequently the kings of Mes enia were called Ascytids instead of the more general name Heraclids. (Pans. iv. 3. § 3, &c., vi. 5. § 5; Hygin. Fab. 137, 184.)

3. A son of Hippothus, and king of Arcadia. He was a great-grandson of the Ascytids mentioned first. He was reigning at the time when Orestes, in consequence of an oracle, left Mycenae and settled in Arcadia. There was at Mantinea a sanctuary, which down to the latest time no mortal was ever allowed to enter. Ascytus disregarding the sacred custom crossed the threshold, but was immediately struck with blindness, and died soon after. He was succeeded by his son Cypselus.
(Paus. viii. 5. § 3) [L. S.]

AÆRIUS (Ἀερίος), Heretic, the intimate friend of Eustathius of Sebaste in Armenia, A. D. 360, was living when St. Epiphanius wrote his Book against Heresios, A. D. 374-6. After living together an ascetic life, Eustathius was raised to the episcopate, and by him Aeriaus was ordained priest and set over the Hospital (σταυροθερέως) of Pontus. (St. Epiph. adv. Haer. 75. § 1.) But nothing could allay the envy of Aeriaus at the elevation of his companion. Caresses and threats were in vain, and last he left Eustathius, and publicly accused him of covetousness. He assembled a troop of men and women, who with him professed the renunciation of all worldly goods (ἀσκομαία). Demand entered into the towns, they roamed about the fields, and lodged in the open air or in caves, exposed to the inclemency of the seasons. Aeria-superadded to the irreligion of Ariaus the following errors: 1. The denial of a difference of order between a bishop and a priest. 2. The rejection of prayer and alms for the dead. 3. The refusal to observe Easter and stated fasts, on the ground of such observances being Jewish. St. Epiphanius refutes these errors. (l.c.) There were remains of his followers in the time of St. Augustine. (Adv.

written A. D. 418.) [A. J. C.]

AÆROPE (Ἀερόπη), a daughter of Cretaus, king of Crete, and granddaughter of Minos. Her father, who had received an oracle that he should lose his life by one of his children, gave her her sister, Clymene, to Nauplius, who was to sell them in a foreign land. Another sister, Apemone, and her brother, Aethenemos, who had heard of the oracle, hid left Crete and gone to Rhodes. Aeco afterwards married Pleisthenes, the son of Aeren, and became by him the mother of Agamemnon and Menelaeus. (Apollod. iii. 2. § 1, &c.; Serv. ad Aen. i. 459; Dictys Cret. i. 1.) After the death of Pleisthenes Aærope married Aërenos, and became the mother of Agamemnon and Menelaus, who were educated by Atreus, and generally believed to be his sons. Aærope, however, became faithless to Atreus, being seduced by Thyestes. (Eurip. Orct. 5, &c.; Hecat. 397; Hygin.

Aesacus himself was married to Aesaca, the dughter of the river god Cebren, who died early, and while he was lamenting her death he was changed into a bird. (Apollod. iii. 12. § 5) Ovid (Met. xi. 750) relates his story differently. Ac-ccording to him, Aesacus was the son of Alexander, the daughter of the river Granicus. He lived far from his father's court in the solitudes of mountain-forests. Hesperia, however, the daughter of Cebren, kindled love in his heart, and on one occasion while he was pursuing her, she was stung by a serpent. Aesacus in his grief threw himself into the sea and was changed by Thetis into an aquatic bird. (J. S.]

from his country under the tyranny of the Thirty. He then served in the Athenian armies in Asia and spent the remainder of his life at Athens, at first in reduced circumstances. (Aesch. De fals. Leg. pp. 39, 47.) His birth to him was a free Athenian citizen, and the daughter of Glaucias of Acharne. Which of these accounts is true, cannot be decided, but there seems to be no doubt that Demostenes is guilty of exaggeration in his account of the parents of Aeschines and his early youth.

Aeschines had two brothers, one of whom, Philochares, was older than himself, and the other, Aphiobotus, was the youngest of the three. Philochares was at one time one of the ten Athenian generals, an office which was conferred upon him for three successive years; Aphiobotus followed the calling of a scribe, but had once been sent on an embassy to the king of Persia and was afterwards connected with the administration of the public revenue of Athens. (Aesch. De fals. Leg. p. 48.) All these things seem to contain strong evidence that the family of Aeschines, although poor, must have been of some respectability. Respecting his early youth nothing can be ascribed with certainty, except that he assisted his father in his school, and that afterwards, being of a strong and athletic constitution, he was employed in the gymnasia for money, to contend with other young men in their exercises. (Dem. De Coron. p. 313; Plut. Vit. x. oral. Aeschi. p. 840.) It is a favourite custom of late writers to place great orators, philosophers, poets, &c., in the relation of teacher and scholar to one another, and accordingly Aeschines is represented as a disciple of Socrates, Plato, and Isocrates. If these statements, which are even contradicted by the ancients themselves, were true, Aeschines would not have omitted to mention it in the many opportunities he bad. The distinguished orator and statesman Aristophon engaged Aeschines as a scribe, and in the same capacity he afterwards served Eubulus, a man of great influence with the democratic party, with whom he formed an intimate friendship, and to whose political principles he remained faithful to the end of his life. That he served two years as περιπότηρος, from his eighteenth to his twentieth year, as all young men at Athens did, Aeschines (De fals. Leg. p. 50) expressly states, and this period of his military training must probably have placed before the time that he acted as a scribe to Aristophon; for we find that, after leaving the service of Eubulus, he tried his fortune as an actor, for which he was provided by nature with a strong and sonorous voice. He acted the parts of τραγωνιστας, but was unsuccessful, and in one occasion, when he was performing in the character of Oenomaus, was hissed off the stage. (Dem. De Coron. p. 288.) After this he left the stage and engaged in military services, in which, according to his own account (De fals. Leg. p. 50), he gained great distinction. (Comp. Dem. De fals. Leg. p. 375.) After several less important engagements in other parts of Greece, he distinguished himself in B.C. 362 in the battle of Mantinea; and afterwards in B.C. 338, he also took part in the expedition of the Athenians against Euboea, and fought in the battle of Tamynae. On this occasion he gained such laurels, that he was praised by the generals on the spot, and, after the victory was gained, was sent to carry the news of it to Athens. Tenemides, who was sent with him, bore witness to his courage and bravery, and the Athenians honoured him with a crown. (Aesch. De fals. Leg. p. 51.)

Two years before this campaign, the last in which he took part, he had come forward at Athens as a public speaker (Aesch. Epist. 12), and the military fame which he had now acquired established his reputation. His former occupation as a scribe to Aristophon and Eubulus had made him acquainted with the laws and constitution of Athens, while his acting on the stage had been a useful preparation for public speaking. During the first period of his public career, he was, like all other Athenians, zealously engaged in directing the attention of his fellow-citizens to the growing power of Philip, and exhorted them to check it in its growth. After the fall of Olynthus in B.C. 348, Eubulus prevailed on the Athenians to send an embassy to Peloponnesus with the object of uniting the Greeks against the common enemy, and Aeschines was sent to Arcadia. Here Aeschines spoke at Megalopolis against Hieronymus, an emissary of Philip, but without success; and from this moment Aeschines, as well as all his fellow-citizens, gave up the hope of effecting anything by the united forces of Greece. (Dem. De fals. Leg. pp. 344, 438; Aesch. De fals. Leg. p. 38.) When therefore Philip, in B.C. 347, gave the Athenians to understand that he was inclined to make peace with them, Philocrates urged the necessity of sending an embassy to Philip to treat on the subject. Ten men, and among them Aeschines and Demosthenes, were accordingly sent to Philip, who received them with the utmost politeness, and Aeschines, when it was his turn to speak, reminded the king of the rights which Athens had to his friendship and alliance. The king promised to send forthwith ambassadors to Athens to negotiate the terms of peace. After the return of the Athenian ambassadors they were each rewarded with a wreath of olive, on the proposal of Demosthenes, for the manner in which they had discharged their duties. Aeschines from this moment forward was inflexible in his opinion, that nothing but peace with Philip could avert utter ruin from his country. That this was perfectly in accordance with what Philip wished is clear, but there is no reason for supposing, that Aeschines had been bribed into this opinion, or that he urged the necessity of peace with a view to ruin his country. (Aesch. in Cleopha. p. 62.) Antipater and two other Macedonian ambassadors arrived at Athens soon after the return of the Athenian ones, and after various debates Demosthenes urgently advised the people to conclude the peace, and speedily to send other ambassadors to Philip to receive his oath to it. The only difference between Aeschines and Demosthenes was, that the former would have concluded the peace even without providing for the Athenian allies, which was happily prevented by Demosthenes. Five Athenian ambassadors, and among them Aeschines but not Demosthenes (De Coron. p. 255), set out for Macedon the more speedily, as Philip was making war upon Cersobleptes, a Thracian prince and ally of Athens. They went to Pella to wait for the arrival of Philip from Thrace, and were kept there for a considerable time, for Philip did not come until he had completely subdued Cersobleptes. At last, however, he swore to the peace, from which the Phocian was expressly excluded. Philip honoured the Athenian ambassadors with rich presents, promised to restore all Athenian prisoners without ransom, and wrote a polite letter to the people of Athens apologising for having detained their ambassadors so long. (Dem. De fals. Leg. pp. 394, 405.) Hyperides and Timarchus, the former of whom was a friend of Demosthenes, brought forward an accusation against the ambassadors, charging them with high treason against the republic, because they were bribed by the king. Timarchus accused Aeschines, and Hyperides Philocrates. But Aeschines evaded the danger by bringing forward a counter-accusation against Timarchus (n. c. 343), and by showing that the moral conduct of his accuser was such that he had no right to speak before the people. The speech in which Aeschines attacked Timarchus is still extant, and its effect was, that Timarchus was obliged to drop his accusation, and Aeschines gained a brilliant triumph. The operations of Philip after this peace, and his march towards Thermopylae, made the Athenians very uneasy, and Aeschines, though he assured the people that the king had no hostile intentions towards Athens and only intended to chastise Thessalia, was again requested to go as ambassador to Philip and insure his abiding by the terms of his peace. But he deferred going on the pretext that he was ill. (Dem. De fals. Leg. p. 337.) On his return he pretended that the king had secretly confided to him that he would undertake nothing against either Phocis or Athens. Demosthenes saw through the king's plans as well as the treachery of Aeschines, and how just his apprehensions were became evident soon after the return of Aeschines, when Philip announced to the Athenians that he had taken possession of Phocis. The people of Athens, however, were silenced and lulled into security by the repeated assurances of the king and the venal orators who advocated his cause at Athens. In n. c. 346, Aeschines was sent as τοαγώγας to the assembly of the amphictyons at Pylenas which was convoked by Philip, and at which he received greater honours than he could ever have expected.

At this time Aeschines and Demosthenes were at the head of the two parties, into which not only Athens, but all Greece was divided, and their political enmity created and nourished personal hatred. This enmity came to a head in the year n. c. 343, when Demosthenes charged Aeschines with having been bribed and having betrayed the interests of his country during the second embassy to Philip. This charge of Demosthenes (πεπλαφερετος) was not spoken, but published as a memorial, and Aeschines answered it in a similar memorial on the amphictyons at Pylenas which was likewise published (Dem. De fals. Leg. p. 337), and in the composition of which he is said to have been assisted by his friend Eubulus. The result of these mutual attacks is unknown, but there is no doubt that it gave Philip an opportunity of pitting Aeschines against Demosthenes. At the time he wrote his memorial we gain a glimpse into his private life. Some years before that occurrence he had married a daughter of Philemonas, a man of high respectability in his tribe of Paenaeus, and in 343 he was father of three little children. (Aesch. De fals. Leg. p. 53.) It was probably in n. c. 342, that Antiphon, who had been expelled and lived in Macedonia, secretly returned to the Pelasgians with the intention of setting fire to the Athenian ships of war. Demosthenes discovered him, and had him arrested. Aeschines denounced the conduct of Demosthenes as a violation of the democratical constitution. Antiphon was sentenced to death; and although no disclosure of any kind could be extorted from him, still it seems to have been believed in many quarters that Aeschines had been his accomplice. Hence the honourable office of σωλήνα to the sanctuary in Delos, which had just been given him, was taken from him and bestowed upon Hyperides. (Demosth. De Coron. p. 271.) In n. c. 340 Aeschines was again present at Delphi as Athenian τοιογράφος, and caused the second sacred war against Amphissa in Locris for having taken into cultivation some sacred lands. Philip entrusted with the supreme command by the am¬ phictyons, marched into Locris with an army of 30,000 men, ravaged the country, and established himself in it. When in 338 he advanced south¬ ward as far as Elatea, all Greece was in consterna¬ tion. Demosthenes alone persevered, and roused his countrymen to a last and desperate struggle. The battle of Chaeroneia in this same year decided the fate of Greece. The misfortune of that day gave a handle to the enemies of Demosthenes for attacking him; but notwithstanding the babies which Aeschines received from Antipater for this purpose, the pure and sustained patriotism of Demosthenes was so generally recognised, that he received the honourable charge of delivering the funeral oration over those who had fallen at Chaeroneia. Ctesiphon proposed that Demosthenes should be rewarded for the services he had done to his country, with a golden crown in the theatre at the great Dionysia. Aeschines availed himself of the illegal form in which this reward was proposed to be given, to bring a charge against Ctesiphon on that ground. But he did not prosecute the matter till eight years later, that is, in n. c. 330, when after the death of Philip, and the victories of Alexander, political affairs had assumed a different aspect in Greece. After having commenced the prosecution of Ctesiphon, he is said to have gone for some time to Macedonia. What induced him to drop it? The mention and of Ctesiphon, and to take it up again eight years afterwards, are questions which can only be answered by conjectures. The speech in which he accused Ctesiphon in n. c. 330, and which is still extant, is so skilfully managed, that if he had succeeded he would have totally destroyed all the political influence and authority of Demosthenes. The latter answered Aeschines in his celebrated oration on the crown (πεπληστοάνω). Even before Demosthenes had finished his speech, Aeschines acknowledged himself conquered, and withdrew from the court and his country. When the matter was put to the votes, not even a fifth of them was in favour of Aeschines. Aeschines went to Asia Minor. The statement of Plutarch, that Demosthenes provided him with the means of accomplishing his journey, is surely a fable. He spent several years in Ionia and Caria, occupying himself with teaching rhetoric, and anxiously waiting for the return of Alexander to Europe. When in n. c. 324 the report of the death of Alexander reached him, he left Asia and went to Rhodes, where he established a school of eloquence, which subsequently became very celebrated, and occupies a middle position between the gravely maintained by the Attic orators, and the effiminate luxuriousness of the so-called Asiatic school of oratory. On one occasion he read to his audience in Rhodes his speech against Ctesiphon, and when some of his hearers expressed their astonishment at his having been defeated notwithstanding his brilliant oration, he replied, "You would cease to be astonished, if you had heard Demosthenes." (Cic.
De Orat. iii. 5; Plin. H. N. vii. 30; Plin. Epilet. ii. 8; Quintil. xi. 3. § 6.) From Rhodes he went to Samos, where he died in B.C. 314.

The conduct of Aeschines has been censured by the writers of all ages; and for this many reasons may be mentioned. In the first place, and above all, it was his misfortune to be constantly placed in juxtaposition or opposition to the spotless glory of Demosthenes, and this must have made him appear more guilty in the eyes of those who saw through his actions, while in later times the contrast between the greatest orators of the time was frequently made the theme of rhetorical declanation, in which one of the two was praised or blamed at the cost of the other, and less with regard to truth than to effect. Respecting the last period of his life we scarcely possess any other source of information than the accounts of late sophists and declamations. Another point to be considered in forming a just estimate of the character of Aeschines is, that he had no advantages of education, and that he owed his greatness to none but himself. His occupations during the early part of his life were such as necessarily engendered in him the low desire of gain and wealth;
and had he overcome these passions, he would have been equal to Demosthenes. There is, however, not the slightest ground for believing, that Aeschines recommended peace with Macedonia at first from any other motive than the desire of providing for the good of his country. Demosthenes himself acted in the same spirit at that time, for the crafiness of Philip deceived both of them.
But while Demosthenes altered his policy on discovering the secret intentions of the king, Aeschines continued to advocate the principles of peace. But there is nothing to justify the belief that Aeschines intended to ruin his country, and it is much more probable that the crafty king deceived him. And an uncorrupted character, such as Aeschines firmly believed he was doing right, and was thus unconsciously led on to become a traitor to his country. But no ancient writer except Demosthenes charges him with having received bribes from the Macedonians for the purpose of betraying his country. He appears to have been carried away by the favour of the king and the people, who delighted in hearing him, what they themselves wished, and, perhaps also, by the opposition of Demosthenes himself.

Aeschines spoke on various occasions, but he published only three of his orations, namely, against Timarchus, on the Embassy, and against Ctesiphon.
As an orator, he was inferior to none but Demosthenes. He was endowed by nature with extraordinary oratorical powers, of which his orations afford abundant proofs. The facility and felicity of his diction, the boldness and the vigour of his descriptions, carry away the reader now, as they must have carried away his audience. The ancients, as Photius (Cod. 61) remarks, designated these three orations as the "Moesi", and the nine letters which were extant in the time of Photius, as the "Moesi". Besides the three orations, we now possess twelve letters which are ascribed to Aeschines, which however are in all probability not more genuine than the so-called epistles of Phalaris, and are undoubtedly the work of late sophists.

The principal sources of information concerning Aeschines are: 1. The orations of Demosthenes on the Embassy, and on the Crown, and the orations of Aeschines on the Embassy and against Ctesiphon. These four orations were translated into Latin by Cicero; but the translation is lost, and we now possess only an essay which Cicero wrote
as an introduction to them: "De optimo genere Oratorum," 2. The life in Plutarch's Vita decem Oratorum. 3. The life of Aeschines by Philostates.
4. The life of Aeschines by Libanius. 5. Apolloerus' Exegesis. The last two works are printed in Reiske's edition, p. 10, fol. The best modern essay on Aeschines is that by Passow in Erach and Gruber's Encyclopedia, ii. p. 78, &c. There is also a work by E. Stoeche, De Aeschinis Orato-ris Vita, Berlin, 1841, 4to., which is an attempt to clear the character of Aeschines from all the processes that have been attached to it; but the essay is written in exceedingly bad Latin, and the attempt is a most complete failure.

The first edition of the orations of Aeschines is that of Aldus Manutius in his Cleeodic Rhetorum Gracorum, Venice, 1513, fol. An edition with a Latin translation, which also contains the letters attributed to Aeschines, is that of H. Wolf, Basel, 1762, fol. The next important edition is that by Taylor, which contains the notes of Wolf, Taylor, and Markland, and appeared at Cambridge in 1748-56 in his collection of the Attic orators. In Reiske's edition of the Attic orators Aeschines occupies the third volume, Lips. 1771, 8vo. The best editions are those of L. Bekker, vol. iii. of his Oratores Attic. Oxford, 1822, 8vo., for which thirteen new MSS. were collated, and of F. II.
Brenni, Zurich, 1823, 2 vols. 8vo. The oration against Demosthenes has been translated into English by Portal and Lea land. [L. S.]

AESTHINES (Άστίκης), an Athenian philosopher and rhetorician, son of a sausage-seller, or, according to other accounts, of Lyssias (Diog.
Laecri. ii. 60; Suidas, s. v. "Aesthe") and a disciple, although by some of his contemporaries held an unworthy one, of Socrates. From the account of Laerius, he appears to have been the familiar friend of his great master, who said that "the sausageseller's son only knew how to honour him." The same writer has preserved a tradition that it was Aeschines, and not Crito, who offered to assist Socrates in his escape from prison.

The greater part of his life was spent in abject poverty, which gave rise to the advice of Socrates to him, "to borrow money of himself, by diminishing his daily wants." After the death of his master, according to the charge of Lyssias, apud Athen.
iiii. p. 611, e. f.), he kept a perfumer's shop with borrowed money, and presently becoming bankrupt, was obliged to leave Athens. Whether from necessity or inclination, he followed the fashion of the day, and retired to the Syracusan court, where the friendship of Aristippus might console him for the contempt of Plato. He remained there until the expulsion of the younger Dionysius, and on his return, finding it useless to attempt a rivalry with his great contemporaries, he gave private lectures. One of the charges which his opponents delighted to repeat, and which by association of ideas constituted him a sophist in the eyes of Plato. Another story was invented that some of his expeditions. He is mentioned by and his followers, was that of receiving money for ideas constituted him a sophist in the eyes of Plato native of Mitylene and a pupil of Aristotle, and delighted to repeat, and which by association of was an epic poet of the same name, who was a reading them at Megara. Plato is related by with the Samian Aeschines, and to have been many scholars have supposed him to be identical {Chit, (s. v.) these dialogues were really the work of Socrates; Suidas and Tzetzes viii. 40G). As charged Aeschines with the theft while he was stole from him his solitary pupil Xenocrates.

The three dialogues, Περὶ διεργίας, Περὶ διδασκαλίας, Περὶ πλούτου, Αἰσχύλος ἤ περὶ θανάτου, which have come down to us under the name of Aeschines are not genuine remains: it is even doubted whether they are the same works which the ancients acknowledged as spurious. They have been edited by Fischer, the third edition of which (8vo. Lips. 1786) contains the criticisms of Wolf, and forms part of a volume of spurious Platonic dialogues (Simonis Socratici ut videtur dialogi quatuor) by Büchel, Heidelberg. 1810.

The genuine dialogues, from the slight mention made of them by Demetrius Phalerus, seem to have been full of Socratic irony. Hermogenes, Περὶ 186θε, considers Aeschines as superior to Xenophon in elegance and purity of style. A long and amusing passage is quoted by Cicero from him. (De Invent. i. 31; Diogenes Laertius, ii. 60-64, and the authorities collected by Fischer.) [B. J.]

AESCHINES (Αἰσχίνου), of Miletus, a contemporary of Cicero, and a distinguished orator in the Asiatic style of eloquence. He is said by Diogenes Laertius to have written on Politics. He died in exile on account of having spoken too freely to Pompey. (Cic. Brut. 95; Diog. Laert. ii. 64; Strab. xiv. p. 635; Sen. Controv. i. 8.)

AESCHINES (Αἰσχίνου), of Neapolis, a Peripatetic philosopher, who was at the head of the Academy at Athens, together with Charrades and Clitomachus about a. c. 109. (Cic. de Orat. i. 11.) Diogenes Laertius (ii. 64) says, that he was a pupil of Melanthes the Rhodian.

AESCHINES (Αἰσχίνου), an ancient physician, who lived in the latter half of the fourth century after Christ. He was born in the island of Chios, and christened at Athens, where he appears to have practised with very little success, but acquired great fame by a happy cure of Eunapius Sardianus, who on his voyage to Athens (as he tells us himself, in vita Procris. p. 76, ed. Boisson) had been seized with a fever of a very violent kind, which yielded only to treatment of a peculiar nature. An Athenian physician of this name is quoted by Pliny (H. N. xxvii. 10), of whom it is only known, that he must have lived some time before the middle of the first century after Christ. [W. A. O.]

AESCHRON, of Syracusae, whose wife Pippa was one of the mistresses of Verres, is frequently mentioned by Cicero in the Verrier Orations. (ii. 14, v. 19, 31.) He assisted Verres in robbing the Syruncanans (ii. 21), and obtained the pardon of the titles of the Herbitanes for the purpose of plundering them. (iii. 33.)

AESCHRON (Αἰσχρου), an iambic poet, a native of Samos. He is mentioned by Athenaeus (vii. p. 296, f. viii. p. 335, c.), who has preserved some choliambic verses of his, in which he defends the Samian Philaenus against Polycrates, the Athenian rhetorician and sophist. Some of his verses are also quoted by Tzetzes (ad Lycophr. 638). There was an epic poet of the same name, who was a native of Mitylene and a pupil of Aristotle, and who is said to have accompanied Alexander on some of his expeditions. He is mentioned by Suidas (s. v.) and Tzetzes (Chil. viii. 406). As he was also a writer of iambics and choliambics, many scholars have supposed him to be identical with the Samian Aeschines, and to have been called a Mitylenean in consequence of having resided for some time in that city. (Schneldewin, Delectus Poetarum Samib. et melicorum Graec. ; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. xiii. 834.) [C. P. M.]

AESCHYLUS (Ἀισχύλος), a native of Perugia, and a physician in the second century after Christ. He was one of Galen's tutors, who says that he belonged to the sect of the Empirici, and that he had a great knowledge of Pharmacy and Materia Medica. Aeschylus was the inventor of a celebrated superstitious remedy for the bite of a mad dog, which is mentioned with approbation by Galen and Orhiias (Synops. iii. p. 55), and of which the most important ingredient was powdered crawfish. These he directs to be caught at a time when the sun and moon were in a particular relative position, and to be baked alive. (Gal. De Simplic. Medic. Facult. xi. 34, vol. xii. p. 356; C. G. Kuhn, Additam, ad Elesch. Med. Vet. a J. A. Fabricia, in "Bibl. Gr., exhibit."

AESCHYLIDES (Ἀισχυλίδης), wrote a work on agriculture, entitled Παραγωγικός, which was at least in three books. (Athens, xiv. p. 650, d; Aelian, de Anim. xvi. 92.)

AESCHYLUS (Ἀησχύλος) was born at Eleusis in Attica in b. c. 525, so that he was thirty-five years of age at the time of the battle of Marathon, and contemporary with Simonides and Pindar. His father Euphorion was probably connected with the worship of Demeter, from which Aeschylus may naturally be supposed to have received his first religious impressions. He was himself, according to some authorities, initiated in the mysteries, with reference to which, and to his birthplace Eleusis, Aristophanes (Rom. 884) makes him pray to the Eleusinian goddess. Pausanias (i. 21, § 2) relates an anecdote of him, which, if true, shews that he was struck in very early youth with the exhibitions of the drama. According to this story, "When he was a boy he was set to watch grapes in the country, and there fell asleep. In his slumber Dionysus appeared to him, and ordered him to apply himself to tragedy. At daybreak he made the attempt, and succeeded very easily." Such a dream as this could hardly have resulted from anything but the impression produced by tragic exhibitions upon a warm imagination. At the age of 25 (b. c. 499), he made his first appearance as a competitor for the prize of tragedy, against Chaerus and Prinias, without however being successful. Sixteen years afterwards (b. c. 484), Aeschylus gained his first victory. The titles of the pieces which he then brought out are not known, but his competitors were most probably Prinias and Phrynichus or Choeirus. Eight years afterwards he gained the prize with the trilogy of which the Persae, the earliest of his extant dramas, was one piece. The whole number of victories attributed to Aeschylus amounted to thirteen, most of which were gained by him in the interval of sixteen years, between B.c. 484, the year of his first tragic victory, and the close of the Persian war by Cimon's double victory at the Eurymedon, B.c. 470. (Bode, Gesch. der Hellen.
Dichtkunst, iii. p. 212.) The year n. c. 468 was the date of a remarkable event in the poet's life.
In that year he was defeated in a tragic contest
by his younger rival Sophocles, and if we may be lieve Plutarch (Cim. 3), his mortification at this indignity, as he conceived it, was so great, that he quitted Athens in disgust the very same year, and went to the court of Hiero (Paus. i. 2. § 3), king of Syracuse, where he found Simonides the lyric poet, who as well as himself was by that prince most hospitably received. Of the fact of his hav¬ ing visited Sicily at the time alluded to, there can be no doubt; but whether the motive alleged by Plutarch for his doing so was the only one, or a real one, is a question of considerable difficulty, though of little practical moment. It may be, as has been plausibly maintained by some authors, that Aeschylus, whose family and personal honour was connected with the glories of Marathon, and the heros of the Persian war, did not sympathise with the spirit of aggressinnment by which the councils of his country were then actuated, nor approve of its policy in the struggle for the supremacy over Greece. The contemporaries of his earlier years, Miltiades, Aristides, and The-mistocles, whose achievements in the service of their country were noticed in the later extant plays of Aeschylus, and his principles, and have felt that it more keenly, from Cimon, the hero of the day, having been one of the judges who awarded the tragic prize to Sophocles in preference to himself. (Plut.
Cim. 3.) On this supposition, Athens could not have been an agreeable residence to a person like Aeschylus, and therefore he might have been disposed to leave it; but still it is more than probable that his defeat by Sophocles materially influenced his determinations, and was at any rate the prox¬ imate cause of his removing to Sicily. It has been further conjectured that the charge of Aristot. Eth. iii. 1), but possibly from political motives, was in some measure connected with his retirement from his native country. If this were really the case, it follows, that the play or plays which gave the supposed offence to the Athenians, must have been published before n. c. 468, and therefore that the trilogy of the Oresteia could have had no connexion with it. Shortly before the arrival of Aeschylus at the court of Hiero, that prince had built the town of Aetna, at the bottom of the mountain of that name, and on the site of the ancient Catana: in connexion with this event, Aeschylus is said to have composed his play of the Women of Aetna (n. c. 471, or 472), in which he predicted and prayed for the prosperity of the new city. At the request of Hiero, he also repro¬ duced the play of the Persians in the trilogy of which he had been victorious in the dramatic con¬ tests at Athens. (n. c. 472.) Now we know that the trilogy of the Seven against Thebes was re presented soon after the "Persians:" it follows therefore that the former trilogy must have been first represented not later than n. c. 470. (Wecker, Trilog. 3. 520; Schol. ad Aristoph. Ran. 1058.) Aristeidc: The Oresteia, which was produced in the time. (Plut. Arist. 3.) Besides "The Women of Aetna," Aeschylus also composed other pieces in Sicily, in which are said to have occurred Sicilian words and expressions not intelligible to the Athe¬ nians. (Athen. ix. p. 402, b.) From the number of such words and expressions, which have been noticed in the later extant plays of Aeschylus, it has been inferred that he spent a considerable time in Sicily, on his first visit. We must not however omit to mention, that, according to some accounts, Aeschylus also visited Sicily about n. c.
468, previous to what we have considered his first visit. (Bode, Id. iii. p. 215.) The occasion of this retirement is said to have been the victory gained over him by Simonides, to whom the Athenians adjudged the prize for the best elegy on those who fell at Marathon. This tradition, however, is not supported by strong independent testimony, and accordingly its truth has been much questioned.
Suidas indeed states that Aeschylus had visited Sicily even before this, when he was only twenty-five years of age (n. c. 499), immediately after his first contest with Pratinas, on which occasion the crowd of spectators was so great as to cause the fall of the wooden planks (topia) or temporary scaffolding, on which they were accommodated with seats.
In n. c. 467, his friend and patron king Hiero died; and in n. c. 458, it appears that Aeschylus was again at Athens from the fact that the trilogy of the Oresteia was produced in that year. The conjunction of Böckh, that this might have been a second representation in the absence of the poet, is not supported by any probable reasons, for we have no intimation that the Oresteia ever had been acted before. (Hermann, Omp. ii. p. 137.) In the same or the following year (n. c. 457), Aeschylus again visited Sicily for the last time, and the reason assigned for this his second or as others conceive his fourth visit to this island, is both probable and sufficient. The fact is, that in his play of the Eumenides, the third and last of the three plays which made up the Oresteian trilogy, Aes¬ chylus proved himself a decided supporter of the ancient dignities and power of that "watchful guardian" of Athens, the aristocratical court of the Areopagus, in opposition to Pericles and his de-ocratical conquerors. With this trilogy Aeschylus was indeed successful as a poet, but not as a politician: it did not produce the effects he had wished and intended, and he found that he had striven in vain against the opinions and views of a generation to which he did not belong. Accordingly it has been conjectured that either from disappointment or fear of the consequences, or perhaps from both these causes, he again quitted Athens, and retired once more to Sicily. But another reason, which if founded on truth, perhaps operated in connexion with the former, has been assigned for his last sojourn in Sicily. This rests on a statement made more or less distinctly by various authors, to the effect that Aeschylus was accused of impiety before the court of the Areopagus, and that he would have been condemned but for the interposition of his brother Aemdnias, who had distinguished himself at the battle of Salamis.
(Aelian, v. h. v. 19.) According to some authors this accusation was preferred against him, for having in some of his plays either divulged or profanely spoken of the mysteries of Cereus.
According to others, the charge originated from his having introduced on the stage the dread godesses, the Eumenides, which he had done in such a way as not only to do violence to popular prejudice, but also to excite the greatest alarm among the spectators. Now, the Eumenides contains no-	hing which can be considered as a publication of the mysteries of Ceres, and therefore we are inclined to think that his political enemies availed themselves of the unpopularity he had incurred by his "Chorus of Furies," to get up against him a charge of impiety, which they supported not only by what was objectionable in the Eumenides, but also in other plays not now extant. At any rate, from the number of authorities all confirming this conclusion, there can be no doubt that towards the end of his life Aeschylus incurred the serious displeasure of a strong party at Athens, and that after the exhibition of the Orestean trilogy he retired to Gela in Sicily, where he died b.c. 456, the 69th year of his age, and three years after the representation of the Eumenides. On the manner of his death the ancient writers are unanimous. (Suidas, s. v. Xελονάωνα.) An eagle, say they, mistaking the poet's bald head for a stone, let a tortoise fall upon it to break the shell, and so fulfilled an oracle, according to which Aeschylus was fated to die by a blow from heaven. The inhabitants of Gela showed their regard for him by erecting a noble monument to him, and inscribing it with an epitaph written by himself. (Paus.
i. 14. § 4; Athen. xiv. 627, d. Vit. Anon.) In it Gela is mentioned as the place of his burial, and the field of Marathon as the place of his most glorious achievements; but no mention is made of his poetry, the only subject of commemoration in the later epigrams written in his honour. At Athens also his name and memory were held in special reverence, and the prophecy in which he (Athen. viii. 547, e. 5) is said to have predicted his own posthumous fame, was first defeated by Salamis, but was too awful for the contemplation of the next generation, who complained that Aeschylus had not produced himself, or such as had been represented in Sicily, and not at Athens, during his lifetime. The individuals who exhibited his dramatic remains on the Attic stage were his sons Euphorion and Pto-on: the former of whom was, in b.c. 431, victor-sionary of a conflict over Sophocles and Euripides (Argum. Eurip. Med.), and in addition to this is said to have gained four victories with dramatic pieces of his father's never before represented.
(Blomfield, ed Argum. Aeg. p. 20.) Philocles also, the son of a sister of Aeschylus, was victorious over the King Oedipus of Sophocles, probably with a tragedy of his uncle's. (Argum. Soph. Oed.

lessons. It produces indeed a sort of religious awe, and dread of the irresistible power of the gods, to which man is represented as being entirely subject; but on the other hand humanity appears as the sport of an irrevocable destiny, or the victim of a struggle between superior beings. Still Aeschylus sometimes discloses a providential order of compensation and retribution, while he always teaches the duty of resignation and submission to the will of the gods, and the futility and fatal consequences of all opposition to it. See Quarterly Review, No. 112, p. 315.

With respect to the construction of his plays, it has been often remarked, that they have little or no plot, and are therefore wanting in dramatic interest: this deficiency however may strike us more than it otherwise would in consequence of most of his extant plays being only parts, or acts of a more complicated drama. Still we cannot help being impressed with the belief, that he was more capable of sketching a vast outline, than of filling up its parts, however bold and vigorous are the sketches by which he portrays and groups his characters. His object, indeed, according to Aristophanes, in such plays as the Persae, and the Seven against Thebes, which are more epical than dramatical, was rather to animate his countrymen to deeds of glory and warlike achievement, and to inspire them with generous and elevated sentiments, by a vivid exhibition of noble deeds and characters, than to charm or startle by the incidents of an elaborate plot. (Prom. 1000.)

The religious views and tenets of Aeschylus, so far as they appear in his writings, were Homeric. Like Homer, he represents Zeus as the supreme Ruler of the Universe, the source and centre of all things. To him all the other divinities are subject, and from him all their powers and authority are derived. Even Fate itself is sometimes identical with his will, and the result of his decrees. He only of all the beings in heaven and earth is free to act as he pleases. (Prom. 40.)

In Philosophical sentiments, there was a tradition that Aeschylus was a Pythagorean (Cic. Tusc. Disp. ii. 10); but of this his writings do not furnish any conclusive proof, though there certainly was some similarity between him and Pythagoras in the purity and elevation of their sentiments. The most correct and lively description of the character and dramatic merits of Aeschylus, and of the transition in which he was held by his contemporaries and immediate successors, is given by Aristophanes in his “Frogs.” He is there depicted as proud and impatient, and his style and genius such as we have described it. Aristophanes was evidently a very great admirer of him, and sympathised in no common degree with his political and moral sentiments. He considered Aeschylus as without a rival and utterly unapproachable as a tragic poet; and represents even Sophocles himself as readily yielding to and admitting his superior claims to the tragic throne. But few if any of the ancient critics seem to have altogether coincided with Aristophanes in his estimation of Aeschylus, though they give him credit for his excellence. Thus Dionysius (De Poet. Vet. II. 2) praises the originality of his ideas and of his expressions, and the beauty of his imagery, and the propriety and dignity of his characters. Longinus (15) speaks of his elevated creations and imagery, but condemns some of his expressions as harsh and restrained; and Quintilian (x. 1) expresses himself much to the same effect. The expression attributed to Sophocles, that Aeschylus lived right without knowing it (Athen. x. p. 428, f.), in other words, that he was an unconscious genius, working without any knowledge of or regard to the artistic laws of his profession, is worthy of note. So also is the observation of Schlegel (Lecture iv.), that "Generally considered, the tragedies of Aeschylus are an example amongst many, that in art, as in nature, gigantic productions precede those of regulated symmetry, which then dwindle away into delicacy and insignificance; and that poetry in her first manifestation always approaches nearest to the awkwardness of religion, whatever shape the latter may assume among the various races of men." Aeschylus himself used to say of his dramas, that they were fragments of the great banquet of Homer’s table. (Athen. viii. p. 347.)

The alterations made by Aeschylus in the composition and dramatic representation of Tragedy were so great, that he was considered by the Athenians as the father of it, just as Homer was of Epic poetry and Herodotus of History. (Philostr. Vit. Apoll. vi. 11.) As the ancients themselves remarked, it was a greater advance from the elementary productions of Theophrastus, Choerilus, and Phrynichus, to the stately tragedy of Aeschylus, than from the latter to the perfect and refined forms of Sophocles. It was the advance from infancy if not to maturity, at least to a youthful and vigorous manhood. Even the improvements and alterations introduced by his successors were the natural results and suggestions of those of Aeschylus. The first and principal alteration which he made was the introduction of a second actor (Σύγκεκριμένοι), Aristot. Poet. 4, § 16), and the consequent formation of the dialogue properly so called, and the limitation of the choral parts. So great was the effect of this change that Aristotle denotes it by saying, that he made the dialogue, the principal part of the play (τόν Λόγον προτεινόμενον παρεξίσθενες), instead of the choral part, which was now become subsidiary and secondary. This innovation was of course adopted by his contemporaries, just as Aeschylus himself (e. g. in the Choephoroi 665—716) followed the example of Sophocles, in subsequently introducing a third actor. The characters in his plays were sometimes represented by Aeschylus himself. (Athen. i. p. 39.) In the early part of his career he was supported by an actor named Cleandrus, and afterwards by Myrinos of Chalchis. (Vita apud Robert, p. 161.) The dialogue between the two principal characters in the plays of Aeschylus was generally kept up in a strictly symmetrical form, each thought or sentiment of the two speakers being expressed in one or two unbroken lines: e. g. as the dialogue between Kratos and Hephæastus at the beginning of the Prometheus. In the same way, in the Seven against Thebes, Eteocles always expresses himself in three lines between the reflections of the chorus. This arrangement, differing as it does from the forms of ordinary conversation, gives to the dialogue of Aeschylus an elevated and stately character, which bespeaks the conversation of gods and heroes. But the improvements of Aeschylus were not limited to the composition of tragedy: he added the resources of art in its exhibition. Thus, he is said to have availed himself of the skill of Agas-Aeschylus, who painted for him the first scenes which had ever been drawn according to the principles of linear perspective. (Vitruv. Arch. lib. iii.) He also furnished his actors with more suitable and magnificent dresses, with significant and various masks, and with the thick-soled cthraunth, to raise their stature to the height of heroes. He moreover bestowed so much attention on the choral dances, that he is said to have invented various figures himself, and to have instructed the choristers in them without the aid of the regular ballet-masters. (Athen. i. p. 21.) So great was Aeschylus' skill as a teacher in this respect, that Telestes, one of his choristers, was able to express by dance alone the various incidents of the play of the Seven against Thebes. (Athen. ii. c.) The removal of all deeds 1. c.) Aeschylus. (Philos. Vit. Apol. vi. 11.) With him also arose the usage of representing at the same time a trilogy of plays connected in subject, so that each formed one act, as it were, of a great whole, which might be compared with some of Shakespeare's historical plays. Even before the time of Aeschylus, it had been customary to contend for the prize of tragedy with three plays exhibited at the same time, but it was reserved for him to show how each of three tragedies might be complete in itself, and independent of the rest, and nevertheless form a part of a harmonious and connected whole. The only example still extant of such a trilogy is the Oresteia, as it was called. A Satyr play commonly followed each tragic trilogy, and it is recorded that Aeschylus was the author of a number of the ludicrous than of the serious drama. (Paus. ii. 13. § 5.)

Aeschylus is said to have written seventy tragedies. Of these only seven are extant, namely, the "Persians," the "Seven against Thebes," the "Suppliants," the "Prometheus," the "Agamemnon," the "Choephoroe," and "Eumenides;" the last three forming, as already remarked, the trilogy of the "Oresteia." The "Persians" was acted in B.C. 472, and the "Seven against Thebes" a year afterwards. The "Oresteia" was represented in B.C. 459; the "Suppliants" and the "Prometheus" were brought out some time between the "Seven against Thebes" and the "Oresteia." It has been supposed from some allusions in the "Suppliants," that this play was acted in B.C. 461, when Athens was allied with Argos.

The first edition of Aeschylus was printed at Venice, 1518, 8vo.; but parts of the Agamemnon and the Choephoroe are not printed in this edition, and those which are given, are made up into one play. Of the subsequent editions the best was by Stanley, Lond. 1663, fo. with the Scholia and a commentary, reedited by Butler. The best recent editions are by Wellauer, Lips. 1823, W. Dindorf, Lips. 1827, and Scholzfeld, Camb. 1839. There are numerous editions of various plays, of which those most worthy of mention are by Blumfield, Muller, Klausen, and Peile. The principal English translations are by Potter, Harford, and Medwin. (Harford, De Aeschyli Vita et Fabulis, Haunton, 1814; Wedel, Die Aeschyl. Trilogie Prometeus, Darmstadt, 1824, Nachtrag zur Trilogie, Frankf. 1826, and Die Griech. Tragodien, Bonn, 1840; Klausen, Theologenum Aeschyl. Tragici, Berol. 1829.)

saved the child (Aesculapius) from the flames, and carried it to Cheiron, who instructed the boy in the art of healing and in hunting. (Pind. Pyth. iii. 1, &c.; Apollod. iii. 10. § 3; Paus. l. e.) According to other traditions Aesculapius was born at Tricca in Thessaly (Strab. xiv. p. 647), and others again related that Coronis gave birth to him during an expedition of her father Phlegyas into Peloponnesus, in the territory of Epidaurus, and that she exposed him on mount Tithesion, which was before called Myrtion. Here he was fed by a goat and watched by a dog, until at last he was found by Aesclathus, a shepherd, who saw the boy surrounded by a lustre like that of lightning. (See a different account in Paus. viii. 25. § 6.) From this dazzling splendour, or from his having been rescued from the flames, he was called by the Dorians αἰλάμψ. The truth of the tradition that Aesculapius was born in the territory of Epidaurus, and was not the son of Arainoë, daughter of Leucippus and born in Messenia, was attested by an oracle which was consulted to decide the question. (Paus. ii. 26. § 6, iv. 3, § 2; Cic. De Nat. Deor. iii. 22, where three different Aesculapiuses are made out of the different local traditions about him.) After Aesculapius had grown up, reports spread over all countries, that he not only cured all the sick, but called the dead to life again. About the manner in which he acquired this latter power, there were two traditions in ancient times. According to the one (Apollod. l. e.), he had received from Athena the blood which had flowed from the veins of Gorgo, and the blood which had flowed from the veins of the right side of her body possessed the power of restoring the dead to life. According to the other tradition, Aesculapius on one occasion was shut up in the house of Glauceus, whom he was to cure, and while he was standing absorbed in thought, there came a serpent which twined round the staff, and which he killed. Another serpent then came carrying in its mouth a herb with which it recalled to life the one that Aesculapius had just killed. These serpents made use of the same herb with the same effect upon men. (Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 14.) Several persons, whom Aesculapius was believed to have restored to life, are mentioned by the Scholiast on Pindar (Pyth. iii. 96) and by Apollodorus. (l. e.) When he was exercising this art upon Glauceus, Zeus killed Aesculapius with a flash of lightning, as he feared lest men might gradually contrive to escape death altogether (Apollod. iii. 10. § 4), or, according to others, because Pluto had complained of Aesculapius diminishing the number of the dead too much. (Died. iv. 71; comp. Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. iii. 102.) But, on the request of Apollo, Zeus placed Aesculapius among the stars. (Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 14.) Aesculapius is also said to have taken part in the expedition of the Argonauts and in the Calydonian hunt. He was married to Epione, and besides the two sons spoken of by Homer, we also find mention of the following children of his: Janiscus, Alexenor, Aratus, Hygieia, Angle, Isao, and Pannoeia (Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. iii. 14; Paus. ii. 10. § 3, i. 34. § 2), most of whom are only personifications of the powers ascribed to their father.

These are the legends about one of the most interesting and important divinities of antiquity. Various hypotheses have been brought forward to explain the origin of his worship in Greece; and, while some consider Aesculapius to have been originally a real personage, whom tradition had connected with various marvellous stories, others have explained all the legends about him as mere personifications of certain ideas. The serpent, the perpetual symbol of Aesculapius, has given rise to the opinion, that the worship was derived from Egypt, and that Aesculapius was identical with the serpent Cneiph worshipped in Egypt, or with the Phoenician Elon. (Euseb. Præp. Evan. i. 10; comp. Paus. vii. 26. § 6.) But it does not seem necessary to have recourse to foreign countries in order to explain the worship of this god. His story is undoubtedly a combination of real events with the results of thoughts or ideas, which, as in so many instances in Greek mythology, are, like the former, considered as facts. The kernel, out of which the whole myth has grown, is perhaps the account we read in Homer; but gradually the sphere in which Aesculapius acted was so extended, that he became the representative or the personification of the healing powers of nature, which are naturally enough described as the son (the effects) of Helios,—Apollo, or the Sun.

Aesculapius was worshipped all over Greece, and many towns, as we have seen, claimed the honour of his birth. His temples were usually built in healthy places, on hills outside the town, and near wells which were believed to have healing powers. These temples were not only places of worship, but were frequented by great numbers of sick persons, and may therefore be compared to modern hospitals. (Plut. Quaest. Rom. 286, n.) The principal seat of his worship in Greece was Epidaurus, where he had a temple surrounded with an extensive grove, within which no one was allowed to die, and no woman to give birth to a child. His sanctuary contained a magnificent statue of ivory and gold, the work of Thrasymedes, in which he was represented as a handsome and manly figure, resembling that of Zeus. (Paus. ii. 26 and 27.) He was seated on a throne, flanked by one held a staff, and with the other resting upon the head of a dragon (serpent), and by his side lay a dog. (Paus. ii. 27. § 2.) Serpents were everywhere connected with the worship of Aesculapius, probably because they were a symbol of prudence and renovation, and were believed to have the power of discovering herbs of wondrous powers, as is indicated in the story about Aesculapius and the serpents in the house of Glauceus. Serpents were further believed to be guardians of wells with salutary powers. For these reasons a peculiar kind of tame serpents, in which Epidaurus abounded, were not only kept in his temple (Paus. ii. 26. § 1), but the god himself frequently peered in the form of a serpent. (Paus. iii. 23. § 4; Val. Max. i. 8. § 2; Liv. Epit. 11; compare the account of Alexander Pseudo-Deidamius in Lucian.) Besides the temple of Epidaurus, whence the worship of the god was transplanted to various other parts of the ancient world, we may mention those of Tricca (Strab. ix. p. 437), Celaenae (xiii. p. 603), between Dyme and Patnae (viii. p. 386), near Cyllene (viii. p. 337), in the island of Cos (xiii. p. 657; Paus. iii. 23. § 4), at Eretria (Strab. viii. p. 360), near Caes in Arcadia (Steph. Byz. s. v.), at Sicyon (Paus. ii. 10. § 2), at Athens (i. 21. § 7), near Patnae (vii. 21. § 6), at Titane in the territory of Sicyon (vii. 23. § 6), at Theopisa (viii. 25. § 3), in Messene (iv. 31. § 8), at Philus (ii. 13, AESCOPUS.

§ 3. Arges (ii. 23. § 4); Agium (ii. 23. § 5); Pellene (vii. 27. § 8); Asopus (iii. 22. § 7); Pergumum (iii. 26. § 7); Lebene in Crete, Strymna, Balantium (ii. 26. § 7); Ambracica (Liv. xxxviii. 5) at Rome and other places. At Rome the worship of Asclepius was introduced from Epidaurus at the command of the Delphic oracle or of the Sibyl's books, in B. C. 293, for the purpose of averting a pestilence. Respecting the miraculous manner in which this was effected see Valerius Maximus (i. 8. § 2), and Ovid. (Met. xv. 620, &c.; Comp. Niebuhr, Hist. de Rome, iii. p. 408, &c.; Liv. x. 47, xxix. 11; Suet. Claud. 25.)

The sick, who visited the temples of Asclepius, had usually to spend some or more nights in his sanctuary (sanctolin, incantulae, Paus. ii. 27 § 2), during which they observed certain rules prescribed by the priests. The god then usually revealed the remedies for the disease in a dream. (Aristoph. Plut. 662, &c.; Cio. De Div. ii. 59; Philost. Vita Apollon. i. 7; Jambli. De Myst. iii. 2.) It was in allusion to this incantula that many temples of Asclepius contained statues representing Sleep and Dream. (Paus. ii. 10. § 2.) Those whom the god cured of their disease offered a sacrifice to him, generally a cock (Plat. Phaed. p. 118) or a goat (Paus. x. 32. § 6; Serv. ad Virg. Georg. ii. 386), and hung up in his temple a tablet recording the name of the sick, the disease, and the manner in which the cure had been effected. The temples of Epidaurus, Tricca, and Cos, were full of such votive tablets, and some of them are still extant. (Paus. ii. 37. § 3; Strab. viii. p. 374; Comp. Dict. of Ant. p. 673.) Respecting the festivals celebrated in honour of Asclepius see Dict. of Ant. p. 103, &c. The various surmises given to the god partly describe him as the healing or saving god, and are partly derived from the places in which he was worshipped. Some of his statues are described by Pausanias. (i. 10. § 3, x. 32. § 5.) Besides the attributes mentioned in the description of his statue at Epidaurus, he is sometimes represented holding in one hand a phial, and in the other a staff; sometimes also a boy is represented standing at his side, who is the genius of recovery, and is called Telephorus, or Episcopus, or Aesculapius. (Paus. ii. 11. § 7.) We still possess a considerable number of marble statues and busts of Asclepius, as well as many representations on coins and gems. (Böttiger, Amalthea, i. p. 382; ii. p. 361; Hirt. Mythol. Bilderk. i. p. 84; Müller, Handb. der Archäol. p. 597, &c. 710.)

There were in antiquity two works which went under the name of Asclepius, which, however, were no more genuine than the works ascribed to Orpheus. (Fabricius, Bibl. Graec. i. p. 55, &c.)

The descendants of Asclepius were called by the patronymic name Asclepiadn. (Aeppxapddoic.) These writers, who consider Asclepius as a real personage, must regard the Asclepiadn as his real descendants, to whom he transmitted his medical knowledge, and whose principal seats were Cos and Cnidus. (Plat. de Re Pud. i. p. 405, &c.) But the Asclepiadn were also regarded as an order or caste of priests, and for a long period the practice of medicine was intimately connected with religion. The knowledge of medicine was regarded as a sacred secret, which was transmitted from father to son in the families of the Asclepiadn, and we still possess the oath which every one was obliged to take when he was put in possession of the medical secrets. (Galen, Anat. ii. p. 128; Aristid. Orat. i. p. 80; Comp. K. Sprengel, Gesch. der Medizin, vol. i.)

AESERNI'NUS. [Marcellus.]

A'ESON (Ailovern), an Athenian orator, was a contemporary of Demostenes, with whom he was educated. (Suidas, S. v. Αἰσερνών.) To what party he belonged during the Macedonian time is uncertain. When he was asked what he thought of the orators of his time, he said, that when he heard the other orators, he admired their beautiful and sublime conversations with the people, but that the speeches of Demostenes, when read, excelled all others by their skilful construction and their power. (Hermippus, Ap. Plat. Deum. 10.) Aristotle (Phlb. iii. 10) mentions a satirical expression of Aeson.

AESON (Ailvern), a son of Crethus, the founder of Iolcus, and of Tyro, the daughter of Salmoneus. He was excluded by his step-brother Pelias from his share in the kingdom of Thessaly. He was father of Jason and Promachus, but the name of his wife is differently stated, as Polyomed, Alcime, Amphionice, Polyphem, Polyne, Arne, and Searphe. (Apollod. i. § 11 and § 16; Hor. Od. ii. 238; Textz. ad locoptr. 672; Dion. iv. 50; Schol. ad Apollon. i. 45; Schol. ad Hom. Od. xii. 70.) Pelias endeavored to secure the throne to himself by sending Jason away with the Argonauts, but when one day he was surprised and frightened by the news of the return of the Argonauts, he attempted to get rid of Jason by force, but the latter put an end to his own life. (Apollod. i. 9. § 27.) According to an account in Diodorus (iv. 50), Pelias compelled Jason to kill himself by drinking ox's blood, for he had received intelligence that Jason and his companions had perished in their expedition. According to Ovid (Met. vii. 165, 250, &c.), Aeson survived the return of the Argonauts, and was made young again by Medea. Jason as the son of Aeson is called Aesonides. (Orph. Arg. 55.)

AESONIDES. [Aeson.]

AESOPUS (A'isorou), a writer of Fables, a species of composition which has been defined "analogue narratives, intended to convey some moral lesson, in which irrational animals or objects are introduced as speaking." (Philolog. Museum, i. p. 280.) Of his works none are extant, and of his life scarcely anything is known. He appears to have lived about B. C. 570, for Herodotus (ii. 134) mentions a woman named Rhodopis as a fellow-slave of Aesop's, and says that she lived in the time of Amasis king of Egypt, who began to reign B. C. 569. Plutarch makes him contemporary with Solon (Sept. Sup. Cons. p. 152, c.), and Laertius (i. 72) says, that he flourished about the 52th Olympiad. The only apparent authority against this date is that of Suidas (s. v. Αἴσοπος); but the passage is plainly corrupt, and if we adopt the statement of Clinton, it gives about B. C. 652 as the date of his birth; his death is placed B. C. 564, but may have occurred a little later. (See Clinton, Fast. Hell. vol. i. pp. 213, 237, 239.)

Suidas tells us that Samos, Sards, Mesenaria in Thrace, and Coticeum in Phrygia dispute the honour of having given him birth. We are told that he was originally a slave, and the reason of his first writing fables is given by Phaedrus. (iii.
Among his masters were two Samians, Xanthus and Ladmon, from the latter of whom he received his freedom. Upon this he visited Croesus (where we are told that he proved Solon for discourtesy to the king), and afterwards Pelasgius at Athens. Plutarch (De vita Sol. Hist. ii. p. 556) tells us, that he was sent to Delphi by Croesus, to distribute among the citizens four minae a piece. But in consequence of some dispute arising on the subject, he refused to give any money at all, upon which the enraged Delphians threw him from a precipice. Plagues were sent upon them from the gods for the offence, and they proclaimed their willingness to give a compensation for his death to any one who could claim it. At length Ladmon, the grandson of his old master, received the compensation, since no nearer connexion could be found. (Herod. ii. 134.)

There seems no reason to doubt this story about the compensation, and we have now stated all the circumstances of Aesop's life which rest on any authority. But there are a vast variety of anecdotes and adventures in which he bears the principal part, in a life of himself, or to a book of Fables purporting to be his, and collected by Maximus Planudes, a monk of the 14th century. This life represents Aesop as a perfect monster of ugliness and deformity; a notion for which there is no authority whatever. For he is mentioned in passages of classical authors, where an allusion to such personal peculiarities would have been most natural, without the slightest trace of any such allusion. He appears for instance in Plutarch's Convivial, where though there are many jokes on his former condition as a slave, there are none on his appearance, and we need not imagine that the ancients would be restrained from such jokes by any feelings of delicacy, since the nose of Socrates furnishes ample matter for mockery in the Symposium of Plato. Besides, the Athenians caused Lyssippus to erect a statue in his honour, which had it been sculptured in accordance with the above description, would have been the reverse of ornamental.

The notices however which we possess of Aesop are so scattered and of such doubtful authority, that there have not been wanting persons to deny his existence altogether. "In poetical philosophy," says Vice in his Scienza Nuda, "Aesop will be found not to be any particular and actually existing man, but the abstraction of a class of men, or a poetical character representative of the companions and attendants of the heroes, such as certainly existed in the time of the seven Sages of Greece." This however is an excess of scepticism into which it would be most unreasonable to plunge: whether Aesop left any written works at all, is a question which affords considerable room for doubt, and to which Bentley inclines to give a negative. Thus Aristophanes (Vesp. 1259) represents Philocleon as learning his Fables in conversation and not out of a book, and Socrates who turned them into poetry versified those that "he knew, and could most readily remember." (Plat. Phaed. p. 61, b; Bently, Dissertation on the Fables of Aesop, p. 125.)

However this may be, it is certain that fables, bearing Aesop's name, were popular at Athens in its most intellectual age. We find them frequently quoted by Aristophanes. One of the pleasures of a dinner (Vesp. 568) was, that among the candidates for his protection and vote some endeavoured to win his favour by repeating to him fables, and some Akabov ti ylaoev. Two specimens of these ylaoev or drolleries may be read in the Vespae, 1340, c., and in the Aes. 321, c. The latter however is said by Scholastus to belong to Archilochus, and it is probable that many anecdotes and jests were attributed to Aesop, as the most popular of all authors of the kind, which really were not his. This is favourable to Bentley's theory, that his fables were not collected in a written form, which also derives additional probability from the fact that there is a variation in the manner in which ancient authors quote Aesop, even though they are manifestly referring to the same fable. Thus Aristotle (De Part. Anim. iii. 2) cites from him a complaint of Momus, "that the bull's horns were not placed about his shoulders, where he might make the strongest push, but in the tenderest part, his head," whilst Lucian (Nigr. 32) makes the fault to be "that his horns were not placed straight before his eyes," a written collection would have prevented such a diversity.

Besides the drolleries above mentioned, there were probably fables of a graver description, since, as we have seen, Socrates condescended to turn them into verse, of which a specimen has been preserved by Diogenes Laertius. Again, Plato, though he excluded Homer's poems from his imaginary Republic, praises the writings of Aesop. By him they are called μοθο (Phaed. pp. 60, 61), though an able writer in the Philological Museum (i. p. 281) thinks that the more ancient name for such fictions was αλος, a word explained by Buttmann (Lexicon, p. 60, Eng. transl.), "a speech full of meaning, or cunningly imagined." (Herm. Oi. iv. 500), whence Ulysses is called πολλαφων in reference to the particular sort of speeches which mark his character. In Hesiod (Op. et Dies, 200), it has passed into the sense of a moral fable. The αλος or μοθο of Aesop were certainly in prose— they are called by Aristophanes Ζογα, and their author (Herod. ii. 134) is Ανικος o λογαφος, λογας being the peculiar word for Prose, as επι was for verse, and including both fable and history, though afterwards restricted to oratory, when that became a separate branch of composition.

Following the example of Socrates, Demetrius Phalerus (b. c. 320) turned Aesop's fables into poetry, and collected them into a book! and after him an author, whose name is unknown, published them in Elegies, of which some fragments are preserved by Salmas. But the only Greek version of Socrates, whose writings any whole fables are preserved is Babrius, an author of no mean powers, and who may well take his place amongst Fabulists with Phaedrus and La Fontaine. His version is in Choliambics, i. e. lamel, fulld'ambes (Xυλος, ταμαιος), verses which follow in all respects the laws of the Iambic Trimeter till the sixth foot, which is either a spondee or trochee, the fifth being properly an imbus. This version was made a little before the age of Augustus, and consisted of ten Books, of which a few scattered fables only are preserved. Of the Latin writers of Aesopian fables, Phaedrus is the most celebrated.

The fables now extant in prose, bearing the name of Aesop, are unquestionably spurious. Of these there are three principal collections, the one containing 136 fables, published first A. D. 1610, from MSS. at Heidelberg. This is so clumsy a forgery, that it mentions the orator Demades, who lived 200 years after Aesop, and contains a whole sentence from the book of Job (γραμμὸς καθ' ἡλικίαν τοὺς χρόνους, γραμμὸν δειν ἄδελφονμεθα). Some of the passages Bentley has shown to be fragments of Choliambic verses, and has made it tolerably certain that they were stolen from Babrius. The other collection was made by the above mentioned monk of Constantinople, Maximus Planudes. These contain at least one Hebrew (Vesuvius and Nepenthes, published at Leipzig 1741, etc.) and among them are words entirely modern, as βοτρίας α πλασμενος, and also traces of the Choliambics of Babrius. The third collection was found in a MS. at Florence, and published in 1809. Its date is about a century before the time of Planudes, and it contains the life which was prefixed to his collection, and commonly supposed to be his own.

Bentley's dissertation on Aesop is appended to those on Phalaris. The genuineness of the existing forgeries was stoutly maintained by his Oxford antagonists (Preface to Aesopicarum Fabelarum Delectus, Oxford 1626); but there is no one in our day who disputes his decision.

It remains to notice briefly the theory which assigns to Aesop's fables an oriental origin. Among the writers of Arabic, one of the most famous is Lukman, whom some traditions make contemporary with David, others the son of a sister or aunt of Job, while again he has been represented as an ancient king or chief of the tribe of Ad. "Lukman's wisdom" is proverbial among the Arabs, and joined with Joseph's beauty and David's melody. [See the Thousand and One Nights (Lane's translation), Story of Prince Kamer-ez-Zeman and Princess Budoor, and Note 59 to chapter x.] The Persian accounts of this Lukman represent him as an ugly black slave, and it seems probable that the author of the Life engraved this and other circumstances in the Oriental traditions of Lukman upon the classical tales respecting Aesop. The fables ascribed to Aesop have in many respects an eastern character, alluding to Asiatic customs, and introducing panthers, peacocks, and monkeys among their dramatic personae. All this makes it likely that the fables attributed both to Lukman and Aesop are derived from the same Indo-Persian source.

The principal editions of Aesop's Fables are,

1. The collection formed by Planudes with a Latin translation, published at Milan by Buono Accorso at the end of the 16th century. 2. Another edition of the same collection, with some additional fables from a MS. in the Bibliotheca du Roh at Paris, by Robert Stephanus, 1546. 3. The edition of Nevelet, 1610, which added to these the Heidelber collection, published at Frankfort on the Main. These have been followed by editions of all or some of the Fables, by Hudson at Oxford (1718), Hauptmann at Leipzig (1741), Heusinger at Leipzig (1756), Ernesti at the same place (1781), and G. H. Schaefer again at Leipzig (1810, 1816, 1820). Francesco de Furia added to the above the new fables from the Florentine MS., and his edition was reprinted by Coray at Paris (1810). All the fables have been put together and published, 231 in number, by J. G. Schneider, at Breslau, in 1810. [G. E. L. C.] sous. From Cicero's remark, however, (de Off. i. 114), it would seem that the character of Ajax was rather to transfuse his spirit to the body of the Thessalian j."noster familiarius (ad Qn. Frat. vii. 1), sopris. (de Of.

She quitted the city, because she knew that it would do injury to him who possessed it. When she had quitted it, she remembered the old prophecy, and instituted a festival of Dionysus Aesymnetes, for this was the name of the god in the chest. Nine men and nine women were appointed to attend to his worship. During one night of this festival a priest carried the chest outside the town, and all the children of the place, adorned, as formerly the victims used to be, with garlands of corn-cars, went down to the banks of the river Meilichius, which had before been called Amechius, hung up their garlands, purified themselves, and then put on other garlands of ivy, after which they returned to the sanctuary of Dionysus Aesymnetes. (Paus. vii. 19 and 20.) This tradition, though otherwise very obscure, evidently points to a time when human sacrifices were abolished at Aroë by the introduction of a new worship. At Patnae in Achaea there was likewise a temple dedicated to Dionysus Aesymnetes. (Paus. vii. 21, § 12.) [L.S.]

AESYMNETES (Aesymnetes), a surname of Dionysus, which signifies the Lord, or Ruler, and under which he was worshipped at Aroë in Achaea. The story about the introduction of his worship is as follows: There was at Troy an ancient image of Dionysus, the work of Hephæastes, which Zeus had once given as a present to Dardana. It was kept in a chest and Cæsarea on according to others, Amen, left this chest behind when she quitted the city, because she knew that it would do injury to him who possessed it. When the Greeks divided the spoils of Troy among themselves, this chest fell to the share of the Thessalian

Euryppus, who on opening it suddenly fell into a state of madness. The oracle of Delphi, when consulted about his recovery, answered, "When thou shalt see men performing a strange sacrifice, there shalt thou dedicate the chest, and there shalt thou settle." When Euryppus came to Aroë in Achaea, it was just the season at which its inhabitants offered every year to Artemis Trianda a human sacrifice, consisting of the fairest youth and the fairest maiden of the place. This sacrifice was offered as an atonement for a crime which had once been committed in the temple of the goddess. But an oracle had declared to them, that they should be released from the necessity of making this sacrifice, if a foreign divinity should be brought to them by a foreign king. This oracle was now fulfilled. Euryppus on seeing the victims led to the altar was cured of his madness and believed that this was the place pointed out to him by the oracle; and the Aroëtæans also, on seeing the god in the chest, remembered the old prophecy, stopped the sacrifice, and instituted a festival of Dionysus Aesymnetes, for this was the name of the god in the chest. Nine men and nine women were appointed to attend to his worship. During one night of this festival a priest carried the chest outside the town, and all the children of the place, adorned, as formerly the victims used to be, with garlands of corn-cars, went down to the banks of the river Meilichius, which had before been called Amechius, hung up their garlands, purified themselves, and then put on other garlands of ivy, after which they returned to the sanctuary of Dionysus Aesymnetes. (Paus. vii. 19 and 20.) This tradition, though otherwise very obscure, evidently points to a time when human sacrifices were abolished at Aroë by the introduction of a new worship. At Patnae in Achaea there was likewise a temple dedicated to Dionysus Aesymnetes. (Paus. vii. 21, § 12.) [L.S.]

AETHA/LIDES (Aethalides), a son of Hermes and Eupolemeia, a daughter of Myrion. He was the herald of the Argonauts, and had received from his father the faculty of remembering everything, even in Hades. He was further allowed to reside alternately in the upper and in the lower world. As his soul could not forget anything even after death, it remembered that from the body of Aethalides it had successively migrated into those of Euphorbus, Hermoutimus, Pyrrha, and last into that of Pythagoras, in whom it still retained the recollection of its former migrations. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 54, 640, &c.; Orph. Argon. 131; Hygin. Fab. 14; Diog. Laer. vii. 1, § 4, &c.; Val. Fusc. i. 487.) [J. S.]

AETHER (Aith), a personified idea of the mythical cosmogonies. According to that of Hyginus (Fab. Pref. p. 1, ed. Staveren) he was, together with Night, Day, and Erebos, begotten by Chaos and Caligo (Darkness). According to that of Hesiod (Theog. 124), Aether was the son of Erebos and his sister Night, and a brother of Day. (Comp. Pharnac. De Nat. Deor. 16.) The children of Aether and Day were Land, Heaven, and Sea, and from their connexion with the Earth thence sprang all the races which destroy the human race, and also the Giants and Titans. (Hygin. Fab. Pref. p. 2, &c.) These accounts shew that, in the Greek cosmogonies, Aether was considered as one of the elementary substances out of which the Universe was formed. In the Orphic hymn AETHICUS. (4) Aethius appears as the soul of the world, from which all life emanates, an idea which was also adopted by some of the early philosophers of Greece. In later times Aethius was regarded as the wise spokesman of the gods and Zeus as the Lord of the Aethier, or Aethier itself personified. (Paur. op. Cia. de Nat. Doctr. ii. 36, 40; Locut. v. 499; Virg. Aen. xii. 140, Georg. ii. 325.)

AETHIOPIS. [Heliades.]
AETHICUS, HISTER or ISTER, a Roman writer of the fourth century, a native of Istria according to his surname, or, according to Rabanus Maurus, of Sceythia, the author of a geographical work, called Aethici Cosmographia. We learn from the preface that a measurement of the whole Roman world was ordered by Julius Caesar to be made by the most able men, that this measurement was begun in the consulship of Julius Caesar and M. Antonius, i.e. a. n. 44; that three Greeks were appointed for the purpose, Zenodoctus, Theodotus, and Nicodemus; that Zenodoctus measured all the eastern part, which occupied him twenty-one years, five months, and nine days, on to the third consulsip of Augustus and Crassus; that Theodotus measured the northern part, which occupied him twenty-nine years, eight months, and ten days, on to the tenth consulsip of Augustus; and that Polycitus measured the southern part, which occupied him thirty-two years, one month, and ten days; that thus the whole (Roman) world was gone over by the measurers within thirty-two (?) years; and that a report of all it contained was given to Nicodemus, and the western to Cassiodorus, by an emendation of Iiuschke, p. 6, Var. iii. 36, 40; Lucrct. v. 499; Virg. Aen. xii. 140, Georg. ii. 325.)

AETHIOPIS. describes a cosmographical work by Julius Honorius Cator in terms which suit exactly the work of Aethicus; and Salmasius regards Julius Honorius as the real author of this work, to which opinion Ritschl seems to lean, reading Ethinics instead of Aethicus, and considering it as a mere appendix. In some MSS. the appellatives Sophista and Philosophus are found.

The sources of the Cosmographia appear to have been the measurements above described, other official lists and documents, and also, in all probability, Agrippa's Commentarii, which are constantly referred to by Pliny (Hist. Nat. iii. iv. v. vi.) as an authority, and his Chart of the World, which was founded on his Commentarii. (Plin. Hist. Nat. iii. 2.)

Cassiodorus (de instlt. divit. 25) describes a cosmographical work by Julius Honorius Cator in terms which suit exactly the work of Aethicus; and Salmasius regards Julius Honorius as the real author of this work, to which opinion Ritschl seems to lean, reading Ethinics instead of Aethicus, and considering it as a mere appendix. In some MSS. the appellatives Sophista and Philosophus are found.

The first edition of the Cosmographia was by Simler, Basel, 1575, together with the Itineraire Antonini. There is an edition by Henry Stephens, 1577, with Simler's notes, which also contains Dionysius, Pomponius Mela, and Solinus. The last edition is by Gronovius, in his edition of Pomponius Mela, Leyden, 1792. [A.A.]

was believed to have derived its name. (Plin. H. N. vi. 35; Nat. Com. ii. 6.) [L. S.]

AETHIUS (Ἀθηύς), the first king of Elis. (Paus. v. 1. § 2.) He was a son of Zeus and Protegeon, the daughter of Deucalion (Apollod. i. 7. § 2; Hygin. Fab. 155), and was married to Calyce, by whom he begot Endymion. According to some accounts Endymion was himself a son of Zeus and first king of Elis. (Apollod. i. 7. § 5.) Other traditions again made Aethius a son of Aeolus, who was called by the name of Zeus. (Paus. v. 4. § 1.) [L. S.]

AETHIUS (Ἀθηύς), the author of a work entitled "Somnian Annals" ("Ὄνεον Ἀναμνήστιον"), the fifth book of which is quoted by Athenaeus, although he expresses a doubt about the genuineness of the work. (xiv. p. 650, d. 655, f.) Aethius is also referred to by Clemens Alexander (Protr. p. 80, a), Eutathius (ad Od. lili. 120, p. 1573), and in the Etymologicum Magnum (s. v. νεφελής), where the name is written Athius.

AETHISA (Ἀθηήςα). 1. A daughter of king Pittheus of Troezen. Bellerophon seduced her by hand, but was banished from Corinth before the nuptials took place. (Paus. ii. 31. § 12.) She was surprised on one occasion by Poseidon in the island of Sphaera, whether she had gone, in consequence of a dream, for the purpose of offering a sacrifice on the tomb of Sphaerus. Aethria therefore dedicated in the island a temple to Athena Apaturia (the Deceitful), and called the island Hiera instead of Sphaera, and also introduced among the maidens of Troezen the custom of dedicating their girdles to Athena Apaturia on the day of their marriage. (Paus. ii. 33. § 11.) At a later time she became the mother of Theseus by Aegaeus. (Plut. Thes. 3; Hygin. Fab. 14.) In the night in which this took place, Poseidon also was believed to have been with her. (Apollod. iii. 15. § 7; Hygin. Fab. 37.) According to Plutarch (Thes. 6) her father spread this report merely that Theseus might be regarded as the son of Poseidon, who was much revered at Troezen. This opinion, however, is nothing else but an attempt to strip the genuine story of its marvels. After this event she appears living in Attica, from whence she was carried off to Lacedaemon by Castor and Polydeuces, and became a slave of Helen, with whom she was taken to Troy. (Plut. Thes. 44; Hom. Il. iii. 144.) At the taking of Troy she came to the camp of the Greeks, where she was recognised by her grandsons, and Demophon, one of them, asked Agamemnon to procure her liberation. Agamemnon accordingly sent a messenger to Helen to request her to give up Aethris. This was granted, and Aethis became free again. (Paus. x. 25. § 3; Dict. Cret. x. 13.) According to Hyginus (Fab. 249) she afterwards put an end to her own life from grief at the death of her sons. The history of her bondage to Helen was represented on the celebrated chest of Cypselus (Paus. iv. 19. § 1; Dion Chrysost. Orat. 11), and in a painting by Polygnotus in the Lesche of Delphi. (Paus. x. 25. § 2.)

AETHIUS (Ἀθηύς), a daughter of Poseidon and Alcyone, who was beloved by Apollo, and bore to him Eleuther. (Apollod. iii. 10. § 1; Paus. ix. 20. § 2.) [L. S.]

AETHIUSIA (Ἀθηίηςια), a surname of Athens, under which she was worshipped in Megaria. (Paus. i. 5. § 3; 41. § 6; Lycophr. Curs. 359.) The word αθηίηςια signifies a diver, and figuratively a ship, so that the name must have reference to the goddess teaching the art of ship-building or navigation. (Tzetz. ad Lycofhr. l. c.) [L. S.]

AETION. [Cypselus.]

AETION (Ἀείων). 1. A Greek sculptor of Amphipolis, mentioned by Callimachus (Anth. Gr. ix. 350) and Theocritus (Epig. viii.), from whom we learn that at the request of Nicia, a famous physician of Miletus, he executed a statue of Aeolus in cedar wood. He flourished about the middle of the third century b. c. There was an engraver of the same name; but when he lived is not known. (K. O. Müller, Arch. der Kunst, p. 151.)

2. A celebrated painter, spoken of by Lucian (De Merod. Cand. 42, Herod. or Aetius, 4, &c., Iwag. 7), who gives a description of one of his pictures, representing the marriage of Alexander and Roxana. This painting excited such admiration when exhibited at the Olympic games, that Prokynela, one of the judges, gave the artist his daughter in marriage. Aetion seems to have excelled particularly in the art of mixing and laying on his colours. It is commonly supposed that he lived in the time of Alexander the Great; but the words of Lucian (Herod. 4) shew clearly that he must have lived about the time of Hadrian and the Antonines. (K. O. Müller, Arch. der Kunst, p. 240; Kugler, Kunstgeschichte, p. 320.) [C. P. M.]

AETIUS, a Roman general, who with his rival Boniface, has justly been called by Procopius the last of the Romans. He was born at Dorostana in Moesia (Jornandes, de reb. Get. 34), and his father Gaudentius, a Scythian in the employ of the empire, having been killed in a mutiny, he was early given as a hostage to Alaric, and under him learnt the arts of barbarian war. (Philostorgius, xii. 12.) After an ineffectual support of the usurper John with an army of 60,000 men (a. d. 424), he became the general of the Roman forces under Placidia, at that time guardian of her son, the emperor Valentinian III. In order to supplant in her favour his rival Boniface, by treacherous accusations of each to the other, Aetius occasioned his revolt and the loss of Africa (Procop. Bell. Vandal. iii. 3, 4); the empress, however, discovered the fraud, and Aetius, after having met Boniface at Ravenna, and killed him in single combat [Bonifacius], was himself compelled to retire in disgrace to the Hannish army which in 434 he had settled in Pannonia. (Prosper. and Marcellinus, in anno 432.)

Becoming with their help to Italy, he became the premier and sole director of the armies of the western empire. (Jornandes, de reb. Get. 34.) In this capacity, through his long acquaintance with the barbarian settlers, and chiefly with the Huns and Attila himself, in whose court his son Carpilio was brought up, he checked the tide of barbarian invasion, and maintained the Roman power in peace for seventeen years (433-450) in Italy, Spain, Britain, and Gaul, in which last country especially he established his influence by means of his Hun and Alan allies and by his treaty with Theoderic the Visigoth. (Sidon. Apoll. Paneg. Aet. 500.) And when in 450 this peace was broken by the invasion of Attila, Aetius in concert with...
Theodoric arrested it first by the timely relief of Aetius. (Greg. Turon. ii. 7; Jomandes, de reb. Got. §6), and was only prevented from following up his successes in Italy by want of support both from Valentinian and his barbarian allies. (Idatius and Isidorus, in anno 450.) [AETIUS.] The greatness of his position as the sole stay of the empire, and as the sole link between Christianity, and the pagan barbarians, may well have given rise to the belief, whether founded or not, that he designed the imperial throne for himself and his barbarian allies, (Attila.)

His physical and moral activity well fitted him for the life of a soldier (Gregor. Turon. ii. 8), and though destitute of any high principle, he belongs to the class of men like Augustus and Cromwell, whose early crimes are obscured by the usefulness and glory of later life, and in whom a great and trying position really calls out new and unknown excellences.

AETIUS (Aëtius), surnamed the Athlete, from his denial of the God of Revelation (St. Athanas. de Synod. § 6, p. 83, of the translation, Oxford 1842; Soc. Hist. Ecle. ii. 35; Sozom. Hist. Ecle. iv. 29) was born in Cœle Syria (Philostorg. Hist. Ecle. iii. 15; St. Basil, adv. Eunom. i. p. 10) at Antioch (Soc. ii. 35; * Suidas, s. v. Aëtius). and became the founder of the Arian sect (Soc. ii. 35), and was only prevented from following up his victories by want of support both from Constanti and the pagan barbarians, where he resumed the study of medicine under Sopolis and made such progress in Eristicism, that he designed the imperial throne for himself and his barbarian allies, (Attila.)

Valentinian and his barbarian allies, (Attila.)

He was left fatherless and in poverty when a child, and became the slave of a vine-grower’s wife (St. Gregory Nazianz. c. Eunom. p. 292, c. 1; but see Not. Fausti ad Philost. III. i. 13), then a travelling tailor (S. Gr. iii. 40) or a goldsmith. (Phil. iii. 15.) Conviction in a fraud or ambition led him to abandon this life, and he applied himself to medicine under a quack, and soon set up for himself at Antioch. (Soc. iii. 15.) From the schools of medicine being Arian, he acquired a leaning towards heresy. He frequented the disputatious meetings of the physicians (St. Gr. p. 293, n) and made such progress in Eristicism, that he became a paid advocate for such as wished their own theories exhibited most advantageously. On his mother’s death he studied under Paulinus II., Arian Bishop of Antioch, A. D. 331; but his powers of disputation having exasperated some influential persons about Eulalius, the successor of Paulinus, he was obliged to quit Antioch for Ancyra, where he resumed the trade of a goldsmith, A. D. 331. (Phil. iii. 15.) Here he acquired a professor of grammar noticed him, employed him as a servant, and instructed him; but he was dismissed in disgrace on publicly disputing against his master’s interpretation of the Scripture. The Arian Bishop of the city, named Athanasius, received him and read with him the Gospels. Afterwards he read the Epistles with Antonius, a priest of Tarsus till the promotion of the latter to the Episcopate, when he returned to Athanasius and studied the Prophets with the priest Leonius. His obtrusive irreligion obliged him again to quit Athanasius, and he took refuge in Ghilin (before A.D. 348), where he was defeated in argument by some of the grossest (Borborian) Gnostics. He returned to Athanasius, but was retaken by him for a time for Alexandria, being led thither by the fame of the Manichee Apthiphon, against whom he recovered the fame for disputation which he had lately lost. He now resumed the study of medicine under Sopolis and practised gratuitously, earning money by following his former trade by night (Phil. iii. 15) or living upon others. (Theodoret, Hist. Ecle. ii. 23.) His chief employment, however, was an irreverent application of logical figures and geometrical diagrams to the Nature of the Word of God. (S. Epiphanius. adv. Haereses. § 2, and comp. § 6, p. 920.) He returned to Athanasius, and the elevation of his former master Leonius, led him to Sec. A. D. 349, and was by him ordained Deacon (Soc. iii. 15, transl. p. 136), though he declined the ordinary duties of the Diacontate and accepted that of teaching. A. D. 350. (Phil. iii. 17.) The Catholic haymen, Diodorus and Flavins, protested against this ordination, and Leonius was obliged to depose him. (Thdt. ii. 19.) His dispute with Basil of Caesarea, A. D. 351 (fin.), is the first indication of the future schism in the Arian heresy. (Phil. iii. 15.) Basil incensed Gallus (who became Caesar, March, A. D. 351) against Aetius, and Leonius’s intercession only saved the latter from death. Soon Theophilus Blennius introduced him to Gallus (S. Gr. p. 294), who made him his friend, and often sent him to his brother Julian when in danger of apostacy. (Phil. iii. 17.) There is a letter from Gallus extant, congratulating Julian on his adherence to Christianity, as he had heard of Aetius. (Post. Epist. Juliani, p. 155, ed. Boisson. Mogunt. 1828.) Aetius was implicated in the murder of Dominic and Montius (see Gibbon, c. 19), A. D. 354 (S. Gr. p. 294, b), but his insignificance saved him from the vengeance of Constantius. However, he quitted Aetius for Alexandria, where St. Athanasius was maintaining Christianity against Arianism, and in A. D. 355 acted as Deacon under George of Cappodocia, the violent interloper into the See of St. Athanasius. (St. Ep. 76. § 1; Thdt. ii. 24.) Here Ennomius became his pupil (Phil. iii. 20) and amanuensis. (Soc. ii. 83.) He is said by Philostorgius (iii. 19) to have refused ordination to the Episcopate, because Serras and Secundus, who made the offer, had mixed with the Catholics; in A. D. 358, when Eudosius became bishop of Antioch (Thdt. ii. 23), he returned to that city, but popular feeling prevented Eudosius from allowing him to act as Deacon.

The Aetian (Eunosimn, see Aetius) schism now begins to develop itself. The bold irreligion of Aetius leads a section of Arians (whom we may call anti-Aetians) to accuse him to Constantius (Soc. iv. 18); they allege his connexion with Gallus, and press the emperor to summon a general Council for the settlement of the Theological question. The Aetian interest with Eusebius (Sov. i. 16), the powerful Eunuch, divides the intended council, but notwithstanding, the Aetians are defeated at Seleucia, A. d. 353, and, dissolving the council, hasten to Constantius, at Constantinople, to secure his protection against their opponents. (S. Ath. transl. pp. 73, 77, 88, 163, 164.) The Anti-Aetians (who are in fact the more respectable Semi-Arians, see Aetius) follow, and charge their opponents with maintaining a Difference in Substance (+epoptewo) in the Trinity, producing a paper to that effect. A new schism among the Aetians, and Aetius is abandoned by his friends (called Eusebians or Arcens, see Aetius) and banished (S. Bas. i. 4), after protesting against his companions, who, holding the same principle with himself (viz. that the Son was a creature, antrora), refused to acknowledge the necessary inference (viz. that He is of unlike substance to the Father, dv3ovov). (Thdt. ii. 23; Sev. iv. 23; S. Greg. p. 301, d.; Phil. iv. 12.) His late friends would not let him remain at Mopsuestia, where he was kindly received by Aecutius, the Bishop there: Aecutius procures his banishment to Amhsdia in Pisidia (Phil. v. 1), where he composed his 300 books against those of Eusebius. (4. Eus. 17. 3.) He is also referred to by Theodoret, as producing a paper to that effect. A new schism among the Aetians, and Aetius is abandoned by his friends (called Eusebians or Aecennus, see Aetius, and banished (S. Bas. i. 4), after protesting against his companions, who, holding the same principle with himself (viz. that the Son was a creature, antrora), refused to acknowledge the necessary inference (viz. that He is of unlike substance to the Father, dv3ovov). (Thdt. ii. 23; Sev. iv. 23; S. Greg. p. 301, d.; Phil. iv. 12.)

On Constantius's death, Julian recalled the various exiled bishops, as well as Aetius, whom he invited to his court (Ep. Juliani, 31, p. 52, ed. Boisson.), giving him, too, a farm in Lesbos. (Phil. iv. 2.) Eunoulos, heretical Bishop of Antioch, took off the ecclesiastical condemnation from Aetius (Phil. vii. 5), and he was made Bishop at Constantinople. (S. Ep. 76. p. 892, c.) He spreads his heresy by fixing a bishop of his own religion at Constantinople (Phil. viii. 2) and by missionaries, till the sees of Jordan, A. d. 364. Valens, however, took part with Eudoxius, the Aecanian Bishop of Constantinople, and Aetius retired to Lesbo, where he narrowly escaped death at the hands of the governor, placed there by Procopius in his revolt against Valens, A. d. 365, 366. (See Gibbon, ch. 19.) Again he took refuge in Constantinople, but was driven thence by his former friends. In vain he applied for protection to Eudoxius, now at Marchonipe with Valens; and in A. d. 367 (Phil. iv. 7) he died, it seems, at Constantineople, unvisited by any but the equally irrereligious Eunoulos, who buried him. (Phil. iv. 6.) The doctrinal errors of Aetius are stated historically in the article on Aetos, from the Manichees he seems to have learned his licentious morals, which appeared in the most shocking Sedarismianism, and which he grounded on a Gnostic interpretation of St. John, xxvi. 3. He denied, like most other heretics, the necessity of fasting and self-mortification. (S. Ep. adr. Haer. 76. § 4.) At some time or other he was a disciple of Eusebius of Sebaste. (S. Bas. Ep. st. 233 [79] and 244 [82].) Socrates (ii. 35) speaks of several letters from him to Constantin and others. (S. Bas. Ep. st. 233 [79] and 244 [82].) Socrates (ii. 35) speaks of several letters from him to Constantin and others. His Treatise is to be found ap. S. Epiph. adr. Haer. 76. p. 924, ed. Petav. Colon. 1692. [A. J. C.]

AETIUS (Aetas, Aetius), a Greek medical writer, whose name is commonly but incorrectly spelt Aetius. Historians are not agreed about his exact date. He is placed by some writers as early as the fourth century after Christ; but it is plain from his own work that he did not write till the very end of the fifth or the beginning of the sixth, as he refers (tetrab. iii. serm. i. 24, p. 654) not only to St. Cyril, Patriarch of Alexandria, who died A. d. 444, but also (tetrab. ii. serm. iii. 110, p. 353) to Petrus Aetichristi, who was physician to Theodoric, King of the Ostrogoths, and therefore must have lived still later; he is himself quoted by Alexander Trallianis (xii. 8, p. 346), who lived probably in the middle of the sixth century. He was a native of Amidus, a city of Mesopotamia (Phoïtis, cod. 231) and studied at Alexandria, which was the most famous medical school of the age. He was probably a Christian, which may account perhaps for his being confounded with another person of the same name, a famous Arian of Antioch, who lived in the time of the Emperor Julian. In some manuscripts he has the title of αἵρητος προφήτης, κοιμητηρία, which means the chief officer in attendance on the emperor (see Du Cange, Gloss. Med. &f. Inf. Latin.); this title, according to Pherecydes, is given by the emperor to Aetius at Constantinople, where he was practising medicine. Aetius seems to be the first Greek medical writer among the Christians who gives any specimen of the spells and charms so much in vogue with the Egyptians, such as that of St. Blaise (tetrab. ii. serm. iv. 50, p. 404) in removing a bone which sticks in the throat, and another in relation to a Fistula. (tetrab. iv. serm. iii. 14, p. 762.) The division of his work Belia ierouk Ekaldhse. Sixteen Books on Medicine, "into four tetrambili (τετραμβιλία) was not made by himself, but (as Fabricius observes) was the invention of some modern translator, as his way of quoting his own work is according to the numerical series of the books. Although his work does not contain much original matter, it is nevertheless one of the most valuable medical remains of antiquity, as being a very judicious compilation from the writings of many authors whose works have been long since lost. The whole of it has never appeared in the original Greek; one half was published at Venice, 1534, fol. "in ad. Aldii," with the title "Aetii Amiden Librorum Medicinalium tomus primus; primi scilicet Libri Octo primum in lucem editi, Graece;" the second volume never appeared. Some chapters of the ninth book were published in Greek and Latin, by J. E. Hebenstreit, Lips. 4to. 1757, under the title "Tentamen Philologicum Medicum super Aetii Amiden Synopsis Medicorum Veterum," &c.; and again in the same year, "Aetii Amiden Aev strangor... Specimen alterum." Another chapter of the same book was edited in Greek and Latin by J. Magnus a Tengstadin, Aboae, 1817, 4to., with the title "Commentationum in Aetii Amiden Medici Aevstraco Specimen Primum, etc." Another extract, also from the ninth book, is inserted by MustoIxys and Schinas in their "Συλλογή "Ελληνικων Αεβικων," Venet. 1816, 8vo. The twenty-fifth chapter of the ninth book was edited in Greek and Latin by J. C. Horn, Lips. 1654, 4to.; and the chapter (tetrab. i. serm. li. 164) "De Significationibus Stellarum," is inserted in Greek and Latin by Petavius, in his "Uranolo-AETIUS, SICAMIUS (Σικαμιοῦς ὁ Ἀετίος), sometimes called Aetius Sicamius or Sicanus, the author of a treatise Περὶ Μελαγγόλας, De Melancholia, which is commonly printed among the works of Galen. (Vol. xix. p. 699, &c.) His date is uncertain, but, if he be not the same person as Aetius of Amida, he must have lived after him, as his treatise corresponds exactly with part of the latter's great medical work (tetrab. ii. sarm. ii. 9 — 11, p. 250, &c.): it is compiled from Galen, his treatise corresponds exactly with part of the latter's great medical work (tetrab. ii. sarm. ii. 9 — 11, p. 250, &c.): it is compiled from Galen, Celsus, Posidonius, and Marcellus. AFRANIUS.

senator Licinius Baccio, a very litigious woman, who always pleaded her own causes before the praetor, and thus gave occasion to the publishing of the edict, which forbade women to postulate. She was perhaps the sister of L. Afranius, consul in B. C. 60. She died in B. C. 48. (Val. Max. viii. 3 § 1; Dig. 3. tit. 1. a. § 5.)

AFRANIA GENS, plebeian, is first mentioned in the second century B. C. The only cognomen of this gens, which occurs under the republic, is STERLIO; those names which have no cognomina are given under AFRANUS. Some persons of this name evidently did not belong to the Afrania Gens. On coins we find only S. Afranius and M. Afranius, of whom nothing is known. (Beekel, v. p. 132, &c.)

AFRANIUS. 1. L. AFRANIUS, a Roman comic poet, who lived at the beginning of the first century B. C. His comedies described Roman scenes and manners (Conociae togatae), and the subjects were mostly taken from the life of the lower classes. (Conociae tubermorariae.) They were frequently polluted with disgraceful amours, which, according to Quintilian, were only a representation of the conduct of Afranius. (x. 1 § 100.) He depicted, however, Roman life with such accuracy, that he is chused with Menander, from whom indeed he borrowed largely. (Hor. Ep. ii. 1. 57; Macrob. Sat. vi. 1; Cic. de Fin. L. i.) He imitated the style of O. Titius, and his language is praised by Cicero. (Brut. 43.) His comedies are spoken of in the highest terms by the ancient writers, and under the empire they not only continued to be read, but were even acted, of which an example occurs in the time of Nero. (Vell. Pat. i. 17, ii. 19; Gell. xiii. 8; Suet. Ner. 11.) They seem to have been well known even at the latter end of the fourth century. (Aesop. Epigr. 71.) Afranius must have written a great many comedies, as the names and fragments of between twenty and thirty are still preserved. These fragments have been published by Botho, Post. Lat. Scenic. Fragmenta, and by Neukirch, De fidula togata Roman. 2. L. AFRANIUS, appears to have been of obscure origin, as he is called by Cicero in contempt "the son of Julius," as a person of whom nobody had heard. (Cic. ad Att. i. 16, 20.) He was first brought into notice by Pompey, and was always his warm friend and partizan. In B. C. 77 he was one of Pompey's legates in the war against Sertorius in Spain, and also served Pompey in the same capacity in the Mithridatic war. (Plut. Sert. 19. Pompey 34, 36, 39; Dion Cass. xxxvii. 5.) On Pompey's return to Rome, he was anxious to obtain the consulship for Afranius, that he might more easily carry his own plans into effect; and, notwithstanding the opposition of a powerful party, he obtained the election of Afranius by influence and bribery. During his consulship, however, (B. C. 60), Afranius did not do much for Pompey (Dion Cass. xxxvii. 49), but probably more from want of experience in political affairs than from any want of inclination. In B. C. 59 Afranius had the province of Cisalpine Gaul (comp. Cic. ad Att. i. 19), and it may have been owing to some advantages he had gained over the Gauls, that he obtained the triumph, of which Cicero speaks in his oration against Piso. (Dion Cass. xliii. 12; Florus, iv. 2. § 90; Liv. Epit. 114; Aur. Vict. de Vir. Ill. 78.) Afranius seems to have had some talent for war, but little for civil affairs. Dion Cassius says "he was a better dancer than a statesman" (xxviii. 49), and Cicero speaks of him with the greatest contempt during his consulship (ad. Att. i. 16, 20), though at a later time, when Afranius was opposed to Caesar, he calls him summus dux. (Phil. xiii. 14.)

Africanus is a writer on veterinary surgery, whose date is not certainly known, but who may very probably be the same person as Afranius. His more work entitled Kephos contained information upon medical subjects. (Africanus, Sex. Julius.) His remains were published in the Collection of writers on Veterinary Surgery.
AFRICANUS.

AFRICANUS, SEX. CAECILIUS, a classical Roman jurisconsult, who lived under Antoninus Pius. He was probably a pupil of Salvinus Julianus, the celebrated reformer of the Edict under Hadrian. [JULIANUS, SALVINUS.] He consulted Julian on legal subjects (Dig. 25. tit. 3. s. 3. § 4), and there is a controverted passage in the Digest (Africanus libros vicesimo Epistolarum apud Julianum quaerit, &c. Dig. 30. tit. i. s. 39), which has been explained in various ways; either that he published a legal correspondence which passed between him and Julianus, or that he commented upon the epistolary opinions given by Julianus in answer to the letters of clients, or that he wrote a commentary upon Julianus in the form of letters. On the other hand, Julianus "ex Sexto" is quoted by Gaius (ii. 216), which shows that Julianus annotated Sextus, the formula "ex Sexto" being synonymous with "ad Sextum." (Neubcr, die notated Sextus, the formula "ex Sexto" being the answer to the letters of clients, or that he wrote a commentary upon Julianus in the form of letters. On the other hand, Julianus "ex Sexto" is quoted by Gaius from the remains of some Greek scholia on the Basilics with parallel extracts from Africanus in the Digest. Paulus and Ulpian have done much to preserve in the Digest by the name Cascellius or S. Caecilius, who was a steady follower of Salvinianus Julianus, who is the person supposed to be the author of "Libri IX Questions," from the conciseness of the style, the great subtility of the reasoning, and the knottiness of the points discussed, so puzzled the old glossators, that when they came to an extract from Africanus, they were wont to exclaim 'Africani lex, id est difficilis.' (Heinecc. Hist. Jure Rom. § cccvii. n.) Mascovius (de Sectis Jure. 4. § 3) supposes that Africanus belonged to the legal sect of the Sabiniun (CAPITOL), and as our author was a steady follower of Salvinianus Julianus, who was a Sabiniun (Gaius, ii. 217, 218), this supposition may be regarded as established. In the reign of Antoninus Pius, the distinction of schools or sects had not yet worn out. Among the writers of the lives of ancient lawgivers (Papirios, Jo. Bertrandus, Gratins, &c.) much dispute has arisen as to the time when Africanus wrote, in consequence of a corrupt or erroneous passage in Lysandrius (Lamp. Alex. Sen. 68), which would make him a friend of Severus Alexander and a disciple of Papinian. Cujs ingeniously and satisfactorily disposes of this anachronism by referring to the internal evidence of an extract from Africanus (Dig. 30. tit. i. s. 109), which assumes the validity of a legal maxim that was no longer in force when Papinian wrote. For reasons which it would be tedious to detail, we hold, contrary to the opinion of Meigne (Ameon. Jure c. 29), that our Sextus Cascellius Africanus is identical with the jurist sometimes mentioned in the Digest by the name Cascellius or S. Caecilius, and also with that S. Caecilius whose dispute with Favorinus forms an amusing and interesting chapter in the Noces Atticæ. (Gell. xx. 1.) Gellius perhaps draws to some extent upon his own invention, but at all events, the lawyer's defence of the XII Tables against the attacks of the philosopher is "ben trovato." There is something humorously cruel in the concluding stroke of the conversation, in the pedantic way in which our jurisconsult vindicates the decemviral law against debtors—partis secundo, &c.—by the example of Melitus Fuscitus, and the harsh sentiment of Virgil:

"At tu dictis, Albane, maneras."

The remains of Africanus have been admirably expounded by Cujus (ad Africamur tractatus IX. in Cujus. Opp. vol. 1), and have also been annotated by Scipio Gentili. (Scip. Gentilis, Diss. I-IX ad Africamur, 4to. Altdorf. 1602-7.) (Sannichius, Vite lifi quodam jurisconsultorum et oratorum veterum, Turin 1723; i. Zimmerm. Rom. Rechtsgeschichte, § 94.) [J. T. G.]

AFRICANUS, JULIUS, a celebrated orator in the reign of Nero, seems to have been the son of Julius Africanus, of the Gallic state of the Sontoni, who was condemned by Tiberius, A. D. 32. (Tac. Ann. vii. 7.) Quintilian, who had heard Julius Africanus, speaks of him and Domitius Afer as the best orators of their time. The eloquence of Africanus was chiefly characterised by vehemence and energy. (Quintil. x. 1. § 118, xii. 10. § 11, comp. viii. 5. § 15; Dial. de Orat. 15.) Pliny mentions a grandson of this Julius Africanus, who was also an advocate and was opposed to him upon one occasion. (Ep. vii. 6.) He was consul successi in A. D. 106.

AFRICANUS, SEX. JULIUS, a Christian writer at the beginning of the third century, is called by Suidas a Libyian (s. v. 'Apl)ouyov), but passed the greater part of his life at Emmaus in Palestine, where, according to some, he was born. (Jerome, de Vir. Ill. 69.) When Emmaus was destroyed by fire, Africanus was sent to Elagabalus to solicit its restoration, in which mission he succeeded: the new town was called Nicopolis. (A. D. 221, Eusebius, Chron. sub anno ; Syneccllus, p. 359, b.) Africanus subsequently went to Alexandria to hear the philosopher Heraclus, who was afterwards bishop of Alexandria. The later Syrian writers state, that he was subsequently made bishop. He was one of the most learned of the early Christian writers. Sozomenus (Hist. Eccl. ii. 35) classifies him with Origen and Clement; and it appears from his letters on the History of Susana, that he was acquainted with Hebrew.

The chief work of Africanus was a Chronicon in five books (παιδεσμον χρονολογικα), from the creation of the world, which he placed in 5490 B. C. to A. D. 221, the fourth year of the reign of Elagabalus. This work is lost, but a considerable part of it is extracted by Eusebius in his "Chronicon," and many fragments of it are also preserved by Georgius Synceillus, Cedrenus, and in the Paschale Chronicon. (See Ideles, Hadesbiol. d Chronol. vol. ii. p. 456, &c.) The fragments of this work are given by Gallandi (Bibl. Pat.), and Nouth (Religiones Soroae).

Africanus wrote a letter to Origen impugning the authority of the book of Susanna, to which of Beltis, Actor, and Dictys, by Poseidon. (Fab. xi. 739), was acquainted with the healing arts. Pausanias (ii. 121) relates that the Egyptian king Rhampsinitus, in the construction of the treasury of Augeias, Agamedes and Trophonius contrived to place one stone in such a manner, that it could be taken away outside, and thus formed an entrance to the treasury, without any body perceiving it. Agamedes and Trophonius now constantly robbed the treasury; and the king, seeing that locks and seals were uninjured while his treasures were constantly decreasing, set traps to catch the thief. Agamedes was thus ensnared, and Trophonius cut off his head to avert the discovery. After this, Trophonius was immediately swallowed up by the earth. On this spot there was afterwards, in the grove of Leodecia, the so-called cave of Agamedes with a column by the side of it. Here also was the oracle of Trophonius, and those who consulted it first offered a ram to Agamedes and invoked him. (Paus. iii. 39. § 4; compare Dict. of Ant. p. 673.) A tradition mentioned by Cicero (Tusc. Quaest. i. 47; comp. Plut. De consul. et Apollon. 14), states that Agamedes and Trophonius, after having built the temple of Apollo at Delphi, prayed to the god to grant them in reward for their labour what was best for men. The god promised to do so on a certain day, and when the day came, the two brothers died. The question is whether the story about the Egyptian treasury is derived from Greece, or whether the Greek story was an importation from Egypt, and has been answered by modern scholars in both ways; but Müller (Orchom. p. 94, &c.) has rendered it very probable that the tradition took its rise among the Minyans, during which the intercourse between the two countries was opened. (L. S.)

AGAMEMNON (Ἀγαμέμνων). 1. A son of Pleisthenes and grand-son of Atreus, king of Mycenae, in whose house Agamemnon and Menelaus were educated after the death of their father. (Apollod. iii. 2. § 2; Schol. ad Eurip. Or. 5; Schol. ad Iliad. ii. 249.) Homer and several other writers call him a son of Atreus, grandson of Pelops, and great-grandson of Tantalus. (Hom. H. i. 131; Eurip. Helen. 390; Teets. ad Lyophor. 147; Hygin. Fab. 97.) His mother was, according to most accounts, Aërope; but some call Ethripyle the wife of Pleisthenes and the mother of Agamemnon. Besides his brother Menelaus, he had a sister, who is called Anaxibia, Cyndragora, or Astyocheia. (Schol. Eurip. Or. 5; Hygin. Fab. 17.)

AGAMEDE (Ἀγαμήδη). 1. A daughter of Aegaeus and wife of Mulius, who, according to Homer (II. x. 739), was acquainted with the healing powers of all the plants that grow upon the earth. Hyginus (Fab. 157) makes her the mother of Rebus, Actor, and Dictys, by Poseidon. (Steth. Byss. s. v. Ἀγαμήδη.) (L. S.) AGAMEMNON.

memon and Menelaus were brought up together with Aegisthus, the son of Thyestes, in the house of Atreus. When they had grown to manhood, Atreus sent Agamemnon and Menelaus to seek Thyestes. They found him at Delphi, and carried him to Atreus, who threw him into a dungeon. Aegisthus was afterwards commanded to kill him, but, recognizing his father in him, he abstained from the cruel deed, slew Atreus, and after having expelled Agamemnon and Menelaus, he and his father occupied the kingdom of Mycenae. [AEGI-

THUS.] The two brothers wandered about for a time, and at last came to Sparta, where Agamemnon married Clytemnestra, the daughter of Tyndareus, by whom he became the father of Iphigenia (Iphigeniae), Chrysothemis, Laodice (Elecura), and Orestes. (Hom. Ili. ix. 145, with the note of Eustath.; Lucr. i. 86.) The manner in which Agamemnon came to the kingdom of Mycenae, is differently related. From Homer (II. ii. 108; comp. Paus. ix. 40, § 6), it appears as if he had peaceably succeeded Thyestes, while, according to others (Aeschyl. Agam. 108), he expelled Thyestes, and usurped his throne. After he had become king of Mycenae, he rendered Sicyon and its king subject to himself (Paus. ii. 6, § 4), and became the most powerful prince in Greece. A catalogue of his dominions is given in the Iliad. (ii. 503, &c.; comp. Strab. viii. p. 377; Thucyd. i. 9.) When Homer (II. ii. 108) attributes to Agamemnon the sovereignty over all Argos, the name Argos here signifies Peloponnessus, or the greater part of it, for the city of Argos was governed by Diomedes. (II. ii. 559, &c.) Strabo (i.c.) has also shown that the name Argos is sometimes used by the tragic poets as synonymous with Mycenae.

When Helen, the wife of Menelaus, was carried off by Paris, the son of Priam, Agamemnon and Menelaus called upon all the Greek chiefs for assistance against Troy. (Odys. xxiv. 115.) The chiefs met at Argos in the palace of Diomedes, where Agamemnon was chosen their chief commander, either in consequence of his superior power (Eustath. ad II. ii. 108; Thucyd. i. 9), or because he had gained the favour of the assembled chiefs by giving them rich presents. (Dictys, Cret. i. 15, 16.) After two years of preparation, the Greek army and fleet assembled in the port of Aulis in Boeotia. Agamemnon had previously consulted the oracle about the issue of the enterprise, and the answer given was, that Troy should fall at the time when the most distinguished among the Greeks should quarrel. (Ovid. viii. 80.) A similar prophecy was derived from a marvellous occurrence which happened while the Greeks were assembled at Aulis. One day a sacrifice was offered under the boughs of a tree, a dragon crawled forth from under it, and devoured a nest on the tree containing eight young birds and their mother. Calchas interpreted the sign to indicate that the Greeks would have to fight against Troy for nine years, but that in the tenth the city would fall. (II. ii. 303, &c.) An account of a different miracle pertaining the same thing is given by Aeschylus. (Agam. 110, &c.) Another interesting incident happened while the Greeks were assembled at Aulis. Agamemnon, it is said, killed a stag which was sacred to Artemis, and in addition provoked the anger of the goddess by irreverent words. She in return visited the Greek army with a pestilence, and produced a perfect calm, so that the Greeks were unable to leave the port. When the seers declared that the anger of the goddess could not be soothed unless Iphigenia, the daughter of Agamemnon, were offered to her as an atoning sacrifice, Diomedes and Odysseus were sent to fetch her to the camp under the pretext that she was to be married to Achilles. She came; but at the moment when she was to be sacrificed, she was carried off by Artemis herself (according to others by Achilles) to Tauris, and another victim was substituted in her place. (Hygin. Fab. 93; Eurip. Iphig. i. 90, Iphig. Taur. 15; Sophoc. Elect. 565; Pind. Pyth. xi. 35; Ov. Met. xii. 31; Dict.CRET. i. 19; Schol. ad Lycophr. 183; Antonin. Lib. 27.) After this the calm ceased, and the army sailed to the coast of Troy. Agamemnon alone had but one hundred ships, independent of sixty which he had lent to the Andrians. (II. ii. 576, 612.)

In the tenth year of the siege of Troy—for it is in this year that the Iliad opens—we find Agamemnon involved in a quarrel with Achilles respecting the possession of Briseis, whom Achilles was obliged to give up to Agamemnon. Achilles withdrew from the field of battle, and the Greeks were visited by successive disasters. [ACHILLES.] Zeus sent a dream to Agamemnon to persuade him to lead the Greeks to battle against the Trojans. (II. ii. 55, &c.) After a single combat between Paris and Menelaus, a battle followed, in which Agamemnon killed several of the Trojans. When Hector challenged the bravest of the Greeks, Agamemnon offered to fight with him, but in his stead Ajax was chosen by lot. Soon after this another battle took place, in which the Greeks were worsted (II. viii.); and Agamemnon in despondence advised the Greeks to take to flight and return home. (II. ix. 10.) But he was opposed by the other heroes. An attempt to conciliate Achilles failed, and Agamemnon assembled the chiefs in the night to deliberate about the measures to be adopted. (II. ix. 1, &c.) Odysseus and Diomedes were then sent out as spies, and on the day following the contest with the Trojans was renewed. Agamemnon himself was again one of the bravest, and slew many enemies with his own hand. At last, however, he was wounded by Coon and obliged to withdraw to his tent. (II. xi. 288, &c.) Hector now advanced victoriously, and Agamemnon again advised the Greeks to save themselves by flight. (II. xiv. 75, &c.) But Odysseus and Diomedes were then sent out as spies, and on returning to the field of battle which was going on near the ships. Poseidon also appeared to Agamemnon in the figure of an aged man, and inspired him with new courage. (II. xiv. 125, &c.) The pressing danger of the Greeks at last induced Patroclus, the friend of Achilles, to take an energetic part in the battle, and his fall roused Achilles to new activity, and led to his reconciliation with Agamemnon. In the games at the funeral pyre of Patroclus, Agamemnon gained the first prize in throwing the spear. (II. xxiii. 890, &c.)

inferior to Achilles. But he nevertheless rises above all the Greeks by his dignity, power, and majesty (H. iii. 163, &c.), and his eyes and head are likened to those of Zeus, his girdle to that of Ares, and his breast to that of Poseidon. (H. ii. 471, &c.) Agamemnon is among the Greek heroes what Zeus is among the gods of Olympia. This idea appears to have guided the Greek artists, for in several representations of Agamemnon still extant there is a remarkable resemblance to the representations of Zeus. The emblem of his power and majesty in Homer is a sceptre, the work of Hephaestus, which Zeus had once given to Hermes, and Hermes to Pelops, from whom it descended to Agamemnon. (H. ii. 100, &c.; comp. Paus. ii. 30. § 6.) His armour is described in the Iliad. (xi. 19, &c.)

The remaining part of the story of Agamemnon is related in the Odyssey, and by several later writers. At the taking of Troy he received Cassandra, the daughter of Priam, as his prize (Od. xi. 421; Dict. Cret. v. 13), by whom, according to a tradition in Pausanias (ii. 16. § 5), he had two sons, Teledamus and Pelops. On his return home he was twice driven out of his course by storms, but at last landed in Arcolis, in the dominion of Aegisthus, who had seduced Clytemnestra during the absence of her husband. He invited Agamemnon on his arrival to a repast, and had him and his companions treacherously murdered during the feast (Od. iii. 263 [Aegisthus], and Clytemnestra on the same occasion murdered Cassandra. (Od. xi. 400, &c. 422, xxiv. 96, &c.) Odyseus met the shade of Agamemnon in the lower world. (Od. xii. 397, xxiv. 20.) Memoeus erected a monument in honour of his brother on the river Aegeus. (Od. iv. 584.) Pausanias (ii. 16. § 5) states, that in his time a monument of Agamemnon was still extant at Mycenae. The tragic poets have variously modified the story of the murder of Agamemnon. Aeschylus (Agam. 1492, &c.) makes Clytemnestra alone murder Agamemnon: she threw a net over him while he was in the bath, and slew him with three strokes. His motive is partly her jealousy of Cassandra, and partly her adulterous life with Aegisthus. According to Tzetzes (ad Lycophr. 1099), Aegisthus committed the murder with the assistance of Clytemnestra. Euripides (Or. 20) mentions a garment which Clytemnestra threw over him instead of a net, and both Sophocles (Elet. 530) and Euripides represent the sacrifice of Iphigeneia as the cause for which she murdered Agamemnon. After the death of Agamemnon and Cassandra, their two sons were murdered upon their tomb by Aegisthus. (Paus. ii. 16. § 5.) According to Pindar (Pyth. xi. 48) the murder of Agamemnon took place at Amycle, in Laconia, and Pausanias (i. c. e.) states that the inhabitants of this place disputed with those of Mycenae the possession of the tomb of Cassandra. (Comp. Paus. iii. 19. § 5.) In later times statues of Agamemnon were erected in several parts of Greece, and he was worshipped as a hero at Amycle and Olympia. (Paus. iii. 19. § 5, v. 25. § 5.) He was represented on the pedestal of the celebrated Rhامnian Nemesis (i. 33. § 5?), and his fight with Coon on the chest of Cypseus. (Paus. ii. 35. § 10.) He was painted on the back of Delphi by Polygnotus. (P. 23. § 2; compare Plin. H. N. xxxv. 36. § 5; Quintil. ii. 13. § 18; Val. Max. viii. 11. § 6.) It should be re-marked that several Latin poets mention a bastard son of Agamemnon, of the name of Halesus, to whom the foundation of the town of Falisci or Alesium is ascribed. (Or. Pauti. iv. 72; Amor. ii. 13. 31. Comp. Serv. ad Aen. viii. 683; Sili. Ital. viii. 476.)

2. A surname of Zeus, under which he was worshipped at Spartae. (Lycophr. 335, with the Schol.; Eustath. ad H. ii. 25.) Eustathius thinks that the god derived this name from the resemblance between him and Agamemnon; while others believe that it is a mere epithet signifying the Eternal, from αἰών and μυκήν. (L. S.)

AGAMEMNONIDES (Ἀγαμημνονίδες), a patronymic form from Agamemnon, which is used to designate his son Orestes. (Hom. Od. i. 30; Juv. viii. 215.)

AGANICUS or AGALONICUS (Ἀγανίκος or Ἀγαλονίκος), daughter of Hegetor, a Thessalian, who by her knowledge of Astronomy could forecast when the moon would disappear, and imposed upon credulous women, by saying that she could draw down the moon. (Plut. de Off. Conjug. p. 145, de Defect. Orac. p. 417.)

AGANIPPE (Ἀγανιππή), 1. A nymph of the well of the same name at the foot of Mount Helicon, in Bocotia, which was considered sacred to the Muses, and believed to have the power of inspiring those who drank of it. The nymph is called a daughter of the river-god Permessus. (Paus. ix. 29. § 5; Virg. Æol. x. 12.) The Muses are sometimes called Aganippides.

2. The wife of Arnaus, and according to some accounts the mother of Daunæ, although the latter is more commonly called a daughter of Eurydice. (Hygin. Fab. 65; Schol. ad Apollon. iv. 1091.)

AGAPIPPUS, is used by Ovid (Fast. v. 7) as an epithet of Hippocrene; its meaning however is not quite clear. It is derived from Agapippa, the well or nymph, and as Aganippides is used to designate the Muses, Aganippus Hippocrene may mean nothing but "Hippocrene, sacred to the Muses." (L. S.)

AGAPEPÔR (Ἀγαπηπόρ), a son of Ancaeus, and grandson of Lycurgus. He was king of the Arcadians, and received sixty ships from Agamemnon, in which he led his Arcadians to Troy. (Hom. H. ii. 609, &c.; Hygin. Fab. 97.) He also occurs among the suitors of Helen. (Hygin. Fab. 81; Apollod. iii. 10. § 6.) On his return from Troy he was cast by a storm on the coast of Cyprus, where he founded the town of Paphius, and in it the famous temple of Aphrodite. (Paus. viii. 5. § 2, &c.) He also occurs in the story of Harmonia. (Apollod. iii. 7. § 5, &c. [L. S.])

2. St., born at Rome, was Archbishop and raised to the Holy See A.D. 555. He was no sooner consecrated than he took off the anathemas pronounced by Pope Boniface II. against his deceased rival Dioscorus on a false charge ofSimonisme. He received an appeal from the Catholic of Constantinople when Anthimus, the Monophysite, was made Bishop by Theodora. [ANTH-Justinian led the Goths Theodatus to oblige St. Theodatus, on the fear of an invasion of Italy by Mas. Agapetus to go himself to Constantinople, in hope that Justinian might be diverted from his purpose. Agapetus laid his own hands upon him. The Council and the Synodal (interpreted into Greek) sent by Agapetus relating to these affairs may be found ap. Mansi, vol. viii. pp. 695, 921. Complaints were sent him from various quarters against the Monophysite Acæbius; but he died suddenly a.d. 536, April 22, and they were read in a Council held on 2nd May, by Mennas. (Mansi, vide p. 874.) There are two letters from St. Agapetus to Justinian in reply to a letter from the emperor, in the latter of which he refuses to acknowledge the Orders of the Arians; and there are two others: 1. To the Bishops of Africa, on his elevation to the Pontificate. (Mansi, Concil. viii. pp. 846—850.)

3. Deacon of the Church of St. Sophia, A.D. 527. There are two other Agapei mentioned in a Council held by Mennas at this time at Constantinople, who were Archimandrites, or Abbots. Agapetus was tutor to Justinian, and, on the accession of the latter to the empire, addressed to him Admonitions on the Duty of a Prince, in 72 Sections, the initial letters of which form the dedication (εὐθείας κεφαλαίων παραμετρικών σχετικῶν). The repugn in which this work was held appears from its common title, viz. the Royal Sections (σχετικῶν βασιλικῶν). It was published, with a Latin version, by Zach. Callierg. 8vo., Ven. 1509, afterwards by J. Brunon, 8vo., Lips. 1669, Gréhal, 8vo., Lips. 1733, and in Gallandi's Bibliotheca, vol. xi. p. 255, &c., Ven. 1766, after the edition of Bandurs (Benedictine). It was translated into French by Louis XIII., 8vo. Par. 1612, and by Th. Paynell into English, 12mo. Lond. 1550. [A. J. C.]

AGAPETUS ('Agaπετος), an ancient Greek physician, whose remedy for the gout is mentioned with approbation by Alexander Trallianus (xi. p. 505) and Paula Agineta. (iii. 78, p. 497, xi. 11, p. 661.) He probably lived between the third and sixth centuries after Christ, or certainly not later, as Alexander Trallianus, by whom he is quoted, is supposed to have flourished about the beginning of the sixth century. [W. A. G.]

AGAPIUS ('Aγαπίος), an ancient physician of Alexandria, who taught and practised medicine at Byzantium with great success and reputation, and acquired immense riches. Of his date it can only be determined, that he must have lived before the end of the fifth century after Christ, as Damascus (from whom Photius, Biblioth. cod. 242, and Suidas have taken their account of him) lived about that time. [W. A. G.]

AGARISTA (Ἀγαρίστα). 1. The daughter of Cleisthenes, tyrant of Sicyon, whom her father promised to give in marriage to the best of the Greeks. Suits came to Sicyon from all parts of Greece, and among others Megacles, the son of Alcmeon, from Athens. After they had been detained at Sicyon for a whole year, during which time Cleisthenes made trial of them in various ways, he gave Agariste to Megacles. From this marriage came the Cleisthenes who divided the Athenians into ten tribes, and Hippocrates. (Herod. vi. 126—130; comp. Athen. vi. p. 278, b. c., xii. 541, b. c.)

2. The daughter of the above-mentioned Hippocrates, and the grand-daughter of the above-mentioned Agariste, married Xanthippus and became the mother of Pericles. (Herod. vi. 130; Plut. Peric. 3.)

AGASIAS (Ἀγασίας), a Symphilian of Arcadia (Xen. Anab. iv. 1. § 27), is frequently mentioned by Xenophon as a brave and active officer in the army of the Ten Thousand. (Anab. iv. § 11. v. 2. § 15, &c.) He was wounded while fighting against Asiadics. (Anab. viii. 6. § 19.)

AGASIAS (Ἀγασίας), son of Dositheus, a distinguished sculptor of Ephesus. One of the productions of his chisel, the statue known by the name of the Borghese gladiator, is still preserved in the gallery of the Louvre. This statue, as well as the Apollo Belvidere, was discovered among the ruins of a palace of the Roman emperors on the site of the ancient Antium (Cupo d'Anzu). From the attitude of the figure it is clear, that the statue represents not a gladiator, but a warrior contending with a mounted combatant. Thiersch conjectures that it was intended to represent Achilles fighting with Penthesilea. The only record that we have of this artist is the inscription on the pedestal of the statue; nor are there any data for ascertaining the age in which he lived, except the style of art displayed in the work itself, which competent judges think cannot have been produced earlier than the fourth century, B.C.

It is not quite clear whether the Agasias, who is mentioned as the father of Heracleides, was the same as the author of the Borghese statue, or a different person.

There was another sculptor of the same name, also an Ephesian, the son of Memnonius. He is mentioned in a Greek inscription, from which it appears that he exercised his art in Delos while that island was under the Roman sway; probably somewhere about 100 B.C. (Thiersch, Ephes. d. bild. Kunst, p. 150; Müller, Arch. d. Kunst, P. 155.) [C. P. M.]

AGASICLES, AGESICLES or HEGESICLES (Ἀγασίκλης, Ἀγεσίκλης, Ἡγεσίκλης), a king of Sparta, the thirteenth of the line of Procles. He was contemporary with the Agid Leon, and succeeded his father Archidamus I., probably about B.C. 590 or 600. During his reign the Lacedaemonians carried on an unsuccessful war against Tegea, but prospered in their other wars. (Herod. i. 65; Paus. iii. 7. § 6. 3. §.) [C. P. M.]

AGASTEINENES (Ἀγαθείνενες), a son of Agathangelas, whom he succeeded in the kingdom of Elis. He had a son, Polyxenus, who occurs among the suitors of Helen. (Hom. I. ii. 624; Paus. v. 3. § 4; Apollod. iii. 10. § 8.) [L. S.]

AGATHANGELUS, the son of Callistratus wrote the Life of Gregory of Armavir in Greek, which is printed in the Acta Synodorum, vol. vii. p. 320. There are manuscripts of it in the public libraries both of Paris and Florence. The time at which Agathangelas lived is unknown. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 252, xi. p. 554.)

AGATHAGETUS (Ἀγάθαγητος), a Rhodian, who recommended his state to espouse the side of the Romans at the beginning of the war between Rome and Persia, b. c. 171. (Polyb. xxvii. 6.)

Rome and Perseus, who recommended his state to espouse the side of Marius, born at Cnidos. He was brought up by Agatharchus, who lived in the reign of Ptolemy Philometor. This historical and geographical works. In his youth (xvi. p. 779) informs us, attached to the Peripatetic school of philosophy, and wrote several historical and geographical works. In his youth he held the situation of secretary and reader to Hellenus Lembus, who, according to Suidas, lived in the reign of Ptolemy Philometor. This king died b. c. 146. He himself informs us (in his work on the Erythrean Sea) that he was subsequently guardian to one of the kings of Egypt during his minority. This was no doubt one of the two sons of Ptolemy Phuscon. Dodwell endeavours to show that it was the younger son, Alexander, and objects to Soter, that he resigned consistently with his mother. This, however, was the case with Alexander likewise. Wesseling and Clinton think the elder brother to be the one meant, as Soter II. was more likely to have been a minor on his accession in b. c. 117, than Alexander in b. c. 107, ten years after their father's death. Moreover Dodwell's date would leave too short an interval between the publication of Agatharchides's work on the Erythrean Sea (about b. c. 113), and the work of Artemidorus.

An examination of the works of Agatharchides is given by Photius (Cod. 213). He wrote a work on Asia, in 10 books, and one on Europe, in 49 books; a geographical work on the Erythrean Sea, in 5 books, of the first and fifth books of Strabo, is also attributed to him; an epitome of the last mentioned work; a treatise on the Troglodytæ, in 5 books; an epitome of the Αἰγυπτικὰ of Anthimachus; an epitome of the works of those who had written τὰ παραφαύραν θεοματων διώκοντα; an historical work, from the 12th and 30th books of which Athenaeus quotes (xii. p. 527, b. vi. p. 251, f.); and a treatise on the intercourse of friends. The first three of these only had been read by Photius. Agatharchides composed his work on the Erythrean Sea, as he tells us himself, in his old age (p. 14, ed. Huds.), in the reign probably of Ptolemy Soter II. It appears to have contained a great deal of valuable matter. In the first book was a discussion respecting the origin of the name. In the fifth he described the mode of life amongst the Sabaeans in Arabia, and the Ichthyophagi, and the way in which elephants were caught by the elephant-eaters, and the mode of working the gold mines in the mountains of Egypt, near the Red Sea. His account of the Ichthyophagi and of the mode of working the gold mines, has been copied by Diodorus. (iii. 12—18.) Amongst other extraordinary animals he mentions the camelopard, which was found in the country of the Troglodytæ, and the rhinoceros.

Agatharchides wrote in the Attic dialect. His style, according to Photius, was dignified and perspicuous, and abounded in sententious passages, which inspired a favourable opinion of his judgment. In the composition of his speeches he was an imitator of Thucydidæ, whom he equalled in dignity and excelled in clearness. His rhetorical talents also are highly praised by Photius. He was acquainted with the language of the Aeolians (de Liter. M. p. 46), and appears to have been the first who discovered the true cause of the yearly inundations of the Nile. (p. 41.)

An Agatharchides of Samos, is mentioned by Plutarch, as the author of a work on Persia, and one τεταχθὼν. Fabricius, however, conjectures that the true reading is Agathysides, not Agatharchides. (Dodwell in Hudson's Geogr. Script. Gr. Minoræ; Clinton, Fasti Helt, iii p. 535.) [C.P.M.]

There is a curious observation by Agatharchides preserved by Plutarch (Sympos. viii. 9. § 3), of the species of worm called Pilaria Melicenias, or Guinea Worm, which is the earliest account of that that is to be met with. See Justus Wehe, De Pilar. Medin. Comment. Berol. 1862, 8vo., and especially the very learned work by G. H. Welschæus, De Vasa Melicenias, 8vo., August. Vindel. 1674, 4to. [W. A. G.]

AGATHARCHUS (Ἀγαθαρχος), a Syracusan, who was placed by the Syracusans over a fleet of twelve ships in b. c. 413, to visit their allies and harass the Athenians. He was afterwards, in the same year, one of the Syracusan commanders in the decisive battle fought in the harbour of Syracuse. (Thuc. vii. 25, 70; Diod. xiii. 1.)

AGATHARCHUS (Ἀγαθαρχος), an Athenian artist, said by Vitruvius (Proef. ad lib. vii.) to have invented scene-painting, and to have painted a scene (ανεμον ψεύδων) for a tragedy which Aeschylus exhibited. As this appears to contradict Aristotle's assertion (Poet. 4. § 10), that scene-painting was introduced by Sophocles, some scholars understand Vitruvius to mean merely, that Agatharchus constructed a stage. (Compare Hor. Ep. ad Pis. 275: et medicis insinuavit pulpitos typhos.) But the context shews clearly that Agatharchus meant, for Vitruvius goes on to say, that Democritus and Anaxagoras, carrying out the principles laid down in the treatise of Agatharchus, wrote on the same subject, shewing how, in drawing, the lines ought to be made to correspond, according to a natural proportion, to the figure which would be traced out on an imaginary intervening plane by a pencil of rays proceeding from the eye, as a fixed point of sight, to the several points of the object viewed.

It was probably not till towards the end of Aeschylus's career that scene-painting was introduced, and not till the time of Sophocles that it was generally made use of, which may account for what Aristotle says.

There was another Greek painter of the name of Agatharchus, who was a native of the island of Samos, and the son of Eudemus. He was a contemporary of Alcibiades and Zeuxis. We have no definite accounts respecting his performances, but he does not appear to have been an artist of much merit: he prided himself chiefly on the ease and rapidity with which he finished his works. (Plut. Peric. 13.) Plutarch (Alcib. 16) and Andocides at greater length (in Alcib. p. 31.15) tell an anecdote of Alcibiades having inveigled Agatharchus to his house and kept him there for more than three months in strict durance, compelling him to adorn it with his pencil. The speech of Andocides above referred to seems to have been delivered after the destruction of Melos (b. c. 416) and before the expedition to Sicily (b. c. 415); so that from the above data the age of Agatharchus may be accurately fixed. Some scholars (as Bentley, Böttiger, and Meyer) have supposed him to be the same as the contemporary of Aeacius, who, however, must have preceded him by a good half century. (Müller, Arch. d. Kuns, p. 88.) [C. P. M.]
AGATHIAS.

AGATHIAS.

AGATHEMERUS (Ἀγαθήμερος), the son of Orthon, and the author of a small geographical work in two books, entitled τὸς γεωγράφιας ὑποτυπουσίν ἐν ἑπτάγραμμο ( "A Sketch of Geography in epitome"), addressed to his pupil Philon. His age cannot be fixed with much certainty, but he is supposed to have lived about the beginning of the third century after Christ. He lived after Ptolemy, whom he often quotes, and before the foundation of Constantinople on the site of Byzantium in A. D. 328, as he mentions only the old city Byzantium. (ii. 14.) Wendelin has attempted to show that he wrote in the beginning of the third century, from the statement he gives of the distance of the tropic from the equator; but Dodwell, who thinks he lived nearer the time of Ptolemy, contends that the calculation cannot be depended on. From his speaking of Albion ἐς ἀραγάδες Ἀπόλλων, it has been thought that he wrote not very long after the erection of the wall of Severus. This is probably true, but the language is scarcely definite enough to establish the point.

His work consists chiefly of extracts from Ptolemy and other earlier writers. From a comparison with Pliny, it appears that Artemidorus, of whose work a sort of compendium is contained in the first book, was one of his main authorities. He gives a short account of the various forms assigned to the earth by earlier writers, treats of the divisions of the earth, seas, and islands, the winds, and the length and shortness of the days, and then lays down the most important distances on the inhabited part of the earth, reckoned in stadia. The surname Agathemeron frequently occurs in inscriptions. (Dodwell in Hudson's Geography. 6. 6. 8. 9.)

AGATHE'MERUS, CLAUDIUS (Ἀκαθήμερος, Κλαύδιος Ἐρσαητος), an ancient Greek physician, who lived in the first century after Christ. He was born at Lacedaemon, and was a pupil of the philosopher Parnas, in whose house he became acquainted with the poet Persius about A. D. 50. (Pseudo-Sueton. vita Persii.) In the old editions of Suetonius he is called Agateraus, a mistake which was first corrected by Reinesius (Syntagma Inscript. Autot. p. 610), from the epitaph upon him and his wife, Myrtille, which is preserved in the Marmor Oscanum and the Greek Anthology, vol. iii. p. 381. § 234, ed. Tisch. The apparent anomaly of a Roman praenomen being given to a Greek, may be accounted for by the fact that Persius, who was a pupil of the senator Cato (Tiber. 6), that the Spartans were the hereditary clients of the Glaucidae. (C. G. Kuhn, Additum, ad Elesch. Medica. Vet. a J. A. Fubricio, in "Bibloth. Graeca" exhibit.) [W. A. G.]

AGATHIAS (Ἀγαθίας), the son of Mammaju, a rhetorician, was born, as it seems, in 536 or 537 A. D. (Hist. ii. 16, and Vita Agathiae in ed. Bonn. p. iv.), at Myrina, a town at the mouth of the river Pythicus in Aeolia (Agathiae Proveniun, p. 9, ed. Bonn; p. 5, Par.; p. 7, Ven.), and received his education in Alexandria, where he studied literature. In 554 he went to Constantinople (Hist. ii. 16), where his father then most probably resided, and studied for several years the Roman law. (Epigr. 4.) He afterward exercised with great success the profession of an advocate, though only for the sake of a livelihood, his favourite occupation being the study of ancient poetry (Hist. iii. 1); and he paid particular attention to history. His profession of a lawyer was the cause of his surname Συγγαλστιος (Συγγαλστιος, 2. α.ν. Ἀγαθίας), which word signified an advocate in the time of Agathas. Niebuhr (Vita Agath. in ed. Bonn. pp. xvi.) believes, that he died during the reign of Tiberius Thrax, a short time before the death of this emperor and the accession of Maurius in 582, at the age of only 44 or 45 years. Agathas, who was a Christian (Epigr. 3, 5, and especially 4), enjoyed during his life the esteem of several great and distinguished men of his time, such as Theodorus the decurio, Paulus Silentiarius, Eutychianus the younger, and Macedonius the ex-consul. He shewed them his gratitude by dedicating to them several of his literary productions, and he paid particular homage to Paulus Silentiarius, the son of Cyrus Flora, who was descended from an old and illustrious family. (Hist. v. 9.)

Agathas is the author of the following works:

1. Διάφορα. A collection of small love poems, divided into nine books; the poems are written in hexametres. Nothing is extant of this collection, which the author calls a juvenile essay. (Agath. Proveniun, p. 6, ed. Bonn; p. 4, Par.; p. 6, Ven.)

2. Κύκλος, an anthology containing poems of early writers and of several of his contemporaries, chiefly such as were his protectors, among whom were Paulus Silentiarius and Macedonius. This collection was divided into seven books, but nothing of it is extant except the introduction, which was written by Agathas himself. However, 108 epigrams, which were in circulation either before he collected his Κύκλος, or which he composed at a later period, have come down to us. The last seven and several others of these epigrams are generally attributed to other writers, such as Paulus Silentiarius, &c. The epigrams are contained in the Anthologia Graeca (iv. p. 3, ed. Jacobus), and in the editions of the historical work of Agathas.

Joseph Scaliger, Janus Douza, and Bonaventura Vulcainus, have translated the greater part of them into Latin. The epigrams were written and published after the Διαφορα.

3. Αγαθίου Συγγαλστιος Μυρινακος Ιστοριαν Ελ. "Agathiae Scholastici Myroniensis Historiarum Libri V." This is his principal work. It contains the history from 553—558 A. D., a short period, but remarkable for the important events with which it is filled up. The first book contains the conquest of Italy by Narses over the Goths, and the first contests between the Greeks and the Persians; the second book contains the taking of the city of Sardis; the third book contains the description of the great earthquake of 554, and the beginning of the war between the Greeks and the Persians; the third and the fourth books contain the continuation of this war until the first peace in 556; the fifth book relates the second great earthquake of 557, the rebuilding of St. Sophia by Justinian, the plague, the exploits of Belisarius over the Huns and other barbarians in 558, and it finishes abruptly with the 25th chapter.

Agathas, after having related that he had abandoned his poetical occupation for more serious studies (Proveniun, ed. Bonn. pp. 6, 7; Par. p. 4; Ven. p. 6), tells us that several distinguished men had suggested to him the idea of writing the history
AGATHINUS, of his time, and he adds, that he had undertaken the task especially on the advice of Eutychianus. (1b.) However, he calls Eutychianus the ornament of the family of the Flori, a family to which Eutychianus did not belong at all. It is therefore probable that, instead of Eutychianus, we must read Paulus Silentiarius: Niebuhr is of this opinion. (1b. not 10.) Agathinus is not a great historian; he wants historical and geographical knowledge, principally with regard to Italy, though he knows the East better. He seldom penetrates into the real causes of those great events which form the subjects of his book: his history is the work of a man of business, who adorns his style with poetical reminiscences. But he is honest and impartial, and in all those things which he is able to understand he shews himself a man of good sense. His style is often bombastic; he praises himself; his Greek the Ionic dialect prevails, but it is the Ionic of his time, degenerated from its classical purity into a sort of mixture of all the other Greek dialects. Nothwithstanding these deficiencies the work of Agathinus is of high value, because it contains a great number of important facts concerning one of the most eventful periods of Roman history. Editions: 1 Aγαθινος Χρονολογικός μελ ην Βασιλειανης των Ελληνων Κυριακος της Βοιωτου, with a Latin translation, Lugduni, 1594. The Parisian edition, which is contained in the Corpus Scriptorum Byzant. was published in 1660; it contains many errors and conjectural innovations, which have been reprinted and augmented by the editors of the Venetian edition. Another edition was published at Basel (in 1576?). A Latin translation by Christophorus Persona was separately published at Rome, 1516, fol., and afterwards at Augsburg, 1519, 4to.; at Basel, 1531, fol., and at Leyden, 1594, 8vo. The best edition is that of Niebuhr, Bonn. 1820, 8vo., which forms the third volume of the Corpus Scriptorum Historiae Byzantinae. It contains the Latin translation and the notes of Bonaventura Vulanius. The Epigrams form an appendix of this edition of Niebuhr, who has carefully corrected and improved the innovations of the Parisian edition. [W. P.] AGATHINUS ('Aγαθινος), an eminently ancient Greek physician, the founder of a new medical sect, to which he gave the name of Episymphetici. (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Episymphetici.) He was born at Sparta and must have lived in the first century after Christ, as he was the pupil of Athenaeus, and the tutor of Archigenes. (Galen. Deiit. Med. c. 14, vol. xix. p. 533; Suidas, s. v. Αρχιγενης; Eudoc. Victor. ap. Villoison, Anecd. Gr. c. 1. p. 65.) He is said to have been once seized with a delirium, brought on by want of sleep, from which he was delivered by his pupil Archigenes, who attacked his head to be fomented, with a great quantity of warm oil. (Arist., tetr. i. serm. iii. 172, p. 156.) He is frequently quoted by Galen, who mentions him among the Pneumatics. (Dict. of An. s. v. Pneumatics.) None of his writings are now extant, but a few fragments are contained in Matthei’s Collection, entitled XXI Veterum et Clarorum Medicorum Graecorum Varia Opuscula, Moscaee, 1808, 4to. See also Palladius, Com. in Hippocr. De Morbi. Popul. lib. vii. ap. Dietz, Scholia in Hippocr. et Galen. vol. ii. p. 56. The particular opinions of his sect are not exactly known, but they were probably nearly the same as those of the Eclecctici. (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Ecl.ectici.) (See J. C. Osterhausen, Histor. Sectae Pneumat. Med. Altorf. 1791, 8vo.; C. G. Kühn, Addit. ad Elec. Med. Vet. a J. A. Fabriiciod in “Bibl. U. Graeco” exhib.) [W. A. G.] AGATHOCLES (‘Αγαθακλῆς), a mistress of the profligate Ptolemy Philopator, King of Egypt, and sister of his no less profligate minister Agathocles. She and her brother, who both exercised the most unbounded influence over the king, were introduced to him by their ambitions and avaricious mother, Oenanthe. After Ptolemy had put to death his wife and sister Eurydice, Agathocles became his favourite. On the death of Ptolemy (a. D. 265), Agathocles and her friends kept the event secret, that they might have an opportunity of plundering the royal treasury. They also formed a conspiracy for setting Agathocles on the throne. He managed for some time, in conjunction with Sobibius, to act as guardian to the young king Ptolemy Epiphanes. At last the Egyptians and the Macedonians of Alexandria, exasperated at his outrages, rose against him, and Tlepolemus placed himself at their head. They surrounded the palace in the night, and forced their way in. Agathocles and his sister implored in the most abject manner that their lives might be spared, but in vain. The former was killed by his friends, that he might not be exposed to a more cruel fate. Agathocles with her sisters, and Oenanthe, who had taken refuge in a temple, were dragged forth, and in a state of nakedness exposed to the fury of the multitude, who literally tore them limb from limb. All their relations and those who had had any share in the murder of Eurydice were likewise put to death. (Polyb. v. 63, xiv. 11, xv. 23–34; Justin, xxx. 1. 2; Athen. vi. p. 251, xiii. p. 576; Plint. Cleom. 33.) There was another Agathocles, the daughter of a man named Aristomenes, who was by birth an Acræanian, and rose to great power in Egypt. (Polyb. 7. 3. 32.) [C. N. M.] AGATHOCLES (Ἀγαθόκλης), a Sicilian of such remarkable ability and energy, that he raised himself from the station of a potter to that of tyrant of Syracuse and king of Sicily. He flourished in the latter part of the fourth and the beginning of the third century, b. c., so that the period of his dominion is contemporary with that of the second and third Samnite wars, during which time his power must have been to Rome a cause of painful interest; yet so entire is the loss of all Roman history of that epoch, that he is not once mentioned in the 9th and 10th books of Livy, though we know that he had Sammites and Etruscans in his service, that assistance was asked from him by the Tarentines (Strab. vi. p. 280), and that he actually landed in Italy. (See Arnold’s Rome, c. xxxv.) The events of his life are detailed by Diodorus and Justin. Of these the first has taken his account from Timaeus of Tauromenium, a historian whom Agathocles banished from Sicily, and whose love for censuring others was so great, that he was nick-named Epitimimaus (fault-finder). (Athen. vi. p. 272.) His natural propensity was not likely to be softened when he was describing the author of his exile; and Diodorus himself does not hesitate to accuse him of having calumniated Agathocles very grossly. (Paus. lib. xii.) Polybius too charges him with wilfully perverting the truth (xi. 13), so that the account which he has left must be received with much suspicion. Marvellous stories are reiterated of the early years of Agathocles. Born at Thurii, a town of Sicily subject to Carthage, he is said to have been exposed when an infant, by his father, Carcinus of Rhegium, in consequence of a succession of troublesome dreams, portending that he would be a source of much evil to Sicily. His mother, however, secretly preserved his life, and at seven years old he was restored to his father, who had long repented of his conduct to the child. By him he was taken to Syracuse and brought up as a potter. In his youth he led a life of extravagance and debauchery, but was remarkable for strength and personal beauty, qualities which recommended him to Damos, a noble Syracusan, under whose auspices he was made first a soldier, then a chilarch, and afterwards a military tribune. On the death of Damos, he married his rich widow, and so became one of the wealthiest citizens in Syracuse. His ambitious schemes then developed themselves, and he was driven into exile. After several changes of fortune, he collected an army which overawed both the Syracusans and Carthaginians, and was restored under an oath that he would not interfere with the democracy, which oath he kept by murdering 4000 and banishing 6000 citizens. He was immediately declared sovereign of Syracuse, under the title of Autocrat. But Hamilcar, the Carthaginian general in Sicily, kept the field successfully against him, after the whole of Sicily, which was not under the dominion of Carthage, had submitted to him. In the battle of Himera, the army of Agathocles was defeated with great slaughter, and immediately after, Syracuse itself was closely besieged. At this juncture, he formed the bold design of averting the ruin which threatened him, by carrying the war into Africa. To obtain money for this purpose, he offered to let those who dreaded the miseries of a protracted siege depart from Syracuse, and then sent a body of armed men to plunder and murder those who accepted his offer. He kept his design a profound secret, eluded the Carthaginian fleet, which was blockading the harbour, and though closely pursued by them for six days and nights, landed his men in safety on the shores of Africa. Advancing then into the midst of his army, arrayed in a splendid robe, and with a crown on his head, he announced that he had vowed, as a thank-offering for his escape, to sacrifice his ships to Demeter in a splendid robe, and with a crown on his head, he announced that he had vowed, as a thank-offering for his escape, to sacrifice his ships to Demeter, and gently. To his great abilities we have the testimony of Scipio Africanus, who when asked what men were in his opinion at once the boldest warriors and wisest statesmen, replied, Agathocles and Dionysius. (Polyb. xvi. 35.) He appears also to have possessed all the qualities of wisdom and repartee, to have been a most agreeable companion, and to have lived in Syracuse in a security generally unknown to the Greek tyrants, unattended by guards, and trusting entirely either to his views. So that while we reject the fictions of Timaeus, we can as little understand the statement of Polybius, that though he used bloody means to acquire his power, he afterwards became most mild and gentle. As to the chronology of his life, his landing in Africa was in the archonship of Hieronemmon at Athens, and accompanied by an eclipse of the sun, 1.e. Aug. 15, B.C. 310. (Clinton, Fast. Hist.) He quitted it at the end of B.C. 307, died B.C. 289, after a reign of 28 years, aged 72 according to Diodorus, though Lucan (Maced. 10), gives his age 85. Wesseling and Clinton prefer the statement of Diodorus. The Italian mercenaries whom he had left, were the Mamertini who after his death seized Messana, and occasioned the first Punic war. [C. E. L. AGATHOCLES

AGATHOCLES (Ἀγάθωκλῆς). 1. The father of Lysimachus, was a Thessalian Peasant, but obtained the favour of Philip through flattery, and was raised by him to high rank. (Theopompos, ap. Athen. vi. p. 259, f., &c.; Arrian, Anat. vi. 36. Ind. 18.)

2. The son of Lysimachus by an Odrysian woman, whom Polyuenus (vi. 12) calls Macris. Agathocles was sent by his father against the Getae, about b. c. 292, but was defeated and taken prisoner. He was kindly treated by Dromichaetis, the king of the Getae, and sent back to his father with presents; but Lysimachus, notwithstanding, marched against the Getae, and was taken prisoner himself. He too was also released by Dromichaetis, who received in consequence the daughter of Lysimachus in marriage. According to some authors, it was only Agathocles, and according to others only Lysimachus, who was taken prisoner. (Diod. Exc. xxi. p. 559, ed. Wess.; Plut. Demet. c. 39, de ser. num. vind. p. 555, d.) In b. c. 287, Agathocles was sent by his father against Demetrius Poliorectes, who had marched into Asia to depose Lysimachus of Lydia and Caria. In this expedition he was successful; he defeated Lysimachus and drove him out of his father's provinces. (Plut. Demet. c. 46.) Agathocles was destined to be the successor of Lysimachus, and was popular among his subjects; but his stepmother, Arsinoe, prejudiced the mind of his father against him; and after an unsuccessful attempt to poison him, Lysimachus cast him into prison, where he was murdered (b. c. 284) by Ptolemaus Ceramis, who was a fugitive at the court of Lysimachus. His widow Lysandra fled with his children, and Alexander, his brother, to Seleucus in Asia, who made war upon Lysimachus in consequence. (Memnon, ap. Ptol. Cod. 124, pp. 225, 226, ed. Bekker; Paus. i. 19; Justin, xvii. 1.)

AGATHOCLES (Ἀγάθωκλῆς), a Greek historian. The history of Cyrus is attributed to Agathocles. He is called by Athenaeus both a Babylonian (i. p. 30, a. ix. p. 375, a) and a Cynic. (xiv. p. 649, f.) He may originally have come from Babylon, and have settled at Cyzicus. The first and third books are referred to by Atheneeus. (ix. p. 375, f, xii. p. 515, a.) The time at which Agathocles lived is unknown, and his work is now lost; but it seems to have been extensively read in antiquity, as it is referred to by Cicero (de Div. i. 24), Pliny (Hist. Nat. Elenchus of books iv. vi. v.), and other ancient writers. Agathocles also spoke of the origin of Rome. (Pestus. s. e. Romam; Solinus, Polig. 1.) The scholar on Apollonius (iv. 781) cites Memoria (ιοωνευματα) by an Agathocles, who is usually supposed to be the same as the above-mentioned one. (Compare Schol. ad Hes. Theog. 485; Steph. Byz. s. e. Βασκτος; Epinol. M. s. v. Διαστ.)

There are several other writers of the same name. 1. Agathocles of Atrax, who wrote a work on fishing (Ἀκουτωμᾶ), Suidas, s. e. Κουτωμᾶς). 2. Of Chios, who wrote a work on agriculture. (Varro and Colum. de Re Rust. i. 1. Plin. H. N. xxii. 44.) 3. Of Miletus, who wrote a work on rivers. (Plut. de Plm. p. 1153, c.) 4. Of Samos, who wrote a work on the constitution of Pessinus. (Plut. Ital. p. 1158, f.)

AGATHOCLES, brother of Agathocles. (Agathocles.)

AGATHODAEMON (Ἀγαθοδαίμων or Αγαθαίδος), the "Good God," a divinity in honour of whom the Greeks drank a cup of unmixed wine at the end of every repast. A temple dedicated to him was situated on the road from Megalopolis to Macellum in Arcadia. Pausanias (viii. 38, § 3) conjectures that the name is a mere epithet of Zeus. (Comp. Lebbeck, de Ptolemais, p. 605.) [L.S.]

AGATHODAEMON (Ἀγαθοδαίμων), taken back, regicide of Alexandria. All that is known of him is, that he was the designer of some maps to accompany Ptolemy's Geography. Copies of these maps are found appended to several MSS. of Ptolemy. One of these is at Vienna, another at Venice. At the end of each of these MSS. is the following notice: Εκ τῶν Κλαυδίου Πτολεμαίου Γεωγράφου βι− έλμα διότι τὴν οἰκουμένην πάσαν Ἀγαθοδαιμόνι Αἰκινδόρου οὖστικέα (Agath. of Alexandria delineated the whole inhabited world according to the eight books on Geography of C1. Ptolemaeus). The Vienna MS. of Ptolemy is one of the most beautiful extant. The maps attached to it, 27 in number, comprising 1 general map, 10 maps of Europe, 4 of Africa, and 12 of Asia, are four-leaved, the water being green, the mountains red or dark yellow, and the land white. The climates, parallels, and the hours of the longest day, are marked on the East margin of the maps, and the meridians on the North and South. We have no evidence as to when Agathodaeon lived, as the only notice preserved respecting him is that quoted above. There was a grammarian of the same name, to whom some extant letters of Leidore of Pelusium are addressed. Some have thought him to be the Agathodaeon in question. Heeren, however, considers the delineator of the maps to have been a contemporary of Ptolemy, who (viii. 1, 2) mentions certain maps or tables (στοιχεῖα), which agree in number and arrangement with those of Agathodaeon in the MSS.

Various errors having in the course of time crept into the copies, the maps of Agathodaeon, Nicolaus Donis, a Benedictine monk, who flourished about a. d. 1470, restored and corrected them, substituting Latin for Greek names. His maps are appended to the Ethiopic MS. of Ptolemy. They are the same in number and nearly the same in order with those of Agathodaeon. (Heeren, Commentario de Fontibus Geogr. Ptolemei Tabularumisque in annexum; Raidel, Commentario critico-litterario de C1. Ptolemaei Geographiae ejusque codicibus, p. 7.) [C. P. M.]

A'GATHON (Ἀγάθων), the son of the Macedonian Philotas, and the brother of Panneon and Asander, was given as a hostage to Antigonus in b. c. 315, by his brother Asander, who was satrap of Caria, but was taken back by Antigonus and sent to Antigonus in a few days. (Diod. xii. 79.) Agathon had a son, named Asander, who is mentioned in a Greek inscription. (Bichl. Corp. Jser. 105.)

A'GATHON (Ἀγάθων), an Athenian tragic poet, was born about b. c. 417, and sprung from a rich and respectable family. He was consequently contemporary with Socrates and Alcibiades and the other distinguished characters of their age, with many of whom he was on terms of intimate acquain-tance. Amongst these was his friend Euripides. He was remarkable for the handsome-ness of his person and his various accomplishments. (Ptol. Plag. p. 186, b.) He gained his first victory at the Lenaeum festival in b. c. 416, when he was a little above thirty years of age: in honour of which Plato represents the Symposium, or ban¬ quet, to have been given, which he has made the occasion of his dialogue so called. The scene is laid at Agathon's house, and amongst the interlocutors are, Apollodorus, Socrates, Aristophanes, Diotima, and Alcibiades. Plato was then fourteen years of age, and a spectator at the tragic contest, in which Agathon was victorious. (Athen. v. p. 217, a.) When Agathon was about forty years of age (n. c. 407), he visited the court of Archelais, the king of Macedonia (Aelian, V. H. xii. 4), where his old friend Euripides was also a guest at the same time. From the expression in the Rameae (83), that he was gone év nT TOD TETKTOS, nothing certain can be determined as to the time of his death. The phrase admits of two meanings, either that he was then residing at the court of Archelais, or that he was dead. The former, however, is the more probable interpretation. (Clinton, Post. Hell.
vol. ii. p. xxi.) He is generally supposed to have died about n. c. 400, at the age of forty-seven.

(Bode, Geschicht der dram. Dichtkunst, i. p. 553.) The poetic merits of Agathon were considerable, but his compositions were more remarkable for elegance and flowery ornaments than force, vigour, or sublimity. They abounded in antithesis and metaphor, "with cheerful thoughts and kindly ingages," (Aelian, V. H. xiv. 13,) and he is said to have imitated in verse the prose of Gorgina the philosopher. The language which Plato puts into his mouth in the Symposium, is of the same character, full of harmonious words and softly flowing periods: an õp& Każs ëvXtov rod. Nmvi.<n
The style of his verses, and especially of his lyrical compositions, is represented by Aristophanes in his Thesmophoriazusae (191) as affected and effeminate, corresponding with his personal appearance and manner. In that play (acted n. c. 409), where he appears as the friend of Euripides, he is ridiculed for his effeminacy, both in manners and actions, being brought on the stage in female dress. In the Rameae, acted five years afterwards, Aristophanes speaks highly of him as a poet and a man, calling him an ay&vov peyxei Kal peyxeis tov ëvuxo.<
In the Thesmophoriazusae (29) also, he calls him
'Ayavov ó peujeis. In some respects, Agathon was instrumental in causing the decline of tragedy and the rise of comedy. He was the first tragic poet, according to Aristotle (Poet. 18. § 22), who practiced the insertion of choruses between the acts, the subject-matter of which was not connected with the story of the drama, and which were therefore called ëvXtvuxos, or intercalary, as being merely lyrical or musical interludes. The same critic (Poet. 18. § 17) also blames him for selecting too extensive subjects for his tragedies. Agathon also wrote pieces, the story and characters of which were the creations of pure fiction. One of these was called the "Flower" (Kalóv, Arist. Poet. 9. § 7); its subject-matter was neither mythical nor historical, and therefore probably "neither seriously affecting, nor terrible." (Schlegel, Dram. Lit. i.
p. 189.) We cannot but regret the loss of this work, which must have been amusing and original.
The titles of four only of his tragedies are known with certainty: they are, The Thystes, the Telephus, the Aérobe, and the Alcmeon. A fifth, which was ascribed to him, is of doubtful authority.
It is probable that Aristophanes has given us extracts from some of Agathon's plays in the Thesmophoriazusae, v. 100-130. The opinion that Agathon also wrote comedies, or that there was a comic writer of this name, has been refuted by Bentley, in his Dissertation upon the Epistles of Euripides, p. 417. (Ritschl, Commentatio de Agathonis vita, Arite et Tragodemiarum religiosi, Hale, 1829, 8vo.)

[AGAVE (Agyavos), of Samos, who wrote a work upon Scythia and another upon Rivers.
(Plut. de Fluv. p. 1156, c. 1159, a; Stobaeus, Serm. tit. 100. 10, ed. Gasford.)

AGATHON (Agydous), at first Reader, afterwards Librarian, at Constantinople. In a. d. 680, during his Readership, he was Notary or Reporter at the 6th General Council, which concluded the Monothelitine heresy. He called the acts, written by himself, to the five Patriarchates. He wrote, C. d. 712, a short treatise, still extant in Greek, on the attempts of Philippicus Burdanes (711—719) to revive the Mono-theitite error, Conciliorum Nova Collectio à Mansi,
v. xii. p. 189. [A. J. C.]

AGATHOSTHENES (Agyalosthenos), a Greek historian or philosopher of uncertain date, who is referred to by Tzetzes (ad Lyceorph. 704, 1021.
Chit. vii. 645) as his authority in matters connected with geography. There is mention of a work of Agathosthenes called "Asiatica Carmina" (Germanicus, in Aret. Placs. 24), where Gale Notae in Parteum, p. 125, &c.) wished to read the name Agathosthenes, for Aglanosthenes or Aglo-thenes, who by some is considered to be the same as Agathosthenes, wrote a work on the history of Naxos, of which nothing is extant, but which was much used by ancient writers. (Hygin. Poët.
Astr. ii. 16; Eratosth. Catalog. ii. 27; Pollux.
n. 33; Athen. iii. p. 78; Plin. H. N. iv. 22.) [L. S.]

AGATHOTYCHUS (Agyatourygeus), an ancient veterinary surgeon, whose date and history are unknown, but who probably lived in the fourth or fifth century after Christ. Some fragments of his writings are to be found in the collection of works on this subject first published in a Latin translation
by Jo. Rustellus, Veterinarium Medicinac Libri dux, Paris, 1530, fol., and afterwards in Greek by Grynacus, Basil. 1537, 4to. [W. A. G.]

AGATHYLLUS (Agydhalos) of Arcadia, a Greek elegiac poet, who is quoted by Dionysius in reference to the history of Aeneas and the foundation of Rome. Some of his verses are preserved by Dionysius. (i. 49, 72.)

AGATHYRRUS (Agydhyros), a son of Aeolus, regarded as the founder of Agathyrnum in Sicily. (Diod. v. 8.)

AGAVE (Agya), 1. A daughter of Cadmus, and wife of the Spartan Echion, by whom she became the mother of Pentheus, who succeeded his grandfather Cadmus as king of thebes. Agave was the sister of Autonoë, Ino, and Semele (Apollopd. iii. 4. § 2), and when Semele, during her pregnancy with Dionysus, was destroyed by the sight of the splendid of Zeus, her sisters spread the report that she had only endeavoured to con-cel her guilt, by pretending that Zeus was the father of her child, and that her destruction was a just punishment for her falsehood. This calumny was afterwards most severely avenged upon Agave.
For, after Dionysus, the son of Semele, had traversed the world, he came to Thebes and compelled the women to celebrate his Dionysiac festivals on mount Cithaeron. Pentheus wishing to prevent or stop these riotous proceedings, went himself to mount Cithaeron, but was torn to pieces there by his own mother Agave, who in her frenzy believed him to be a wild beast. (Apollod. iii. 5. § 2; Ov.
Met. iii. 725; comp. Penteres.) Hyginus (Fab.
240, 254) makes Agave, after this deed, go to Illyria and marry king Lycothezeros, whom however she afterwards killed in order to gain his kingdom for her father Cadmus. This account is manifestly transplaced by Hyginus, and must have belonged to an earlier part of the story of Agave.

Atys. Pausanias (vii. 17. § 5) relates the following story about Agdistis. On one occasion Zeus unwittingly begot by the Earth a superhuman
being which was at once man and woman, and which was at once man and woman, and was called Agdistis. The gods dread ed it and unman ed it, and from its severed arms there grew up an almond-tree. Once when the daughter of the river-god Sangarius was gathering the fruit
of this tree, she put some almonds into her bosom;
but here the almonds disappeared, and she became
the mother of Attes, who of such extraordinary beauty, that when he had grown up Agdistis fell in love with him. His relatives, however, destined him to become the husband of the daughter of the king of Pessinus, whither he went accordingly.
But at the moment when the hymeneal song had commenced, Agdistis appeared, and Attes was seized by a fit of madness, in which he unman ed
himself; the king who had given him his daughter did the same. Agdistis now repented her deed, and obtained from Zeus the promise that the body of Attes should not become decomposed or disappear. This is, says Pausanias, the most popular account of an otherwise mysterious affair,
which is probably part of a symbolical worship of the creative powers of nature. A hill of the name of Agdistis in Phrygia, at the foot of which Attes
was believed to be buried, is mentioned by Pausa-
nias. (i. 4. § 5.) According to Hesychius (x. c.)
and Strabo (xii. p. 567; comp. x. p. 469), Agdistis
is the same as Cybele, who was worshipped at Pessinus under that name. A story somewhat different is given by Arnobius. (Adv. Gent. ix. 5. § 4; comp. Minuc. Felix, 21.)

AGDISTIS (Ἀγδίστης), a mythical being con-ected with the Phrygian worship of Attes or Atys.
Pausanias (vii. 17. § 3) relates the following story about Agdistis. On one occasion Zeus
unwittingly begot by the Earth a superhuman
being which was at once man and woman, and was called Agdistis. The gods dreaded it and unmanied it, and from its severed arms there grew up an almond-tree. Once when the daughter of the river-god Sangarius was gathering the fruit
of this tree, she put some almonds into her bosom;
but here the almonds disappeared, and she became
the mother of Attes, who of such extraordinary
beauty, that when he had grown up Agdistis fell in love with him. His relatives, however, destined
him to become the husband of the daughter of the king of Pessinus, whither he went accordingly.
But at the moment when the hymeneal song had commenced, Agdistis appeared, and Attes was seized by a fit of madness, in which he unman ed
himself; the king who had given him his daughter did the same. Agdistis now repented her deed, and obtained from Zeus the promise that the body of Attes should not become decomposed or disappear. This is, says Pausanias, the most popular account of an otherwise mysterious affair,
which is probably part of a symbolical worship of
the creative powers of nature. A hill of the name of Agdistis in Phrygia, at the foot of which Attes
was believed to be buried, is mentioned by Pausa-
nias. (i. 4. § 5.) According to Hesychius (x. c.)
and Strabo (xii. p. 567; comp. x. p. 469), Agdistis
is the same as Cybele, who was worshipped at Pessinus under that name. A story somewhat different is given by Arnobius. (Adv. Gent. ix. 5. § 4; comp. Minuc. Felix, 21.)

AGELAUS (Ἀγέλαος), a native of Argos (Pausan. vi. 8. § 4, vii. 24. § 2, x. 10. § 3), preominously distinguished as a statuary. His name is enhanced by his having been the instructor of the three great masters, Phidias (Suidas, x. e.; Schol. ad Aristoph. Ran. 604; Tzetzes, Chilid.
vi. 164, viii. 191—for the names Ελαθών and Ελαθῶν are unquestionably merely corruptions of Ἀγέλαος, as was first observed by Meursius, with whom Winckelmann, Thiersch, and Muller agree), Myron, and Polyclitus. (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8, s.
19.) The determination of the period when Ageladas flourished, has given rise to a great deal of discussion, owing to the apparently contradictory statements in the writers who mention the name.
Pausanias (vi. 10. § 2) tells us that Ageladas cast a statue of Cleothenes (who gained a victory in the chariot-race in the 69th Olympiad) with the chariot, horses, and charioteer, which was set up at Olympia. There were also at Olympia statues by him of Timochares of Delphi and Anochnos of Tarentum. Now Timochares was put to death by the Athenians, for his participation in the attempt of Isagoras in Ol. lviii. 2 (n. c. 507); and Anochnus (as we learn from Eusebius) was a victor in the games of the 65th Ol. So far everything is clear; and if we suppose Ageladas to have been born about n. c. 540, he may very well have been the instructor of Phidias. On the other hand Pliny
(L. c.) says that Ageladas, with Polyclitus, Phradmon, and Myron, flourished in the 87th Ol. This agrees with the statement of the scholiast on Aristophanes, that at Melite there was a statue of Αριστοφάνης Ἀλέξανδρος, the work of Ageladas the Argive, which was set up during the great pestience. (Ol. brxxvii. 3. 4.) To these authorities must be added a passage of Pausanias (iv. 33, § 3), where he speaks of a statue of Zeus made by Ageladas for the Messenians of Naupactus. This must have been after the year n. c. 356, when the Messenians were allowed by the Athenians to settle at Naupactus. In order to reconcile these conflicting statements, some suppose that Pliny's date is wrong, and that the statue of Hercules had been made by Ageladas long before it was set up at Melite: others (as Meyer and Siebelis) that Pliny's date is correct, but that Ageladas did not make the statues of the Olympic victors mentioned by Pausanias till many years after their victories;
which in the case of three persons, the dates of whose victories are so nearly the same, would be a very extraordinary coincidence. The most probable solution of the difficulty is that of Thiersch, who thinks that there were two artists of this name; one an Argive, the instructor of Phidias, born about n. c. 540, the other a native of Syeion, who flourished at the date assigned by Pliny, and was confounded by the scholiast on Aristophanes with his more illustrious namesake of Argos. Thiersch supports this hypothesis by an able criticism on a passage of Pausanias. (v. 24. § 1.) Sillig assumes that there were two artists of the name of Ageladas, but both Argives. Ageladas the Argive executed one of a group of three Muses, representing respectively the presiding geniiuses of the diatonic, chromatic and enharmonic styles of Greek music.
Canachus and Aristocles of Syeion made the other two. (Antipater, Anth. Pal. Plan. 220; Thiersch,

AGELAUS (Ἀγέλαος). 1. A son of Henacles and Onphale, and the founder of the race of Croceus. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 8, Herodetus l. 7.) The family of Croesus from one Alceus, and Dio-dorus (iv. 31) from one Cleoneus, while he calls the son of Hercules and Omphale Lamus, and others Leomedes. (Anton. Lib. 2; Pulleplat. de Incred. 45.)

2. A son of Damastor, and one of the suitors of Penelope. (Hom. Od. xx. 321.) In the struggle of Odysseus with the suitors, and after many of them had fallen, Agelaus encouraged and headed those who survived (xxii. 131, 241), until at last he too was struck dead by Odysseus with a javelin.
(xxii. 293.)

3. A slave of Priam, who exposed the infant Paris on mount Ida, in consequence of a dream of his mother. When, after the lapse of one day, the slave found the infant still alive and suckled by a bear, he took him to his own house and brought him up. (Apollod. iii. 12. § 4; compare Paris.)

There are several other mythical personages of the name of Ageladas, concerning whom no particulars are known. (Apollod. ii. 8. § 5; Antonin,
v. 2)

5. A son of Poseidon and Libya, king of Phoenicia, and twin-brother of Belus. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 4.) He married Telephassa, by whom he became the father of Cadmus, Phoenix, Cylix, Thasus, Phineus, and Phoenissus, and according to some of the many stories that have been told, he was the leader or protectress of the people. (Polyb. iv. 16, v. 103—107.)

AGELEIA or AG'ELI'S (Aγελεια or Αγελλης), a surname of Athens, by which she is designated as the leader or protectress of the people. (Horn. ill. iv. 128, v. 765, vi. 269, xv. 213, Od. iii. 378, &c.)

AGESA'NDRIDAS (Aγκσανθριδας), the son of Agesander (comp. Thuc. i. 123), the commander of the Lacedaemonian fleet sent to protect the revolt of Euboea in b.c. 411, was attacked by the Athenians near Eretria, and obtained a victory over them. (Thuc. vili. 91, 94, 95.)

AGESI'ANAX (Aγησιαναξ), a Greek poet, of whom a beautiful fragment descriptive of the moon is preserved in Phidias. (De facie in orb. lunae, p. 920.) It is uncertain whether the poem to which this fragment belonged was of an epic or didactic character. [L. S.]

AGE'SIAS (Aγησιας), one of the Iambidæ, and an hereditary priest of Zeus at Olympia, gained the victory there in the nude race, and is celebrated on that account by Pindar in the sixth Olympic ode. Böck places his victory in the 78th Olympiad.

AGESIDA'MUS (Aγησιδαμος), son of Ar-chestratus, an Epizephyrian Locrian, who conquered, when a boy, in boxing in the Olympic games, his victory is celebrated by Pindar in the 10th and 11th Olympic odes. The scholar places his victory in the 74th Olympiad. He should not be confounded with Agesidamus, the father of Chromius, who is mentioned in the Nemean odes. (i. 42, ix. 99.)

AGESI'AUS. [AGESANDER.]

AGESILAUS I. (Aγησιλεως), son of Doryssus, sixth king of the Agid line at Sparta, excluding Aristodemus, according to Apollodoros, reigned fourty-four years, and died in 386 b.c. Pausanias makes his reign a short one, but contemporary with the legislation of Lycurgus. (Paus. iii. 2. § 5; Clinton, Fasti, i. p. 335.)

AGESIL\'AUS II., son by his second wife, Eu-polia, of Archidamus II., succeeded his half-brother, Agis II., as nineteenth king of the Eurypentid line; excluding, on the ground of spurious birth, and by the interest of Lysander, his nephew, Leotychides. [LEOTYCICHIDES.] His reign extends from 398 to 361 b.c., both inclusive; during most of which time he was, in Pintarch's words, "as good as thought commander and king of all Greece, and was for the whole of it greatly identified with his country's deeds and fortunes. The position of that country, though internally weak, was, externally, in Greece, down to 394, one of supremacy and Lysander; and, in the spring of 394, was encamped in the plain of Thebe, preparing to advance into the heart of the empire, when a message arived to summon him to the war at home. He calmly and promptly obeyed; expressing however to the Asiatic Greeks, and doubtless himself indulging, hopes of a speedy return. Marching rapidly by Xerxes' route, he met and defeated at Cronia in Boeotia the allied forces. In 393 he was engaged in a ravaging invasion of Argolis, in 392 in one of the Corinthian territory, in 391 he reduced the Acamanians to submission; but, in the remaining years of the war, he is not mentioned. In the interval of peace, we find him declining the command in Sparta's aggression on Mantinea; but heading, from motives, it is said, of private friendship, that on Phlius; and openly justifying Phocibidas' seizure of the Cadmeia. Of the next war, the first two years he commanded in Boeotia, more however to the enemy's gain in point of experience, than loss in any other; from the five remaining he was withdrawn by severe illness. In the congress of 371 an altercation is recorded between him and Epamimondas; and by his advice Thbes was perempto-ily excluded from the peace, and orders given for the fatal campaign of Leuctra. In 370 we find him engaged in an embassy to Mantinea, and reassuring the Spartans by an invasion of Arcadia;
and in 369 to his skill, courage, and presence of mind, is to be ascribed the maintenance of the un-walked Sparta, amidst the attacks of four armies, and revolts and conspiracies of Helots, Perioeci, and even Spartans. Finally, in 362, he led his countrymen into Arcadia; by fortunate information was enabled to return in time to prevent the surprise of Sparta, and was, it seems, joint if not sole commander at the battle of Mantinea. To the ensuing winter must probably be referred his embassy to the coast of Asia and negotiations for money with the revolted satraps, alluded to in an obscure passage of Xenophon (Agesilaus, ii. 26, 27); and, in performance perhaps of some stipulation then made, he crossed, in the spring of 361, with a body of Lacedaemonian mercenaries into Egypt. Here, after displaying much of his ancient skill, he died, while preparing for his voyage home, in the winter of 361-60, after a life of above eighty years and a reign of thirty-eight. His body was embalmed in wax, and splendidly buried at Sparta.

Referring to our sketch of Spartan history, we find Agesilaus shining most in its first and last period, and succeeding in a manner on a heroic career in Asia, and as, in extreme age, maintaining his prostrate country. From Coroneia to Leuctra we see him partly unemployed, at times yielding to weak motives, at times joining in wanton acts of public injustice. No one of Sparta's great defeats, but some of her bad policy belongs to him. In what others do, we miss him; in what he does, we miss the greatness and consistency belonging to unity of purpose and sole command. No doubt he was hampered at home; perhaps, too, from a man withdrawn, when now near fifty, from his chosen career, great action in a new one of any kind could not be looked for. Plutarch gives among numerous apophthegmata his letter to the ephors on his recall: "We have reduced most of Asia, driven back the barbarians, made arms abundant in Ionia. But since you bid me, according to the decree, come home, I shall follow my letter, may perhaps be even before it. For my command is not mine, but my country's and her allies'. And a commander then commands truly according to right when he sees his own commander in the laws and ephors, or others holding office in the state." Also, an exclamation on hearing of the battle of Corinth: "Alas for Greece! she has killed enough of her sons to have conquered all the barbarians." Of his courage, temperance, and hardness, many instances are given: to these he added, even in excess, the less Spartan qualities of kindness and tenderness as a father and a friend. Thus we have the story of his riding across a stick with his children; and to gratify his son's affection for Cleonymus, son of the culprit, he saved Sphodrias from the punishment due, in right and policy, for his incursion into Attica in 378. So too the appointment of Peisander. [Peisander.] A letter of his runs, "If Nicias is innocent, acquit him for that; if guilty, for my sake; any how acquit him." From Spartan capacity and dishonesty, and mostly, even in public life, from ill faith, his character is clear. In person he was small, mean-looking, and even in public life, from ill faith, his character is clear. AGESILACHUS or HEGESILACHUS (Aege\lsakwos, 'Aeg\lsakwos, 'Hygg\lsakwos), was the chief magistrate (Pr g\lsk\saw) of the Rhodians, on the breaking out of the war between Rome and Persia in b. c. 171, and recommended his countrymen to espouse the side of the Romans. He was sent as ambassador to Rome in b. c. 169, and to the consul Aemilius Paullus in Macedonia, b. c. 168. (Polyb. xxvii. 3, xxviii. 2, 14, xxix. 4.)

AGESILIBRATUS, commander of the Spartan fleet in the war between the Romans and Philip, king of Macedonia, b. c. 200—197. (Liv. xxxi. 46, xxxii. 16, 32.)

AGESILPOLIS, commander of the Spartan fleet in the war between the Romans and Persia, in the years 318 and 317, and again in 316. He was the twenty-first of the Agesilaus beginning with Eurythemus, succeeding his father Pausanias, while yet a minor, in b. c. 394, and reigned fourteen years. He was placed under the guardianship of Aristodemus, his nearest of kin. He came to the crown just about the time that the confederacy (partly brought about by the intrigues of the Persian satrap Tithymalus), which was formed by Theses, Athens, Corinth, and Argo, against Sparta, rendered it necessary to recall his colleague, Agesilaus II., from Asia; and the first military operation of his reign was the expedition to Corinth, where the forces of the confederates were then assembled. The Spartan army was led by Aristodemus, and gained a signal victory over the allies. (Xen. Hell. iv. 2, § 9.) In the year b. c. 390 Agesipolis, who had now reached his majority, was entrusted with the command of an army for the invasion of Argolis. Having procured the sanction of the Olympic and Delphic gods for disregarding any attempt which the Argives might make to stop his march, on the pretext of a religious truce, he carried his ravages still farther than Agesilaus had done in b. c. 393; but as he suffered the aspect of the victims to deter him from occupying a permanent post, the expedition yielded no fruit but the plunder. (Xen. Hell. iv. 7, § 2-6; Paus. iii. 5, § 6.) In b. c. 395 the Spartans, seizing upon some frivolous pretext, sent an expedition against Mantinea, in which Agesipolis took the command, after it had been declined by Agesilaus. In this expedition the Spartans were assisted by Theses, and in a battle with the Mantineans, Epaminondas and Pelopidas, who were fighting side by side, narrowly escaped death. He took the town by diverting the river Ophis, so as to lay the low grounds at the foot of the walls under water. The breaches, being made of unbaked bricks, were unable to resist the action of the water. The walls soon began to totter, and the Mantineans were forced to surrender. They were admitted to terms on condition that the population should be dispersed among the four hamlets, out of which it had been collected to form the capital. The democratical leaders were permitted to go out into exile. (Xen. Hell. v. 2, § 1-7; Paus. viii. 8, § 5; Diod. xv. 5, &c.; Plut. Pelop. 4; Isocr. Paneg. p. 67, n. De Pace, p. 173, c.)

Early in b. c. 392, an embassy came to Sparta from the cities of Acacutus and Apollonia, requesting assistance against the Olynthians, who were endeavouring to compel them to join their confederacy. The Spartans granted it, but were not at first very successful. After the defeat and death of Teleutias in the second campaign (b. c. 391) Agesipolis took the command. He set out in 391, but did not begin operations till the spring of 380. He then acted with great vigour, and took Teleutias.
by storm; but in the midst of his successes he was seized with a fever, which carried him off in seven days. He died at Aphytis, in the peninsula of Hell. He was deeply regretted by that prince, who seems to have had a sincere regard for him. (Xen. Hell. v. 3. § 8-9, 18-19; Diod. xv. 22; Thirlwall, Hist. of Greece, vol. iv. pp. 405, 428, &c., v. p. 5, &c.)

Agesipolis did not share the ambitious views of Pallene. His body was immersed in honey and carried in seven days. He died at Aphytis, in the peninsula of Hell.

Flamininus, after the death of Cleomcnes. (Polyb. iv. 35.) He was however soon deposed by his colleagues Lycurgus, the ruler of the Gangaridae (Hist. of Rome, i. 558.)

The name itself does not occur in early Greek writers, unless it be supposed that Egias or Hegias (Hylas) in Clemens Alexandrinus (Stron. vi. p. 622); and Pausanius (i. 2. § 1), are only different forms of the same name. He was a native of Troy, and the time at which he wrote appears to have been about the year B.C. 740. His poem was celebrated in antiquity, under the name of Ñòòtòi, i.e. the history of the return of the Achaeans heroes from Troy, and consisted of five books. The poem began with the cause of the misfortunes which befell the Achaeans on their way home and after their arrival, that is, with the outrage committed upon Cassandra and the Palladium; and the whole poem filled up the space which was left between the work of the poet Arctinus and the Odyssey. The ancients themselves appear to have been uncertain about the author of this poem, for they refer to it simply by the name of Ñòòtòi, and when they mention the author, they only call him ὁ τῶν Νόστων τραγάφος. (Athen. vii. p. 291; Paus. x. 28. § 4, 29. § 30, 29. § 32, 32. § 3; Athen. ii. 1. § 5; Athen. ad Odyss. iv. 12; Schol. ad Aristoph. Equit. 1392; Lucian, De Saltat. 46.) Hence some writers attributed the Ñòòtòi to Homer (Suid. s. v. νόστοι; Anthol. Planud. iv. 30), while others calls its author a Cophonian. (Eustath. ad Odyss. xvi. 118.) Similar poems, and with the same title, were written by other poets also, such as Eumclus of Corinth (Schol. ad Pind. Ol. xiii. 31), Anticleides of Athens (Athen. iv. p. 157, ix. p. 466), Cledemns (Athen. xiii. p. 609), and Lysimachus. (Athen. iv. p. 158; Schol. ad Apollon. Riol. i. 556.) Where the Ñòòtòi is mentioned without a name, we have generally to understand the work of Agias.

AGIAS (Ἀγιας), a Greek poet, whose name was formerly written Augias, through a mistake of the first editor of the Excerpta of Proclus. It has been corrected by Thiersch in the Acta Philol. Monac. ii. p. 584, from the Codex Monacensis, which in one passage has Agias, and in another Hagias. The name itself does not occur in early Greek writers, unless it be supposed that Eginas or Hegias (Hylas) in Clemens Alexandrinus (Stron. vi. p. 622); and Pausanius (i. 2. § 1), are only different forms of the same name. The poem began with the cause of the misfortunes which befell the Achaeans on their way home and after their arrival, that is, with the outrage committed upon Cassandra and the Palladium; and the whole poem filled up the space which was left between the work of the poet Arctinus and the Odyssey. The ancients themselves appear to have been uncertain about the author of this poem, for they refer to it simply by the name of Ñòòtòi, and when they mention the author, they only call him ὁ τῶν Νόστων τραγάφος. (Athen. vii. p. 291; Paus. x. 28. § 4, 29. § 30, 29. § 32, 32. § 3; Athen. ii. 1. § 5; Athen. ad Odyss. iv. 12; Schol. ad Aristoph. Equit. 1392; Lucian, De Saltat. 46.) Hence some writers attributed the Ñòòtòi to Homer (Suid. s. v. νόστοι; Anthol. Planud. iv. 30), while others calls its author a Cophonian. (Eustath. ad Odyss. xvi. 118.) Similar poems, and with the same title, were written by other poets also, such as Eumclus of Corinth (Schol. ad Pind. Ol. xiii. 31), Anticleides of Athens (Athen. iv. p. 157, ix. p. 466), Cledemns (Athen. xiii. p. 609), and Lysimachus. (Athen. iv. p. 158; Schol. ad Apollon. Riol. i. 556.) Where the Ñòòtòi is mentioned without a name, we have generally to understand the work of Agias.

AGIS I. (Ἀγις), king of Sparta, son of Eurysthenes, began to reign, it is said, about B.C. 1032. (Müller, Dor. vol. ii. p. 511, transl.) According to Eusebius (Chron. i. p. 166) he reigned only one year; according to Apollodorus, as it appears, about 41 years. During the reign of Eurysthenes, his line of subjects were admitted to an equality of political rights with the Dorians. Agis deprived them of these, and reduced them to the condition of subjects to the Spartans. The inhabitants of the town of Helos attempted to shake off the yoke, but they were subdued, and gave rise and name to the class called Helots.

AGIS II., the 17th of the Eurypontid line (beginning with Procles), succeeded his father Archidamus, b.c. 427, and reigned a little more than 28 years. In the summer of b.c. 426, he led an army of Peloponnesians and their allies as far as the isthmus, with the intention of invading Attica; but they were deterred from advancing farther by a succession of earthquakes which happened when they had got so far. (Thuc. iii. 89.) In the spring of the following year he led an army into Attica, but quitted it fifteen days after he had entered it. (Thuc. iv. 2, 6.) In b.c. 419, the Argives, at the instigation of Alcibiades, attacked Epidaurus; and Agis with the whole force of Lacedaemon set out at the same time and marched to the frontier city, Leuctra. No one, Thucydides tells us, knew the purpose of this expedition. It was probably to make a diversion in favour of Epidaurus. (Thirlwall, vol. iii. p. 342.) At Leuctra the aspect of the sacrifices deterred him from proceeding. He therefore led his troops back, and sent round notice to the allies to be ready for an expedition at the end of the sacred month of the Carnean festival; and when the Argives repeated their attack on Epidaurus, the Spartans again marched to the frontier town, Caryae, and again turned back, professedly on account of the aspect of the victims. In the middle of the following summer (b.c. 418) the Epidaureans being still hard pressed by the Argives, the Lacedaemonians with their whole force and some allies, under the command of Agis, invaded Argolis. By a skilful manoeuvre he succeeded in intercepting the Argives, and posted his army advantageously between them and the city. But just as the battle was about to begin, Thrasyllus, one of the Argive generals, and Alciphron came to Agis and prevailed on him to conclude a truce for four months. Agis, without disclosing his motives, drew off his army. On his return he was severely censured for having thus thrown away the opportunity of reducing Argos, especially as the Argives had seized the opportunity afforded by his return and taken Orchomenos. It was proposed to pull down his house, and inflict on him a fine of 100,000 drachmas. But on his earnest entreaty they consented themselves with appointing a council of war, consisting of 10 Spartans, without whom he was not to lead an army out of the city. (Thuc. v. 54, 57, &c.) Shortly afterwards they received intelligence from Themistocles, that, if not promptly succeeded, the party favourable to Sparta in that city would be compelled to give way. The Spartans immediately sent their whole force under the command of Agis. He restored tranquillity at Tegea, and then marched to Mantinea. By turning the waters so as to flood the lands of Mantinea, he succeeded in drawing the army of the Mantineans and Athenians down to the level ground. A battle ensued, in which the Spartans were victorious. This was one of the most important battles ever fought between Greek states. (Thuc. v. 71—73.) In b.c. 417, when news reached Sparta of the counter-revolution at Argos, in which the oligarchical and Spartan faction was overthrown, an army was sent there under Agis. He was unable to restore the defeated party, but he destroyed the long walls which the Argives had begun to carry down to the sea, and took Hysiae. (Thuc. v. 83.) In the spring of b.c. 413, Agis entered Attica with a Peloponnesian army, and fortified Deceleia, a steep eminence about 15 miles north-east of Athens (Thuc. vii. 19, 27); and in the winter of the same year, after the news of the disastrous fate of the Sicilian expedition had reached Greece, he marched northwards to levy contributions on the allies of Sparta, for the purpose of constructing a fleet. While at Deceleia he acted in a great measure independently of the Spartan government, and received embassies as well from the disaffected allies of the Athenians, as from the Boeotians and other allies of Sparta. (Thuc. viii. 3, 5.) He seems to have remained at Deceleia till the end of the Peloponnesian war. In 411, during the administration of the Four Hundred, he made an unsuccessful attempt on Athens itself. (Thuc. viii. 71.) In b.c. 401, the command of the war against Elis was entrusted to Agis, who in the third year compelled the Eleans to sue for peace. As he was returning from Delphi, whither he had gone to consecrate a tenth of the spoil, he fell sick at Herace in Aredia, and died in the course of a few days after he reached Sparta. (Xen. Hell. iii. 2. § 21, &c. 3. § 1—4.) He left a son, Leotychides, who however was excluded from the throne, as there was some suspicion with regard to his legitimacy. While Alcibiades was at Sparta he made Agis his implacable enemy. Later writers (Justin, v. 2; Plut. Alcib. 23) assign as a reason, that the latter suspected him of having dishonoured his queen Tinnaea. It was probably at the suggestion of Agis, that orders were sent out to Astyochus to put him to death. Alcibiades however received timely notice, (according to some accounts from Tinnaea herself) and kept out of the reach of the Spartans. (Thuc. viii. 12, 45; Plut. Lycurg. 32. Aeschin. 3.)

AGIS III., the eldest son of Archidamus III., was the 20th king of the Eurypontid line. His reign was short, but eventful. He succeeded his father in b.c. 338. In b.c. 333, we find him going with a single trireme to the Persian commanders in the Aegean, Pharnabazus and Autophrades, to request money and an armament for carrying on hostile operations against Alexander in Greece. They gave him 30 talents and 10 triremes. The news of the battle of Issus, however, put a check upon their plans. He sent the galleys to his brother Agesilaus, with instructions to sail with them to Crete, that he might secure that island for the Spartan interest. In this he seems in a great measure to have succeeded. Two years afterwards (b.c. 331), the Greek states which were leagued together against Alexander, seized the opportunity of the disaster of Zopyrius and the revolt of the Thracians, to declare war against Macedonia. Agis was invested with the command, and with the Lacedaemonian troops, and a body of 8000 Greek mercenaries, who had been present at the battle of Issus, gained a decisive victory over a Macedonian army under Corragus. Having been joined by the other forces of the league he laid siege to Megalopolis. The city held out till Antipater came to its relief, when a battle ensued, in which Agis was defeated and killed. It happened about the time of the battle of Arbelia. (Arrian, ii. 13; Diod. xvi. 63, 68, xvii. 68; Aesch. c. Cleophr. p. 77; Curt. vi. 1; Justin, xii. 1.) [C. P. M.]

AGIS IV., the elder son of Euthymidas II., was the 24th king of the Eurypontid line. He succeeded his father in B.C. 244, and reigned four years. In B.C. 243, after the liberation of Corinth by Atratus, the general of the Achaeans league, Agis led an army against him, but was defeated. (Paus. ii. 8 § 4.) The interest of his reign, however, is derived from events of a different kind. Through the influx of wealth and luxury, with their consequent vices, the Spartans had greatly degenerated from the ancient simplicity and severity of manners. Not above 700 families of the genuine Spartan stock remained, and in consequence of the innovation introduced by Epitadeus, who procured a repeal of the law which secured to every Spartan head of a family an equal portion of land, the landed property had passed into the hands of a few individuals, of whom a great number were females, so that not above 100 Spartan families possessed estates, while the poor were burdened with debt. Agis, who from his earliest youth had shewn his attachment to the ancient discipline, undertook to reform these abuses, and re-establish the institutions of Lycurgus. For this end he determined to lay before the Spartan senate a proposition for the abolition of all debts and a new partition of the lands. Another part of his plan was to give landed estates to the Perioeci. His schemes were warmly seconded by the poorer classes and the wealthy. He succeeded, however, in gaining over three very influential persons,—his uncle Agesilaus (a man of large property, but who, being deeply involved in debt, hoped to profit by the innovations of Agis), Lysander, and Mandrocleides. Having procured Lyssander to be elected one of the ephors, he laid his plans before the senate. He proposed that the Spartan territory should be divided into two portions, one to consist of 4500 equal lots, to be divided amongst the Spartans, whose ranks were to be filled up by the admission of the most respectable of the Perioeci and strangers; the other to contain 15,000 equal lots, to be divided amongst the Perioeci. The senate could not at first come to a decision on the matter. Lyssander, therefore, convoked the assembly of the people, to whom Agis submitted his measure, and offered to make the first sacrifice, by giving up his lands and money, telling them that his mother and grandmother wore worth as poetry. The Greek Anthology (vi. 272) contains an epigram, which is probably the work of this flatterer. (Jacobs, iii. p. 184.)

AGIS (Agya), a Greek poet, a native of Argos, and a contemporary of Alexander the Great, whom he accompanied on his Asiatic expedition. Curtius (vii. 5) as well as Arrian (Anab. iv. 9) and Plutarch (De aduleat. et amic. discr. p. 60) describe him as one of the basest flatterers of the king. Curtius calls him a "pessmorum carminum post Chorilum conditor," which probably refers rather to their flattering character than to their worth as poetry. The Greek Anthology (vi. 152) contains an epigram, which is probably the work of this flatterer. (Jacobs, Anthol. iii. p. 896; Zimmermann, Zeitschrift für die Alterth. 1841, p. 164.) AGNODICE.

Athenaeus (xii. p. 516) mentions one Agis as the author of a work on the art of cooking (Ὑγηγορία). [L. S.]

AGLA'TA (Ἀγλάτα). I. [CHARTES.]

2. The wife of Charopus and mother of Nireus, who led a small band from the island of Syme against Troy. (Hom. H. ii. 671; Diod. v. 53.) Another Aglais is mentioned in Apollodorus. (ii. 7. § 8.) [L. S.]

AGLAONICE. [AGANICE.]

AGLAOPHÆME. [ŞIREKES.]

AGLAophon (Ἀγλαοφάνας), a painter, born in the island of Thasos, the father and instructor of Polycrates. (Suidas and Photius, s. v. Πολυκρατής; Anth. Gr. ix. 700.) He had another son named Aristophon. (Plat. Gorg. p. 448. B.) As Polycrates flourished before the 90th Ol. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 9. s. 53), Aglafophon probably lived about Ol. 70. Quintilian (xii. 10. § 3) praises his paintings, which were distinguished by the simplicity of their colouring, as worthy of admiration on other grounds besides their antiquity. There was an Aglafophon who flourished in the 90th Ol. according to Pliny (H. N. xxxv. 9. s. 36), and his statement is confirmed by a passage of Athenaeus (xii. p. 543. d, from which we learn that he painted two pictures, in one of which Olympias and Pythias, as the presiding deities of the Olympic and Pythian games, were represented crowning Aileiabides; in the other Nemea, the presiding deity of the Nemean games, held Aileiabides on her knees. Aileiabides could not have gained any victories much before Ol. 91. (n. c. 416.) It is therefore exceedingly likely that this artist was the son of Aristophon, and grandson of the famous Aileiabides, as among the Greeks the son generally bore the name not of his father but of his grandfather. Plutarch (Alcibi. 16) says, that Aristophon was the author of the picture of Nemea and Aileiabides. He may perhaps have assisted his son. This Aileiabodes was, according to some, the first who represented Victory with wings. (Schol. ad Aristoph. Aves, 573.) [C. P. M.]

AGLAOSTHENES. [AGAOSTHENES.]

AGLAUROS. [AGRAULOS.]

AGLAUS (Ἀγλαύς), a poor citizen of Psophis in Arcadia, whom the Delphic oracle pronounced to be happier than Gyges, king of Lydia, on account of his contentedness, when the king asked the oracle, if any man was happier than he. (Val. Max. vii. 1. § 2; Plin. H. N. vii. 47.) Pausanias (viii. 24. § 7) places Aileiabdes in the time of Croesus.

AGNAPTUS, an architect mentioned by Pausanias (v. 15, § 4, vi. 20. § 7) as the builder of a porch in the Altis at Olympia, which was called by the Eleusins the "porch of Agnaptus." When he lived is uncertain. [C. P. M.]

AGNIUS (Ἀγνῖος), the father of Tiphys, who was the pilot of the ship Argo (Apololl. i. 9. § 16; Orph. Argo. p. 540.), whence Tiphys is called Agnides. [L. S.]

AGNODICE (Ἀγνόδικη), the name of the earliest midwife mentioned among the Greeks. She was a native of Athens, where it was forbidden by law for a woman or a slave to study medicine. According, however, to Hyginus (Fab. 374), on whose authority alone the whole contests (διώμ) of Agnonides is based, he was represented in a statue on a cuneiform altar (it of her patients. Upon her refuting this charge by making known her sex, she was immediately accused of having violated the existing law, which second danger she escaped by the wives of the chief persons in Athens, whom she had attended, coming forward in her behalf, and succeeding at last in getting the obnoxious law abolished. No date whatever is attached to this story, but several persons have, by calling the tutor of Agnodice by the name of Herophilus instead of Hippocrates, placed it in the third or fourth century before Christ. But this emendation, though at first sight very easy and plausible, does not appear altogether free from objections. For, in the first place, if the story is to be believed at all upon the authority of Hyginus, it would seem to belong rather to the fifth or sixth century before Christ than the third or fourth; secondly, we have no reason for thinking that Agnodice was ever at Alexandria, or Herophilus at Athens; and thirdly, it seems hardly probable that Hyginus would have called so celebrated a physician "a certain Herophilus," (Herophilus quidam.) [W. A. G.]

AGON, a Greek rhetorician, who wrote a work against rhetoric, which Quintilian (ii. 17. § 15) calls "Rhetorica accusation." Rhenken (Hist. Crit. Oret. Graec. p. x.) and other him most modern scholars have considered this Agnon to be the same man as Agnondes, the contemporary of Phocion, as the latter is in some MSS. of Corn. Nepos (Phoc. 3) called Agnon. But the manner in which Agnon is mentioned by Quintilian, shows that he is a rhetorician, who lived at a much later period. Whether however he is the same as the academic philosopher mentioned by Athenaeus (xiiii. p. 692), cannot be decided. [L. S.]

AGNO'NIDES (Ἀγνονίδες), an Athenian demagogue and orator, a contemporary of Theophrastus and Phocion. The former was accused by Agnondes of impiety, but was acquitted by the Areopagus, and Theophrastus might have ruined his accuser, had he been less generous. (Diog. Laert. v. 67.) Agnondes was opposed to the Macedonian party at Athens, and called Phocion a traitor, for which he was exiled, as soon as Alexander, son of Polyperchon, got possession of Athens. Afterwards, however, he obtained from Antipater permission to return to his country through the mediation of Phocion. (Plut. Phoc. 29.) But the orator soon forgot what he owed to his benefactor, and not only continued to oppose the Macedonian party in the most vehement manner, but even induced the Athenians to sentence Phocion to death as a traitor, who had delivered the Pelmecnes into the hands of Nicanor. (Plut. Phoc. 33, 85; Corn. Nep. Phoc. 3.) But the Athenians soon repented of their conduct towards Phocion, and put Agnondes to death to appease his manes. (Plut. Phoc. 38.) [L. S.]

AGON. (Ἀγών), a personification of solemn contests (διώμ), and of the sacrifice of victors. (Schol. on Soph. Agam. 870.) He was represented in a statue at Olympia with d proposed in his hands. This statue was the work of Dionysius, and dedicated by Smicryus of Rhegium. (Paus. v. 26. § 3.) [L. S.]

to the 23rd August, a. d. 76. Agricola. He was bom at the Roman colony of Forum Julii, the modern Fréjus in Provence. His father was Julius Gracchus of senatorian rank; his mother Julia Procilla, who throughout his education seems to have watched with great care and to have exerted great influence over him. He studied philosophy (the usual education of a Roman of higher rank) from his earliest youth at Marseilles. His first military service was under Suetonius Paulinus in Britain (a. d. 60), in the relation of Contubernialis. (Sueton. Paul. p. 284, a.) Hence he returned to Rome, was made to Domitia Decidiana, and went the round of the magistracies; the quœsortship in Asia (a. d. 63), under the proconsul Silvius Titianus, where his integrity was shown by his refusal to join the proconsul in the ordinary system of extortion in the Roman provinces; the tribunate and the praetorship,—in Nero's time mere nominal offices, filled with danger to the man who held them, in which a prudent inactivity was the only safe course. By Galba (a. d. 69) he was appointed to examine the sacred property of the temples, that Nero's system of robbery (Sueton. Ner. 32) might be stopped. In the same year he lost his mother; it was in returning from her funeral in Lucania, that he heard of Vespasian's accession, and immediately joined his party. Under Vespasian his first service was the command of the 20th legion in Britain. (a. d. 70.) On his return, he was raised by the emperor to the rank of patrician, and set over the province of Aquitania, which he held for three years. (a. d. 74-76.) He was recalled to Rome to be elected consul (a. d. 77), and Britain, the great scene of his power, was given to him, by general consent, as his province.

In this year he betrothed his daughter to the historian Tacitus; in the following he gave her to him in marriage, and was made governor of Britain, and one of the college of pontiffs.

Agricola was the twelfth Roman general who had been in Britain; he was the only one who completely affected the work of subjugation to the Romans, not more by his consummate military skill, than by his masterly policy in reconciling the Britons to that yoke which hitherto they had so ill borne. He taught them the arts and luxuries of civilised life, to settle in towns, to build comfortable dwelling-houses and temples. He established a system of education for the sons of the British chiefs, amongst whom at last the Roman language was spoken, and the Roman toga worn as a fashionable dress.

He was full seven years in Britain, from the year a. d. 78 to a. d. 84. The last conquest of his predecessor Julius Frontinus had been that of the Silures (South Wales); and the last action of Agricola's command was the action at the foot of the Grampian hills, which put him in possession of the whole of Britain as far north as the northern boundary of Perth and Argyle. His first campaign (a. d. 79) was occupied in the reconquest of Mona (Anglesea), and the Ordovices (North Wales), the strongholds of the Druids; and the remainder of this year, with the next, was given to making the before-mentioned arrangements for the security of the Roman dominion in the already conquered parts of Britain. The third campaign (a. d. 80) carried him northwards to the Taus,* probably the Solway Frith; and the fourth (a. d. 81) was taken up in fortifying and taking possession of this tract, and advancing as far north as the Friths of Clyde and Forth. In the fifth campaign (a. d. 82), he was engaged in subduing the tribes on the promontory opposite Ireland. In the sixth (a. d. 83), he explored with his fleet and land forces the coast of Fife and Forfar, coming now for the first time into contact with the true Caledonians. They made a night attack on his camp (believed to be at Loch Ore, where ditches and other traces of a Roman camp are still to be seen), and succeeded in nearly destroying the ninth legion; but in the general battle, which followed, they were repulsed. The seventh and last campaign (a. d. 84) gave Agricola complete and entire possession of the country, up to the northernmost point which he had reached, by a most decided victory over the assembled Caledonians under their general Galgacus (as it is believed, from the Roman and British remains found there, and from the two tumuli or sepulchral cairns) on the moor of Murdoch at the foot of the Grampian hills. In this campaign his fleet sailed northwards from the coast of Fife round Britain to the Tintulensian harbour (supposed to be Sandwich), thus for the first time discovering Britain to be an island. He withdrew his army into winter quarters, and soon after (a. d. 84) was recalled by the jealous Domitian.

On his return to Rome, he lived in retirement, and when the government either of Asia or Africa would have fallen to him, he considered it more prudent to decline the honour. He died a. d. 93; his death was, as his biographer plainly hints, either immediately caused or certainly hastened by the emissaries of the emperor, who could not bear the presence of a man pointed out by universal feeling as alone fit to meet the exigency of times in which the Roman arms had suffered repeated reverses in Germany and the countries north of the Danube. Dion Cassius (Ixiv. 20) says expressly, that he was killed by Domitian.

In this account we can do no more than refer to the beautiful and interesting description given by Tacitus (Agri. 39—46) of his life during his retirement from office, his death, his person, and his character, which though it had no field of action at home in that dreary time, shewed itself during the seven years in which it was unfettered in Britain, as great and wise and good. (Tacitus, Agricola.)

There is an epitaph of Antiphilus in the Greek Anthology (Anth. Dion. ii. 180) upon an Agricola, which is commonly supposed to refer to the celebrated one of this name. [C. T. A.]

AGRIO'NIUS (Ἀγριώνιος), a surname of Dionysus, under which he was worshipped at Orchomenus in Boeotia, and from which his festival Agrionia in that place derived its name. (Dict. of Ant. p. 30; Müller, Orcl. i. 166, &c.) [L. S.]

AGRIO'PAS, a writer spoken of by Pinyi. (H. N. viii. 22, where some of the MSS. have Acopas or Copas.) He was the author of an account of the Olympic victors. [C. P. M.]

AGRIIPPA, an ancient name among the Romans, was first used as a praenomen, and afterwards as a cognomen. It frequently occurs as a cognomen in the early times of the empire, but not under the republic. One of the mythical kings of Alba is called by this name. (Liv. i. 3.) According to Aulus Gellius (xvi. 16), Pliny (H. N. vii. 6. s. 8), and Solinus (1), the word signifies a birth, at which the child is presented with its feet foremost; but their derivation of it from aepri partes or pes is absurd enough. (Comp. Sen. Tus. 813.)

AGrippa (Ἀγρίππας), a sceptical philosopher, only known to have lived later than Aenesidemus, the contemporary of Cicero, from whom he is said to have been the fifth in descent. He is quoted by Diogenes Laerctius, who probably wrote about the time of Plutarch. The "five grounds of doubt" (οἱ πέντε θρόνοι), which are given by Sextus Empiricus as a summary of the later scepticism, are ascribed by Diogenes Laerctius (ix. 83) to Agrippa.

I. The first of these argues from the uncertainty of the rules of common life, and of the opinions of philosophers. II. The second from the "rejection ad infinitum:" all proof requires some further proof, and so on to infinity. III. All things are changed as their relations become changed, or, as we look upon them in different points of view. IV. The truth asserted is merely an hypothesis or, in other words, involves a vicious circle. (Sextus Empiricus, Ἡ νοημοσύνη τῆς Ἑλληνικῆς, i. 5.)

With reference to these πέντε θρόνοι it need only be remarked, that the first and third are a short summary of the ten original grounds of doubt which were the basis of the earlier scepticism. (Pyrrhon.) The three additional ones show a progress in the sceptical system, and a transition from the common objections derived from the fallibility of sense and opinion, to more abstract and metaphysical grounds of doubt. They seem to mark a new attempt to systematise the sceptical philosophy and adapt it to the spirit of a later age. (Ritter, Geschichte der Philosophie, xi. 4.)

AGRIPPA, M. ASI'NIUS, consul a. d. 25, was descended from a family more illustrious than ancient, and did not disgrace it by his mode of life. (Tac. Ann. iv. 34, 61.)

AGRIPPA CASTOR (Ἀγρίππας Κάστωρ), about a. d. 165, praised as a historian by Eusebius, and as a writer learning by Jerome (see Euseb. Hist. eccles. c. 21), lived in the reign of Hadrian. He wrote against the twenty-four books of the Alexandrian Gnostic Basilides, on the Gospel. Quotations are made from his work by Eusebius. (Hist. Eccles. iv. 7; see Gallandi's Bibliotheca Patrum, vol. i. p. 330.)

AGRIPPA, FONTEIUS. 1. One of the users of Libo, a. d. 16, is again mentioned in a. d. 19, as offering his daughter for a vestal virgin. (Tac. Ann. ii. 30, 86.)

2. Probably the son of the preceding, commanded the province of Asia with pro-consular power, a. d. 69, and was recalled from thence by Vespasian, and placed over Moesia in a. d. 70. He was shortly afterwards killed in battle by the Saracens. (Tac. Hist. iii. 40; Joseph. B. J. ii. 4. § 31.)

AGRIPPA, D. HATERIUS, called by Tacitus (Ann. ii. 51) the propinquus of Germanicus, as tribunal of the plebs a. d. 15, praetor a. d. 17, and consul a. d. 22. His moral character was very low, and he is spoken of in a. d. 32, as plotting the destruction of many illustrious men. (Tac. Ann. i. 77, ii. 51, iii. 49, 62, vi. 4.)

AGrippa, Hero'des I., Ηρώδης Ἄργειτας), called by Josephus (Ant. Jud. xvi. 2. § 2), "Agrippa the Great," was the son of Aristobulus and Berenice, and grandson of Herod the Great. Shortly before the death of his grandfather, he came to Rome, where he was educated with the future emperor Claudius, and Drusus the son of Tiberius. He squandered his property in giving sumptuous entertainments to gratify his princely friends, and in bestowing largesses on the freedmen of the emperor, and became so deeply involved in debt, that he was compelled to fly from Rome, and betook himself to a fortress at Malathia in Idumaea. There he remained until his brother Cypros, with his sister Herodias, the wife of Herodes Antipas, he was allowed to take up his abode at Tiberias, and received the rank of noble in that city, with a small yearly income. But having quarrelled with his brother-in-law, he fled to Flaccus, the proconsul of Syria. Soon afterwards he was convicted, through the information of his brother Aristobulus, of having received a bribe from the Damascenes, who wished to purchase his influence with the proconsul, and was again compelled to fly. He was arrested as he was about to sail for Italy, for a sum of money which he owed to the treasury of Caesar, but made his escape, and reached Alexandria, where his wife, in procuring a supply of money from Alexander the Alabarch, he then set sail, and landed at Puteoli. He was favourably received by Tiberius, who entrusted him with the education of his grandson Tiberius. He also formed an intimacy with Caius Caligula. Having one day incautiously expressed a wish that the latter might soon succeed to the throne, his words were reported by his freedman Buthychus to Tiberius, who forthwith threw him into prison. Caligula, on his accession (a. d. 37), set him at liberty, and gave him the tetrarchies of Lycaonia (Abiêne) and Philippus (Batanaea, Trachonitis, and Auranitis). He also presented him with a golden chain of equal weight with the iron one which he had worn in prison. In the following year Agrippa took possession of his kingdom, and after the banishment of Herodes Antipas, the tetrarchy of the latter was added to his dominions.

On the death of Caligula, Agrippa, who was at the time in Rome, materially assisted Claudius in gaining possession of the empire. As a reward for his services, Judaea and Samaria were annexed to his dominions, which were now even more extensive than those of Herod the Great. He was also invested with the consular dignity, and a league was publicly made with him by Claudius in the forum. At his request, the kingdom of Chalcis was given to his brother Herodes. (A. d. 41.) He then went to Jerusalem, where he offered sacrifices, and suspended in the treasury of the temple the golden chain which Caligula had given him. His government was mild and gentle, and he was exceedingly popular amongst the Jews. In the city of Bethusus he built a theatre and amphitheatres, baths, and porticoes. The suspicions of Claudius prevented him from finishing the impregnable fortifications with which he had begun to surround Jerusalem. His friendship was courted by many of the neighbouring kings and rulers. It was probably to increase his popularity with the Jews that he caused the apostle James, the brother of John, to be beheaded, and Peter to be cast into...
INTERCEDED WITH CALIGULA ON BEHALF OF THE JEWS, RISK OF HIS OWN LIFE, OR AT LEAST OF HIS LIBERTY, HE REPEATED AGrippa's WORDS, IN WHICH HE ACKNOWLEDGED THE JUSTICE OF THE PUNISHMENT SOLENT INFLICTED ON HIM. AFTER LINGERING FIVE DAYS, HE EXPIRED, IN THE FIFTY-FOURTH YEAR OF HIS AGE.

By his wife Cypros he had a son named Agrippa, and three daughters, Berenice, who then married his uncle Herodes, king of Chalcis, afterwards with her brother Agrippa, and subsequently married Polamo, king of Ciecia; she is alluded to by Juvenal (Sat. iv. 156); Mariamne, and Drusilla, who married Felix, the procurator of Judea. (Joseph. Ant. jud. vii. 1 § 2, viii. 5-8, xix. 4-8; Bell. Jud. ii. 28 § 1, ii. 9, 11; Dion Cass. ix. 5; Euseb. Hist. Eccles. ii. 10.)

AGRIPPA, HERODES II., the son of Agrippa I., was educated at the court of the emperor Claudius, and at the time of his father's death was only seventeen years old. Claudius therefore kept him at Rome, and sent Cypros Fadus as procurator of the kingdom, which thus again became a Roman province. On the death of Herodes, king of Chalcis (A.D. 48), his little principality, with the right of superintending the temple and appointing the high priest, was given to Agrippa, who four years afterwards received in its stead the tetrarchies formerly held by Philip and Lysanias, with the title of king. In A.D. 55, Nero added the cities of Tiberias and Taricheus in Galilee, and Julias, with fourteen villages near it, in Perea. Agrippa expended large sums in beautifying Jerusalem and other cities, especially Berytus. His partiality for the latter rendered him unpopular amongst his own subjects, and the capricious manner in which he appointed and deposed the high priests, with some other acts which were distasteful, made him an object of dislike to the Jews. Before the outbreak of the Jewish war with the Romans, Agrippa was, in vain, dissuaded from any act of rebellion. When the war was begun, he sided with the Romans, and was wounded at the siege of Gamala. After the capture of Jerusalem, he went with his sister Berenice to Rome, where he was invested with the dignity of praetor. He died in the seventieth year of his age, in the third year of the reign of Trajan. He was the last prince of the house of the Herods. It was before this Agrippa that the apostle Paul made his defence. (A.D. 60. Acts xxv. xxvi.) He lived on terms of intimacy with the historian Josephus, who has preserved two of the letters he received from him. (Joseph. Ant. jud. xvii. viii. § 5, § 4, xix. 9 § 2, xx. 1 § 3, § 2, 7, § 1, § 4 & 11, 9 § 4; Delac. diei. 11. § 12, § 1, 16, 17, § 1, 11. § 1, 14, § 8; Vit. s. 54; Phot. cod. 38.)

AGRIPPA, MARCIUS, A MAN OF THE LOWEST ORIGIN, WAS APPOINTED BY MARIUS IN A.D. 217, FIRST TO THE GOVERNMENT OF PANONIA AND AFTERWARDS TO THAT OF DACIA. (Dion. Cass. lxxvi. 15.) He seems to be the same person as the Marcus Agrippa, admiral of the fleet, who is mentioned by SPARTINIUS AS PRIY TO THE DEATH OF ANTONIUS CARACALLUS. (Anton. Cae. 6.)

AGRIPPA MENEVIUS. (Menevius.)
AGRIPPA POSTUMUS, A POSTHUMOUS SON OF M. VIPSANUS AGrippa, by Julia, the daughter of Augustus, was born in A.D. 12. He was adopted by Augustus together with Tiberius in A.D. 4, and he assumed the toga virilis in the following year, A.D. 5. (Suet. Octav. 64, 65; Dion Cass. liv. 29, lv. 22.) Notwithstanding his adoption he was afterwards banished by Augustus to the island of Plana, on the coast of Conisia, a disgrace which he incurred on account of his savage and intractable character; but he was not guilty of any crime. There he was under the surveillance of soldiers, and Augustus obtained a senatusconsultum by which the banishment was legally confirmed for the time of his life. The property of Agrippa was assigned by Augustus to the treasury of the army. It is said that during his captivity he received the visit of Augustus, who secretly went to Plana, accompanied by Fabius Maximus. Augustus and Agrippa, both deeply affected, shed tears when they met, and it was believed that Agrippa would be restored to liberty. But the news of this visit reached Livin, the mother of Tiberius, and Agrippa remained a captive. After the accession of Tiberius, in A.D. 14, Agrippa was murdered by a centurion, who entered his prison and killed him after a long struggle, for Agrippa was a man of great force and strength. When the centurion afterwards went to Tiberius to give him an account of the execution, the emperor denied having given any order for it, and it is very probable that Livin was the secret author of the crime. There was a rumour that Augustus had left an order for the execution of Agrippa, but this is positively contradicted by Tacitus. (Tac. Ann. ii. 3—6; Dion Cass. iv. 32, lii. 3; Suet. i, 17, 22; Vell. ii. 104, 112.)

After the death of Agrippa, a slave of the name of Clemens, who was not informed of the murder, landed on Planaus with the intention of restoring Agrippa to liberty and carrying him off to the army in Germany. When he heard of what had taken place, he tried to profit by his great resemblance to the murdered captive, and he gave himself out to be Agrippa. He landed at Octia, and found many who believed him, or affected to believe him, but he was seized and put to death by order of Tiberius. (Tac. Ann. ii. 39, 40.)

AGRIPPA, VIBULENUS, A ROMAN KNIGHT, WHO TOOK POISON IN THE SENATE HOUSE AT THE TIME OF HIS TRIAL, A.D. 36; he had brought the poison with him in a ring. (Tac. Ann. vi. 40; Dion. Cass. lvii. 21.)

AGRIPPA, M. VIPSANIUS, was born in A.D. 63. He was the son of Lucius, and was descended from a very obscure family. At the age of twenty he studied at Apollonia in Ilyria, together with young Octavius, afterwards Octavius and afterwards murderer of J. Caesar in B.C. 44, Agrippa was one of those intimate friends of Octavius, who advised him to proceed immediately to Rome. Octavius took Agrippa with him, and charged him to receive the oaths of fidelity from several legions which had declared in his favour. Having been chosen consul in A.D. 43, Octavius gave to his friend Agrippa the delicate commission of prosecuting C. Cassius, one of the murderers of J. Caesar. At the outbreak of the Perusinian war between Octavianus, now Octavianus, and L. Antonius, in b. c. 41, Agrippa, who was then praetor, commanded part of the forces of Octavianus, and after distinguishing himself by skilful manoeuvres, besieged L. Antonius in Perusia. He took the town in b. c. 40, and towards the end of the same year retook Sipontum, which had fallen into the hands of M. Antonius. In b. c. 38, Agrippa obtained fresh success in Gaul, where he quelled a revolt of the native chiefs; he also penetrated into Germany as far as the country of the Catti, and transplanted the Ubi to the left bank of the Rhine; whereupon he turned his arms against the revolted Aquitani, whom he soon brought to obedience. His victories, especially those in Aquitania, contributed much to securing the power of Octavianus, and he was recalled by him to undertake the command of the war against Sex. Pompeius, which was on the point of breaking out, in b. c. 37. Octavianus offered him a triumph, which Agrippa declined, but accepted the consulship, to which he was promoted by Octavianus in b. c. 37. Dion Cassius (xlviii. 49) seems to say that he was consul when he went to Gaul, but the words οὐδὲν ἔφη μετὰ Λουκίου γύναικά τοῦ, seem to be suspicious, unless they are to be inserted a little higher, after the passage, τῷ ἀγρίττῳ τῆς τοῦ ναυτικοῦ παρακεκυκτικῆς, which refer to an event which took place during the consulship of Agrippa. For, immediately after his promotion to this dignity, he was charged by Octavianus with the construction of a fleet, which was the more necessary, as Sextus Pompey was master of the sea.

Agrippa, in whose conduct and deeds were never separated (Vellei. ii. 79), executed this order with prompt energy. The Lucrine lake near Baiae was transformed by him into a safe harbour, which he called the Julian in honour of Octavianus, and where he exercised his sailors and mariners till they were able to encounter the experienced sailors of Pompey. In b. c. 36, Agrippa defeated Sex. Pompey first at Myline, and afterwards at Nauloclius on the coast of Sicily, and the latter of these victories broke the naval supremacy of Pompey. He received in consequence the honour of a naval crown, which was first conferred upon him; though, according to other authorities, M. Varro was the first who obtained it from Pompey the Great. (Vellei. ii. 61; Liv. Epit. 129; Dion Cass. xlix. 14; Plin. H. N. xvi. 8 c. 6; Virg. Aen. viii. 684.)

In b. c. 35, Agrippa had the command of the war in Illyria, and afterwards served under Octavianus, when the latter had proceeded to that country. On his return, he voluntarily accepted the aedileship in b. c. 33, although he had been consul, and expended immense sums of money upon great public works. He restored the Appian, Marcian, and Anientian aqueducts, constructed a new one, fifteen miles in length, from the Tepula to Rome, to which he gave the name of the Julian, in honour of Octavianus, and had an immense number of smaller water-works made, to distribute the water within the town. He also had the large caves of the Aquincus Prætura entirely cleansed. His various works were adorned with statues by the first artists of Rome. These splendid buildings he augmented in b. c. 27, during his third consulship, by several others, and among these was the Pantheon, on which we still read the inscription: "M. Agrippa L. F. Cos. Terentium fecit." (Dion Cass. xix. 43, luti. 27; Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 13, s. 24 § 3; Strab. v. p. 235; Front. De Aquae. Taur.)

When the war broke out between Octavianus and M. Antonius, Agrippa was appointed commander-in-chief of the fleet, in b. c. 32. He took Methone in the Peloponnesus, Leucas, Patrace, and Corinth; and in the battle of Actium (in b. c. 31) where he commanded, the victory was mainly owing to his skill. On his return to Rome in b. c. 30, Octavianus, now Augustus, rewarded him with a "vexillum caeruleum," or sea-green flag.

In b. c. 28, Agrippa became consul for the second time with Augustus, and about this time married Marcella, the niece of Augustus, and the daughter of his sister Octavia. His former wife, Pomponia, the daughter of T. Pomponius Atticus, was either dead or divorced. In the following year, in b. c. 27, he was again consul the third time with Augustus.

In b. c. 25, Agrippa accompanied Augustus to the war against the Cantabrians. About this time jealousy arose between him and his brother-in-law Marcellus, the nephew of Augustus, and who seemed to be destined as his successor. Augustus, anxious to prevent differences that might have had serious consequences for him, sent Agrippa as proconsul to Syria. Agrippa of course left Rome, but he stopped at Mitylene in the island of Lesbos, leaving the government of Syria to his legate. The apprehensions of Augustus were removed by the death of Marcellus in b. c. 23, and Agrippa immediately returned to Rome, where he was the more anxiously expected, as troubles had broken out during the consular term of the consul in b. c. 21. Augustus resolved to receive his faithful friend into his own family, and accordingly induced him to divorce his wife Marcella, and marry Julia, the widow of Marcellus and the daughter of Augustus by his third wife, Scribonia. (b. c. 21.)

In b. c. 19, Agrippa went into Gaul. He pacified the turbulent natives, and constructed four great public roads and a splendid aqueduct at Nemausus (Nimes). From thence he proceeded to Spain and subdued the Cantabrians after a short but bloody and obstinate struggle; but, in accordance with his usual prudence, he neither announced his victories in pompous letters to the senate, nor did he accept a triumph which Augustus offered him. In b. c. 18, he was invested with the tribunician power for five years together with Augustus; and in the following year (b. c. 17), his two sons, Calus and Lucius, were adopted by Augustus. At the close of the year, he accepted an invitation of Herod the Great, and went to Jerusalem. He founded the military colony of Berytus (Beirut), thence he proceeded in b. c. 16 to the Pontus Buxinus, and compelled the Boarpani to accept Poleno for their king and to restore the Roman eagles which had been taken by Mithridates. On his return he stayed some time in Ionia, where he granted privileges to the Jews whose cause was pleaded by Herod (Joseph. Antiq. Jud. xvi. 2), and then proceeded to Rome, where he arrived in b. c. 13. After his tribunician power had been prolonged for five years, he went to Pannonia to restore tranquillity to that province. He returned in b. c. 12, after having been successful as usual, and retired to Campania. There he died unexpectedly, in the month of March, in b. c. 12, in his 51st year. His body was carried to Rome, and was buried in the mausoleum of Augustus, who himself pronounced a funeral oration over it. Dion Cassius tells us (iii. i., &c.), that in the year B.C. 29 Augustus assembled his friends and counsellors, Agrippa and Maecenas, demanding their opinion as to whether it would be advisable for him to usurp monarchical power, or to restore to the nation its former republican government. This is corroborated by Suetonius (Octav. 28), who says that Augustus twice deliberated upon that subject. The speeches which Agrippa and Maecenas delivered on this occasion are given by Dion Cassius; but the artificial character of them makes them suspicious. However it does not seem likely from the general character of Dion Cassius as a historian that these speeches are invented by him; and it is not improbable, and such a supposition suits entirely the character of Augustus, that those speeches were really pronounced, though preconcerted between Augustus and his counsellors to make the Roman nation believe that the fate of the republic was still a matter of discussion, and that Augustus would not assume monarchical power till he had been convinced that it was necessary for the welfare of the nation. Besides, Agrippa, who according to Dion Cassius, advised Augustus to restore the republic, was a man whose political opinions had evidently a monarchical tendency.

Agrippa was one of the most distinguished and important men of the age of Augustus. He must be considered as a chief support of the rising monarchical constitution, and without Agrippa Augustus could scarcely have succeeded in making himself the absolute master of the Roman empire. Dion Cassius (liv. 29, &c.), Vellius Paterculus (ii. 79), Suetonius (Ep. 94), and Horace (Od. i. 6), speak with equal admiration of his merits.

Pliny constantly refers to the "Commentariori" of Agrippa as an authority (Blemius, iii. iv. v. vi. comp. iii. 2), which may indicate certain official lists drawn up by him in the measurement of the Roman world under Augustus (AERITIUS), in which he may have taken part.

Agrippa left several children. By his first wife Pomponia, he had Vipsania, who was married to Tiberius Caesar, the successor of Augustus. By his second wife, Marcella, he had several children who are not mentioned; and by his third wife, Julia, he had two daughters, Julia, married to L. Aemilius Paulus, and Agrippina married to Germanicus, and three sons, Caius (CAESAR, C.), Lucius (CAESAR, L.), and AGrippa Postumus. (Dion Cass. lib. 45-54; Liv. 48. 117-136; Appian, Bel. Civ. lib. 5; Suet. Octavi, Friscus, M. Vipsanius Agrippa, eine historische Untersuchung über dessen Leben und Wirken, Altona, 1836.)

There are several medals of Agrippa: in the one figured below, he is represented with a naval crown; on the reverse is Neptune indicating his success by sea. [W. P.]

AGRIPPINA.

AGRIPPINNA I., the youngest daughter of M. Vipsanius Agrippa and of Julia, the daughter of Augustus, was born some time before B.C. 12. She married Caesar Germanicus, the son of Drusus Nero Germanicus, by whom she had nine children. Agrippina was gifted with great powers of mind, a noble character, and all the moral and physical qualities that constituted the model of a Roman matron: her love for her husband was sincere and lasting, her chastity was spotless, her fertility was a virtue in the eyes of the Romans, and her attachment to her children was an eminent feature of her character. She yielded to one dangerous passion, ambition. Augustus shewed her particular attention and attachment. (Sueton. Calig. 6.)

At the death of Augustus in a. d. 14, she was on the Lower Rhine with Germanicus, who commanded the legions there. Her husband was the idol of the army, and the legions on the Rhine, disconsolate with the accession of Tiberius, manifested their intention of proclaiming Germanicus master of the state. Tiberius hated and dreaded Germanicus, and he shewed as much antipathy to Agrippina, as he had love to her elder sister, his first wife. In this perilous situation, Germanicus and Agrippina saved themselves by their prompt energy; he quelled the outbreak and pursued the war against the Germans. In the ensuing year his lieutenant Caecina, after having made an invasion into Germany, returned to the Rhine. The campaign was not inglorious for the Romans, but they were worn out by hardships, and perhaps harassed on their march by some bands of Germans. Thus the rumour was spread that the main body of the Germans was approaching to invade Gaul. Germanicus was absent, and it was proposed to destroy the bridge over the Rhine. (Comp. Strab. iv. p. 194.) If this had been done, the retreat of Caecina’s army would have been cut off, but it was saved by the firm opposition of Agrippina to such a cowardly measure. When the troops approached, she went to the bridge, acting as a general, and receiving the soldiers as they crossed it; the wounded among them were presented by her with clothes, and they received from her own hands everything necessary for the cure of their wounds. (Tac. Ann. i. 69.) Germanicus having been recalled by Tiberius, she accompanied her husband to Asia (A.D. 17), and after his death, or rather murder (GERMANICUS), she returned to Italy. She stayed some days at the island of Corcyra to recover from her grief, and then landed at Brundusium, accompanied by two of her children, and holding in her arms the urn with the ashes of her husband. At the news of her arrival, the port, the walls, and even the roofs of the houses were occupied by crowds of people who were anxious to see and salute her. She was solemnly received by the officers of two Praetorian cohorts, which Tiberius had sent to Brundusium for the purpose of accompanying her to Rome; the urn containing the ashes of Germanicus was borne by tribunes and centurions, and the funeral procession was received on its march by the magistrates of Calabria, Apulia, and Campania; by Drusus, the son of Tiberius; Claudius, the brother of Germanicus; by the other children of Germanicus; and at last, in the environs of Rome, by the consuls, the senate, and crowds of the Roman people. (Tae. Ann. III. 1, &c.)
During some years Tiberius disguised his hatred of Agrippina; but she soon became exposed to secret accusations and intrigues. She asked the emperor's permission to choose another husband, but Tiberius neither refused nor consented to the emperor's permission to choose another husband, secret accusations and intrigues. She asked the permission of Agrippina; but she soon became exposed to disorders, persuaded Agrippina that the emperor intended to poison her. Alarmed at such a report, she refused to eat an apple which the emperor shewed his hostile feelings by allusive words or neglectful silence. There were no evidences of ambitious plans formed by Agrippina, but the rumour having been spread that she would fly to the army, he banished her to the island of Pandataria (A.D. 30) where her mother Julia had died in exile. Her sons Nero and Drusus were likewise banished and both died an unnatural death. She lived three years on that barren island; at last she refused to take any food, and died most probably by voluntary starvation. Her death took place precisely two years after and on the same date as the murder of Sejanus, that is in A.D. 33. Tacitus and Suetonius tell us, that Tiberius boasted that he had not strangled her. On the same date as the murder of Sejanus, that is in A.D. 33, Tiberius boasted that he had not strangled her. According to Suetonius, all this was an intrigue preconcerted between the emperor and Sejanus, who, as it seems, had formed the plan of leading Agrippina into false steps. Tiberius was extremely suspicious of Agrippina, and showed his hostile feelings by allusive words or neglectful silence. course. At last, her death was resolved upon by Nero, who wished to repudiate Octavia and marry Poppaea, but whose plan was thwarted by his mother. Thus petty feminine intrigues became the cause of Agrippina's ruin. Nero invited her under the pretense of a reconciliation to visit him at Baiae, on the coast of Campania. She went therewith by sea. In their conversation hypocrisy was displayed on both sides. She left Baiae by the same way; but the vessel was so contrived, that it was to break to pieces when out at sea. It only partly broke, and Agrippina saved herself by swimming to the shore; her attendant Accorina was killed. Agrippina fled to her villa near the Lucrine lake, and informed her son of her happy escape. Nero charged Burrus to murder his mother; but Burrus declined it, Anicetus, the commander of the fleet, who had invented the stratagem of the ship, was compelled by Nero and Burrus to undertake the task. Anicetus went to her villa with a chosen band, and his men surprised her in her bedroom. "Ventrem fori" she cried out, after she was slightly wounded, and immediately afterwards expired under the blows of a centurion. (A. D. 60.) (Tac. Ann. xiv. 8.) It was told, that Nero went to the villa, and that he admired the beauty of the dead body of his mother: this was believed by some, doubted by others. (xiv. 9.) Agrippina left commentaries concerning her history and that of her family, which Tacitus consulted, according to his own statement. (ib. iv. 54; comp. Plin. Hist. Nat. vii. 6. a. 8, Echiumus, vii. &c.)

There are several medals of Agrippina, which are distinguishable from those of her mother by the title of Augustus, which those of her mother never have. On some of her medals she is represented with her husband Claudius, in others with her son Nero. The former is the case in the one annexed. The words on each side are respectively, AGRIPPINAE AVGUSTAE, and T. CLAVD. CAESAR. AVG. GERIM. P. M. TRIB. POT. P. P. (Tac. Ann. lib.xii. xiii. xiv.; Dion Cass. lib. ix.—Ixi.; Sueton. AGrippinus, Bishop of Carthage, of venerable memory, but known for being the first to maintain the necessity of re-baptizing all heretics. (Vincent. Liriina. Commoniti. i. 9.) St. Cyprian regarded this opinion as the correction of an error. (S. Augustin. De Baptismo. II. 7, vol. i. p. 102, ed. Bened.) And St. Augustine seems to imply he defended his error in writing. (Epist. 93, c. 10.) He held the Council of 70 Bishops at Carthage about A. D. 200 (Vulg. a. d. 215, Mans. A. d. 217) on the subject of Baptism. Though he erred in a matter yet undefined by the Church, St. Augustine notices that neither he nor St. Cyprian thought of separating from the Church. (De Baptismo, ii. 2, p. 109.) [A. J. C.]

Agrrippinus, Pacontius, whose father was put to death by Tiberius on a charge of treason. (Suet. Tib. 61.) Agrippinus was accused at the same time as Thrasea, A. D. 67; and was banished from Italy. (Tac. Ann. xvi. 29, 29, 58.) He was a Stoic philosopher, and is spoken of with praise by Epictetus (ep. Stoch. Serm. 7), and Avian. (i. 1.)

Agrinus (Ἀγρίνος), a son of Porthon and Euryte, and brother of Oeneus, king of Calydon in Aetolia, Alectothes, Melos, Leonocus, and Sterope. He was father of six sons, of whom Thersites was one. These sons of Agrinus deprived Oeneus of his kingdom, and gave it to their father; but all of them, with the exception of Thersites, were slain by Diomedes, the grandson of Oeneus. (Apollod. i. 7. 10, 8, 5, &c.) Apollodoros places these events before the expedition of the Greeks against Troy, while Hyginus (Fab. 175, comp. 242 and Antonin. Lib. 57) states, that Diomedes, when he heard, after the fall of Troy, of the misfortune of his grandfather Oeneus, hastened back and expelled Agrinus, who then put an end to his own life; according to others, Agrinus and his sons were slain by Diomedes. (Comp. Paus. ii. 23, § 2; Ov. Heroid. ix. 153.)

There are some other mythical personages of the name of Agrinus, concerning whom nothing of interest is known. (Hesiode. Theog. 1013, &c.; Apollod. i. 6. § 2, ii. 8. § 4.) [L. S.]

Agroecius or Agroetiue, a Roman grammarian, the author of an extant work "De Orthographia et Differentia Sermonis," intended as a supplement to a work of the same title, by Flavins Capere, and dedicated to a bishop, Eucharius. He is supposed to have lived in the middle of the 5th century of our era. His work is printed in Putschius' "Grammaticae Latinae Antiques Antiqui," pp. 2266—2275. [C. P. M.]

Agroetas (Ἀγρωτας), a Greek historian, who wrote a work on Scythia (Σκυθων), from the thirteenth book of which the scholiast on Apollonius (ii. 1248) quotes, and one on Libya (Λιβων), the fourth book of which is quoted by the same scholiast. (iv. 1396.) He is also mentioned by Stephanus Byz. (s. v. Αγνωτος). [C. P. M.]

Agron (Ἀγρων). 1. The son of Ninsu, the first of the Lydian dynasty of the Hercules. The tradition was, that this dynasty supplanted a native race of kings, having been originally entrusted with the government as deputies. The names Ninsu and Belus in their genealogy render it probable that they were either Assyrian governors, or princes of Assyrian origin, and that their accession marks the period of an Assyrian conquest. (Herod. i. 7.)

2. The son of Pleuratus, a king of Illyria. In the strength of his land and naval forces he surprised all the preceding kings of that country. When the Aetolians attempted to compel the Macedonians to join their confederacy, Agron undertook to protect them, having been induced to do so by a large bribe which he received from Demetrius, the father of Philip. He accordingly sent to their assistance a force of 5000 Illyrians, who gained a decisive victory over the Aetolians. Agron, overjoyed at the news of this success, gave himself up to feasting, and, in consequence of his excess, contracted a pleurisy, of which he died. (H. c. 231.) He was succeeded in the government by his wife Tecta. Just after his death, an embassy arrived from the Romans, who had sent to mediate in behalf of the inhabitants of the island of Ison, who had revolted from Agron and placed themselves under the protection of the Romans. By his first wife, Tritea, whom he divorced, he had a son named Phoenix, or Pinncus, who survived him, and was placed under the guardianship of Demetrius Pharsus, who married his mother after the death of Teuta. (Dion Cass. xxxiv. 46, 151; Polyb. ii. 2-4; Appian, Id. 7; Flor. ii. 5; Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 6.)

AGROTERA (Ἀγροτέρα), the huntress, a surname of Artemis. (Hom. Η. xxi. 471.) At Agra on the Ilissus, where she was believed to have first stepped out of the boat. (Paus. i. 19. § 7.) Under this name she was also worshipped at Aegina. (vii. 26, § 3.) The name Agrotea is synonymous with Agraena (Ἀγραένα), but Eustathius (ad Id. p. 361) derives it from the name of Artemis Agrotcra at Athens, see Dict. of Aut. s. v. Αγροτέρας Suodes, p. 31.

AGYEUS (Ἀγυέας), a surname of Apollo describing him as the protector of the streets and public places. As such he was worshipped at Acharnae (Paus. i. 31. § 3), Mycenae (ii. 19. § 7), and at Tegae. (viii. 53. § 1.) The origin of the worship of Apollo Agyeus in the last of these places is related by Pausanias. (Compare Hor. Carm. iv. 6. 28; Macrob. i. 9.) [L. S.]

AGYRRHIUS (Ἀγγρήρης), a native of Colocythus in Aetolia, whom Andocides ironically calls τὸν καλὸν καταβάτον (de Myst., 65, ed. Reiske), after being in prison many years for embezzlement of public money, obtained about b.c. 395 the restoration of the Theoricon, and also tripled the pay for the property of Ahala, but that it failed. (Val. Max. v. 3. § 2; Cic. de rep. 1. 5, pro Dom. 52.) Livy passes over this, and only mentions (iv. 21), that a bill was brought in three years afterwards, b. c. 346, by another Sp. Maelius, a tribune, for confining the property of Ahala, but that it failed.

A representation of Ahala is given on a coin of M. Brutus, the murderer of Caesar, but we cannot suppose it to be anything more than an imaginary likeness. M. Brutus pretended that he was descended from L. Brutus, the first consul, on his father's side, and from C. Ahala on his mother's, and thus was sprung from two tyrannicides. (Comp. Cic. ad Att. xiii. 40.) The head of Brutus on the annexed coin is therefore intended to represent the first consul.

| 4. Cn. Domitius Cn. f. Cn. n. Ahenobarbus, son of the preceding, was tribune of the plebs b. c. 104, in the second consulate of Marius. (Ascon. in Cornel. p. 81, ed. Orelli.) When the college of pontiffs did not elect him in place of his father, he brought forward the law (Lex Domitia), by which the right of election was transferred from the priestly colleges to the people. (Dict. of Ant. pp. 773, b. 774, a.) The people afterwards elected him Pontifex Maximus out of gratitude. (Liv. Epit. 67; Cic. pro Deiot. 11; Val. Max. vi. 5. § 5.) He prosecuted in his tribunate and afterwards several of his private enemies, as Aemilius Scaurus and Junius Silanus. (Val. Max. L. c.; Dion Cass. Fr. 100; Cic. Div. in Cecid. 20, Verr. ii. 47, Cornel. 2, pro Scaur. 1.) He was consul b. c. 96 with C. Cassius, and censor b. c. 92, withLicinius Crassus, the orator. In his censorship he and his colleague shut up the schools of the Latin rhetoricians (Cic. de Orat. iii. 24; Gall. xv. 11), but this was the only thing in which they acted in concert. Their censorship was long celebrated for their disputes. Domitius was of a violent temper, and was moreover in favour of the ancient simplicity of living, while Crassus loved luxury and encouraged
AHENOBARBUS.

Among the many sayings recorded of both, we are told that Crassus observed, "that it was no wonder that a man had a head of brass, who had a mouth of iron and a heart of lead." (Plin. H. N. xviii. 1; Suet. L. C.; Val. Max. ix. 1. § 4; Macrobr. Sat. ii. 11.) Cicero says, that Domitius was not to be reckoned among the orators, but that he spoke well enough and had sufficient talent to maintain his high rank. (Cic. Brut. 44.)

5. L. DOMITIUS CN. F. CN. N. AHENOBARBUS, son of No. 8 and brother of No. 4, was praetor in Sicily, probably in b. c. 96, shortly after the Servile war, which was forbidden to carry arms. He ordered a slave to be crucified for killing a wild boar with a hunting spear. (Cic. Ferr. 3; Val. Max. vi. 3. § 5.) He was consul in 54. In the civil war between Marius and Sulla, he espoused the side of the latter, and was murdered at Rome, by order of the younger Marius, by the praetor Damascusius. (Appian, B. C. i. 88; Vell. ii. 26; Oros. v. 20.)

6. CN. DOMITIUS CN. F. CN. F. AHENOBARBUS, apparently a son of No. 4, married Cornelia, daughter of L. Cornelius Cinna, consul in b. c. 67, and in the civil war between Marius and Sulla espoused the side of the former. In 82, Domitius was proscribed, and fled to Africa, where he was joined by many who were in the same condition as himself. With the assistance of the Numidian king, Hiarbas, he collected an army, but was defeated near Utica by Cn. Pompeius, whom Sulla had sent against him, and was afterwards killed in the storming of his camp, b. c. 81. According to some accounts, he was killed after the battle by command of Pompey. Liv. Epit. 89; Plut. Pom. 10, 12; Zonar. x. 2; Oros. v. 21; Val. Max. vi. 2. § 8.)

7. L. DOMITIUS CN. F. CN. N. AHENOBARBUS, son of No. 4, is first mentioned in b. c. 70 by Cicero, as a witness against Verres. In 61 he was curule aedile, when he exhibited a hundred Tumidian lions, and continued the games so long, that the people were obliged to leave the circus and flee to the shelves in the eye of the storm, which was the first time they had done so. Dion Cass. xxxvii. 46; Plin. H. N. viii. 55; this use in the games was called diluidium, Hor. Ep. 19. 47.) He married Porcia, the sister of M. Cato, and in his aedilship supported the latter in his proposals against bribery at elections, which were directed against Pompey, who was purchasing votes for Afranius. The political opinions of Ahenobarbus coincided with those of Cato; he was rough with his life one of the strongest supporters of the aristocratic party. He took an active part in the war. He did not however return to Pompey. He threw himself into Corfinium with the remainder of his army, which he did not expect, and which he would certainly not have showed, if he had been the conqueror. Despairing of life, he had ordered his physician to administer to him poison, but the latter gave him only a sleeping draught. Ahenobarbus' feelings against Caesar remained unaltered, but he was too deeply offended by the conduct of Pompey to join him immediately. He retired for a short time to Cosa in Etruria, and afterwards sailed to Massilia, of which the inhabitants appointed him governor. He prosecuted the war vigorously against Caesar; but the town was eventually taken, and Ahenobarbus escaped in a vessel, which was the only one that got off.

Ahenobarbus now went to Pompey in Thessaly, and proposed that after the war all senators should be brought to trial who had remained neutral in it. Cicero, whom he branded as a coward, was not a little afraid of him. He fell in the battle of Pharsalia (48), where he commanded the left wing, and, according to Cicero's assertion in the second Philippic, by the hand of Antony. Ahenobarbus was a man of great energy of character; he remained firm to his political principles, but was little scrupulous in the means he employed to maintain them. (The passages of Cicero in which Ahenobarbus is mentioned are given in Orelli's Onomasticon Tullianum; Suet. N. C. 2; Dion Cass. lib. xxxix. xli; Cass. H. D.)

8. CN. DOMITIUS L. F. CN. N. AHENOBARBUS, son of the preceding, was taken with his father at Corfinium (b. c. 49), and was present at the battle of Pharsalia (48), but did not take any further part in the war. He did not however return to Italy till 46, when he was pardoned by Caesar. He probably had no share in the murder of Caesar (44), though some writers expressly assert that he was one of the conspirators; but he followed Brutus into Macedonia after Caesar's death, and was condemned by the Lex Pedia in 43 as one of the murderers of Caesar. In 42 he commanded a fleet of fifty ships in the Ionian sea, and completely defeated Domitius Calvinus on the day of the first battle of Philippi, as the latter attempted to sail out of Brundusium. He was saluted Imperator in consequence, and a record of this victory is preserved in the annexed coin, which represents a trophy placed upon the prow of a vessel. The head on the other side of the coin has a beard, in reference to the reputed origin of the family.

After the battle of Philippi (42), Ahenobarbus conducted the war independently of Sex. Pompeius, and with a fleet of seventy ships and two legions plundered the coasts of the Ionian sea.

In 40 Ahenobarbus became reconciled to Antony, which gave great offence to Octavius, and was placed over Bithynia by Antony. In the peace concluded with Sex. Pompeius in 39, Antony provided for the safety of Ahenobarbus, and obtained for him the promise of the consulship for 32. Ahenobarbus remained a considerable time in Asia, and accompanied Antony in his unfortunate campaign against the Parthians in 36. He became consul, according to agreement, in 32, in which year the open rupture took place between Antony and Augustus. Ahenobarbus fled from Rome to Ephesus, where he found Cleopatra with him, and endeavored, in vain, to obtain her removal from the army. Many of the soldiers, disgusted with the conduct of Antony, offered the command to him; but he preferred deserting the party altogether, and accordingly went over to Augustus shortly before the battle of Actium. He was not, however, present at the battle, as he died a few days after joining Augustus. Suetonius says that he was the best of his family. (Cic. Phil. ii. 11, x. 6; Brut. 25; Appian, B. C. v. 55, 63, 65; Plut. Anton. 70, 71; Dion Cass. lib. xlvii.—1; Vellei. ii. 76, 84; Suet. Ner. 3; Tac. Ann. iv. 44.)

1. A son of Telamon, king of Salamis, by Periboea or Eriboea (Apollod. iii. 12, § 7; Paus. i. 42. § 4; Pind. Isb. vi. 65; Diod. iv. 72), and a grandson of Aeacus. Homer calls Ajax the Telamonian, Ajax the Great, or simply Ajax (II. ii. 768, ix. 169, xiv. 410; comp. Pind. Isb. vi. 38), whereas the other Ajax, the son of Oileus, is always distinguished from the former by some epithet. According to Homer Ajax joined the expedition of the Greeks against Troy, with his Salamianis, in twelve ships (II. ii. 557; comp. Strab. ix. p. 394), and was next to Achilles the most distinguished and the bravest among the Greeks. (ii. 708, xvii. 279, &c.) He is described as tall of stature, and his head on broad shoulders as rising above those of all the Greeks (iii. 226, &c.); in beauty he was inferior to none but Achilles. (Od. xi. 550, xxiv. 17 comp. Paus. i. 35. § 3.) When Hector challenged the bravest of the Greeks to single combat, Ajax came forward among several others. The people prayed that he might fight, and when the latter fell to Ajax (II. vii. 179, &c.), and he as requested, Hector himself began to tremble. (215) He wounded Hector and dashed him to the ground by a huge stone. The combatants were separate and upon putting they exchanged arms with another as a token of mutual esteem. (305, &c.) Ajax was also one of the ambassadors whom Agamemnon sent to conciliate Achilles. (ix. 169.) I fought several times besides with Hector, as in the battle near the ships of the Greeks (xiv. 408, &c.); in 415, xvi. 114), and in protecting the body of Patroclus. (xviii. 129, 7.) In the games at the festival of Patoclus, Ajax fought with Odysseus, without gaining any decided advantage over him (xxili. 720, &c.), and in like manner with D
AJAX.

In the contest about the armour of Achilles, he was conquered by Odysseus, and this, says Homer, became the cause of his death. (Od. xi. 541, &c.) Odysseus afterwards met his spirit in Hades, and endeavoured to appease it, but in vain.

Thus far the story of Ajax, the Telamonic, is related in the Homeric poems. Later writers furnish us with various other traditions about his youth, which is so vaguely alluded to by Homer. According to Apollodorus (iii. 12. § 7) and Pindar (Isth. vi. 51, &c.), Ajax became invulnerable in consequence of a prayer which Hercules offered to Zeus, while he was on a visit in Salamis. The child Telamon, and the hero made the child invulnerable by wrapping him up in his lion's skin. (Comp. Schol. ad ll. xxiii. 341.) Ajax is also mentioned among the suitors of Helen. (Apollod. iii. 10. § 8; Hygin. Fab. 81.) During the war against Troy, Ajax, like Achilles, made excursions into neighbouring countries. The first of them was to the Thracian Chersonesus, where he took Polydorus, the son of Priam, who had been entrusted to the Thracian Chersonesus, where he took Polydorus, the son of Priam, who had been entrusted to the care of King Polyphemus together with rich booties. Thence, he went into Phrygia, slew king Teuthras, or Telcutas, in single combat, and carried off great spoils, and Tecmessa, the king's head, which is generally believed to be a head of Ajax, is still extant in the Eregmont collection at Petworth. (Böttiger, Annalhcs, iii. p. 258.)

1. The son of Oileus, king of the Locrians, who is also called the Lesser Ajax. (Hom. II. ii. 527.) His mother's name was Briopis. According to Strabo (ix. p. 425) his birthplace was Naryx in Locris, whence Ovid (Met. xiv. 468) calls him Narcissus hcrus. According to the Iliad (II. 527, &c.) he led his Locrians in forty ships (Hygin. Fab. 97, says twenty) against Troy. He is described as one of the great heroes among the Greeks, and acts frequently in conjunction with the Telamonic Ajax. He is small of stature and wears a linen cuirass (Aπόλισιν), but is brave and intrepid, especially skilled in throwing the spear, and, next to Achilles, the most swift-footed among all the Greeks. (II. xiv. 520, &c., xxiii. 789, &c.) His principal exploits during the siege of Troy are mentioned in the following passages: xiii. 700, &c., xiv. 520, &c., xvi. 350, xviii. 256, 732, &c. In the funeral games at the pyre of Patroclus he contended with Odysseus and Antilochus for the prize in the footrace; but Athena, who was hostile towards him and favoured Odysseus, made him stumble and fall, so that he gained only the second prize. (xxiii. 754, &c.) On his return from Troy his vessel was wrecked on the Whirling Rocks (UUnπαί ξτητον), but he himself escaped upon a rock through the assistance of Poseidon, and would have been saved in spite of Athena, but he used presumptuous words, and said that he would escape the dangers of the sea, in defiance of the immortals. Hereupon Poseidon split the rock with his trident, and Ajax was swallowed up by the sea. (Od. iv. 499, &c.)

In later traditions this Ajax is called a son of Oileus and the nymph Rhene, and is also mentioned among the suitors of Helen. (Hygin. Fab. 81, 97; Apollod. iii. 10. § 8.) According to a tradition in Philostratus (Her. viii. 1), Ajax had a tame dragon, five cubits in length, which followed him everywhere like a dog. After the taking of Troy, it is said, he rushed into the temple of Athena, where Cassandra had taken refuge, and was embracing the statue of the goddess as a suppliant. Ajax dragged her away with violence and led her to the other captives. (Virg. Aen. ii. 403; Ruppius. Troad. 70, &c.; Dict. Cret. v. 12; Hygin. Fab. 116.) According to some statements he even violated Cassandra in the temple of the goddess (Tryphiod. 633; Q. Smyrn. xiiii. 422; Lyocphr. 560, with the Schol.; Odysseus at least accused him of this crime, and Ajax was to be stoned to death, but saved himself by establishing his innocence by an oath. (Paus. x. 26, § 1, s. v. Ajax; Paus. xiv. 5, § 4.)

The whole charge, is on the other hand, said to have been an invention of Agamemnon, who wanted to have Cassandra for himself. But whether true or not, Athena had sufficient reason for being indignant, as Ajax had dragged a suppliant from her temple. When on his voyage he came to the Capharean rocks on the coast of Euboea, his ship was wrecked in a storm, he himself was killed by Athena with a flash of lightning, and his body was washed upon the rocks, which henceforth were called the rocks of Ajax. (Hygin. Fab. 116; comp. Virg. Aen. l. iv. 40, &c., xi. 360.) For a different account of his death see Philostr. Her. viii. 8, and Schol. on Iliad. l. iv. 432. After his death his spirit dwelled on the island of Lence. (Paus. iii. 19, § 11.)

The Opuntian Locrians worshipped Ajax as their national hero, and so great was their faith in him, that when they drew up their army in battle array, they always left one place open for him, believing that, although invisible to them, he was fighting for and among them. (Paus. l. c.; Conon. Narrat. 18.)

The story of Ajax was frequently made use of by ancient poets and artists, and the hero who appears on some Locrin coins with the helmet, appears in the sacred enclosure around it, to Aius Locutius, or Bold, the second noblest family of the Visigoths.

Fragm. 5), he advised Zeus to have a figure of oak-wood dressed in bridal attire, and carried about amidst hymeneal songs, in order to change the anger of Hera into jealousy. The name of the wife of Alacomone was Athene, and that of his son, Glauceus, both of which refer to the goddess Athena. (Steph. Byz. s. v. 'Alαλκομε'νια; Paus. ix. 3, § 8; comp. Dict. of Ant. e. v. ALACHON'IA ('Alαχονία), a daughter of Zeus and Europa, from whom Alachon, a town in Laconia, derived its name. (Paus. iii. 21, § 6, 26; § 8; Nat. Com. viii. 23.)

ALALCOME'NIS ('Alαλκομε'νις), a Boeotian autochthon, who was believed to have given the name to the Boeotian Alacomene, to have brought up Athena, who was born there, and to have been the first who introduced her worship. (Paus. ix. 35, § 4.) According to Plutarch (De Dydad. Fragm. 5), he advised Zeus to have a figure of oak-wood dressed in bridal attire, and carried about amidst hymeneal songs, in order to change the anger of Hera into jealousy. The name of the wife of Alacomone was Athene, and that of his son, Glauceus, both of which refer to the goddess Athena. (Steph. Byz. s. v. 'Alαλκομε'νια; Paus. ix. 3, § 8; comp. Dict. of Ant. e. v. Δανάη; Müller, Orchom. p. 213.)

ALALCOME'NIA ('Alαλκομε'νια), one of the daughters of Ogyges, who as well as her two sisters, Thalcmene and Aulus, were regarded as supernatural beings, who watched over oaths and saw that they were not taken rashly or thoughtlessly. Their name was Πραξιδίνα, and they had a temple in common at the foot of the Telphusian mount in Boeotia. The representations of these divinities consisted of mere heads, and no parts of animals were sacrificed to them, except heads. (Paus. ix. 33, § 2, 4; Panynias, op. Steph. Byz. s. v. Τριμύλλιον; Suid. s. v. Πραξιδίνα; Müller, Orchom. p. 128, &c.)

ALARICUS. (In German Al-rísc, i. e. "All rich") king of the Visigoths, remarkable as being the first of the barbarian chiefs who entered and sacked the city of Rome, and the first enemy who had appeared before its walls since the time of Hannibal. He was of the family of Baltha, or Bold, the second noblest family of the Visigoths. (Jornandes, de Reb. Get. 29.) His first appearance in history is in a. d. 394, when he was invested by Theodosius with the command of the Gothic auxiliaries in his war with Eugenius. (Zosimus, v. 5.) In 396, partly from anger at being refused
The command of the armies of the eastern empire, partly at the instigation of Rufinus (Socrates, Hist. Eccl. vii. 10) and partly owing to the weakness of Arcadius, appointed prefect of eastern Illyricum (Zosimus, v. 5, 6), and partly owing to this office, and the use he made of it in providing arms for his own purposes, partly to his birth and fame, was by his countrymen elected king in 398. (Claudian, Entrop. ii. 212, Bell. Got. 533-543.)

The rest of his life was spent in the two invasions of Italy. The first (408-403), apparently unprovoked, brought him only to Ravena, and, after a bloody defeat at Pollentia, in which his wife and treasures were taken, and a masterly retreat to Verona (Oros. vii. 37), was ended by the treaty with Stilicho, which transferred his services from Arcadius to Honorius, and made him prefect of the western instead of the eastern Illyricum. In this capacity he fixed his camp at Aemona, in expectation of Ostia, and he ended in the unconditional surrender of the city for six days. It is marked by the three sieges of Rome. The first (408), as being a protracted blockade, was the most severe, but was raised by a ransom. The second (409) was occasioned by Alaric's demands, and, upon the occupation of Ostia, ended in the unconditional surrender of the city, and in the disposal of the empire by Alaric to Attilius, till on discovery of his incapacity, he restored it to Honorius. (Zosimus, v. vi.) The third (410), was occasioned by an assault upon his troops under the imperial sanction, and was ended by the treacherous opening of the Salarian gate on August 24, and the sack of the city for six days. It was immediately followed by the occupation of the south of Italy, and the design of invading Sicily and Africa. This intention, however, was interrupted by his death, after a short illness at Consantia, where he was buried in the basilica of the pagans. His sudden death inspired them with such terror, that they were unwilling to risk the empire by his return, and, in reply to their question of what he would do, the aged counsellors of his own tribe seems to be the heathen version of the ecclesiastical story, that he stopped the monk who begged him to spare Rome with the answer, that he was driven on by a voice which he could not resist. (Socrates, Hist. Eccl. vii. 10.) So also his vision of Achilles and Minerva appearing to defend the city of Athens, as recorded by Zosimus (v. 6), if it does not imply a lingering respect and fear in the mind of Alaric himself towards the ancient worship,—at least expresses the belief of the pagan historian, that his invasion was of so momentous a character as to call for divine interference.

But the impression left upon us by his general character is of a higher order. The real military skill shown in his escape from Greece, and in his retreat to Verona; the wish at Athens to show that he adopted the use of the battle and the other external forms of civilized life; the moderation and justice which he observed towards the Romans in the times of peace; the humanity which distinguished him during the sack of Rome—indicate something superior to the mere craft and lawless ambition which he seems to have possessed in common with other barbarian chiefs. So also his personal traits are of high moral tone. He was by nature a gentleman, and by birth a Roman. His personal looks were such as to command the respect of men of all ranks, and he was loved by the people. He was one of the most illustrious figures of the empire, and the first in the order of European chivalry. His character is of a higher order. The permanent effects of his career are to be found only in the establishment of the Visigothic kingdom of Spain by the warriors whom he was the first to lead into the west.

The authorities for the invasion of Greece and the first two sieges of Rome are Zosimus (v. vi): for the first invasion of Italy, Jornandes de Reb. Got. 30; Claudian, D. Get.: for the third siege and sack of Rome, Jornandes, 68; Orosius, vii. 39; Aug. Civ. Dei, i. 1-10; Hieronym. Epist. ad Princip. Procop. Bell. Vand. i. 2; Sozomen, Hist. Eccl. ix. 9, 10; Isid. Hispalensis, Chronicon Gotorum.) The invasions of Italy are involved in great confusion by these writers, especially by Jornandes, who blends the battle of Pollentia in 403 with the massacre of the Goths in 406. By conjecture and inference they are reduced in Gibbon (c. 30, 31) to the order which has been here followed. See also Godefroy, ad Philostor. xi. 3. [A.P.S.]

ALASTOR (ΑΛΑΣΤΟΡ). 1. According to Hesychius and the Etymologicum M., a surname of Zeus, describing him as the avenger of evil deeds. The name is also used, especially by the tragic writers, to designate any deity or demon who avenges wrongs committed by men. (Paus. viii. 24. § 4; Plut. De Def. Orac. 13, &c.; Aeschy. Agam. 1479, 1508, Pers. 343; Soph. Trach. 1092; Eurip. Phoen. 1580, &c.)

2. A son of Neleus and Chloris. When Heracles took Pylus, Alastor and his brothers, except Nestor, were slain by him. (Apollod. i. 9, § 6; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 156.) According to Parnathus (c. 13) he was to be married to Har- palyce, who, however, was taken from him by her father Clymenus.

3. A Lybian, who was a companion of Sarpedon, and slain by Odysseus. (Hom. I. vii. 617; Or. Met. xiii. 257.) Another Alastor is mentioned in Hom. I. viii. 333, xii. 422. [L. S.]

ALASTORIDES (ΑΛΑΣΤΟΡΙΔΩΣ), a patronymic from Alastor, and given by Homer (II. xx. 463) to Tros, who was probably a son of the Libyan Alastor mentioned above. [L. S.]

ALATHEUS, called ODOTHAEUS by Claudian, became with Saphrax, in d. 376, on the nymic from Alastor, and given by Homer (II. xx. 26, 27; Claudian, De IV Cons. Honor. Reb. Get.

ALBINOVANUS, P. TU'LLIUS, belonged to the party of Marius in the first civil war, and was one of the twelve who were declared enemies of the state in n. c. 97. He then joined the Hannibals, but afterwards deserted them. After the death of Carbo and Norbanus in n. c. 81, he obtained the pension of Sulla by treacherously putting to death many of the principal officers of Norbanus, whom he had invited to a banquet. Ariminium in consequence revolted to Sulla, whence the Pseudo-Asconius (in Cc. Verr. p. 168, ed. Orelli) speaks of Albinovanus betraying it. (Appian, B. C. i. 60, 62, 91; Florus, iii. 21. § 7.)

ALBINOVANUS or ALBUS, the name of the prin¬ cipal family of the patrician Postumia gens. The original name was Albus, as appears from the Fasti, which was afterwards lengthened into Albi-

Postumius as commander in consequence of the name. Livy (xxx. 45) states expressly, that Scipio Africanus was the first Roman who obtained a surname from his conquests. (Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, i. p. 556.)

Many of the coins of the Albini commemorate this victory of their ancestor, as in the one annexed. On one side the head of Diana is represented with the crescent, which are partly effaced, and on the reverse are three horsemen trampling on a foot-soldier.

2. SP. POSTUMIUS P. F. ALBUS REGILL/NSIS, was, according to Livy, dictator B. c. 498, when he conquered the Latins in the great battle near the lake Regillus. Roman story related that Castor and Pollux were seen fighting in this battle on the side of the Romans, whence the dictator afterwards dedicated a temple to Castor and Pollux in the forum. He was consul B. c. 496, in which year some of the annals, according to Livy, placed the battle of the lake Regillus; and it is to this year that Dionysius assigns it. (Liv. ii. 19, 20, 21; Dionys. vi. 2, &c.; Val. Max. i. 8, § 1; Cic. de Nat. Deor. ii. 2, iii. 5.) The surname Regillensis is usually supposed to have been derived from this battle; but Niebuhr thinks that it was taken from a place of residence, just as the Claudii bore the same name, and that the later annalists only spoke of Postumius as commander in consequence of the name. Livy (xxx. 45) states expressly, that Scipio Africanus was the first Roman who obtained a surname from his conquests. (Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, i. p. 556.)

2. SP. POSTUMIUS A. F. P. N. ALBUS REGIL-
L/NSIS, apparently, according to the Fasti, the son of the preceding, (though it must be observed, that in these early times no dependance can be placed upon these genealogies,) was consul b.c. 466. (Livy. iii. 2; Dionys. ix. 60.) He was one of the three commissioners sent into Greece to collect information about the laws of that country, and was a member of the first decemviri in 451. (Livy. iii. 31, 33; Dionys. x. 59, 56.) He commanded, as legatus, the centre of the Roman army in the battle in which the Aequians and Volscians were defeated in 446. (Livy. iii. 70.)

3. A. Postumius A. F. P. N. Albinus Regilnensis, apparently son of No. 1, was consul b.c. 459, and carried on war against the Aequians. He was sent as the legatus maius of the Roman army in 450, on which occasion he was insulted by their commander. (Liv. iii. 4, 5, 25; Dionys. ix. 62, 65.)

4. Sp. Postumius Sp. F. A. N. Albinus Regilnensis, apparently son of No. 2, was consul tribune b.c. 432, and served as legatus in the war in the following year. (Livy. iv. 25, 27.)

5. P. Postumius P. F. A. N. Albinus Regilnensis, whom Livy calls Marcus, was consul tribune b.c. 414, and was killed in an insurrection of the soldiers, whom he had deprived of the plunder of the Aequian town of Bolae, which he had promised them. (Livy. iv. 49, 50.)

6. M. Postumius M. F. A. N. Albinus Regilnensis, consular tribune b.c. 403, was in reality censor in that year with M. Furius Camillus. (Fasti Capitol.)

7. A. Postumius A. Albinus Regilnensis, consular tribune b.c. 397, collected with his colleague L. Julius an army of volunteers, since the tribunes prevented them from making a regular levy, and cut off a body of Tarquinienses, who were returning home after plundering the Roman territory. (Livy. v. 16.)

8. Sp. Postumius Albinus Regilnensis, consular tribune b.c. 394, carried on war against the Aequians; he at first suffered a defeat, but afterwards conquered them completely. (Livy. v. 26, 28.)

9. Sp. Postumius Albinus, was consul b.c. 334, and invaded, with his colleague T. Veturius Calvinus, the country of the Sidicini; but, on account of the great forces which the enemy had collected, and the report that the Samnites were coming to their assistance, a dictator was appointed. (Livy. viii. 16, 17.) He was censor in 332 and magister equitum in 327, when M. Claudius Marcellus was appointed dictator to hold the comitia. (Livy. viii. 17, 23.) In 321, he was consul a second time with T. Veturius Calvinus, and marched against the Samnites, but was defeated near Caulium, and obliged to surrender with his whole army, who were sent under the yoke. As the price of his deliverance and that of the army, he and his colleague and the other commanders swore, in the name of the republic, to a humiliating peace. The consuls, on their return to Rome, laid down their office after appointing a dictator; and the senate, on the advice of Postumius, resolved that all persons who had sworn to the peace should be given up to the Samnites. Postumius, with the other prisoners, accordingly went to the Samnites, but they refused to accept them. (Livy. ix. 1—19; Appian, de Rebell. S. 2—6; Cic. de Off. iii. 30, Cato. 12.)

10. A. Postumius A. N. L. N. Albinus, was consul b.c. 242 with Lutatius Catulus, who defeated the Carthaginians off the AEgates, and thus brought the first Punic war to an end. Albinus was kept in the city, against his will, by the Pontifex Maximus, because he was Flamen Martianus. (Liv. Epit. 19, xxiii. 13; Dionys. xx. 27; Val. Max. i. 1. § 2.) He was censor in 234. (Fasti Capitol.)

11. L. Postumius L. F. A. N. Albinus, apparently a son of the preceding, was consul b.c. 234, and again in 229. In his second consulship he made war upon the Illyrians. (Entrop. iii. 4; Oros. iv. 137; Dionys. iii. 28; Porph. ii. 11, &c., who erroneously calls him Antus instead of Lucius.) In 216, the third year of the second Punic war, he was made praetor, and sent into Cisalpine Gaul, and while absent was elected consul for the following year, 215. But he did not live to enter upon his consulship; for he and his army were destroyed by the Boii in the wood Litana in Cisalpine Gaul. His head was cut off, and after being filched with gold was dedicated to the gods by the Boii, and used as a sacred drinking-vessel. (Livy. xxii. 33, xxvii. 24; Polyb. iii. 106, 119; Cic. Tusq. i. 37.)

12. Sp. Postumius Sp. F. A. N. Albinus, was praetor, and praetor urbanus b.c. 189. (Livy. xxxvii. 47, 50; and consul in 186. In his consulship the senatusconsulatum was passed, which is still extant, suppressing the worship of Bacchus in Rome, in consequence of the abominable crimes which were committed in connexion with it. (xxxix. 6, 11, &c.; Val. Max. vi. 3. § 7; Plin. H. N. xxxii. 10; Dict. of Ant. p. 544.) He was also augur, and died in 179 at an advanced age. (Livy. xl. 42; Cic. Cato. 3.)

13. A. Postumius A. F. A. N. Albinus, was curulea nobiles b.c. 167, when he exhibited the Great Games, praetor 185, and consul 190. (Livy. xxxix. 7, 26, xl. 35.) In his consulship he conducted the war against the Ligurians. (xl. 41.) He was consul 174 with Q. Fulvius. Their censorship was a severe one; they expelled nine members from the senate, and degraded many of equestrian rank. They executed, however, many public works. (xlii. 32, xliii. 10; comp. Cic. Verr. i. 41.) He was elected in his censorship one of the decremarii aecurorum in the place of L. Cornelius Lentulus. (Livy. xlii. 10.) Albinus was engaged in many public missions. In 175 he was sent into northern Greece to inquire into the truth of the representations of the Dardanians and Thessalians about the Bastarnae and Perusae. (Polyb. xxvi. 9.) In 171 he was sent as one of the ambassadors to Crete (Livy. xiii. 39); and after the death of M. Claudius in 168 he was one of the ten commissioners appointed to settle the affairs of the country with Aemilius Paullus. (Livy. xiv. 17.) Livy not unfrequently calls him Lusceus, from which it would seem that he was blind of one eye.

14. Sp. Postumius Sp. F. A. N. Albinus Paulullus, probably a brother of No. 13 and 15, perhaps obtained the surname of Paullinus, as being small of stature, to distinguish him more accurately from his two brothers. He was praetor in Sicily, b.c. 173, and consul, 174. (Livy. xxxix. 45, xliii. 26, xliii. 2.)

15. L. Postumius L. F. A. N. Albinus, probably a brother of No. 13 and 14, was praetor b.c. 180, and obtained the province of further Spain. His command was prolonged in the following year. After conquering the Vexcatii and Liby-ians, he returned to Rome in 178, and obtained a triumph on account of his victories. (Liv. xli. 35, 44, 47, 48, 50, xli. 3, 11.) He was consul in 173, with M. Popillius Laenas; and the war in Liguria was assigned to both consuls. Albinus, however, was first sent into Campania to separate the land of the state from that of private persons;
and this business occupied him all the summer, so that he was unable to go into his province. He was the first Roman magistrate who put the allies to any expense in travelling through their territories. (xlii. 3, 11.) The festival of the Floralia, which had been discontinued, was restored in his consulship. (Orv. Fest. v. 329.)

17. L. Postumius Sp. f. L. n. Albinus, apparent son of No. 12, was curule aedile b.c.
161, and exhibited the Ludi Megalenses, at which the Enunach of Terence was acted. He was consul in 154, and died seven days after he had set out from Rome to go to his province. It was supposed that he was poisoned by his wife. (Obseq. 76; Val. Max. vi. 3. § 8.)

18. A. Postumius A. F. A. n. Albinus, apparent son of No. 13, was praetor b.c. 155 (Cic.
Acad. ii. 45; Polyb. xxxiii. 1), and consul in 151 with L. Licinius Lucullus. He and his colleague were thrown into prison by the tribunes for conducting the levies with too much severity. (Liv.
Epit. 48; Polyb. xxxv. 3; Oros. iv. 21.) He was one of the ambassadors sent in 153 to make peace between Attalus and Prusias (Polyb. xxxiii.
11), and accompanied L. Mummius Achaicus into Greece in 146 as one of his legates. There was a statue erected to his honour on the Isthmus.
(Cic. ad Att. xiii. 30, 32.) Albinus was well acquainted with Greek literature, and wrote in that language a poem and a Roman history, the latter of which is mentioned by several ancient writers.
Polybius (xii. 6) speaks of him as a vain and light-headed man, who disparaged his own people, and was sullenly devoted to the study of Greek literature.
He relates a tale of him and the elder Cato, who reproved Albinus sharply, because in the preface to his history he begged the pardon of his readers, if he should make any mistakes in writing in a foreign language; Cato reminded him that he was not compelled to write at all, but that if he chose to write, he had no business to ask for the indulgence of his readers. This tale is also related by Gellius
(xii. 3), Macrobins (Preface to Saturn. Polintarch (Cato, 12), and Suidas (s. v. Αλίπος Ποστούχος).
Polybius also says that Albinus imitated the worst parts of the Greek character, that he was entirely devoted to pleasure, and shirked all labour and danger. He relates that he retired to Thbeus, when the battle was fought at Phoca, on the plea of indisposition, but afterwards wrote an account of it to the senate as if he had been present.
Cicero speaks with rather more respect of his literary merits; he calls him doctus homo and illustra-ete et discipulis. (Cic. Acad. ii. 45, Brut. 21.)
Macrobins (ii. 16) quotes a passage from the first book of the Annals of Albinus respecting Bruttis, and as he uses the words of Albinus, it has been sup-poused that the Greek history may have been translated into Latin. A work of Albinus, on the privileges of Africans, is referred to by Sestu
(a Vit. Apoll. xlv. 710) as the author of the work "De Origine Gentis Romanae," c. 15.
(Krause, Vitae et Fragmenta, Veterum Historiarum Romanorum, p. 127, &c.)

19. Sp. Postumius Albinus Magnus, was consul b.c. 148, in which year a great fire happened at Rome. (Obseq. 78.) It is this Sp.
Albinus, of whom Cicero speaks in the Brutus (c.
25), and says that there were many orations of his.

probably son of No. 19, was consul b.c. 110, and obtained the province of Numidia to carry on the war against Jugurtha. He made vigorous preparations for war, but when he reached the province, he did not adopt any active measures, but allowed himself to be deceived by the artifices of Jugurtha, who constantly promised to surrender. Many persons supposed that his inactivity was intentional, and that Jugurtha had bought him over. When Albinus departed from Africa, he left his brother Aulus in command. [See No. 21.] After the defeat of the latter he returned to Numidia, but in consequence of the disorganised state of his army, he did not prosecute the war, and handed over the army in this condition, in the following year, to the consul Metellus. (Sall. Jug. 35, 39, 44; Oros. iv. 20; Eutrop. iv. 26.) He was condemned by the Mamilla Lex, which was passed to punish all those who had been guilty of treason-able practices with Jugurtha. (Cic. Brut. 34; comp. Sall. Jug. 40.)

21. A. Postumius Albinus, brother of No. 20, and probably son of No. 19, was left by his bro-er as pro-consul, in command of the army in Africa in b.c. 110. [See No. 20.] He marched to besiege Suthal, where the treasures of Jugurtha were deposited; but Jugurtha, under the promise of giving him a large sum of money, induced him to lead his army into a retired place, where he was suddenly attacked by the Numidian king, and only saved his troops from total destruction
by allowing them to pass under the yoke, and under-taking to leave Numidia in ten days. (Sall.
Jug. 36—38.)

22. A. Postumius A. F. A. n. Albinus, grandson of No. 19, and probably son of No. 21, was consul
b.c. 99, with M. Antonius. (Plin. H. N.
vi. 7; Obseq. 106.) Gellius (iv. 6) quoted the words of a senatusconsultum passed in their consulship in consequence of the spears of Mars having moved. Cicero says that he was a good speaker.
(Brut. 35, post Red. ad Quir. 5.)
The following coin is supposed by Eckhel (vol.
p. 288) and others to refer to this Albinus. On one side is the head of a female with the letters HISPAN, which may perhaps have reference to the victory which his ancestor L. Albinus obtained in Spain. [See No. 15.] On the other side a man ALBINUS.

is represented stretching out his hand to an eagle, a military standard, and behind him are the fasces with the axe. On it are the letters A. POST. A. F. N. S. ARIN (so on the coin, instead of ALBIN.). On the coins of the Postumus gens the praenomen Spurius is always written s. and not sp.

23. A. POSTUMIUS ALBINUS, a person of praetorian rank, commanded the fleet, n. c. 69, in the Marseis war, and was killed by his own soldiers under the plea that he meditated treachery, but in reality on account of his cruelty. Sulla, who was then a legate of the consul Porcius Cato, incorporated his troops with his own, but did not punish the offenders. (Liv. Epit. 75; Plut. Sulla, 6.)

24. A. POSTUMIUS ALBINUS was placed by Caesar over Sicily, n. c. 48. (Appian, B. C. ii. 48.)

25. D. JUNIUS BRUTUS ALBINUS, adopted by No. 32, is commemorated in the annexed coin, where Brutus is called ALBINUS BRVTI. P. [BRUTUS.]

ALBINUS, procurator of Judæa, in the reign of Nero, about A. D. 63 and 64, succeeded Festus, and was guilty of almost every kind of crime in his government. He pardoned the vilest criminals for money, and shamelessly plundered the provincials. He was succeeded by Florus. (Joseph. Ant. Jud. xx. 8. § 1; Bell. Jud. ii. 14. § 1.) The LUCIUS ALBINUS mentioned below may possibly have been the same person.

ALBINUS ('Albinos), a Platonic philosopher, who lived at Smyrna and was a contemporary of Galen. (Galen, vol. iv. p. 372, ed. Basili.) A short tract by him, entitled Συμφωνία σις τοῦ Πλατανοῦ Διάλογος, has come down to us, and is published in the second volume (p. 44) of the first edition of Fabricius; but omitted in the reprint by Harles, because it is to be found prefixed to Eveillé's edition of three dialogues of Plato, Oxon. 1771; and to Fisher's four dialogues of Plato, Lips. 1783. It contains hardly anything of importance. After explaining the nature of the Dialogue, which he compares to a Drama, the writer goes on to divide the Dialogues of Plato into four classes, Λύρικος, Ἐρωτικός, Γνωσικός, and mentions another division of them into Tetralogies, according to their subjects. He advises that the Alcibiades, Phaedo, Republic, and Timæus, should be read in a series.

The authorities respecting Albinus have been collected by Fabricius. (Bild. Graec. iii. p. 658.) He is said to have written a work on the arrangement of the writings of Plato. Another Albinus is mentioned by Boethius and Cassiodorus, who wrote in Latin com works on music and geometry.

ALBINUS, CLODIUS, whose full name was Decimus Clodius Ceiomius Septimius Albinus, the son of Ceiomius Postumus and Aurelia Messalina, was born at Drusumetum in Africa; but the year of his birth is not known. According to his father's statement (Capitol. Clod. Albin. 4), he received the name of Albinus on account of the extraordinary whiteness of his body. Shewing great disposition for a military life, he entered the army at an early age and served with great distinction, especially during the rebellion of Avidius Cassius against the emperor Marcus Aurelius, in a. d. 175. His merits were acknowledged by the emperor in two letters (ib. 10) in which he calls Albinus the man whose worthy services had made him the most excellent general in the empire. He met the equal forces of Severus at Lugdunum, where Brutus is called ALBINUS BRVTI. P. [BRUTUS.]

After the death of Pertinax, Didius Julianus purchased the throne by bribing the praetorians; but immediately afterwards, C. Pescennius Niger proclaimed himself emperor by the legions in Syria, L. Septimius Severus by the troops in Illyricum and Pannonia, and Albinus by the armies in Britain and Gaul. Julianus having been put to death by order of the senate, who dreaded the power of Septimius Severus, the latter turned his arms against Pescennius Niger. With regard to Albinus, we must believe that Severus made a provisional arrangement with him, conferring upon him the title of Caesar, and holding with him the consulate in A. D. 194. But after the defeat and death of Niger in A. D. 194, and the complete discomfite of his adherents, especially after the fall of Byzantium in A. D. 196, Severus resolved to make himself the absolute master of the Roman empire. Albinus seeing the danger of his position, which had increased by his indiscretion, prepared for resistance. He had narrow escape escaping assassination by a messenger of Severus (ib. 7, 8), whereupon he put himself at the head of his army, which is said to have consisted of 150,000 men. He met the equal forces of Severus at Lugdunum (Lyons), in Gaul, and there fought with him on the 19th of February, 197 (Spartian. Sever. 11), a bloody battle, in which he was at first victorious, but at last was entirely defeated, and lost his life and destroyed, and the adherents of Albinus were treated by Severus, who sent his head to Rome, having been made a prisoner. His body was ill

ALBUCIUS, a physician at Rome, who lived probably about the beginning or middle of the first century after Christ, and who is mentioned by Pliny (H. N. xxix. 5) as having gained by his practice the annual income of two hundred and fifty thousand sesterces (about 1953L. 2s. od.). This is considered by Pliny to be a very large sum, and may therefore give us some notion of the fortunes made by physicians at Rome about the beginning of the empire. [W. A. C.]

T. ALBUCIUS or ALBUTIUS, finished his studies at Athens at the latter end of the second century B.C., and belonged to the Epirote sect. He was well acquainted with Greek literature, or rather, says Cicero, was almost a Greek. (Brut. 35.) On account of his affecting on every occasion the Greek language and philosophy, he was satirized by Lucilius, whose lines upon him are preserved by Cicero (de Fin. i. 3); and Cicero himself speaks of him as a light-minded man. He accused, but unsuccessfully, Q. Mucius Scaevola, the augur, of maladministration (repetundae) in his province. (Brut. 26, De Orat. ii. 70.) In s. c. 105 Albinus was prætor in Sardinia, and in consequence of some insignificant success which he had gained over some robbers, he celebrated a triumph in the province. On his return to Rome, he was applied to the senate for the honour of a supplicatio, but this was refused, and he was accused in b. c. 103 of repetundae by C. Julius Caesar, and condemned. Cn. Pompeius Strabo had offered himself as the accuser, but he was not allowed to conduct the prosecution, because he had been the quasarius of Albinus. (De Prov. Cons. 7, in Pisone, 38, Div. in Cassell. 19, de Off. ii. 14.) After his condemnation, he retired to Athens and pursued the study of philosophy. (Tusc. v. 57.) He left behind him some orations, which had been read by Cicero. (Brut. 35.) Varro (de Re Rust. iii. 2. § 17) speaks of some satires by L. Albius written in the style of Lucilius; he appears to be the same person as Titius.

C. ALBUCIUS SILAS. [SILAS.]

ALBUS OVIDIUS JUVENTINUS. [JUVENTINUS.]

ALCAEUS. (Αλκαίος.) 1. A son of Perses and Andromeda, and married to Hippomone, the daughter of Menoeceus of Thebes, by whom he became the father of Amphtrion and Anaxo. (Apollod. ii. 4. § 5; Schol. ad Eurip. Hecub. 886.) According to Pananias (viii. 14. § 2) his wife's name was Laomone, a daughter of the Arcadian Gunes, or Lysidice, a daughter of Pelops.

2. According to Diodorus (i. 14) the original name of Heracles, given him on account of his descent from Alcaeus, the son of Perses. [HERACLES.]

3. A son of Heracles by a female slave of Jaron, from whom the dynasty of the Herclidæ in Lydia were believed to be descended. (Herod. i. 77; Dict. in v. 81) calls this son of Heracles Cisclus. (Comp. Hellanicus, ap. Stephan. Byz. s. v. Αλκαίος; Wesseling, ad Dict. i. c.)

4. According to Diodorus (v. 79) a general of Rhadamanthis, who presented him with the island.
of Paros. Apollodoros (ii. 5. § 9) relates that he was a son of Androgous (the son of Minos) and brother of Sthoeneus, and that when Hercules, on his expedition to fetch the girdle of Ares, which was in the possession of the queen of the Amazons, arrived at Paros, some of his companions were slain by the sons of Minos, residing there. Hercules, in his anger, slew the descendants of Minos, except Alcaeus and Sthoeneus, whom he took with him, and to whom he afterwards assigned the island of Thasus as their habitation. [L. S.]

ALCAEUS (Ἀλκαίος), of Messene, the author of a number of epigrams in the Greek anthology, from some of which his date may be easily fixed. He was contemporary with Philip III., king of Macedonia, and son of Demetrius, against whom several of his epigrams are pointed, apparently from patriotic feelings. One of these epigrams, however, gave even more offence to the Romans than to Philip, on account of the author's ascribing the victory of Cynocephalae to the Aetolians as much as to the Romans. Philip contended himself with writing an epigram in reply to that of Alcaeus, in which he gave the Messenians a very broad hint of the fate he might expect if he fell into his hands. (Pint. c. 833.)

Messenian a very broad hint of the fate he might expect if he fell into his hands. (Pint. c. 833.)

Alcaeus, therefore, gave even more offence to the Romans than to Philip, on account of the author's ascribing the victory of Cynocephalae to the Aetolians as much as to the Romans. Philip contended himself with writing an epigram in reply to that of Alcaeus, in which he gave the Messenians a very broad hint of the fate he might expect if he fell into his hands. (Pint. c. 833.)

In another epigram, in praise of Flamininus, the mention of the Roman general's name, Titus, led his friends to warlike deeds, and his house is described by himself as furnished with the weapons of war rather than with the instruments of peace. (Pint. c. 833.) He is described by himself as furnished with the weapons of war rather than with the instruments of peace. (Pint. c. 833.)

Alcaeus, however, was summoned to war by ancient writers as a brave and skilful warrior. (Anthol. Palat. ix. 184.)

Alcaeus, however, was summoned to war by ancient writers as a brave and skilful warrior. (Anthol. Palat. ix. 184.)

Of the twenty-two epigrams in the Greek Anthology which bear the name of "Alcaeus," two have the word "Mytileneus" added to it; but Jacobs seems to be perfectly right in taking this to be the addition of some ignorant copyist. Others bear the name of "Alcaeus Messenius," and some of Alcaeus alone. But in the last class there are several which must, from internal evidence, have been written by Alcaeus of Messene, and, in fact, there seems no reason to doubt his being the author of the whole twenty-two.

The above are mentioned as contemporaries of Alcaeus, two other persons of the same name, one of them an Epicurean philosopher, who was expelled from Rome by a decree of the senate about 173 or 154 B.C. (Perizon. ad Alex. V. II. ix. 23; Athen. xii. p. 547, a.; Suidas, s. v. Erotraios): the other is incidentally spoken of by Polybius as being accustomed to ridicule the grammarian Isocrates. (Polyb. xxxii. 6; n. 160.) It is just possible that these two persons, of whom nothing further is known, may have been identical with each other, and with the epigrammatist.

(Jacobs, Anthol. Graec. xiii. pp. 626, 628; there is a reference to Alcaeus of Messene in Eusebius, Praep. Evang. x. 2.)

Pittacus (Pit. s. v. Mytilene), of Mytilene, who is called the son of Aegisthus, named Alcaeus by his father, to whom Pittacus was dedicated at the sacrifice of his own name, was a son of Androgeus (the son of Minos) and Antimachus. He was a contemporary of Alcaeus, and, indeed, was at first a supporter of the party of Pittacus. (Euseb. Chron. i. 76; Valer. Max. iv. 1. § 6.) Alcaeus has not escaped the suspicion of being moved by personal ambition in his opposition to Pittacus. (Strab. xiii. p. 617.)

When Alcaeus and Antimachus perceived that all hope of their restoration to Mytilene was gone, they travelled over different countries. Alcaeus visited Egypt (Strab. i. p. 37).
and he appears to have written poems in which his adventures by sea were described. (Hor. Carm. ii. 13, 28.) Alcaeus was a native of Mytilene, and not of king of Babylon, and performed an exploit which was celebrated by Alcaeus. (Strab. xiii. p. 617, Fr. 33, p. 433, Blomf.) Nothing is known of the life of Alcaeus after this period; but from the political state of Mytilene it is most probable that he died in exile.

Among the nine principal lyric poets of Greece some ancient writers assign the first place, others the second, to Alcaeus. 11 is writings present to us the

The poetry of Alcaeus is always impassioned.
Not only with him, but with the Aeolic school in general, poetry was not a mere art, but the plain and warm outpouring of the writer's inmost feelings.
The metres of Alcaeus were generally lively, and his poems seem to have been constructed in short single strophes, in all of which the corresponding lines were of the same metre, as in the odes of Horace. He is said to have invented the well-known Aeolic strophe.

His likeness is preserved, together with that of Pittacus, on a brass coin of Mytilene in the Royal Museum at Paris, which is engraved by Visconti.

ALCAEUS (Ἀλκαίος), the son of Mecus, was a native of MYTIILENE, according to Suidas, who may, however, have confounded him in this point with the lyric poet. He is found exhibiting at Athens as a poet of the old comedy, or rather of that mixed comedy, which formed the transition between the old and the middle. In n. c. 386, brought forward a play entitled Πάσκει, in the same contest in which Aristophanes exhibited his second Plutus, but, if the meaning of Suidas is rightly understood, he obtained only the fifth place. He left ten plays, of which some frag¬ ments remain, and the following titles are known, Ἀδελφαι μαχηταί, Παμελησία, Ενδομαχία, Ἰσραήλ, γαμός, Καλλονέ, Καμαρντγεδία, Παλαιόντα.

Alcaeus, a tragic poet, mentioned by Fabricius (Biblioth. Graec. ii. p. 282), does not appear to be a different person from Alcaeus the comedian.
The mistake of calling a tragic poet a prose simply from an erroneous reading of the title of his "Comedae-tragoeid." (The Greek Argument to the Plutus; Suidas, ii. 13. Pollux, x. 1; Cassonath on Athen. iii. p.
206; Meineke, Fragm. Concis. Graece. i. p. 244,

Dichtkunst der Hellenen, ii. p. 386.)

[PS.]

ALCAMENES (Ἀλκαμένης), king of Sparta, 10th of the Agids, son of Teleclus, commanded, according to Pausanias, in the night-expedition against Amphiara, which commenced the first Messemian war, but died before its 4th year.
This would fix the 38 years assigned him by Apollodorus, about 779 to 742 B. C. In his reign Helos was taken, a place near one mouth of the Eurotas, the last independent hold most likely of the small Achaean population, and the supposed origin of the term Helot. (Paus. iii. 2. § 7, iv. 4. § 3. § 5. 8. 9; Herod. vii. 204; Plut. Apophth. Les.) [A. H. C.]

ALCAMENES (Ἀλκαμένης), the son of Stheniades, whom Agis appointed as harmost of the Lesbians, when they wished to revolt from the Athenians in n. c. 412. When Alcamenes put to sea with twenty-one ships to sail to Chios, he was pursued by the Athenians fleet off the Isthmus of Corinth, and driven on shore. The Athenians attacked the ships when on shore, and Alcamenes killed in the engagement. (Thuc. viii. 5. 10.)

ALCAMENES (Ἀλκαμένης), a distinguished stationary and sculptor, a native of Athens. (Plim.
H. N. xxxvi. 5. 6. 4.) Suidas (s. s.) calls him a sculptor. (Hence Alcamenes he means the artist.)
This K. O. Müller (Arch. der Kunst, p. 96) inter¬ pret to mean that he was a cleruchs, or holder of one of the κληρον in Lemnos. Voss, who is followed by Thiersch (Epochen der bild. Kunst, p.
130), conjectured that the true reading is Ἀλκαμ🏻, and accordingly that Alcamenes was born in the district called the Alaeus, which is in some degree confirmed by his having made a statue of Dionysus in gold and ivory to adorn a temple of that god in the Lemeum, a part of the Limae. (Paus. i. 20. § 2.) He was the most famous of the pupils of Phidias, but was not so close an imitator of his master as Agoracritus. Like his fellow-pupil, he exercised his talent chiefly in making statues of the deities. By ancient writers he is ranked amongst the most distinguished artists, and is considered by Pausanias second only to Phidias. (Quintil. xii. 10. § 8; Dionys. De Dometh. acoum. vol. vi. p. 1108, ed. Reliske; Paus. v. 10. § 2.) He flourished from about 01. 84 (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19) to 01. 104 (v. c. 440-400). Pliny's date is confirmed by his having made a statue of Dionysus which is in some degree admired. It has been supposed by some that this statue, intended to the dignity of decurio and duumvir in some municipality. He perhaps exercised the art of carving as an amateur. (Winckelmann, viii. 4, 5.)

ALCANTARIS. There are three mythical personages of this name, who are mentioned respectively in Hom. Il. v. 678; Virg. Aen. ix. 766; Antonin. Lib. 14. A female Alcandra occurs in the Od. iv. 125. [L. S.]

ALCANDER (Ἀλκάνδηρ), a young Spartan, who attacked Lycurgus and thrust out one of his eyes, when his fellow-citizens were discontented with the laws he proposed. His mangled face, however, produced shame and repentance in his enemies, and they delivered up Alcander to him to be punished as he thought fit. But Lycurgus pardoned his outrage, and thus converted him into one of his warmest friends. (Plut. Lyg. 11; Aelian, F. H. ii. 23; Val. Max. v. 2 § ext. 2.)

ALCATHOE or ALCITHOE (Ἀλκαθοῦ or Ἀλκιθοῦ), a daughter of Minyas, and sister of Leucippus and Aristeippe. Instead of Aristeippe, Aelian (F. H. iii. 42) calls the latter Aristippe, and Plutarch (Quast. Gr. 38) Arsinoe. At the time when the worship of Dionysus was introduced into Boeotia, and while the other women and maidens were revelling and ranging over the mountains in Bacchic joy, these two sisters alone remained at home, devoting themselves to their usual occupations, and thus profaning the days sacred to the god. Dionysus punished them by changing them into bats, and their work into vines. (Ov. Met. iv. 1-40, 390-415.) Plutarch, Aelian, and Antoninus Liberalis, though with some differences in the detail, relate that Dionysus appeared to the sisters in the form of a maiden, and invited them to partake in the Dionysiac mysteries. When this request was not complied with, the god metamorphosed himself successively into a bull, a lion, and a panther, and the sisters were seized with madness. In this state they were eager to honour the god, and Leucippus, who was chosen by lot to offer a sacrifice to Dionysus, gave up her own son Hippasus to be torn to pieces. In extreme Baccic frenzy the sisters now rommed over the mountains, until at last Hermes changed them into birds. Plutarch adds that down to his time the men of Orchomenos descended from that family were called φωλεῖς, that is, mourners, and the women δεία or ιδεία, that is, the destroyers. In what manner the neglect of the Dionysic worship on the part of Alcaitho and her sister was atoned for every year at the festival of the Agrionia, see Dict. of Ant. s. v. Ἀριστίππη; comp. Buttmann, Mythol. ii. p. 201, 4c.

ALCATHOUS (Ἀλκαθώους). 1. A son of Pelops and Hippodameia, brother of Atreus and Thyestes, first married Pyrgo and afterwards Enaechme, and was the father of Echeropolis, Callipolis, Iphinoea, Periboea, and Automedusa. (Paus. ii. 30. § 2, i. 24. § 3; and a bronze statue of a victor in the Pentathlon. (Plin. xxxiv. 8. s. 10.) A story of very doubtful credibility is told by Tzetzes (Chl. viii. 103), that Alcamenes and Phidias contended in making a statue of Athene, and that before the statues were erected in their destined elevated position, that of Alcamenes was the most admired on account of its delicate finish; but that, when set up, the effect of the more strongly defined features in that of Phidias caused the Athenians to change their opinion. On a Roman anaglyph in the villa Albani there is the following inscription: Q. Lollius Alcamenes.

DEC. ET DUVMVIL. If this contains the name of the artist, he would seem to have been a descendant of an Alcamenes, who had been the slave and afterwards the freedman of one of the Leucipp family, and to have attained to the dignity of decurio and duumvir in some municipality. He perhaps exercised the art in this work he was said to have been assisted by Apollo, and the stone, upon which the god used to place his lyre while he was at work, was even in late times believed, when struck, to give forth a sound similar to that of a lyre. (Paus. i. 42 § 1; Ov. Met. viii. 15, &c.; Virg. Aen. 195; Theogn. 731.) Echecpolis, one of the sons of Alcathous, was killed during the Calydonian hunt in Aetolia, and when his brother Callipolis hastened to carry the sad tidings to his father, he found him engaged in offering a sacrifice to Apollo, and thinking it unfit to offer sacrifices at such a moment, he snatched away the wood from the altar. Alcathous imagining this to be an act of sacrilegious wantonness, killed his son on the spot with a piece of wood. (Paus. i. 42 § 7.) The acropolis of Megara was called by a name derived from that of Alcathous. (i. 42 § 7.)

2. A son of Porthon and Euryte, who was slain by Tydeus. (Apollod. i. 7 § 10, 8 § 5; Diod. iv. 65.)

3. A son of Acyætes and husband of Hippodameia, the daughter of Anchises and sister of Aeacus, who was educated in his house. (Hom. H. xiii. 466.) In the war of Troy he was one of the Trojan leaders, and was one of the handsomest and brallest among them. (H. xiii. 93, xiii. 427.) He was slain by Idomeneus with the assistance of Poseidon, who struck Alcathous with blindness and paralyzed his limbs so that he could not flee. (H. xiii. 433, &c.)—Another personage of this name is mentioned by Virgil, Aen. x. 747. [L. S.]

ALCEIDES (Ἀλκείδης), according to some accounts the name which Heracles originally bore (Apollod. ii. 4 § 12), while, according to Diodorus, his original name was ALCATUS. [L. S.]

ALCESTIS or ALCESTE (Ἀλκέστις or Ἀλκεστέη), a daughter of Pelias and Anaxibia, and mother of Eumelus and Admetus. (Apollod. i. 9 § 10, 15.) Homer (H. ii. 715) calls her the fairest among the daughters of Pelias. When Admetus, king of Phœae, sued for her hand, Pelias, in order to get rid of the numerous suitors, declared that he would give his daughter to him only who should come to his court in a chariot drawn by lions and hores. This was accomplished by Admetus, with the aid of Apollo. For the further story, see ADMETUS. The sacrifice of herself for Admetus was highly celebrated in antiquity. (Aelian, V. H. xiv. 45, Animal. i. 15; Philost. Her. ii. 4; Ov. Ars Am. iii. 19; Eurip. Alcestis.) Towards her father, too, she showed her filial affection, for, at least, according to Diodorus (iv. 52; comp. however, Palseph. De incredib. 41), she did not share in the crime of her sisters, who murdered their father.

Ancient as well as modern critics have attempted to explain the return of Alcestis to life in a rationalistic manner, by supposing that during a severe sickness she was restored to life by a physician of the name of Heracles. (Palseph. i. c.; Plut. Ama- tor. 79.) Alcestis was represented on the chest of Cyraus, in a group showing the funeral solemnities of Pelias. (Paus. v. 17 § 4.) In the museum of Florence there is an alto relievo, the little earlier. His father fell at Coronea b. c. 447, leaving Alcibiades and a younger son. (Plut. Perioch. 329 a.) The last campaign of the war with Potidaea was in b. c. 429. Now as Alcibiades served in this war, and the young Athenians were not sent out on foreign military service before they ALCETAS I. (Ἀλκέτας), king of Epirus, was the son of Tharypus. For some reason or other, which we are not informed of, he was expelled from his kingdom, and took refuge with the elder Dionysius, tyrant of Syracuse, by whom he was reinstated. After his restoration we find him the ally of the Athenians, and of Jason, the Targus of Thessaly. In b. c. 373, he appeared at Athens with Jason, for the purpose of defending Timotheus, who, through their influence, was acquitted. On his death the kingdom, which till then had been governed by one king, was divided between his two sons, Neoptolemus and Arynbas. Diodorus (xii. 38) calls him Arynbas. (Paus. i. 11 § 3; Dem. Timoth. pp. 1187, 1190; Diod. xv. 13. 36.) [C. P. M.]

ALCETAS II., king of Epirus, was the son of Arynbas, and grandson of Alcetas I. On account of his ungovernable temper, he was banished by his father, who appointed his younger son, Aecides, to succeed him. On the death of Aecides, who was killed in a battle fought with Cassander b. c. 313, the Epivots recalled Alcetas. Cassander sent an army against him under the command of Lucius, but the latter entered into an alliance with him (b. c. 312). The Epivots, incensed at the outrages of Alcetas, rose against him and put him to death, together with his two sons; on which Pyrrhus, the son of Aecides, was placed upon the throne by his protector Glaneus, king of the Illyrians, b. c. 307. (Paus. i. 11 § 5; Diod. xii. 38, 89; Plut. Pyrrh. 3.) [C. P. M.]

ALCETAS (Ἀλκέτας), the eighth king of MACEDONIA, counting from Caramus, and the fifth, counting from Perdiccas, reigned, according to Eusebius, twenty-nine years. He was the father of Amyntas I., who reigned in the latter part of the sixth century b. c. (Herod. viii. 139.)

ALCETAS (Ἀλκέτας), the brother of Perdiccas and son of Orontes, is first mentioned as one of Alexander's generals in his Indian expedition. (Arrian, iv. 27.) On the death of Alexander, he espoused his brother's party, and, at his orders, murdered in b. c. 322 Cyanus, the half-sister of Alexander, or the woman entered into an alliance with him (b. c. 312). The Epivots, incensed at the outrages of Alcetas, rose against him and put him to death, together with his two sons; on which Pyrrhus, the son of Aecides, was placed upon the throne by his protector Glaneus, king of the Illyrians, b. c. 307. (Paus. i. 11 § 5; Diod. xii. 38, 89; Plut. Pyrrh. 3.) [C. P. M.]

(Herod, vi. 131; Isocr. 10; Boeckh, unless we suppose Demosthenes to have confounded the mother of Aleibiades was the daughter of Hippocrates; (Plat. Alloc. l. p. 121.), and through him from Aeacus and Zeus. His mother, Deinomache, was the daughter of Megascles, the head of the house of the Alcmaeonids. Thus on both sides he had hereditary claims on the attachment of the people; for his paternal grandfather, Alcibiades, took a prominent part in the expulsion of the Peisistratids (Iscrat. De Btg. 10), and his mother was descended from Cleisthenes, the friend of the commonalty. His father Cleinias did good service in the Persian war. He fitted out and manned a trireme at his own expense, and greatly distinguished himself in the battle of Artemisium. (Herod. vii. 17.) One of his ancestors of the name of Cleinias earned a less enviable notoriety by taking fraudulent advantage of the Seisachtheia of Solon. The name Alcibiades was of Laconian origin (Thucus. vi. 6), and was derived from the Spartan family to which the ephor Endius belonged, with which of that of Alcibiades had been anciently connected by the ties of hospitality. The first who bore the name was the grandfather of the great Alcibiades.

On the death of his father (b. c. 447), Alcibiades was left to the guardianship of his relations Pericles and Ariphron. Zopyrus, the Thracian, is mentioned as one of his instructors. (Plat. Alloc. l. p. 122.) From his very boyhood he exhibited signs of that indestructible determination which marked him throughout life. He was at every period of his life remarkable for the extraordinary beauty of his person, of which he seems to have been exceedingly vain. Even when on military service he carried a shield inlaid with gold and ivory, and bearing the device of Zeus hurling the thunderbolt. When he grew up, he earned a disgraceful notoriety by his amours and debaucheries. At the age of 16 he entered upon the possession of his fortune, which had doubtless been carefully husbanded during his long minority by his guardians. Connected as he was with the most influential families in the city, the inheritor of one of the largest fortunes in Athens (to which he afterwards received a large accession through his marriage with Hipparcte, the daughter of Hippocrates), gifted with a mind of singular veracit, and that his father was connected with the noblest families of Athens. Through his father he traced his descent from Euryuces, the son of Ajax (Plat. Alloc. l. p. 121), and through him from Aeacus and Zeus. (herod. vi. 131; Isocr. De Btg. 10; Bocchh, Euphie. ad Pind. Pyth. vii. p. 392.)

He received a portion of 10 talents with his wife, which was to be doubled on the birth of a son. His marriage took place before the battle of Delium (b. c. 424), in which Hippocrates was slain. (Andoc. Alloc. p. 30.)
Before b. c. 420, he had carried a decree for increasing the tribute paid by the subject allies of Athens, and by his management it was raised to double the amount fixed by Aristides. After the death of Cleon there was no rival able at all to cope with Alcibiades except Nicias. To the political views of the latter, who was anxious for peace and repose and averse to all plans of foreign conquests, Alcibiades was completely opposed, and his jealousy of the influence and high character of his rival, led him to entertain a very cordial dislike towards him. On one occasion only do we find them united in purpose and feeling, and that was when Hyperbolus threatened one of them with banishment. On this they united their influence, and Hyperbolus himself was exiled. The date of this occurrence is uncertain.

Alcibiades had been desirous of renewing those ties of hospitality by which his family had been connected with Sparta, but which had been broken off by his grandfather. With this view he vied with Nicias in his good offices towards the Spartan prisoners taken in Sphacteria; but in the negotiations which ended in the peace of 421, the Spartans preferred employing the intervention of Nicias and Laches. Incensed at this slight, Alcibiades threw all his influence into the opposite scale, and in b. c. 430, after tricking the Spartan ambassadors who had come for the purpose of thwarting his plans, brought about an alliance with Argos, Elis, and Mantinea. In 419 he was chosen Strategos, and at the head of a small Athenian force marched into Peloponnesus, and it various ways furthered the interests of the new confederacy. During the next three years he took a prominent part in the complicated negotiations and military operations which were carried on. Whether or not he was the instigator of the unjust expedition against the Melians is not clear; but he was at any rate the author of the decree for their barbarous punishment, and himself purchased a Melian woman, by whom he had a son.

In b. c. 415 Alcibiades appears as the foremost among the advocates of the Sicilian expedition (Thuc. vi.), which his ambition led him to believe would be a step towards the conquest of Italy, Carthage, and the Peloponnesus. (Thuc. vi. 90.) While the preparations for the expedition were going on, there occurred the mysterious mutilation of the hermae. In b. c. 407, he returned to Athens, where he was received with great enthusiasm. The records of the proceedings against him were sunk in the sea, and the oligarchs, however, failed to perform his promises with respect to Tissaphernes, and conscious that he had at heart no real liking for an avowed enemy of his country; disclosed to the Spartan government. He now appeared as the instigator of the unjust expedition against the Melians is not clear; but he was at any rate the author of the decree for their barbarous punishment, and himself purchased a Melian woman, by whom he had a son.

to his fortified domain at Bisanthe in the Thracian Chersonesus. He collected a band of mercenaries, and made war on the neighbouring Thracian tribes, by which means he considerably enriched himself, and afforded protection to the neighbouring Greek cities. Before the fatal battle of Agesopotami (v. c. 463), he gave an ineffectual warning to the Athenian generals. After the establishment of the tyranny of the Thirty (v. c. 404), he was condemned to banishment. Upon this he took refuge with Pharnabazus, and was about to proceed to the court of Artaxerxes, when one night his house was surrounded by a band of armed men, and set on fire. He rushed out sword in hand, but fell, pierced with arrows. (v. c. 404.) According to Diodorus and Ephorus (Diod. xiv. 11) the assassins were emissaries of Pharnabazus, who had been led to this step either by his own jealousy of Alcibiades, or by the instigation of the Spartans.

It is more probable that they were either employed by the Spartans, or (according to one account in Plutarch) by the brothers of a lady whom Alcibiades had seduced. His corpse was taken up and buried by his mistress Timandra. Athcnacus (b. c. 404.) according to Diodorus and Ephorus (Diod. xiv. 11) by the Athenian fleet, under Paches, as far as Patmos. Diosippe lived in the time of Alexander the Great. (Aelian, V. H. x. 22; Diod. xvii. 160; Athen. vi. p. 251, &c.) Alcimachus therefore probably lived about the same time. [C. P. M.]

ALCI'EMEA (Ἀλκήμηδα), a daughter of Phylaucus and Clymene, the daughter of Minyas. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 45; Schol. ad loc. and ad i. 230.) She married Aeason, by whom she became the mother of Jason (Ov. Herod. iv. 105; Hygin. Fab. 15 and 14), who, however, is called by others a son of Polyneices, Arce, or Scarpe. (Apollod. i. 9, § 8; comp. Aeson, Jason.) [L. S.]

ALCI'MEDON (Ἀλκίμηδων). 1. An Arcadian hero, from whom the Arcadian plain Alcimachus derived its name. He was the father of Philo, by whom Heracles begot a son, Aechmacoras, whom Alcimachus exposed, but Heracles saved. (Paus. viii. 12, § 2.) [ARCHIMAGORAS.]

2. One of the Tyrrhenian sailors, who wanted to carry off the infant Dionysus from Naxos, but was metamorphosed, with his companions, into a dolphin. (Ov. Met. iii. 618; Hygin. Fab. 194; comp. ACORDES.)

3. A son of Laerceua, and one of the commanders of the Myrmidons under Patroclus. (Hom. II. xvi. 197, xvii. 475. &c.) [L. S.]

ALCI'MEDON, an embassador or chaser, spoken of by Virgil (Elogi. iii. 37, 44), who mentions some goblets of his workmanship. [C. P. M.]

ALCI'MENES (Ἀλκίμηνες). 1. A son of Glauce, who was unintentionally killed by his brother Bellerophon. According to some traditions, this brother of Bellerophon was called Deliaxes, or Peiren. (Apollod. ii. 3, § 1.)

2. One of the sons of Jason and Medeia. When Jason subsequently wanted to marry Glauce, his sons Alcimenes and Tisander were murdered by Medeia, and were afterwards buried by Jason in the sanctuary of Hera at Corinth. (Diod. iv. 54, 55.) [L. S.]

ALCI'MENES (Ἀλκίμηνες), an Athenian comic poet, apparently a contemporary of Aeschylus. One of his pieces is supposed to have been the Καλέμενας (the Female Swimmers). His works were greatly admired by Tymichus, a younger contemporary of Aeschylus.

There was a tragic writer of the same name, a native of Megara, mentioned by Suidas. (Meineke, Hist. Crit. Compositor Graec. p. 481; Suid. s. v. [Ἀλκίμηνες and [Ἀλκίμως])

AL'CI'MUS (Ἀλκίμος), also called Jacimus, or Joachim (Ἰαχίμος), one of the Jewish priests, who espoused the Syrian cause. He was made high priest by Demetrius, about B. C. 161, and was installed in his office by the help of a Syrian army. In consequence of his cruelties he was expelled by the Jews, and obliged to fly to Antioch, but was restored by the help of another Syrian army. He continued in his office, under the protection of the Syrians, till his death, which happened suddenly (n. c. 185) while he was pulling down the wall of the temple that divided the court of the Gentiles from that of the Israelites. (Joseph. Ant. Jud. xii. 3, § 7; 1 Macc. vii. ix.)

AL'CIMUS (Ἀλκίμος), a Greek rhetorician whom Diogenes Laertius (ii. 114) calls the most distinguished of all Greek rhetoricians, flourished about B. C. 300. It is not certain whether he is the same as the Alcimus to whom Diogenes in another passage (iii. 9) ascribes a work πρὸς Ἀθηναύς. Athenaeus in several places speaks of a Si-ellian Alcimus, who appears to have been the author of a great historical work, parts of which are referred to under the names of Ἰουλίακος and Σεκλακά. But whether he was the same as the rhetorician Alcimus, cannot be determined. (Athen. x. p. 441, xii. p. 518, vii. p. 322.) [L. S.]

AL'CIMUS (Ἀλκίμος) ALETHIUS, the writer of seven short poems in the Latin anthology. When Wernus has shown (Post. Lat. Misc. i. p. 26, &c.) to be the same person as Alcimus, the rhetorician in Aquitania, in Gaul, who is spoken of in terms of high praise by Sidonius Apollinarius, (Epist. vii. 11, v. 10.) and Ausonius, (Prose. Baudry. i.) his date is determined by Hieronymus in his Chronicon, who says that Alcimus and Delphidius taught in Aquitania in A.D. 360. His poems are superior to most of his time. They are printed by Meier, in his "Anthologia Latina," ep. 254—260, and by Wernus, vol. vi. p. 194, &c.

AL'CINOUS (Ἀλκίνοος). 1. A son of Nausithous, and grandson of Poseidon. His name is celebrated in the story of the Argonauts, and still more in that of the wanderings of Odysseus. In the former Alcimus is represented as living with his queen Arete in the island of Drapean. The Argonauts, on their return from Colchis, came to his island, and were most hospitably received. When the Colchians, in their pursuit of the Argonauts, likewise arrived in Drapean, and demanded that Medeia should be delivered up to them, Alcimus declared that if she was still a maiden she should be restored to them, but if she was already the wife of Jason, he would protect her and her husband against the Colchians. The Colchians were obliged, by the contrivance of Arete, to depart without their prince, and the Argonauts continued their voyage homewards, after they had received munificent presents from Alcimus. (Apollon. Rhod. iv. 990-1225; Orph. Argon. 1288, &c.; Apollod. i. 9, § 25, 26.) According to Homer, Alcimus is the happy ruler of the Phœacians in the island of Scheria, who has by Arete five sons and one daughter, Nausicaa, (Od. vi. 12, &c., 62, &c.) The description of his island, and his queen Arete, is made in Odysseus, and shows that Odysseus is received, the entertainments given to him, and the stories he related to the king about his own wanderings, occupy a considerable portion of the Odyssey (from book vii. xiii.), and form one of its most charming parts. (Comp. Hygin. Fab. 125 and 126.)

2. A son of Hippothoon, who, in conjunction with his father and eleven brothers, expelled Icarion and Tyndareus from Lacedaemon, but was afterwards killed, with his father and brothers, by Heraclis. (Apollod. iii. 10, § 5.) [L. S.]

AL'CINOUS (Ἀλκίνοος), a Platonist philosopher, who probably lived under the Caesars. Nothing is known of his personal history, but a work entitled Εννοιος τῶν Πλάτωνος οἰκομένης, containing an analysis of the Platonic philosophy, as it was expounded by late writers, has been preserved. The treatise is written rather in the manner of Aristotle than of Plato, and the author has not hesitated to introduce any of the views of other philosophers which seemed to add to the completeness of the system. Thus the parts of the syllogism (c. 6), the doctrine of the mean and of the ἔγγερται and ἐνεργείας (c. 2, 8.), are attributed to Plato; as well as the division of philosophy which was common to the Peripatetics and Stoics.

daughter Calirrhoe in marriage. Calirrhoe had a pupil of Pythagoras, and must therefore have lived amongst the eminent natural philosophers of antiquity, was formed at the mouth of the river Achelous. Apollodorus agrees with this account, but gives a different place for the tomb of Alcmaeon, at the Achaeans to Ptolemy Philometor, B.C. 169, when they heard that the Anaclcteria (see Dict. of art. s. c.) were to be celebrated in his honor. (Polyb. xxviii. 10, 16.)

ALCMAEON ('AAkapaiW), a son of Amphaios and Eriphyle, and brother of Amphirochos, Eurydice, and Demona. (Apollod. iii. 7. § 2.) His mother was induced by the necklace of Harmonia, which she received from Polynieces, to persuade her husband Amphaios to take part in the expedition against Thebes. (Hom. Od. xv. 247, &c.) But before Amphaios set out, he enjoined his sons to kill their mother as soon as they should be grown up. (Apollod. iii. 6. § 2; Hygin. Fab. 73.) When the Epigoni prepared for a second expedition against Thebes, to avenge the death of their fathers, the oracle promised them success and victory, if they chose Alcmaeon their leader. He was at first disinclined to undertake the command, as he had not yet taken vengeance on his mother, according to the desire of his father. But she, who had now received from Thersander, the son of Polynieces, the plenus of Harmonia also, induced him to join the expedition. Alcmaeon distinguished himself greatly in it, and slew Laodamus, the son of Eteocles. (Apollod. iii. 7. § 2, &c.; comp. Diod. iv. 66.) When, after the fall of Thebes, he learnt the reason for which his mother had urged him on to take part in the expedition, he slew her on the advice of an oracle of Apollo, and, according to some traditions, in conjunction with his brother Amphirochos. For this deed he became mad, and was haunted by the Eriphyle. He first came to Oicleus in Arcadia, and thence went to Phegeus in Phocis, and being purified by the latter, he married his daughter Arinoe or Alphysbeoa (Paus. viii. 24. § 4), to whom he gave the necklace and plenus of Harmonia. But the country in which he now resided was visited by scarcity, in consequence of his being the murderer of his mother, and the oracle advised him to go to Achelous. According to Pausanias, he left Phocis because his madness did not yet cease. Pausanias and Theophrastes (fab. 102; comp. Plut. De Res. p. 692) further state, that the oracle commanded him to go to a country which had been formed subsequent to the murder of his mother, and was therefore under no curse. The country thus pointed out was a tract of land which had been recently formed at the mouth of the river Achelous. Apollodorus agrees with this account, but gives a detailed history of Alcmaeon's wanderings until he reached the mouth of Achelous, who gave him his daughter Callirrhoë in marriage. Callirrhoë had a desire to possess the necklace and plenus of Harmonia, and Alcmaeon, to gratify her wish, went to Psophis to get them from Phegesus, under the pretense that he intended to dedicate them at Delphi in order to be freed from his madness. Phegesus complied with his request, but when he heard that the treasures were fetched for Callirrhoë, he sent his sons Promoeus and Ageneus (Apollod. iii. 7. § 6) or, according to Pausanias (vii. 24. § 4), Temenus and Axion, after him, with the command to kill him. This was done, but the sons of Alcmaeon by Callirrhoë took bloody vengeance at the instigation of their mother. (Apollod. Paus. ii. &c.; Ov. Met. iv. 409.)

The story about Alcmaeon furnished rich materials for the epic and tragic poets of Greece, and their Roman imitators. But none of these poems is now extant, and we only know from Apollodorus (iii. 7. § 7), that Euripides, in his tragedy "Alcmaeon," stated that after the fall of Thebes he married Manto, the daughter of Teiresias, and that he had two children by her, Amphilochna and Tisiphone, whom he gave to Creon, king of Corinth, to educate. The wife of Creon, jealous of the extraordinary beauty of Tisiphone, afterwards sold her as a slave, and Alcmaeon himself bought her, without knowing that she was his daughter. (Diod. iv. 66; Paus. vii. 3. § 3, ix. 23. § 1.) Alcmaeon after his death was worshipped as a hero, and at Thebes he seems to have had an altar, near the house of Pindar (Pind. viii. 80, &c.), who calls him his neighbour and the guardian of his property, and also seems to suggest that prophetic powers were ascribed to him, as to his father Amphaios. At Psophis his tomb was shown, surrounded with lofty and sacred cypresses. (Paus. viii. 24. § 4.) At Oropus, in Attica, where Amphaios and Amphirochos were worshipped, Alcmaeon enjoyed no such honours, because he was a matricide. (Paus. iv. 34. § 2.) He was represented in a statue at Delphi, and on the chest of Cyclops. (x. 10. § 2, v. 17. § 4.)

ALCMAEON ('AAkapaiw), son of the Magaclos, who was guilty of sacrilege with respect to the followers of Cimon, was invited by Croesus to Sardis in consequence of the services he had rendered to Plutarch, when he consulted the Delphic oracle. On his arrival at Sardis, Croesus made him a present of as much gold as he could carry out of the treasury. Alcmaeon took the king at his word, by putting on a most capacious dress, the folds of which (as well as the vacant space of a pair of very wide boots, also provided for the occasion) he stuffed with gold, and then filled his mouth and hair with gold dust. Croesus laughed at the trick, and presented him with as much again (about 600 c. c.). The wealth thus acquired is said to have contributed greatly to the subsequent prosperity of the Alcmaeonidae. (Herod. vi. 125.)

Alcmaeon was a breeder of horses for charioteers, and on one occasion gained the prize in a chariot-race at Olympia. (Herod. i. c.; Isocrates, de Bjox. c. 10. p. 351.) We are informed by Plutarch (Solon. c. 11), that he commanded the Athenians in the Circumnav war, which began b. c. 600.

ALCMAEON ('AAkapaiw), one of the most eminent natural philosophers of antiquity, was a native of Cretona in Magna Graecia. His father's name was Pirithus, and he is said to have been a pupil of Pythagoras, and must therefore have lived... in the latter half of the sixth century before Christ. (Diog. Laërt. viii. 83.) Nothing more is known of the events of his life. His most celebrated anatomical discovery has been noticed in the Dict. of Ant. p. 756, a; but whether his knowledge in this branch of science was derived from the dissection of animals or of human bodies, is a disputed question, which it is difficult to decide. Chalcidius, on whose authority the fact rests, merely says (Comment. in Plut. "Tim." p. 368, ed. Fabr.), "qui primus exsectionem aggredi est ausus," and the word casuus would apply equally well to either case. He is said also (Diog. Laërt. i. c.; Clemens Alexandr. Strom. i. p. 308) to have been the first person who wrote on natural philosophy (φυσικός φιλόσ., and to have invented tables (βαθαίνα, Isid. Hist. i. 30). He also wrote several other medical and philosophical works, of which nothing but the titles and a few fragments have been preserved by Stobaeus (Phil. hist. vol. i. p. 308; C. G. Kuhn, De Philosoph. vol. i. p. 507.), Aristotle (Metaph. A. 5) mentions him as nearly contemporary with Pythagoras, but distinguishes between the στοιχεῖα of opposites, under which the Pythagoreans included all things, and the double principle of Alcmaeon, according to Aristotle, less extended, although he does not explain the precise difference. Other doctrines of Alcmaeon have been preserved to us. He said that the human soul was immortal and partook of the divine nature, because like the heavenly bodies it contained in itself a principle of motion. (Arist. de Anima, i. 2, p. 405; Cic. de Nat. Dier. i. 11.) The eclipse of the moon, which was also eternal, he supposed to arise from its shape, which he said was like a boat. All his doctrines which have come down to us, relate to physics or medicine; and seem to have arisen partly out of the speculations of the Ionian school, with which rather than the Pythagorean, Aristotle appears to connect Alcmaeon, partly from the traditional lore of the earliest medical science. (Brandis, vol. i. p. 508.)

ALCMAEONIDAE (Ἀλκμαῖοι), a noble family at Athens, members of which fill a space in Grecian history from 1100 to 400 B.C. The following is a genealogical table of the family.

1. Alcmaeon, founder of the family, 1100 B.C.
2. (Megacles), 6th perpetual archon.
3. (Alcmaeon), last perpetual archon. (B.C. 755—753.)
5. Alcmaeon, about 590 B.C. (See Alcmaeon.)
6. Megacles, the opponent—Agariste, daughter of Cleisthenes, of Pelisistratus. tyrant of Sicyon.
7. Cleisthenes, (the reformer. See Cleisthenes.)
10. Alcibiades. His parentage is unknown, but he was said to be an Alcmaeonid on the father's side. (Demosth. in Med. p. 561.)
12. Megacles. (Herod. vi. 131.)
13. Agariste. = Xanthippus. (Herod. vi. 131; Plat. Peri. 3.)
15. Cleinias commanded a trireme at Tanagra b.c. 246. (Thuc. iii. 91.) He is thought by some to have been himself an Alcmaeonid. HIPPOCRATES.
16. Deinomachus commanded at Tanagra b.c. 480; fell at Coronea b.c. 442. (Herod. viii. 17; Plut. Alc. 1.)
The Alcmaeonidae were a branch of the family of the Neleidæ. The Neleidæ were driven out of Pylus in Messenia by the Dorians, about 1100 B.C., and went to Athens, where Melanthus, the representative of the elder branch of the family became king, and Alcmaeon, the representative of the second branch, became a noble and the ancestor of the Alcmaeonidae. Alcmeon was the great-grandson of Nestor. (Plut. iii. 8.) Among the archons for life, the sixth is named Megacles, and the last Alcmaeon. But, as the archons for life appear to have been always taken from the family of Mardon, it is probable that these were only Alcmaeonids on the mother's side. The first remarkable man among the Alcmaeonids was the archon Megacles, who brought upon the family the guilt of sacrilege by his treatment of the insurgents under Cylon. (n. c. 612.) [Cimon Megacles.] The expulsion of the Alcmaeonids was now forcibly demanded, and Solon, who probably saw in such an event an important step towards his intended reforms, advised them to submit their cause to a tribunal of three hundred nobles. The result was that they were banished from Athens and retired to Phociæ, probably about 596 or 595 B.C. Their wealth having been augmented by the liberality of Croesus to Alcmeon, the son of Megacles [Alcmaeon], and their influence increased by the marriage of Megacles, the son of Alcmaeon, to Agariste, the daughter of Cleisthenes, tyrant of Sicyon, they took advantage of the divided state of Athens, and by joining the party of Lycurgus, they effected their return; and shortly afterwards, by a similar union, they expelled Peisistratus soon after he had seized the government. (b. c. 559.) [Peisistratus.] This state of things did not last long; for, at the end of five years, Megacles gave his daughter Coesyræ in marriage to Peisistratus, and assisted in his restoration to Athens. But a new quarrel immediately arose out of the conduct of Peisistratus towards his wife, and the Alcmaeonids once more expelled him. During the following ten years, Peisistratus collected an army, with which he invaded Attica, and defeated the Alcmaeonids, who were now once more driven into exile. They were, however, still formidable enemies. After the death of Hipparchus, they took possession of Lysippus, a fortress on the frontier of Attica, and made an attempt to restore themselves, but were defeated by Hippias. They had, however, a more important source of influence. In the year 548 B.C., the temple of Apollo at Delphi was burnt, and the Alcmaeonids having contracted with the Amphictyonic council to rebuild it, executed the work in a style of magnificence which much exceeded their engagement. They thus gained great popularity throughout Greece, while they contrived to bring the Peisistratids into odium by charging them with having caused the fire. The oracle, besides, favoured them the more; and whenever it was consulted by a Spartan, on whatever matter, the answer always contained an exhortation to give Athens freedom; and the result was that at length the Spartans expelled Hippias, and restored the Alcmaeonids. (n. c. 510.) The restored family found themselves in an isolated position, between the nobles, who appear to have been opposed to them, and the popular party which had been hitherto attached to the Peisistratids. Cleisthenes, now the head of the Alcmaeonidae, joined the latter party, and gave a new constitution to Athens. Further particulars respecting the family are given under the names of its members. (Herod, vi. 121-131; Pindar, Pyth. viii. and Böckh's notes; Clinton's Fasti, ii. p. 4, 299.) [P. S.] ALCMAN ('Alkmaioú), called by the Attic and later Greek writers Alcmenioú ('Alkmeionioú), the chief lyric poet of Sparta, was by birth a Lydian of Sardis. His father's name was Danaus or Tita¬rus. He was brought into Laconia as a slave, evidently when very young. His master, whose name was Aegidas, discovered his genius, and emancipated him; and he then began to distinguish himself as a lyric poet. (Suidas, s. v.; Heralcid. Pont. Polit. p. 206; Vell. Pat. i. 18; Alcman, fr. 11, Weleker; Epigrams by Alexander Autolus, Leonidas, and Antipater Thess., in Jacob's Anoth. Graece. i. p. 207, No. 3, p. 175, No. 80, ii. p. 110, No. 56; in the Anthol. Patit. vii. 769, 19, 16.) In the epigram last cited it is said, that the two continents strove for the honour of his birth; and Suidas (s. e.) calls him a Lydian of Messaia, which may mean, however, that he was enrolled as a citizen of Messaia after his emancipation. The above statements seem to be more in accordance with the authorities than the opinion of Boïdie, that Alcman's father was brought from Sardis to Sparta as a slave, and that Alcmen himself was born at Messaia. It is not known to what extent he obtained the rights of citizenship. The time at which Alcman lived is rendered somewhat doubtful by the different statements of the Greek and Armenian copies of Eusebius, and of the chronicographers who followed him. On the whole, however, the Greek copy of Eusebius appears to be right in placing him at the second year of the twenty-seventh Olympiad. (n. c. 671.) He was contemporary with Arês, king of Lydian, who reigned from 678 to 629 B.C., with Lesches, the author of the "Little Iliad," and with Ter¬pander, during the later years of these two poets; he was older than Stesichorus, and he is said to have been the teacher of Arion. From these cir¬cumstances, and from the fact which we learn from himself (Fr. 29), that he lived to a great age, we may conclude, with Clinton, that he flourished from about 671 to about 631 B.C. (Clinton, Fast. i. pp. 189, 191, 365; Hermann, Antiq. Lacon. pp.
Audi the Aeolian lyric into the Peloponnesus. In this process of improvement Aleman was immediately followed by Terpander, an Aiolian poet, who, before the year 576 B.C., had removed from Lesbos to the mainland of Greece, and had introduced the Aiolian lyric into the Peloponnesus. This new style of poetry was speedily adapted to the choral form in which the Doric poetry had hitherto been cast, and gradually supplanted that earlier style which was nearer to the epic. In the 33rd or 34th Olympiad, Terpander made his great improvements in music. [Terpander.] Hence rose the peculiar character of the poetry of his younger contemporary, Aleman, which presented the choral lyric in the highest excellence which the music of Terpander enabled it to reach. But Aleman had also acquaintances with the Phrygian and Lydian styles of music, and he was himself the inventor of new forms of rhythm, one of which bore his name.

A large portion of Aleman's poetry was erotic. In fact, he is said by some ancient writers to have been the inventor of erotic poetry. (Athen. xiii. 600; Suidas, s. v.) From his poems of this class, which are marked by a freedom bordering on coarseness, he obtained the epithets of "sweet" and "pleasant" (γανέος, καπέλος). Among these poems were many hymeneal pieces. But the Parthenia, which form a branch of Aleman's poems, must not be confounded with the erotic. They were so called because they were composed for the purpose of being sung by choirs of virgins, and were sung at religious festivals, and short ethical or philosophical pieces. It is disputed whether he wrote any of those Anaepotic war-songs, or marches, which were called ἀρετιπίσμα. But it seems very likely that he should have neglected a kind of composition which had been rendered so popular by Tyrtaeus. His metres are very various. He is said by Suidas to have been the first poet who composed iambic and dactylic hexameters. This statement is incorrect; but Suidas seems to refer to the hexameter lines into which Aleman broke up the Homeric hexameter. In this practice, however, he had been preceded by Archilochus, from whom he borrowed several others of his peculiar styes: others he invented himself. Among his styes we find various forms of the dactylic, anaesth, trochaic, and iambic, as well as lines composed of different metres, for example, iambic and anaesth. The Cretic hexameter was named cemenic, from his being its inventor. The poems of Aleman were chiefly in strophes, composed of six stanzas of the same metre throughout the ode, sometimes of different metres. From their choral character we might conclude that they sometimes had an antistrophic form, and this seems to be confirmed by the statement of Hephæstion (p. 134, Gaisf.), that he composed odes of fourteen strophes, in which there was a change of metre after the seventh strophe. There is no trace of an epode following the strophe and antistrophe, in his poems.

The dialect of Aleman was the Spartan Doric, with an intermixture of the Aeolic. The popular idioms of Laconia appear most frequently in his more familiar poems.

The Alexandrian grammarians placed Aleman at the head of their canon of the nine lyric poets. Among the proofs of his popularity may be mentioned the tradition, that his songs were sung, with those of Terpander, at the first performance of the gymnopaedia at Sparta (b.c. 665, Aelian, V. H. xii. 50), and the ascertained fact, that they were frequently afterwards used at that festival. (Athen. v. p. 678.) The few fragments which remain scarcely allow us to judge how far he deserved his reputation; but some of them display a true poetical spirit.

Aleman's poems comprised six books, the extant fragments of which are included in the collections of Nemander, H. Stephani, and Fulvius Ursinus. The latest and best edition is that of Welcker, Giessen, 1815. [P. S.]

ALCMENNE (Ἀλκμήνη), a daughter of Electryon, king of Messene, by Anaxo, the daughter of Alcaeus. (Apollod. ii. 4 § 5.) According to other accounts her mother was called Lyasidice (Schol. ad Pind. 0l. vii. 49; Plut. These. 7), or Eurydice. (Diod. iv. 9.) The poet Asius represented Alcmene as a daughter of Amphiaras and Eriphyle. (Paus. v. 17, § 4.) Apollodorus mentions ten brothers of Alcmene, who, with the exception of one, Liemynius, fell in a contest with the sons of Pterereus, who had carried off the cattle of Electryon. Electryon, on setting out to avenge the death of his sons, left his kingdom and his daughter Alcmene to Amphitryon, who, uninterestedly, killed Electryon. Sthenelus thereupon expelled Amphitryon, who, together with Alcmene and Liemynius, went to Thebes. Amphitryon declared that he would marry his wife, and he should avenge the death of her brothers. Amphitryon undertook the task, and invited Creon of Thebes to assist him. During his absence, Zeus, in the disguise of Amphitryon, visited Alcmene, and, pretending to be her husband, related to her in what way he had avenged the death of her brothers. (Apollod. ii. 4, § 6—8; Ov. Amor. i. 13. 45; Diod. iv. 9; Hygin. Fab. 29; Lucian, Dialog. Deor. 10.) When Amphitryon himself returned on the next day and wanted to give an account of his achievements, she was surprised at the repetition, but Teiresias solved the mystery. Alcmene became the mother of Heracles by Zeus, and of Iphicles by Amphitryon. Hem, jealous of Alcmene, delayed the birth of Heracles for seven days, that Eurytheus might be born first, and thus be entitled to greater rights, according to a vow of Zeus himself. (Hom. ii. xix. 95, &c.; Ov. Met. ix. 297, &c.; Diod. l. c.) After the death of Amphitryon, Alcmene married Rhadamantus, a son of Zeus, at Ocakes in Boeotia. (Apollod. ii. 4. § 11.) After Heracles was mised to the rank of a god, Alcmene and his sons, in dread of Eurytheus, fled to Trachis, and thence to Athens.
and when Hyllus had cut off the head of Eurytheus, Alcmene satisfied her revenge by picking the eyes out of the head. (Apollod. ii. 8. § 1.) The sons of Heracles disagreed as to whether she was to be carried to Argos or to Thebes, and as the sons of Hercules disagreed as to whether she was to be carried to Argos or to Thebes, she was buried in the place where she had died, at the command of an oracle. According to Plutarch, (De Gen. Socr. p. 578,) her tomb and that of Ilcidas were at Haluartus in Boeotia, and hers was opened by Agesilaus, for the purpose of carrying her remains to Sparta. According to Pherecydes (Cyp. Auton. Lib. 35), she lived with her sons, after the death of Eurytheus, at Thebes, and died there at an advanced age. When the sons of Hercules wished to bury her, Zeus sent Hermes to take her body away, and to carry it to the islands of the blessed, and give her in marriage there to Rhadamantys. Hermes accordingly took her out of her coffin, and put into it a stone so heavy that the Helmedics could not move it from the spot. When, on opening the coffin, they found the stone, they erected it in a grove near Thebes, which in later times contained the sanctuary of Alemene. (Paus. ix. 16. § 4.) At Athens, too, she was worshipped as a heroine, and an altar was erected to her in the temple of Heracles. (Cynostrages, Paus. i. 19. § 3.) She was represented on the chest of Cypactus (Paus. v. 18. § 1), and epic as well as tragic poets made frequent use of her story, though no poem of the kind is now extant. (Hes. &st. Hec. init.; Paus. v. 17. § 4, 18. § 1.)

ALCON or ALCO (Ἀλκών). 1. A son of Hippocoon, and one of the Calydonian hunters, was killed together with his brothers, by Hercules, and had a heroine at Sparta. (Paus. iii. 10. § 5; Hygin. Fab. 173; Paus. iii. 14. § 7, 15. § 3.)

2. A son of Echtheus, king of Athens, and father of Phalerus the Argonaut. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 97; Hygin. Fab. 14.) Valerius Flaccus (i. 399, &c.) represents him as such a skilful archer, that once, when a serpent had entwined his son, he shot the serpent without hurting his child. Virgil (Eclog. v. 11) mentions an Alcon, whom Servius calls a Cretan, and of whom he relates almost the same story as that which Valerius Flaccus ascribes to Alcon, the son of Echtheus.

Two other personages of the same name occur in Cicero (de Nat. Dcor. iii. 21), and in Hyginus. (Fab. 173.)

ALCON, a surgeon (vulnerum medicus) at Rome, possibly derived this surname. (Paus. viii. 4. § 5.) This temple was burnt down in the reign of Claudius. a. n. 41–54, who is said to have gained by his practice an equal sum within a few years, which, however, seems so enormous (compare Albuscus and Arruntius), that there must probably be some mistake in the text. A surgeon of the same name, who is mentioned by Martial (Epigr. xi. 84) as a contemporary, may possibly be the same person. [W. A. G.]

ALCON, a statue mentioned by Pliny. (H. N. xxxiv. 14. § 40.) He was the author of a statue of Hercules at Thebes, made of iron, as symbolic of the god's endurance of labour. [C. P. M.]

ALCYONE or HALCYONE (Ἀλκυών).
Vleyer, Gesch. der bildend. Künste, ii. p. 99, &c. On the road from Sparta to Thermopylae there was likewise a statue of Athena Aleuas. (Paus. 19. § 7.)

ALEBION. [ALEBION.]
ALECTO. [FURIA.]
ALECTOR (AKLEPTEP). 1. The father of Leitus, the Argonaut. (Apollod. i. 9, § 16.) Homer (U. xii. 602) calls him Alectyon.

2. A son of Auneorus and father of Iphikes, king of Argos. He was consulted by Polyneices as to the manner in which Amphiaraus might be compelled to take part in the expedition against Thebes. (Apollod. iii. 6 § 2; Paus. ii. 18. § 4.) Two others of the same name are mentioned in Homer. (Od. iv. 10; Eustath. ad Hom. pp. 303 and 1598.)

ALEMON, ALEMONIDES. [MYuckles.]
ALETES (AELETAS), a son of Hippotes and a descendant of Hercules in the fifth degree. He is said to have taken possession of Corinth, and to have expelled the Nisyphids, thirty years after the first invasion of Peloponnese by the Herodids.

His family, sometimes called the Aleidae, maintained themselves at Corinth down to the time of Lachacis. (Paus. ii. 4. § 3; v. 18. § 2; Strab. vii. 4. § 109; Callim. Fragm. 103; Pind. Ol. xi. 17.)

S'kellius Patocrates (i. 3) calls him a descendant of Hercules in the sixth degree. He received an oracle, promising him the sovereignty of Athens, if he would remain uninjured. This oracle became known at Athens, and Codrus sacrificed himself for his country. (Conon, Narrat. 26.) (Codrus.)

Other persons of this name are mentioned in Apollod. iii. 10. § 6; Hygin. Fug. 122, and in V. Aen. l. 121, ix. 462. [L. S.]

ALEUAS and ALEUADAE (AEETAE and AEAUADAE). Aleuas is the ancestral hero of the Thessalians, and more particularly, of the Larissacan family of the Alcadae. (Pind. Pyth. x. 8, with the Schol.) The Aleuadae were the noblest and most powerful among all the families of Thessaly, which Herodotus (vii. 6) calls its members Baraiai. (Comp. Diod. iv. 61, xvi. 14.)

The first Aleuas, who bore the surname of Phere, that is, "red-haired," is called king (here synonymous with Tagus, see Dict. of Aut. p. 932) of Thessaly, and a descendant of Hercules through Thessalus, one of the many sons of Hercules. (Suidas. x. 9. Miusaia; Ulpius, ad Dem. Olyph. p. 13; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. ili. 1090; Vellei. l. 3.) Plutarch de Am. Praet. in fin. states, that he was hated by his father on account of his haughty and savage manner; but his uncle nevertheless contrived to make him elected king, and was named by the god as king of all Thessaly.

His reign was more glorious than that of any of his ancestors, and the nation rose in power and importance. This Aleuas, who belongs to the mythical period of Greek history, is in all probability the same as the one who, according to Hege- son (op. Ad. Asin. viii. 11), was beloved by a muse. According to Aristole (op. Harpocrat. v. Terapoypa) the division of Thessaly into four parts, of which traces remained down to the latest times, took place in the reign of the first Aleuas. It is much later that the division between the two branches, the Aleuadae and the Scopeidae, called after Scopas, probably a son of Aleuas. (Ov. I. 18. 512.) The Scopeidae inhabited Crammon and perhaps Pharsalus also, while the main branch, the Aleuadae, remained at Larissa. The influence of the families, however, was not confined to these towns, but extended more or less over the greater part of Thessaly. They formed in reality a powerful aristocratic party (Baraiai) in opposition to the great body of the Thessalians.

The earliest historical person, who probably belongs to the Aleuadae, is Eurylochus, who terminated the war of Cirrha about B.C. 590. (Strab. ix. p. 418.) [Eurylochus.] In the time of the post Simonides we find a second Aleuas, who was a friend of the poet. He is called a son of Echecridentes and Syria (Schol. ad Theoc. xvi. 34); but besides the suggestion of Ovid (I. 258), that he had a tragic end, nothing is known about him. At the time when Xerxes invaded Greece, three sons of this Aleuas, Thorsan, Eurylyppus, and Thrasyndus, came to Athens as ambassadors, to request him to go on with the war, and to promise him their assistance. (Herod. vii. 6.) [Thorsax.]

When, after the Persian war, Leotychides was sent to Thessaly to chastise those who had acted as traitors to their country, he allowed himself to be bribed by the Aleuadae, although he might have subdued all Thessaly. (Herod. vii. 72; Paus. iii. 7. § 8.) This fact shows that the power of the Aleuadae was then still as great as before. About the year B.C. 460, we find an Aleud Orestes, son of Echecridentes, who came to Athens as a fugitive, and persuaded the Athenians to exert themselves for his restoration. (Thuc. i. 111.)

He had been expelled either by the Thessalians or more probably by a faction of his own family, who wished to exclude him from the dignity of Baraiai (i.e. probably Tagus), for such funds among the Aleuadae themselves are frequently mentioned.

(Xen. Anab. i. 1. § 10.)

After the end of the Peloponnesian war, another Thessalian family, the dynasts of Phere, gradually rose to power and influence, and gave a great shock to the power of the Aleuadae. As early as B.C. 375, Jason of Phere, after various struggles, succeeded in raising himself to the dignity of Tagus. (Xen. Hellen. ii. 3. § 4; Diod. xiv. 62, xv. 60.) When the dynasty of Phere became tyrannical, some of the Larissacan Aleuadae conspired to put an end to their rule, and for this purpose they invited Alexander, king of Macedonia, the son of Amyntus. (Diod. xvi. 61.) Alexander took Larissa and Crammon, but kept them to himself. Afterwards, Pelopidas restored the original state of things by the peace of Ibyssus; but the dynasty of Phere soon recovered their power, and the Aleuadae again solicited the assistance of Macedonia against them. Philip willingly complied with the request, broke the power of the tyrants of Phere, restored the towns to an appearance of freedom, and made the Aleuadae his faithful friends and allies. (Diod. xvi. 14.)

In what manner Philip used them for his purposes, and how little he spared them when it was his interest to do so, is sufficiently attested. (Dem. de Cor. p. 241; Polyena. iv. 2. § 11; Ulpius, l.c.) Among the tetrarchs whom he entrusted with the administration of Thessaly, there is one Thrasyl- lus (Theopomp. op. Athen. vi. p. 249), who undoubtedly belonged to the Aleuadae, just as the Thessalian Mediaus, who is mentioned as one of

ALEXUS (Ἀλέξος), a son of Apheidas, and grandson of Arcas. He was king of Tegea in Arcadia, and married to Neacra, and is said to have founded the town of Alea and the first temple of Athena Alea at Tegea. (Paus. viii. 23. § 1, 2; comp. Apollod. iii. 9. § 1.) [ALEX.] [L. S.]

ALEXANDER (Ἀλέξανδρος), a man whom

Mithridates is charged by Sulla with having sent to assassinate Nicomedes. (Appian, De Bell. Mithr.

the Paphlagonian, who is afterwards (76, &c.)
mentioned as one of the generals of Mithridates, and was made prisoner by Lucullus, who kept him to adorn his triumph at Rome. [L. S.]

ALEXANDER ('Αλέξανδρος), a saint and martyr, whose memory is celebrated by the Roman church, together with the other martyrs of Lyon and Vienne, on the second of June. He was native of Phrygia, and a physician by profession and was put to death, A. D. 177, during the perse ception that raged against the churches of Lyon and Vienne under the emperor Marcus Aurelius (Epist. Eccles. Lugdun. et Viam. apud Euseb. His Ecol. v. 1. p. 163.) He was condemned, together with another Christian, to be devoured by wild beasts in the amphitheatre, and died (as the historian expresses it) "neither uttering a groan nor a sy able, but conversing in his heart with God.

who, in conjunction with Dorymanchus, put himself in possession of the town of Aegae in Achaia, during the Social war, in B. C. 220. But the conduct of Alexander and his associates was so insolent and rapacious, that the inhabitants of the town rose to expel the small band of the Aetolians. In the ensuing contest Alexander was killed while fighting. (Polyb. iv. 57, 58.)

[20x1201]ALEXANDER AETO'LUS ('ΑΛΕΞΑΝΔΡΟΣ ὁ Αὐταλικος), a Greek poet and grammarian, who lived in the reign of Ptolemaeus Philadelphus. He was the son of Satyrus and Stratoceia, and a native of Pleroum in Aetolia, but spent the greater part of his life at Alexandria, where he was reckoned one of the seven tragic poets who constituted the tragic pleiad. (Suid. s. v.; Eudoc. p. 62; Paus. ii. 22.; Schol. ad Hom. H. xvi. 233.) He had an office in the library at Alexandria, and was commissioned by the king to make a collection of all the tragedies and satyrical dramas that were extant. He spent some time, together with Antigoras and Aratus, at the court of Antigonus Gonatas. (Aratus, Phaenomena et Dionom. ii. pp. 431, 443, &c. 446, ed. Buhle.) Notwithstanding the distinction he enjoyed as a tragic poet, he appears to have had greater merit as a writer of epic poems, elegies, epigrams, and cynegetic. Among his epic poems, we possess the titles and some fragments of three pieces: the Fisherman (Διηνος, Athen. vii. p. 296), Kirka or Krika (Athen. vii. p. 263), which, however, is designated by Athenaeus as doubtful, and Helen. (Bekker, Anecd. p. 96.) Of his elegies, some beautiful fragments are still extant. (Athen. iv. p. 170, xl. p. 496, xv. p. 639; Strab. xii. p. 556, xiv. p. 681; Parthen. Erot. 4; Tzetze, ad Leucip. p. 806, ed. Schol. 803, ed. Dintzer.) His Cicely, or Ἱσωτος τονοσα, are mentioned by Strabo (xiv. p. 648) and Athenaeus. (xiv. p. 626.) Some anapaestic verses in praise of Euripides are preserved in Galliius. (xx. 20.)

ALEXANDER (AΛΕΞΑΝΔΡΟΣ), ST.) of ALEXANDRIA, succeeded as patriarch of that city St. Aetilias, (as his predecessor, St. Peter, had predicted, Martyr. S. Petri, ap. Sorinum, vol. i. p. 577.), a. d. 312. He, "the noble Champion of Apostolic Doctrine," (Theod. Hist. Eccl. i. 2.) first laid the first stones of the irreligion of Arius, and condemned him in his dispute with Alexander Boscusil. St. Alexander was at the Oecumenical Council of Nicaea, a. d. 325, with his deacon, St. Athanasius, and, scarcely five months after, died, April 17th, a. d. 326. St. Epiphanius (adu. Haeres. 69. § 4) says he wrote some seventy circular epistles against Arius, and Socromes (H. E. i. 6), and Sozomen (H. E. i. 1), that he collected them into one volume. Two epistles remain; 1. to Alexander, bishop of Constantinople, written after the Council at Alexandria which condemned Arius, and before the other circular letters to the various bishops. (See Theod. H. E. i. 4; Galland. Bibl. Patr. vol. iv. p. 441.) 2. The Eulogic letter announcing Arius' deposition (Socr. H. E. i. 6, and Galland. l. c. p. 451), with the subscription from Gallus, (Hist. Conc. Niccui. ii. 8, ap. Man. Concilia, vol. ii. p. 301.) There remains, too, The Deposition of Arius and his, i.e. an Address to the Priests and Deacons, desiring their concurrence therein (ap. S. Athanas. vol. i. Ps. 1. p. 396, Paris, 1698; see Galland. l.c. p. 455). Two fragments more, apud Galland. (l.c. p. 456). St. Athanasius also gives the second epistle. (l.c. p. 397.) [A. J. C.]

ALEXANDER (Ἀλέξανδρος), commander of the horse in the time of Antigonus Doson during the war against Cleomenes III. of Sparta. (Polyb. ii. 66.) He fought against Philopoemen, then a young man, whose prudence and valour forced him to a disadvantageous engagement at Sellusin. (ii. 68.) This Alexander is probably the same person as the one whom Antigonus, as the guardian of Philip, had appointed commander of Philip's body-guard, and who was calumniated by Apelles. (iv. 87.) Subsequently he was sent by Philip as ambassador to Thebes, to persecute Megasias. (v. 28.) Polybius states, that at all times he manifested a most extraordinary attachment to his king. (vii. 12.) [L. S.]

ALEXANDER (Ἀλέξανδρος), of Antiochia, a friend of M. Antonius, who being acquainted with the Syracusan language, noted twice as interpreter between Antonius and Aristophanes, and was translated into the Sphere of the Parthians, to save the Romans. This happened in b. c. 36. (Pseudo-Apian, Porph. pp. 93, 96, ed. Schweigh.) [L. S.]

ALEXANDER (Ἀλέξανδρος), son of Antonius, the triumvir, and Cleopatra, queen of Egypt. He and his twin-sister Cleopatra were born c. 40. Antonius bestowed on him the titles of "Heios," and "King of Kings," and called his sister "Seleene." He also destined for him, as an independent kingdom, Armenia, and such countries as might yet be conquered between the Euphrates and Indus, and wrote to the senate to have his grants confirmed; but his letter was not suffered to be read in public. (b. c. 34.) After the conquest of Armenia Antonius betrothed Jotinca, the daughter of the Median king Artavasdes, to his son Alexander. When Octavianus undertook the government of Alexandria, he spared Alexander, but took him and his sister to Rome, to adorn his triumph. They were generously received by Octavia, the wife of Antonius, who educated them with her own children. ( Dion Cassius, xlix. 32, 40, 41, 44, i. 25, ii. 21; Plut. Anton. 36, 54, 87; Liv. Epit. 131, 132.)

ALEXANDER (Ἀλέξανδρος), bishop of Apamea, sent with his name sake of Hierapolis by John of Antioch to the Council of Ephesus. A letter by him is extant in Latin in the Nova Colloquium Concilia et Stephani, Baluzio, p. 834. c. 132, fol. Paris, 1683. [A. J. C.]

ALEXANDER APHRODISIENSIS (Ἀλέξανδρος Ἀφροδισιαῖος), a native of Aphrodisias in Caria, who lived at the end of the second and the beginning of the third century after Christ, the most celebrated of the commentators on Aristotle. He was the disciple of Hermibus and Aristocles the Messenian, and like them endeavoured to free the Peripatetic philosophy from the syncretism of Ammonius and others, and to restore the genuine interpretation of the writings of Aristotle. The title δέιγματις was the testimony to the extent or the excellence of his commentaries. About half his voluminous works were edited and translated into Latin at the revival of literature; there are a few more extant in the original Greek, which have never been printed, and an Arabic version is preserved of several others, whose titles may be seen in the Bibliotheca of Casiri. (Vol. i. p. 243.)

If we view him as a philosopher, his merit cannot be rated highly. His excellences and defects are all on the model of his great master; there is the same periscipicity and power of analysis, united with almost more Aristotelian plainness of style. He never "fits" his ideas to the occasion, or to fit things out of the incident, to interrupt or strike the attention. In a mind so thoroughly imbued with Aristotle, it cannot be expected there should be much place for original thought. His only endeavour is to adapt the works of his master to the spirit and language of his own age; but in doing so he is constantly recurred to the earlier philosophy, and attacks bygone opinions, as though they had the same living power as when the writings of Aristotle were directed against them. (Ritter, Geschichte der Philosophie, vol. iv. p. 255.)

The Platonists and earlier Stoics are his chief opponents, for he regarded the Epicureans as too sensual and unphilosophical to be worth a serious answer. Against the notion of the first, that the world, although created, might yet by the will of God be made imperishable, he urged that God could not alter the nature of things, and quoted the Platonist doctrine of the necessary existence of evil in all corruptible things. (Ritter, p. 262.)

God himself, he said, was the very form of things. Yet, however difficult it may be to enter into this abstract notion of God, it would be unjust, as some have done, to charge him with atheism, as in many passages he attributes mind and intelligence to the divine Being. This is one of the points in which he has brought out the views of Aristotle more clearly, from his living in the light of a later age. God, he says (in Metaph. ix. p. 320.), "properly and simply one, the self-existent substance, the author of motion himself unmovcd, the great and good Deity, without beginning and without end." and again (in Metaph. x. 38.) he asserts, that to deprive God of providence is the same thing as to deprive the universe of an end. "In sweetness, fire of warmth, snow of whiteness and coolness, or the soul of motion. The providence of God, however, is not directed in the same way to the sublunary world and the rest of the universe the latter is committed not indeed to fate, but to general laws, while the concerns of men are the immediate care of God, although he find not in the government of them the full perfection of his being. (Quaest. Nat. i. 25, ii. 21.) He saw no inconsistancy, as perhaps there was none, between the high notions of God and the materialism with which they were connected. As God was the form of all things, so the human soul was likewise a form of matter, which it was impossible to be received into existence as existing in an independent state. If seems however to have made a distinction between the powers of reflection and sensation, for he says (de Anima, i. p. 138.), that the soul needed not the body as an instrument to take in objects of thought but was sufficient of itself: unless the latter is looked upon as an inconsistency into which has been led by the desire to harmonize the Peripateticism with the purer principle of a Platonic philosophy. (Brucker, vol. ii. p. 481.)

The most important treatise of his which has come down to us, is the "De Fato," an inquiry into the opinions of Aristotle on the subject of Fate and Freewill. It is probably one of his late... works, and must have been written between the years 199-211, because dedicated to the joint emperors Severus and Caracalla. Here the earlier Stoics are his opponents, who asserted that all things arise from an eternal and indissoluble chain of causes and effects. The subject is treated practically rather than speculatively. Universal consciousness, is his main arguments. That fate has a real existence, is proved by the distinction we draw between fate, chance, and possibility, and between free and necessary actions. It is another word for nature, and its workings are seen in the tendencies of men and things (c. 5), for it is an all-pervading cause of real, but not absolute, power. books, and contains several interesting medical observations along with much that is frivolous and trifling. It was first published in a Latin translation by George Valis, Venet. 1493, fol. The Greek text is to be found in the Aldine edition of Aristotle's works, Venet. fol. 1495, and in that by Syllburgius, Francon. 1568, 8vo.; it was published with a Latin translation by J. The other work is a short treatise, Ἕπιλος Παρασάρχος, De Fabulis, which is addressed to a medical pupil whom the author offers to instruct in any other branch of medicine; it is also omitted in the Arabic list of Alexander's works mentioned above. For these reasons it does not seem likely to be the work of Alexander Aphrodisiensis, while the whole of the twelfth book of the great medical work of Alexander Trallianus (to whom it has also been attributed) is taken up with the subject of Fever, and he would hardly have written two treatises on the same disease without making in either the slightest allusion to the other. It may possibly belong to one of the other numerous physicians of the name of Alexander. It was first published in a Latin translation by George Valis, Venet. 1498, fol., which was several times reprinted. The Greek text first appeared in the Cambridge Museum Criticurn, vol. ii. pp. 359—399, transcribed by Demetrius Schinas from a manuscript at Florence; it was published, together with Valis's translation, by Franz Passow, Yatisslav. 1822, 4to., and also in Passow's Operaee Academica, Lips. 1835, 8vo., p. 521. The Greek text alone is contained in the first volume of Ideler's Physi et Medici Graeci Minores, Berol. 1841, 8vo. [W. A. G.]

ALEXANDER (Ἁλεξάνδρος), an ambassador of king Attalus, sent to Rome in n. c. 198, to negotiate peace with the Roman senate. (Polyb. xvii. 10.) [L. S.]

ALEXANDER BALAS (Ἁλεξάνδρος Βάλας), a person of low origin, usurped the throne of the Greek kingdom of Syria, in the year 150, n. c., pretending that he was the son of Antiochus Epiphanes. His claim was set up by Hernoileides, who had been the treasurer of the late king Antiochus Epiphanes, but had been banished to Rhodes by the reigning king, Demetrias Soter; and he was supported by Ptolemy Philometor, king of Egypt, Aristarch Philopator, king of Cappadocia, and Attalus Philadelphus, king of Pergamus. Hermeneides also, having taken Alexander to Rome, succeeded in obtaining a decree of the senate in his favour. Furnished with forces by these allies, Alexander entered Syria in 152, n. c., took possession of Ptolemais, and fought a battle with Demetrius Soter, in which, however, he was defeated. In the year 150 n. c. Alexander again met Demetrius in battle with better success. The army of Demetrius was completely routed, and he himself perished in the flight. No sooner had Alexander thus obtained the kingdom than he gave up the administration of affairs to his minister Ammonius, and himself to a life of pleasure. Ammonius put to death all the members of the late royal family who were in his power; but two sons of Demetrius were safe in Crete. The elder of them, who was named Demetrius, took the field in Cilicia against the usurper. Alexander applied for help to his father-in-law, Ptolemy Philometor, who marched into Syria, and then declared himself in favour of Demetrius. Alexander now returned from Cilicia, whither he had gone to meet Demetrius, and engaged in battle with Ptolemy at the river Oenoparas. In this battle, though Ptolemy fell, Alexander was completely victorious, and he was afterwards murdered by an Arabian emir with whom he had taken refuge. (n. c. 146.) The meaning of his surname (Balas) is doubtful. It is most probably a title signifying "lord" or "king." On some of his coins he is called "Epiphanes" and "Nephephorus" after his pretended father. On others "Energetes" and "Theopator." (Polyb. xxxiii. 14, 16; Liv. Epit. i. l. iii.; Justin, xvi.; Appian, Syriaca, c. 67; 1

ALEXANDER, CARBONARIUS (Ἀλέξανδρος ὁ Καρβοναριός), flourished in the third century. To avoid the dangers of a handsome person, he disguised himself and lived as a coal-heaver at Cumna, in Asia Minor. The see of this city being vacant, the people asked St. Gregory Thaumaturgus to come and ordain him a bishop. He rejected many who were offered for consecration, and when he bade the people prefer virtue to rank, one in mockery cried out, "Well then! make Alexander, the coal-heaver, bishop!" St. Gregory had him summoned, discovered his disguise, and having arrayed him in sacerdotal vestments, presented him to the people, who, with surprise and joy, accepted the appointment. He addressed them in homely but dignified phrase, and ruled the church till the Declian persecution, when he was burnt, A. D. 251. (S. Greg. Nyssen. V. S. Greg. Thaumaturg. §§ 19, 20, ap. Galland. Biblioth. Patr. vol. iii. pp. 437-460.) [A. J. C.]

ALEXANDER (Ἀλέξανδρος), third son of Cassander, king of Macedonia, by Thessalonica, sister of Alexander the Great. In his quarrel with his elder brother Antipater for the government [Antipater], he called in the aid of Pyrrhus of Epirus and Demetrius Poliorcetes. To the former he was compelled to surrender, as the prize of his alliance, the land on the sea-coast of Macedonia, together with the provinces of Amphipolis, Acarnania, and Achaia. (Plut. Pyrrh. p. 396, b.) Demetrius, according to Plutarch (Pyrrh. 386, d., Demet. 906, a.), arrived after Pyrrhus had retired, and when matters, through his mediation, had been arranged between the brothers. Demetrius, therefore, was now an unwelcome visitor, and Alexander, while he received him with all outward civility, is said by Plutarch to have laid a plan for murdering him at a banquet, which was baffled, however, by the precaution of Demetrius. (Demet. 906, e. b.) The next day Demetrius and his deputation, having started for Thessaly. Here, as Larissa, he went to dine with Demetrius, and (taking no guard with him by a fancied refinement of policy) was assassinated, together with his friends who attended him, one of whom is said to have exclaimed, that Demetrius was only one day beforehand with them. (Plut. Demet. p. 906, e. d.; Just. xvi. 1; Diod. xvi. Exc. 7.) [R. E.]

ALEXANDER (Ἀλέξανδρος), emperor of Constantiople, was the third son of the emperor Basilus and Eudokia. He was born about A. D. 870, and, after his father's death, he and his brother Leo, the philosopher, bore the title of emperor in common. Leo died on the 11th of May, 911, and Alexander received the imperial crown, together with the guardianship of his brother's son, Constantius Porphyrogenitus, whom he would have mutilated so as to render him unfit to govern, had he not been prevented. The reign of Alexander, which lasted only for one year and some days, was one uninterrupted series of acts of cruelty, debauchery, and licentiousness; for the restraints which he had been obliged to put on himself during the lifetime of his brother, were thrown off immediately after his accession, and the worst persons were removed from the court while the ministers to his lusts and passions were raised to the highest honours. He involved his empire in a war with Simeon, king of the Bulgarians, but he did not live to see its outbreak. He died on the 7th of June, 912, in consequence of a debauch, after which he took violent exercise on horseback. (Constant. in Basili. 26; Scalizzi. pp. 569, 608; Zonaras, xvi. 15, &c.) [L. S.]

ALEXANDER (ST.), patriarch of Constantinople. [A. J. C.]

ALEXANDER CORNELIUS (Ἀλέξανδρος Κορνέλιος), surnamed Polyhistor (Πολυϊστόρ), a Greek writer and contemporary of Sulla. According to Suidas he was a native of Ephesus and a pupil of Crates, and during the war of Sulla in Greece was made prisoner and sold as a slave to Cornelius Lentulus, who took him to Rome and made him the pædagogus of his children. Afterwards Lentulus restored him to freedom. From Suidas it would seem as if he had received the gentile name Cornelius from Lentulus, while Servius (ad Aen. x. 393) says, that he received the Roman franchise from L. Cornelius Sulla. He died at Laurentum in a fire which consumed his house, and as soon as his wife heard of the calamity, she hung herself. The statement of Suidas that he was a native of Ephesus is contradicted by Stephanus Byzantius (s. a. Koristos), who says that he was a native of Cotiacum in Lesser Phrygia, and a son of Aesclapiades, and who is borne out by the Etymologicum Magnus (s. w. βιβλιακα και πορίσματα), where Alexander is called Koristos. The surname of Polyhistor was given to him on account of his prodigious learning. He is said to have written innumerable works, but the greatest and most important among them was one consisting of 42 books, which Stephanus Byzantius calls Πανοργία Ταῦτα Αὐγου̉ς. This work appears to have contained historical and geographical accounts of nearly all countries of the ancient world. Each of the forty books treated of a separate country, and bore a corresponding title, such as Phrygica, Carica, Lycaena, &c. But such titles are not always sure indications of a book forming only a part of a work; and the same is manifest that particular countries were treated of in separate works. Thus we find mention of the first book of a separate work on Crete (SchoI. ad Apollon. Rhod. iv. 1492), and of another on the "Tractus Illyricus." (Val. Max. viii. 13, ext. 7.) These geographical-historical works are referred to in innumerable passages of Stephanus Byzantius and Phlny. A separate work on the Phrygian

ALEXANDER ('Αλέξανδρος), a Greek Grammarian, who is mentioned among the instructors of the emperor M. Antoninus. (Capitol. M. Ant. 2; M. Antonin. i. § 10.) We still possess a κέρας τερετζάριον pronounced upon him by the rhetorician Aristides. (Vol. i. Orat. xii. p. 142, &c.) [L. S.]

ALEXANDER, son of Herod. [Hierod.] ALEXANDER ('Αλέξανδρος). 1. Bishop of Hierapolis in Phrygia, flourished A. D. 253. He was the author of a book entitled, Οι νέες τιναθείς introduced by Christ into the world τι κακον ενθενεργηκε κεφ. υ' ; not extant. (Suid.)

2. Bishop of Hierapolis, A. D. 431. He was sent by John, bishop of Antioch, to advocate the cause of Nestorius at the Council of Ephesus. His hostility to St. Cyril was such, that he openly charged him with Apollinarism, and rejected the communion of John, Theodoret, and the other Eastern bishops, on their reconciliation with him. He appealed to the pope, but was rejected, and was at last banished by the emperor to Famothi in Egypt. Twenty-three letters of his are extant in Latin in the Synodicon adversus Pragmatism Veneiæ cap. Novem Collectionem Conciliorum a Biblioth. p. 670, &c. Paris, 1683. [A. J. C.]

ALEXANDER ('Αλέξανδρος), St., HIEROSOLYMITANUS, a disciple, first, of Pantaenus, then of St. Clement, at Alexandria, where he became acquainted with Origen, (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vi. 14.) was bishop of Philippios, (Tillemont, Hist. Eccl. iii. 415.) in Cappadocia. (S. Hier. Pir. Ill. § 62.) In the persecution under Severus he was thrown into prison, (cire. A. D. 204, Euseb. vii. 11.) where he remained till Asclepiades succeeded Serapion at Antioch, A. D. 211, the beginning of Caracalla's reign. (See [s] the Epitaph. ALEXANDER I. II., kings of Egypt. [Prolemarians.]

ALEXANDER ('Αλέξανδρος) I., king of Epirus, was the son of Neoptolemus and brother of Olympus, the mother of Alexander the Great. He came at an early age to the court of Philip of Macedonia, and after the Grecian fashion became the object of his attachment. Philip in requital made him king of Epirus, after dethroning his cousin Acaecides. When Olympus was repudiated by her husband, she went to her brother, and endeavoured to induce him to make war on Philip. Philip, however, declined the contest, and formed a second alliance with him by giving him his daughter Cleopatra in marriage. (P. c. 336.) At the wedding Philip was assassinated by Pausanias. In b. c. 332, Alexander, at the request of the Tarentines, crossed over into Italy, to aid them against the Lucanians and Bruttii. After a victory near Pandosia, on the banks of the Acheron, and compelled to engage under unfavourable circumstances from the Bruttii. But in b. c. 326, through the treachery of some Lucanian exiles, he was compelled to engage under unfavourable circumstances near Pandosia, on the banks of the Acheron, and fell by the hand of one of the exiles, as he was crossing the river; thus accomplishing the prophecy of the oracle of Dodona, which had hidden him be-lates (c.), that by Divine revelation he became coadjutor bishop to Narcissus, bishop of Aelia, i.e. Jerusalem, a. d. 212. (See Euseb. H. E. vi. 8; Chronic. ad a. d. 223, and Alexander's [2] Epistle to the Antiochites ap. Euseb. H. E. vi. 11.) During his episcopate of nearly forty years (for he continued bishop on the death of St. Narcissus), he collected a valuable library of Ecclesiastical Epistles, which existed in the time of Eusebius. (H. E. vi. 20.) He received Origen when the troubles at Alexandria drove him thence, a. d. 216, and made him, though a layman, explain the Scriptures publicly, a proceeding which he justified in [7] an epistle to Bishop Demetrius, of Alexandria, (up. Euseb. H. E. vi. 10,) who, however, sent some deacons to bring Origen home. As Origen was passing through Palestine, on some necessary business, St. Alexander ordained him bishop. (S. Hier. l.c. §§ 54, 62,) which caused great disturbance in the church. (Origens.) A fragment of a [5] letter from St. Alexander to Origen on the subject exists, ap. Euseb. H. E. vi. 14. St. Alexander died in the Decian persecution, a. d. 251, in prison (S. Dion. Alex. ap. Euseb. H. E. vi. 46) after great sufferings (Euseb. vi. 39), and is commemorated in the Eastern church on 12th December, in the Western church on 12th March. Mazabanes succeeded him. St. Clement of Alexandria dedicated to him his De Commo Ecclesiastico about the observance of Easter. (H. E. vi. 13.) His fragments have been mentioned in chronological order, and are collected in Galland, Bibl. Patr. ii. p. 201, and in Routh's Antiq. Sac. i. p. 39. [A. J. C.] ALEXANDER, JANNAEUS (AjjaiAos), was born at Paneas, and a Greek rhetorician and poet. He called Alexander Ephesian, and must have lived shortly before the time of Strabo (xiv. p. 642), who mentions him among the more recent Ephesian authors, and also states, that he took a part in the political affairs of his native city. Strabo ascribes to him a history, and poems of a didactic kind, viz. one on astronomy and another on geography, in which he describes the great continents of the world, treating of each in a separate work or book, which, as we learn from other sources, bore the name of the continent of which it contained an account. What kind of history it was that Strabo alludes to, is uncertain. The so-called Aurelius Victor (de Orig. Gent. Rom. 9) quotes it, it is true, the first book of a history of the Marsic war by Alexander the Ephesian; but this authority is more than doubtful. Some writers have supposed that this Alexander is the author of the history of the succession of Greek philosophers (ad eos filos°

..duce*), which is so often referred to by Diogenes Laertius (i. 116, ii. 19, 106, iii. 4, 5, iv. 62, vii. 179, viii. 24, ix. 61; but this work belonged probably to Alexander Polyhistor. His geographical poem, of which several fragments are still extant, is frequently referred to by Stephanus Byzantius and others. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Atticus, Ἀπίπος, Τανταλίδης, Διόρας, Τρικαλός, Μελεσίας, &c.; comp. Eustath. ad Dionys. Perig. 388, 591.) Of his astronomical poem a fragment is still extant, which has been erroneously attributed by Ogle (Addenda ad Pater. p. 49) and Schneider (ad Vitruv. ii. p. 23, &c.) to Alexander Polyclus. (See Nauck, Scholia Critica, p. 7, &c.) It is highly probable that Cicero (ad Att. ii. 20, 22) is speaking of Alexander Lychnus when he says, that Alexander is not a good poet, a careless writer, but yet possesses some information. [L. S.]

ALEXANDER LYCOPOLITES (Alexander Lycopolites), was so called from Lycopolis, in Egypt, whether as born there, or because he was bishop there, is uncertain. At first a pagan, he was next instructed in Manicheism by persons acquainted with Manes himself. Converted to the faith, he wrote a refutation of the heresy (Tractatus de Placitatis Manichaeorum) in Greek, which was first published by Combes, with a Latin version, in the Auctarium Novissimum Bibl. sa. Patr. Ps. ii. pag. 3, &c. It is published also by Galland, Bibl. Patr. vol. iv. p. 78. He was bishop of Lycopolis, (Phot. Epitome de Usmit. ap. Manvilia, Bibl. Cod. iii. p. 334,) and probably immediately preceded Melussia. (Le Quien, Orient. Xviii. vol. ii p. 597.) [A. J. C.]

ALEXANDER (Alexander), the son of Lyssmachus by an Odrysian woman, whom Polyaeus (vi. 12) calls Macron. On the murder of his brother Agathocles [see p. 65, a] by command of his father in B. c. 284, he fled into Asia with the widow of his brother, and solicited aid of Seleucus. A war ensued in consequence between Seleucus and Lyssmachus, which terminated in the defeat and death of the latter, who was slain in battle in B. c. 281, in the plain of Coras in Phrygia. His body was conveyed by his son Alexander to the Chersonesus, and there interred between Gorgia and Pactya, where his tomb was remaining in the time of Pausanias. (i. 10, § 4, 5; Appian, Syr. 64.)

ALEXANDER I. (Alexander), the tenth king of Macedonia, was the son of Amyntas I. When Megabazus sent to Macedonia, about B. c. 507, to demand earth and water, as a token of submission to Darius, Amyntas was still reigning. At a banquet given to the Persian envoys, the latter demanded the presence of the ladies of the court, and Amyntas, through fear of his guest, ordered them to attend. But when the Persians proceeded to offer indignities to them, Alexander caused them to retire, under pretence of arraying them more beautifully, and introduced in their stead some Macedonian youths, dressed in female attire, who slew the Persians. As the Persians did not return, Megabazus sent Bubares with some troops into Macedonia; but Alexander escaped the danger by giving his sister Gygaea in marriage to the Persian general. According to Justin, Alexander succeeded his father in the kingdom soon after these events. (Herod. v. 17—21, viii. 136; Justin, vii. 2—4.) In B. c. 492, Macedonia was obliged to submit to the Persian general Mardonius (Herod. vi. 44); and in Xerxes' invasion of Greece (c. 480), Alexander accompanied the Persian army. He gained the confidence of Mardonius, and was sent by him to Athens after the battle of Salamis, to propose peace to the Athenians, which he strongly recommended, under the conviction that it was impossible to contend with the Persians. He was unsuccessful in his mission; but though he continued in the Persian army, he was always secretly inclined to the cause of the Greeks, and informed them the night before the battle of Plataea of the intention of Mardonius to fight on the following day. (viii. 136, 140—143, ix. 44, 45.) He was alive in B. c. 463, when Cimon recovered Thasos. (Plut. Cim. 14.) He was succeeded by Perdiccas II.

Alexander was the first member of the royal family of Macedonia, who presented himself as a competitor at the Olympic games, and was admitted to them after proving his Greek descent. (Herod. v. 22; Justin, vii. 2.) In his reign Macedonia received a considerable accession of territory. (Thuc. ii. 99.)

ALEXANDER II. (Alexander), the sixteenth king of MACEDONIA, the eldest son of Amyntas II., succeeded his father in B. c. 369, and appears to have reigned nearly two years, though Diodorus assigns only one to his reign. While engaged in Thessaly in a war with Alexander of Pherae, a usurper rose up in Macedonia of the name of Ptolemy Alorites, whom Diodorus, apparently without good authority, calls a brother of the king. Pelopidas, being called in to mediate between them, left Alexander in possession of the kingdom, but took with him to Thebes several hostages; among whom, according to some accounts, was Philip, the youngest brother of Alexander, afterwards king of Macedonia, and father of Alexander the Great. But he had scarcely left Macedonia, before Alexander was murdered by Ptolemy Alorites, or according to Justin (vii. 5), through the intrigues of his mother, Eurydice.

Pelop. surnamed the Great, was born at her he traced his descent from the great hero

of his father, and the ardent enthusiasm and ungovernable passions of his mother. His mother belonged to the royal house of Epeirus, and through

her he traced his descent from the great hero

Achilles. His early education was committed to Leonidas and Lysimachus, the former of whom was a relation of his mother's, and the latter an Acarnanian. Leonidas early accustomed him to desire toil and hardship, but Lysimachus recommended himself to his royal pupil by obsequious flattery. But Alexander was also placed under the care of Aristotle, who acquired an influence over his mind and character, which is manifest to the latest period of his life. Aristotle wrote for his use a treatise on the art of government; and the clear and comprehensive views of the political relations of nations and of the nature of government, which Alexander shews in the midst of all his conquests, may fairly be ascribed to the lessons he had received in his youth from the greatest of philosophers. It is not impossible too that his love

had received in his youth from the greatest of philosophers. It is not impossible too that his love of discovery, which distinguishes him from the herd of vulgar conquerors, may also have been implanted in him by the researches of Aristotle. Nor was his physical education neglected. He was early trained in all manly and athletic sports; in horsemanship he excelled all of his age; and in the art of war he had the advantage of his father's instruction.

At the early age of sixteen, Alexander was entrusted with the government of Macedonia by his father, while he was obliged to leave his kingdom to march against Byzantium. He first distinguished himself, however, at the battle of Chaeronea

(b. c. 338), where the victory was mainly owing to himself, however, at the battle of Chaeronea

(b. c. 338), where the victory was mainly owing to his approach. The city was taken by assault; nil the inhabitants butchered, and the rest sold as slaves.

Athena pursued a similar fate, and sent an embassy

deprecating his wrath; but Alexander did not advance further; the punishment of Thebes was a sufficient warning to Greece.

Alexander now directed all his energy to prepare for the expedition against Persia. In the spring of b. c. 334, he crossed over the Hellespont into Asia with an army of about 35,000 men. Of these 30,000 were foot and 5000 horse; and of the former only 12,000 were Macedonians. But experience had shown that this was a force which no Persian king could resist. Darius, the reigning king of Persia, had no military skill, and could only hope to oppose Alexander by engaging the services of mercenaries, of whom he obtained large supplies.

Alexander's first engagement with the Persians was on the banks of the Granicus, where they attempted to prevent his passage over it. Memnon, a Rhodian Greek, was in the army of the Persians,

and had recommended them to withdraw as Alexander's army advanced, and lay waste the country;

but this advice was not followed, and the Persians were defeated. Memnon was the ablest general that Darius had, and his death in the following year (b. c. 333) relieved Alexander from a formidable opponent. After the capture of Halicarnassus, Memnon had collected a powerful fleet, in which

Alexander was greatly deficient; he had taken

many of the islands in the Aegean, and threatened Macedonia.

Before marching against Darius, Alexander thought it expedient to subdue the chief towns on the western coast of Asia Minor. The last event of importance in the campaign was the capture of Halicarnassus, which was not taken till late in the autumn, after a vigorous defence by Memnon.

Alexander marched along the coast of Lydia and Pamphylia, and then northward into Phrygia and to Gordium, where he cut or untied the celebrated

Gordian knot, which, it was said, was to be loosened only by the conqueror of Asia.

In b. c. 333, he was joined at Gordium by reforcements from Macedonia, and commenced his second campaign. From Gordium he marched through the centre of Asia Minor into Cilicia to the city of Tarsus, where he nearly lost his life by a fever, brought on by his great exertions, or through throwing himself, when heated, into the Isthmus of Corinth, with the sole exception of the Lacedaemonians, elected him to the command against Persia, which had previously been bestowed upon his father. Being now at liberty to reduce the barbarians of the north to obedience, he marched (early in b. c. 334) across mount Haemus, defeated the Triballi, and advanced as far as the Dunbe, which he crossed, and received embassies from the Scythians and other nations. On his return, he marched westward, and subdued the Illyrians and Taulantii, who were obliged to submit to the Macedonian supremacy. While engaged in these distant countries, a report of his death reached Greece, and the Thebans once more took up arms. But a terrible punishment awaited them. He advanced into Boeotia by rapid marches, and appeared before the gates of the city almost before the inhabitants had received intelligence of his approach. The city was taken by assault; nil the buildings, with the exception of the house of Pin-dar, were levelled with the ground; most of the inhabitants was butchered, and the rest sold as slaves.

Athens feared a similar fate, and sent an embassy

deprecating his wrath; but Alexander did not advance further; the punishment of Thebes was a

sufficient warning to Greece.
Alexander, who feared lest he should attempt to revenge his son. Several other trials for treason had been brought against him, and Parmenion, who had been himself a personal friend of Alexander, was accused of a plot against the king's life. He was accused by Alexander before the army, condemned, and put to death. Parmenion, who was at the head of an army at Ecbatana, was also put to death by command of Alexander, who feared lest he should attempt to revenge his son. Several other trials for treason followed, and many Macedonians were executed.

Alexander now advanced through the country of the Ariaspis to the Arachotis, a people west of the Indus, whom he conquered. Their conquest and the complete subjugation of Arachotis occupied the winter of this year. (B. C. 332.) In the beginning of the following year (B. C. 331), Alexander founded at the mouth of the western branch of the river Acheron, the city of Ecbatana, which he entrusted to the care of Parmenion, who was at the head of an army at Ecbatana, and who was also a personal friend of Alexander. He then turned southwards through the desert and thus reached the temple of Jupiter Ammon, and after preceding from Alexandria along the coast to Paraeotonium, he turned southwards through the desert and thus reached the temple. He was saluted by the priests as the son of Jupiter Ammon.

In the beginning of the same year (B. C. 331), Alexander set out to meet Darius, who had collected another army. He marched through Phoenicia and Syria to the Euphrates, which he crossed at the ford of Thapsacus; from thence he proceeded through Mesopotamia, crossed the Tigris, and at length met with the immense hosts of Darius, said to have amounted to more than a million of men, in the plains of Gaugamela. The battle was fought in the month of October, B. C. 331, and ended in the complete defeat of the Persians, who suffered immense slaughter. Alexander pursued the fugitives to Arbela (Erbil), which place has given its name to the battle, and which was distant about fifty miles from the spot where it was fought. Darius, who had left the field of battle early in the day, fled to Ecbatana (Hamadan), in Medin. Alexander was now the conqueror of Asia; and he began to assume all the pomp and splendour of an Asiatic despot. His adoption of Persian habits and customs tended doubtless to conccalate the affections of his new subjects; but those outward signs of eastern royalty were also accompanied by many acts worthy only of an eastern tyrant; he exercised no control over his passions, and frequently gave way to the most violent and ungovernable excesses.

From Arbela, Alexander marched to Babylon, Susa, and Persepolis, where all surrendered without striking a blow. He is said to have set fire to the palace of Persepolis, and, according to some accounts, in the revelry of a banquet, at the instigation of Thais, an Athenian courtesan.

At the beginning of B. C. 330, Alexander marched from Persepolis into Medin, where Darius had collected a new force. On his approach, Darius fled through Rhaugae and the passes of the Elburz mountains, called by the ancients the Caspian Gates, into the Bactrian provinces. After stopping a short time at Ecbatana, Alexander pursued him through the deserts of Parthia, and had nearly reached him, when the unfortunate king was murdered by Bessus, satrap of Bactria, and his associates. Alexander sent his body to Persepolis, to be buried in the tombs of the Persian kings. Bessus escaped to Bactria, and assumed the title of king of Persia. Alexander advanced into Hyrcania, in order to gain over the remnant of the Greeks of Darius's army, who were assembled there. After some negotiation he succeeded; they were all pardoned, and a great many of them taken into his pay. After spending fifteen days at Zadrucena, the capital of Parthia, he marched to the frontiers of Areia, which he entrusted to Satibarzanes, the former satrap of the country, and set out on his march towards Bactria to attack Bessus, but had not proceeded far, when he was recalled by the revolt of Satibarzanes. By incredible exertions he returned to Artacacena, the capital of the province, in two days' march; the satrap took to flight, and a new governor was appointed. Instead of resuming his march into Bactria, Alexander seems to have thought it more prudent to subdue the south-eastern parts of Areia, and accordingly marched into the country of the Drangae and Strangae.

During the army's stay at Prophthasis, the capital of the Drangae, an event occurred, which shows the altered character of Alexander, and represents him in the light of a suspicious oriental despot. Phileas, the son of his faithful general Parmenion, who had been himself a personal friend of Alexander, was accused of a plot against the king's life. He was accused by Alexander before the army, condemned, and put to death. Parmenion, who was at the head of an army at Ecbatana, was also put to death by command of Alexander, who feared lest he should attempt to revenge his son. Several other trials for treason followed, and many Macedonians were executed.
Hindoo Coosh, and marched into Bactria against Bessus. On the approach of Alexander, Bessus fled across the Oxus into Sogdiana. Alexander followed him, and transported his army across the river on the skins of the tents stuffed with straw. Shortly after the passage Bessus was betrayed into his hands, and, after being cruelly mutilated by order of Alexander, was put to death. From the Oxus Alexander advanced as far as the Jaxartes (the Sir), which he crossed, and defeated several Scythian tribes north of that river. After founding a city Alexandria on the Jaxartes, he retraced his steps, recrossed the Oxus, and returned to Zariaspa or Bactra, where he spent the winter of 329. It was here that Alexander killed his friend Cleitus in a drunken revel. [CLEITUS.]

In the spring of B.C. 328, Alexander again crossed the Oxus to complete the subjugation of Sogdiana, but was not able to effect it in the year, and accordingly went into winter quarters at Nautae, a place in the middle of the province. At the beginning of the following year, B.C. 327, he took a mountain fortress, in which Oxyartes, a Bactrian prince, had deposited his wife and daughters. The beauty of Roxana, one of the latter, captivated the conqueror, and he accordingly made her his wife. This marriage with one of his eastern subjects was in accordance with the whole of his policy. Having completed the conquest of Sogdiana, Alexander marched southward into Bactria, and made preparations for the invasion of India. While in Bactria, another conspiracy was discovered for the murder of the king. The plot was formed by Hermolaus with a number of the royal pages, and Callisthenes, a pupil of Aristotle, was involved in it. All the conspirators were put to death.

Alexander did not leave Bactria till late in the spring of B.C. 327, and crossed the Indus, probably near the modern Attock. He now entered the country of the Punjaub, or the Five Rivers. Taxila, the ancient capital of the Sattas, or Sattas, of whom the former one, a Persian, whom he put to death, for oppressing the province.

Alexander remained thirty days on the Hydaspes, during which time he founded two towns, one on each bank of the river: one was called Bucephala, in honour of his horse Bucephalus, who died here, after carrying him through so many victories; and the other Nicopolis, to commemorate his victory. He then marched back to Jaxartes, which he crossed, and subsequently to the Jaxartes (the Jhelum), which he crossed, and subsequently to the Hydaspes (the Ravee), which he also crossed, to attack another Parnus, who had prepared to resist him. But as he approached nearer, his Parnus fled, and his dominions were given to the one whom he had conquered on the Hydaspes. The Catrei, however, who also went east of the Hydaspes, offered a vigorous resistance, but were defeated. Alexander still pressed forward till he reached the Hyphasis (Sarm), which he was preparing to cross, when the Macedonians, worn out by long service, and tired of the war, refused to proceed; and Alexander, notwithstanding his entreaties and prayers, was obliged to lead them back. He returned to the Hydaspes, where he had previously given orders for the building of a fleet, and then sailed down the river with about 8000 men, while the remainder marched along the banks in two divisions. This was the autumn of 326 B.C. A large number of people on each side of the river submitted without resistance, except the Malli, in the conquest of one of whose places Alexander was severely wounded. At the confluence of the Acesines and the Indus, Alexander founded a city, and left Philip as satrap, with a considerable body of Greeks. Here he built some fresh ships, and shortly afterwards sent about a third of the army, under Craterus, through the country of the Archonti and Drangae into Carmania. He himself continued his voyage down the Indus, founded a city at Patalkh, the apex of the delta of the Indus, and sailed into the Indian ocean. He seems to have reached the mouth of the Indus about the middle of 326. Nearchus was sent with the fleet to sail along the coast to the Persian Gulf [NEARCHUS], and Alexander set out from Patalkh, about September, to return to Persia. In his march through Gedrosia, his army suffered greatly from want of water and provisions, till they arrived at Pura, where they obtained supplies. From Pura he advanced to Carman (Kirman), the capital of Carmania, where he was joined by Craterus, with his detachment of the army, and also by Nearchus, who had accomplished the voyage in safety. Alexander sent the great body of the army, under Hephastion, along the Persian gulf, while he himself, with a small force, marched to Pasargadæ, and thence to Persepolis, where he appointed Peucestas, a Macedonian, governor, in place of the former one, a Persian, whom he put to death, for oppressing the provincials.

From Persepolis Alexander advanced to Susa, which he reached in the beginning of 325. Here he allowed himself and his troops some rest from their labours; and faithful to his plan of forming his European and Asiatic subjects into one people, he assigned to about eighty of his generals Asiatic wives, and gave with them rich dowries. He himself took a second wife, Barsine, the eldest daughter of Darius, and according to some accounts, a third, Parysatis, the daughter of Ochus. About 10,000 Macedonians also followed the example of their king and generals, and married Asiatic women; all these received presents from the king. Alexander also enrolled large numbers of Asiatics among his troops, among whom he sought to place the new arrangements of the king, especially in his placing the Persians on an equality with themselves in many respects, rose in mutiny against him, which he quelled with some little difficulty, and he afterwards dismissed about 10,000 Macedonian veterans, who returned to Europe under the command of Craterus. Towards the close of the same year (B.C. 325) he went to Ecbatana.
where he lost his great favourite Hoplestion; and his grief for his loss knew no bounds. From Ecbatana he marched to Babylon, subduing in his way the Cosseis, a mountain tribe; and before he reached Babylon, he was met by ambassadors from almost every part of the known world, who had come to do homage to the new conqueror of Asia.

Alexander reached Babylon in the spring of B.C. 324, about a year before his death, notwithstanding the warnings of the Chaldeans, who predicted evil to him if he entered the city at that time. He intended to make Babylon the capital of his empire, as the best point of communication between his eastern and western dominions. His schemes were numerous and gigantic. His first object was the conquest of Arabia, which was to be followed, it was said, by the subjugation of Italy, Carthage, and the west. But his views were not confined merely to conquest. He sent Hecateides to build a fleet on the Caspian, and to explore that sea, which was said to be connected with the northern ocean. He also intended to improve the distribution of waters in the Babylonian plain, and for that purpose sailed down the Euphrates to inspect the canal called Pollacopas. On his return to Babylon, he found the preparations for the Arabian expedition nearly complete; but almost immediately afterwards he was attacked by a fever, probably brought on by his recent exertions in the marshy districts around Babylon, and aggravated by the quantity of wine he had drunk at a banquet given to his principal officers. He died after an illness of eleven days, in the month of May or June, B.C. 323. He died at the age of twenty-two, after a reign of twelve years and eight months. He appointed no one as his successor, but just before his death he gave his ring to Perdiccas, the regent, and his ring to Roxana, who was the wife of Alexander the Great.

The history of Alexander forms an important epoch in the history of mankind. Unlike other Asiatic conquerors, his progress was marked by something more than devastation and ruin; at every step of his course the Greek language and civilization took root and flourished; and after his death Greek kingdoms were formed in all parts of Asia, which continued to exist for centuries. By his conquests the knowledge of mankind was increased; the sciences of geography, natural history and others, received vast additions; and it was through him that a road was opened to India, and new lands of the most remote East.

No contemporary author of the campaigns of Alexander survives. Our best account comes from Arrian, who lived in the second century of the Christian era, but who drew up his history from the accounts of Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, and Aristobulus of Cassandria. The history of Quintus Curtius, Plutarch's life of Alexander, and the epitomes of Justin and Dio Siculus, were also compiled from earlier writers. The best modern writers on the subject are: St. Croix, Examen critique des anciens Historiens d' Alexandre le Grand, Droysen, Geschichte Alexanders des Grossen; Williams, Life of Alexander; Thirlwall, History of Greece, vols. vi. and vii.

ALEXANDER IV. (Ἀλέξανδρος), king of Macedonia, the son of Alexander the Great and Roxana, was born shortly after the death of his father, in B.C. 323. He was acknowledged as the partner of Philip Arridaeus in the empire, and was under the guardianship of Perdiccas, the regent, till the death of the latter in B.C. 321. He was then for a short time placed under the guardianship of Pithon and the general Arridaeus, and subsequently under that of Antipater, who conveyed him with his mother Roxana, and the king Philip Arridaeus and his wife to Macedonia in 320. (Diod. xviii. 36, 39.) On the death of Antipater in 316, the government fell into the hands of Polyperchon; but Eurydice, the wife of Philip Arridaeus, a daughter by his first wife, held a party in Macedonia in opposition to Polyperchon; and Roxana, dreading her influence, fled with her son Alexander into Epirus, where Olympias had lived for a long time. At the instigation of Olympias, Euceides, king of Epirus, made common cause with Polyperchon, and restored the young Alexander to Macedonia in 317. (Alexander.) Eurydice and her husband were put to death, and the supreme power fell into the hands of Olympias. (xix. 11; Justin, xiv. 5.) But in the following year Cassander obtained possession of Macedonia, put Olympias to death, and imprisoned Alexander and his mother. They remained in prison till the general peace made in 311, when Alexander's title to the crown was recognized. Many of his partisans demanded that he should be immediately released from prison and placed upon the throne Cassander therefore resolved to get rid of so dan gerous a rival, and caused him and his mother Roxana to be murdered secretly in prison. (b.c. 311. Dio, xix. 51, 52, 61, 105; Justin, xvi. 2 Pans. ix. 7. § 2.)

ALEXANDER (Ἀλέξανδρος), a Megalopoli tan. He was originally a Macedonian, but he received the franchise and was settled at Megalopolis about B.C. 190. He pretended to be a descendant of Alexander the Great, and accordingly called his two sons Philip and Alexander. His daughter Apama was married to Amyrindes, king of the Athenians. Her eldest brother Philip, followed her to her court, and being of a still more violent character, he allowed himself to be tempted by the prospect of gaining possession of the crown of Macedonla. (Liv. xxxv. 47; Appian, Sy. 13; comp. Phil. son of Alexander.) (L.S.)

ALEXANDER (Ἀλέξανδρος), brother of Mol. On the accession of Antiochus III., afterwar called the Great, in B.C. 224, he entrusted Alex ander with the government of the satrapies of Persia and Mol. He received Media. Antiochus was the only fifteen years of age, and this circumstance together with the fact that Hermeias, a base flatterer and empy intrigue, whom every one had fear, was all-powerful at his court, induced the tv brothers to form the plan of causing the upp satrapies of the kingdom to revolt. It was a secret wish of Hermeias to see the king involved in many difficulties as possible, and it was on a ALEXANDER, an Athenian painter, one of whose productions is extant, painted on a marble tablet which bears his name. (Winckelmann, vol. ii. p. 47, v. p. 120, ed. Eiselelin.) There was a son of king Perseus of this name, who was a skilful toretes. (Plut. Aemil. Paul. 37.) There was also a M. Lollius Alexander, an engraver, whose name occurs in an inscription in Domi, p. 319, No. 14. [C. P. M.]

ALEXANDER (Ἀλέξανδρος), the Paphlagonian, a celebrated impostor, who flourished about the beginning of the second century (Lucian, Alex. 6), a native of Abonoteichos on the Euxine, and the pupil of a friend of Apolloius Tyanaeus. His history, which is told by Lucian with great naivete, is chiefly an account of the various contrivances by which he established and maintained the credit of an oracle. Being, according to Lucian's account, at his wit's end for the means of life, with many natural advantages of manner and person, he determined on the following imposture. After raising the expectations of the Paphlagonians with a reported visit of the god Assalupius, and giving himself out, under the sanction of an oracle, as a descendant of Perseus, he gratified the expectation which he had himself raised, by finding a serpent, which he juggled out of an egg, in the foundations of the new temple of Assalupius. A larger serpent, which he brought with him from Pella, was disguised with a human head, until the dull Paphlagonians really believed that a new god Glycon had appeared among them, and gave oracles in the likeness of a serpent. Dark and crowded rooms, juggling tricks, and the pretense that all the arts of more vulgar magicians, were the chief means used to impose on a credulous populace, which Lucian detects with as much zest as any modern sceptic in the marvels of animal magnetism. Every one who attempted to expose the impostor, was accused of being a Christian or Epicurean; and even Lucian, who amused himself with his contradictory oracle, hardly escaped the effects of his malignity. He had his spies at Rome, and busied himself with the affairs of the whole world: at the time when a pestilence was raging, many were executed at his instigation, as the authors of this calamity. He said, that the soul of Pythagoras had migrated into his body, and prophesied that he should live a hundred and fifty years, and then die from the fall of a thunderbolt: unfortunately, an ulcer in the leg put an end to his imposture in the seventieth year of his age, just as he was in the height of his glory, and had requested the emperor to have a medal struck in honour of himself and the new god. The influence he attained over the populace seems incredible; indeed, the narrative of Lucian would appear to be a mere romance, were it not confirmed by some medals of Antoninus and M. Aurelius. [B. ALEXANDER (Ἀλέξανδρος) of Paphius, a Greek writer on mythology of uncertain date. Eustathius (ad Hom. Od. x. pp. 1658, 1713) refers to him as his authority. [L. S.]

ALEXANDER (Ἀλέξανδρος), surmounted Polylatoorous (Πολυλατοορούς), a Greek rhetorician of the age of the Antonines, was a son of Alexander of Seleucia, in Glicia, and of Vecleusia. (Philosor. Vit. Soph. ii. § 1, compared with Epist. Apollon. Tyman. 13, where the father of Alexander Pelopla-
ALEXANDER. (\'A\'lexa\'ndros), son of Perseus, king of Macedonia, was a child at the conquest of his father by the Romans, and after the triumph of Aemilius Paullus in B.C. 167, was kept in custody at Abdera, together with his father. He became skilful in the toretic art, learned the Latin language, and became a public notary. (Liv. xlv. 42; Plut. Aem. Paull. 37.)

ALEXANDER (\'A\'lexa\'ndros), tyrant of Pharsae. The accounts of his usurpation vary somewhat in minor points; Diodorus (xiv. 61) tells us that, on the assumption of power, B.C. 167, Polydorus his brother ruled for a year, and was then poisoned by Alexander, another brother. According to Xenophon (Hed. vi. 4 § 34), Polydorus was murdered by his brother Polyphron, and Polyphron, in his turn, B.C. 369, * by Alexander—his nephews, according to Plutarch, who relates also that

ALEXANDER worshipped as a god the spear with which he slew his uncle. (Plut. Ptol. p. 293, &c.; Wess. ad Diod. l. c.) Alexander governed tyrannically, and according to Diodorus (l. c.), differently from the former rulers, but Polyphron, at least, seems to have set him the example. (Xen. l. c.) The Thessalian states, however, which had acknowledged the authority of Jason the Tagus (Xen. Hed. vi. 1 § 4, 5, &c.; Diod. xvi. 60), were not so willing to submit to the oppression of Alexander the tyrant, and they applied therefore (and especially the old family of the Alcandae of Larissa, who hated him) to Alexander, king of Macedon, son of Amyntas II. The tyrant, with his characteristic energy, prepared to meet his enemy in Macedonia, but the king anticipated him, and, reaching Larissa, was admitted into the city, obliged the Thessalian Alexander to flee to Pharsae, and left a garrison in Larissa, as well as in Cenon, which had also come over to him. (Diod. xvi. 61.) But the Macedonians having retired, his friends in Thessaly, dreading the vengeance of Alexander, sent for aid to Thebes, the policy of which state, of course, was to check a neighbour who might otherwise become so formidable, and Pelopidas was accordingly despatched to succour them. On the arrival of the latter, at Thessaly (Diod. xvi. 67) he dislodged the Macedonian garrison, Alexander presented himself and offered submission; but soon after escaped by flight, alarmed by the indignation which Pelopidas expressed at the tales he heard of his cruelty and tyrannical profligies. (Diod. l. c.; Plut. Ptol. p. 291, d.) These events appear to be referable to the early part of the year 368. In the summer of that year Pelopidas was again sent into Thessaly, in consequence of fresh complaints against Alexander. Accompanied by Ismenius, he went merely as a negotiator, and without any military force, and venturing incursively within the power of the tyrant, was seized by him and thrown into prison. (Diod. xvi. 71; Plut. Ptol. p. 293, d; Polyb. viii. 1.) The language of Demostenes (e. Aristoc. p. 660) will hardly support Mitford's inferences, that Pelopidas was taken prisoner in battle. (See Mitford, Gr. Hist. ch. 27, sect. 5.) The Thessalians sent a large army into Thessaly to rescue Pelopidas, but they could not keep the field against the superior cavalry of Alexander, who, aided by auxiliaries from Athens, pursued them with great slaughter; and the destruction of the whole Theban army is said to have been averted only by the ability of Epaminondas, who was serving in the campaign, but not as general.

The next year, 367, was signalized by a specimen of Alexander's treacherous cruelty, in the massacre of the citizens of Scutussa (Plut. Pet. p. 293; Diod. xvi. 75; Paus. vi. 5); and also by another expedition of the Thebans under Epaminondas into Thessaly, to effect the release of Pelopidas, whereupon, according to Plutarch, the tyrant did not dare to offer resistance, and was glad to purchase even at thirty days' truce by the delivery of the prisoners (Plut. Pet. pp. 293, 294; Diod. xvi. 75.) During the next three years Alexander would seem to have renewed his attempts against the states of Thessaly, especially those of Magnesia and Phthiotis (Plut. Pet. p. 295, a), for at the end of that time, B.C. 364, we find them again applying to Thebes for protection against him. The army ap pointed to march under Pelopidas is said to have been dismayed by an eclipse (June 15, 364), and Pelopidas, leaving it behind, entered Thebes at the head of three hundred volunteer horsemen and some mercenaries. A battle ensued at Cynoscephalae, wherein Pelopidas was himself slain, but defeated Alexander (Plut. Per. pp. 295, 296; Diod. xv. 80); and this victory was closely followed by another of the Thebans under Malcites and Diogiton, who obliged Alexander to restore to the Thessalians the conquered towns, to confine himself to Pherece, and to be a dependent ally of Thebes. (Plut. Per. p. 297, &c.; Diod. xv. 80; comp. Xen. Hell. vii. 8. § 4.)

The death of Eumenes in 362, if it freed Athens from fear of Thebes, appears at the same time to have exposed her to annoyance from Alexander, who, as though he felt that he had no further occasion for keeping up his Athenian alliance, made a piratical descent on the town and other of the Cyclades, plundering them, and making slaves of the inhabitants. Peparethus too he besieged, and even landed troops in Attica itself, and took several Attic triremes, and plundered the territory of the inhabitants. Paretus too he besieged, and even landed troops in Attica itself, and seized the port of Panormus, a little eastward of Sunium. Leosthenes, the Athenian admiral, defeated him, and relieved Peparethus, but Alexander delivered his men from blockade in Panormus, took several Attic triremes, and plundered the Pelopaeans. (Diod. xv. 95; Polyen. vi. 2; Demosth. c. Polijd. 14; Polyb. pp. 1207, 1208; arctp. rpirjp. c. Polijd. 1.)

The murder of Alexander is assigned by Dio- dorus to B. c. 367. Plutarch gives a detailed ac- count of it, showing a finely painted picture of a semi-barbarian palace. Guards watched throughout it all the night, except at the tyrant's bedchamber, which was situated at the top of a ladder, and at the door of which a ferocious dog was chained. Thebe, the wife and cousin of Alexander, and daughter of Jasion (Plut. Per. p. 293, a), concealed her three brothers in the house during the day, unused the dog to be removed when Alexander had retired to rest, and having covered the steps of the ladder with wool, brought up the young men to her husband's chamber. Though she had taken away Alexander's sword, they feared to set about the deed till she threatened to awake him and dis- cover all: they then entered and despatched him. Of Thebe's motive for the murder different accounts are given. Plutarch states it to have been fear of her husband, together with hatred of his cruel and brutal charac- ter, and, ascribes these feelings principally to her representations of Pelopidas, when she vi- site him in his prison. In Cicon the deed is said to have been eared by a jester. (Plut. Per. pp. 293, b, 297, d; Diod. xvi. 14; Xen. Hell. vi. 4. § 37; Cie. de Off. 7.) See also Cie. de Inv. ii. 49, where Alex- ander's murder illustrates a knotty point for spe- cial pleading; also Arist. op. Cie. de Din. i. 25; de dreem of Endemus.)

ALEXANDER PHILALETHES ('Αλεξάνδρος Φιλάλεθης), an ancient Greek physician, who called himself Octavius Hatarinaeus (Iv. p. 102, ed. argent. cor.) is the same person who is probably the same person who is quoted by Julius Aelianus (De Morb. Acut. ii. p. 74) under the name of Alexander Locidias. He lived probably towards the end of the first century before Christ, as Strabo speaks of him (xii. p. 580) as a contemporary; he was a pupil of Aesculapius (Octav. Horat. c. 26), succeeder Zexias as head of a celebrated Herophilian school of medicine, es- tablished in Phrygia between Laodicea and Caria (Strab. i. c.), and it was tutor to Aristoxenus and Demosthenes Philalethes. (Gal. de Differ. Pals. iv. 4, 10, vol. viii. pp. 797, 796.) He is several times mentioned by Galen and also by Soranus (De Arte Oculat. c. 93, p. 210), and appears to have written some medical works, which are no longer extant. [W. A. G.]

ALEXANDER ('Αλεξάνδρος), was appointed governor of Pheros by Philip III. of Macedon. The Phocian town of Phanoteus was commanded by Jason, to whom he had entrusted this post. In concert with him he invited the Aetolians to come and take possession of the town, promising that it should be opened and surrendered to them. The Aetolians, under the command of Agetus, accordingly entered the town at night; and when their best men were within the walls, they were made prisoners by Alexander and his associate. This happened in B.C. 217. (Polyb. v. 96.) [T. S.]

ALEXANDER POLYHISTOR. [ALEXANDER CORNELIUS.]

ALEXANDER ('Αλεξάνδρος), son of Poly- perchon, the Macedonian. The reign Antipater, on his death (B.C. 320), left the regency to Polyperchon, to the exclusion and consequent dis- content of his own son, Cassander. (Diod. xviii. 48; Plut. Per. p. 755, f.) The chief men, who had been placed in authority by Antipater in the gar- risoned towns of Greece, were friends of Cassander, as their patron's son, and Polyperchon's policy, therefore, was to reverse the measures of Antipater, and restore democra where it had been abolished by the latter. It was then, in the pro- secution of this design, that his son Alexander was sent to Athens, B.C. 318, with the alleged object of delivering the city from Nicanor, who by Cas- sander's appointment commanded the garrison placed by Antipater in Munychia. (Plut. Per. 755, f. 756, e; Diod. xviii. 65.) Before his arrival, Nicanor, besides strengthening himself with fresh troops in Munychia, had also treacherously seized the Peiraeus. To occupy these two ports himself soon appeared to be no less the intention of Alexander,—an intention which he had probably formed before any communication with Phocion, though Dioscorus (L.c.) seems to imply the contrary. The Athenians, however, looked on Phocion as the au- thor of the design, and their suspicions and anger being excited by the private conferences of Alex- ander with Nicanor, Phocion was accused of treason, and, fleeing with several of his friends to Alexander, was by him despatched to Polyper- chon. (Diod. xviii. 66; Plut. Per. 756, f. 757, a.) Cassander, arriving at Athens soon after and occu- pying the Peiraeus, was there besieged by Poly- perchon with a large force; but the supplies of the latter being inadequate, he was obliged to with- draw a portion of his army, with which he went to attempt the reduction of Megalopolis, while Alex- ander was left in command of the remainder at Athens. (Diod. xviii. 68.) Here he appears to have written some medical works, which are no longer extant. [E. E.]
ALEXANDER.

When Polyperchon, baffled at Megalopolis (Diod. xvi. 72), withdrew into Macedon, his son seems to have been left with an army in Peloponnese, where, as we read in Diodorus (xix. 33), the siege was left open to him, and the friends of oligarchy were greatly alarmed by the departure of Cassander into Macedon on the intelligence of the murder of Archilam and Eurydice by Olympias, b. c. 317. (Paus. i. 11 ; Diod. xix. 11.) During his absence, Alexander succeeded in bringing over to himself several cities and important places in the Peloponnese (Diod. xix. 55); but, on Cassander's return to the south, after crushing Olympias in Macedonia, he vainly attempted to check him by his fortification of the Isthmus, for Cassander, passing to Epidaurus by sea, regained Argos and Hermione, and afterwards also the Messenian towns, with the exception of Ithome. (Diod. xix. 54.)

In the next year, 315, Antigonus (whose ambition and successes in the east had united against him Cassander, Lysimachus, Asander, and Ptolemy Soter), amongst other measures, sent Aristodemus into the Peloponnese to form a league of unity with Polyperchon and Alexander; and the latter was persuaded by Aristodemus to pass over to Asia for a personal conference with Antigonus. Finding him at Tyre, a treaty was made between them, and Alexander returned to Greece with a present of 300 talents from Antigonus, and a multitude of magnificent promises. (Diod. xix. 60, 61.) Yet, in the very same year, we find him renouncing his alliance with Antigonus, and bribed by the title of governor of the Peloponnese to reconcile himself to Cassander. (Diod. xix. 64.)

In the ensuing year, 314, we read of him as engaged in a conference with Antigonus. Finding him at Tyre, a treaty was made between them, and Alexander returned to Greece with a present of 500 talents from Antigonus, and a multitude of magnificent promises. (Diod. xix. 60, 61.) Yet, in the very same year, we find him renouncing his alliance with Antigonus, and bribed by the title of governor of the Peloponnese to reconcile himself to Cassander. (Diod. xix. 64.)

ALEXANDER (Ἀλέξανδρος), a Rhodian. In the war against Cassius he was at the head of the popular party, and was raised to the office of praetor, b. c. 43. (Appian, de Bell. Civ. iv. 66.) But soon after, he and the Rhodian admiral, Musæus, were defeated by Cassius in a sea-fight off Cnidus. (Appian, de Bell. Civ. iv. 71.)

ALEXANDER (ST.), bishop of Rome, a. d. 109–119. (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. iv. 4.) There are three Epistles falsely ascribed to him by Isidor Mercator, as well as a decree, according to Gratian. (Mansi, Concilia, vol. i. pp. 643–647.) Heracleon is said (in the book Pseudo-Clementine, ap. Sirmond. Opp. vol. i. p. 470) to have bronched his heresy in Sicily in the time of St. Alexander, and to have been confuted by him. But Heracleon was not, perhaps, yet born.

ALEXANDER.

p. 198), and also under another person, whose name he does not mention, but to whose son Cosmas he dedicates his chief work (xii. i. p. 313), which he wrote out of gratitude at his request. He was a man of an extensive practice, of a very long experience, and of great reputation, not only at Rome, but wherever he travelled in Spain, Gaul, and Italy (l. 15, pp. 156, 157), whence he was called by way of eminence "Alexander the Physician." Agathias speaks also with great praise of his four brothers, Anthemius, Dioscorus, Metrodorus, and Olympus, who were all eminent in their several professions. Alexander is not a mere compiler, like Aetius, Oribasius, and others, but is an author of quite a different stamp, and has more the air of an original writer. He wrote his great work (as he tells us himself, xii. i. p. 313) in an extreme old age, from the results of his own experience, when he could no longer bear the fatigue of practice. His style in the main, says Freind, is very good, short, clear, and (to use his own term, xii. i. p. 314) very expressing expression, though (through a mixture of some foreign words occasioned perhaps by his travels) not always perfectly elegant, yet very expressive and intelligible. Fabricius considers Alexander to have belonged to the sect of the Medicine, but in the opinion of Freind this is not proved sufficiently by the passages adduced. The weakest and most curious part of his practice appears to be his belief in charms and amulets, some of which may be quoted as specimens. For a quotidian ague, "Gather an olive leaf before sun-rise, write on it with common ink, poi, o. a, and hang it round the neck." (xii. 7, p. 339); for the gout, "Write on a thin slate of gold, during the waning of the moon, meli, meli, meli, pol, pol, pol, si, 6i, 6i, 6i, 6i, 6i, and wear it round the ankle; pronouncing also 6i, 6i, 6i, 6i, 6i, 6i, 6i, 6i, and a very full account of the life and works of Alexander in his dissertation De Originibus Medicinac Aegyptiacis sub Khaliilfo, Lugd. Bat. 1840, 8vo.; and also on Wounds of the Head. A treatise on Urine written by him is alluded to by Joannes Actarius (De Urin. Differ. c. 2. p. 43), and he himself mentions it in his Dissertation De Eyrecitia, which was translated into Arabic; (Sprenger, Wenrich, l.c.) The other medical treatise on Pleurisy, which is said to have been translated into Arabic, was probably only the sixth book of his great work, which is entirely devoted to the consideration of this disease. A very full account of the life and works of Alexander Trallianus was published at London, 1734, 8vo., by Edward Milward, M.D., entitled "Trallianus Reviviscens; or, an Account of Alexander Trallian, one of the Greek Writers that flourished after Galen: shewing that these Authors are far from deserving the imputation of mere compilers," &c. Two other medical works which are sometimes attributed to Alexander Trallianus (viz. a Collection of Medical and Physical Problems, and a treatise on Fevers) are noticed under ALEXANDER APHIODINES (Freind's Hist. of Physic, whose words have been sometimes borrowed; Fabricius, Bibli. Græca, vol. xii. p. 503, sq. ed. vet.; Hallor, Bibliotheca Medicinae Practicae, tom. i.; Sprengel, Hist. de la Médecine, tom. ii.; Isseuse, Geschichte der Medicin; Choulant, Handb. der Bücherkunde für die Ältere Medicin.)

ALEXANDER (Ἀλέξανδρος), of Trichonion in Aetolia, was commander of the Achaeans in n. c. 218 and 219. He attacked the rear of the army of Philip on his return from Thermus, but the attempt was unsuccessful, and many Achaeans fell. (Polyb. v. 13.)

ALEXANDER ZEBINA or ZABINAS (Ἀλέξανδρος Ζαβίνας), one of the merchant name Protarchus, a worshipper of Jupiter Phoebus, was a pretender to the crown of the Greek kingdom of Syria shortly after the death of Antiochus Sidetes and the return of Demetrius Nicator from his captivity among the Parthians. (n. c. 129.) Antioch, Apamea, and several other cities, disgusted with the tyranny of Demetrius, acknowledged the authority of Alexander, who pretended to have been adopted by Antiochus Sidetes; but he never succeeded in obtaining power over the whole of Syria. In the earlier part of the year 125 he defeated Demetrius, who fled to Tyre and was there killed; but in the middle of the same year Alexander's patron, the king of Egypt, set up against him Antiochus Grypus, a son of Demetrius, by whom he was defeated in battle. Alexander fled to Antioch, where he attempted to plunder the temple of Jupiter, in order to pay his troops; but the people rose against him and drove him out of the city. He soon fell into the hands of robbers, who delivered him up to Antiocbus, by whom he was put to death, b. c. 122. He was weak and effeminate, but sometimes generous. His surname, Zebina, which means "a purchased slave," was applied to him as a term of reproach, from a report that he had been bought by Ptolemy as a slave. Several of his coins are extant. In the one figured below Jupiter is represented on the reverse, holding in the right hand a small image of victory.

ALEXANDRA. [CASSANDRA.]

ALEXANDRIDES (Ἀλεξάνδρις) of Delphi, a Greek historian of uncertain date. If we may judge from the subjects on which his history is quoted as an authority, it would seem that his work was a history of Delphi. (Plut. Lycurg. 18; Schol. ad Eurip. Acest. 1, where undoubtedly the same person is meant, though the MS. reading is牧and. [L. S.]

ALEXANDROS, the averter of evil, is a surname given by the Greeks to several deities, as—Zeus (Orph. De Lapid. Proem. i.),—to Apollo, who was worshipped under this name by the Athenians, because he was believed to have stopped the plague which raged at Athens in the time of the Peloponnesian war (Paus. 1. 5. § 3, vii. 41. § 5)—and to Hecules. (Lact. viii. 3.)

ALEXICLES (Ἀλέξικλης), an Athenian general, who belonged to the oligarchic or Lacedaemonian party at Athens. After the revolution of b. c. 411, he and several of his friends quitted the city and went to their friends at Dceleia. But he was afterwards made prisoner in Peiraeus, and sentenced to death for his participation in the gulf of Phrynichus. (Thucyd. viii. 92; Lycurg. in Lysor. p. 164.)

ALEXICRATES (Ἀλέξικρατης), a Pythagorean philosopher who lived at the time of Plutarch, and whose discipled continued to observe the ancient diet of the Pythagoreans, abstaining from fish altogether. (Plut. Symposium. viii. p. 738.) Another person of this name occurs in Plutarch, Aeth. 5.

ALEXINUS (Ἀλέξινος), a daughter of Amphiaras, from whom certain divinities called Ethis (Ἐθήσας, i.e. the aversors of epileptic fits) were believed to be descended. (Plut. Quaest. Gr. 23.)

ALEXONUS (Ἀλέξινος), a Greek historian of uncertain date. If we may judge from the subjects on which his history is quoted as an authority, it would seem that his work was a history of Delphi. (Plut. ii. 23. § 4, 11. § 6, &c.)

ALEXANDRUS (Ἀλεξάνδρος). 1. A brother of Cassander of Macedonia, who is mentioned as the founder of a town called Uranoepolis, the site of which is unknown. Here he is said to have introduced a number of words of his own coinage, which, though very expressive, appear to have been regarded as a kind of slang. (Athen. iii. p. 98.)

2. A Corinthian, who, while the Lacedaemonians were fortifying Dceleia in Attica, b. c. 413, and were sending an expedition to Sicily, was entrusted with the command of 600 hoplites, with whom he joined the Sicilian expedition. (Thucyd. vii. 18.)

ALEXIS (Ἀλέξις). 1. A comic poet, born Thurii, in Magna Graccia (Suidas s. v. Αἰαῖς), admitted subsequently to the privileges of

Plant. ix. 10. § 8), and speaks highly of his abilities and acquirements. [W. A. G.]

ALEXIPHACUS (Ἀλέξιφακος), the aveter of evil, is a surname given by the Greeks to several deities, as—Zeus (Orph. De Lapid. Proem. i.)—to Apollo, who was worshipped under this name by the Athenians, because he was believed to have stopped the plague which raged at Athens in the time of the Peloponnesian war (Paus. 1. 5. § 3, vii. 41. § 5)—and to Hecules. (Lact. viii. 3.)

ALEXIS (Ἀλέξις). 1. A comic poet, born Thurii, in Magna Graccia (Suidas s. v. Αἰαῖς), admitted subsequently to the privileges of ALEXIS, Athenian citizen, and enrolled in the deme Olynthos, belonging to the tribe Leontis. (Steph. Byz. s. v.) He was the uncle and instructor of Menander. (Suidas s. v. *Alexis; Prolog. Aristoph. p. xxx.) When he was born is expressly told, but he lived to the age of 106 (Plut. Defect. Oros. p. 420, e.), and was living at least as late as A. D. 238. Now the town of Thurii was destroyed by the Lucumians about B. C. 390. It is therefore not at all unlikely that the parents of Alexis, in order to escape from the threatened destruction of their city, removed shortly before with their little son to Athens. Perhaps therefore we may assign about B. C. 394 as the date of the birth of Alexis. He had a son Stephanus, who also wrote comedies. (Suidas l. c.) It appears, to have been rather addicted to the pleasures of the table. (Athen. viii. p. 544.) According to Plutarch (De Senis Administr. Regiab. p. 785, b.), he expired upon the stage while being crowned as victor. By the old grammarians he is commonly extolled for his wit and elegance. Among his comedies and the titles of many of his plays confirm this statement. Still, for more than 30 years he was contemporary with Philippides, Philomen, Menander, and Diphilus, and several fragments shew he also wrote pieces which would be classed with those of the new comedy. He was a remarkably prolific writer. Suidas says he wrote 245 plays, and the titles of 113 have come down to us. The *Menippos, *Aegylios, *Olympiades, and Paroetos, in which he ridiculed Plato, were probably exhibited as early as the 104th Olympiad. The *Alexia, in which he ridiculed Mignon, was no doubt written while he was alive, and Aeschines (c. Timarch. pp. 6—9) in B. C. 345, spoke of him as then living. The *Alexioi and *Alexiota, in which he satirized Demosthenes, were acted shortly after B. C. 343. The *Irrors, in which he alluded to the decree of Sophocles against the philosophers, in B. C. 316. The *Perows in B. C. 312. The *Parapostagia and *Toxophialos in B. C. 306. As might have been expected in a person who wrote so much, the same passage frequently occurred in several plays; nor did he sample sometimes to borrow from other poets, as, for example, from Eubulus. (Athen. i. p. 25, f.) Carystius of Pergamus (ap. Athen. vi. p. 233, e.) says he was the first who invented the part of the parasite. This is not quite correct, as it had been introduced before him by Epicharmon; but he appears to have been the first who gave it the form in which it afterwards appeared upon the stage, and to have been very happy in his exhibition of it. His name is mentioned concisely by Athenaeus (ii. p. 59, f.), whose testimony is confirmed by the extant fragments. A considerable list of peculiar words and forms used by him is given by Meineke. His plays were frequently translated by the Roman comic writers. (Gell. ii. 25.) The fragments we possess of his plays have been preserved chiefly by Athenaeus and Stobaeus. (Meineke, *Fragmenta Com. vol. i. pp. 374—403; Clinton, Panti Helenei, under the years above given; Fabricius, Bibl. Gr. vol. ii. p. 406, &c.)

2. A writer mentioned by Athenaeus (x. p. 418) as the author of a treatise περί Ἀπροκασίας.

3. A Sasanian, the author of an historical work Παρασασανικον or Παρασασανικος (Sasanian Annals), which Athenaeus quotes. (viii. p. 572, f., xiv. p. 540, d.)*

[ALEXIS (Ἀλέξις), a sculptor and satyr, mentioned by Pliny (xxxiv. 8. s. 19) as one of the pupils of Polycletus. Pausanias (vi. 3. § 3) mentions an artist of the same name, a native of Sicyon and father of sculptor Cantharus. It cannot be satisfactorily settled whether these are the same, or different persons. Pliny’s account implies that he had the elder Polycletus in view, in which case Alexis could not have flourished later than Ol. 95 (s. c. 400), whereas Eutychides, under whom Cantharus studied, flourished about Ol. 120, b. c. 300. (Pliny, H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19.) If the two were identical, as Thiersch (Epochen der bild. Kunst. p. 276) thinks, we must suppose either that Pliny made a mistake, and that Alexis studied under the younger Polycletus, or else that the Eutychides, whose date is given by Pliny, was not the artist under whom Cantharus studied.*

ALEXIS or ALEXIUS I. COMNENUS (Ἀλέξιος οἰκονόμος, or Ἀλέξιος ὁ Constans), emperor of Constantinople, is most probably born in a. d. 1048. He was the son of John Comnenus, and the nephew of the emperor Isaac Comnenus, and received a careful education from his mother Anna. He accompanied the emperor Romanus Diogenes in the war against Alp-Arslan, sultan of the Turks-Seljuks, and was present at the battle of Malaz-kerd, where this emperor was made a prisoner by the sultan. After the deposition of Romanus Diogenes in 1071, Alexis Comnenus and his elder brother Isaac joined the party of the new emperor, Michael VII. Ducas, who employed Alexis against the rebels who had produced great disturbances in Asia Minor. In this war Alexis distinguished himself as a successful general, and showed that extraordinary shrewdness which afterwards became the principal feature of his character. He defended Michael VII. against the rebel Nicephorus Botaniates, but the cause of Michael having become hopeless, he readily joined the victorious rebel, who became emperor under the title of Nicephorus III. in 1077. The authority of Nicephorus III. was disobeyed by several rebels, among whom Nicephorus Bryennius in Epeirus was the most dangerous; but Alexis defeated them one after the other, and the grateful emperor conferred upon him the title of "Sebastos." Alexis was then considered as the first general of the Byzantine empire, but his military renown made him suspected in the eyes of the emperor, who kept him at Constantinople and tried to get rid of him by base intrigues. But Alexis opposed intrigues to intrigues, and as he was not only the most gallant, but also the most skillful among his shrewd counsellors, he outdid the emperor, who at last gave orders, that his eyes should be put out. Alexis now fled to the army on the Danube, and was proclaimed emperor by the troops. Assisted by his brother Isaac, who acted with great generosity, Alexis marched to Constantinople, obtained possession of the city by a stratagem, deposed the emperor, and ascended the throne in 1081.

The Byzantine empire was then at the point of ruin. While Alexis carried on the war against the rebel Nicephorus Bryennius, and afterwards during his forced sojourn at Constantinople, and the time of his differences with Nicephorus III., Melek-Shah, the son of Alp-Arslan, thrice the greatest prince of the Seljuks, overran the Byzantine part of Asia Minor, which he ceded to his cousin Saladin. The Bulgarians destroyed to invade Thrace, and Robert Guiscard, duke of Apulia, with a mighty host of Norman knights, had crossed the Adriatic and laid siege to Durazzo, the ancient Dyrrachium. In this critical position Alexis evinced extraordinary activity. He concluded peace with the Seljuks, ceding Asia to them; he made an alliance with Venice and Henry IV., emperor of Germany; and he sold the sacred vessels of the churches to pay his troops. His struggle with the Normans was long and bloody, but famine, diseases, civil troubles, and a powerful diversion of Henry IV., compelled the Normans to leave Epirus in 1084. During this time the Seljuks had recommenced hostilities, and threatened to block up Constantinople with a fleet constructed by Greek captives. In this extremity Alexis followed the advice of the European princes.

The conquest of Jerusalem by the Seljuks, the interruption of the pious pilgrimages to the holy grave, and the vexations which the Christians in the East had to endure from the infidels, had produced an extraordinary excitement among the nations in Europe. The idea of rescuing the town of our Saviour became popular; the pope and the princes showed themselves favourable to such an expedition, and they resolved upon it after the ambassadors of Alexis had related to them at Placentia in 1085 the hopeless state of the Christians in Asia. The first Crusaders appeared in Constantinople in 1086. They were commanded by Peter the Hermit and Walter the Pennyless, and were rather a band of vagabonds than an army. Alexis hastened to send them to Asia, where they were massacred by the Turks. Soon after them came a powerful army, commanded by Godfrey of Bouillon, and their continued stay in the neighbourhood of Constantinople gave occasion to serious differences between the Latins and the Greeks. However Alexis, by the alternate use of threats and persuasions, not only succeeded in getting rid of the dangerous foreigners by carrying them over to Asia, but also managed the praise of Godfrey of Bouillon and his turbulent barons with so much dexterity, that they consented to take the oath of vassalage for those provinces which they might conquer in Asia, and promised to restore to the emperor the Byzantine territories, which had been taken by the Seljuks. In his turn he promised to assist them in their enterprise with a strong army, but the dangerous state of the empire prevented him from keeping his word. However, in proportion as the Crusaders, in 1097, advanced into Asia, Alexis followed them with a chosen body, and thus gradually reunited with his empire Nicaea, Chios, Smyrna, Ephesus, Sardes, and finally all Asia Minor. The descendants of Bohemond, prince of Antioch, did homage to Alexis, to whom they restored Tarsus and Malmistra. During the latter years of his reign, Alexis was occupied with consolidating the domestic peace of his empire, which was then often disturbed by religious troubles. He died in 1118, at the age of seventy, and his successor was his son John, generally called Celo-Joannes.

Alexis was the author of a work entitled Ayougeul, which was published in the 4th volume of the Analecta Graeca, Par. 1668, and also from a later manuscript by Gronovius at the end of his work De Scriptoribus, Lugd. Bat. 1691. Respecting the ecclesiastical edicts of Alexis, several of which are extant, see Fabric. Bibl. Graec., vii. p. 729.

The life of Alexis has been carefully, though very partially, described by his daughter, Anna Comnena, in her Alexias, which is the principal source concerning this emperor. (Comp. Glycras, p. 4; Albertus Aquisiensis, ii. 9-19; Wilhelmus Tyrensis, ii. 5, 23; comp. S. F. Wilken, "Rerum alii Alexii I., Ioanne, Manuele et Alexii II. Comnenis gestarum libri quatuor," Heidelberg, 1811.) [W. P.]

ALEXIS or ALEXIUS II. COMNENUS

(*A'les'ios or 'Ale'xios Kom'nenos), emperor of Constantinople, the son of the emperor Manuel Comnenus, was born in 1167, according to Nicetas. In 1179, he married Agnes or Anna, the daughter of king Louis VII. of France, and succeeded his father in 1180, under the guardianship of his brother Maria, the daughter of Raymond, prince of and treacherously blinded the emperor of Andronicus Comnenus, who first compelled the young emperor to sign the death of his mother, and then put Alexis to death in 1183; whereupon he succeeded him on the throne. (Nicetas, Alexis Manuel. Comn. fil.; comp. Ducange, Familiae Byzantinae, p. 193.)

ALEXIS or ALEXIUS III. AN'GEIUS

(*A'les'ios or 'Ale'xios 'Aγ'ειος), the brother of the emperor Isaac II. Angelus, whom he deposed and blinded in 1185. Being a descendant of Alexis I. Comnenus by Theodora, the youngest daughter of the latter, he assumed the family-name of his great ancestor, and is therefore commonly called Alexis Angelus-Comnenus. In 1197 and 1198, he carried on war with Persia and the Seljuks of Koniah, but his armies were defeated. Being seized and taken by the sultan, and persuaded him to support his son as sultan of Koniah. In 1210, Alexis III. fled to Greece, and subsequently took refuge with the doge of Venice, they attacked Constantinople in the month of July, 1203; but before they had taken this city, Alexis III. abandoned his palace and fled to Italy, carrying with him 10,000 pounds of gold. After his flight, Constantinople was occupied by the Crusaders, who recognised as emperors the blinded Isaac and his son Alexis. [ALEXIS IV.] He afterwards returned to Greece, and besieged the city of Thessalonica by Andronicus Comnenus, who after his deposition in 1204, had fled to Alexis III., whose daughter he had married. Meanwhile, Theodore Lascaris succeeded in making himself independent at Nicaea, but was involved in a war with Ghayouth-ed-din, sultan of Koniah. In 1210, Alexis III. fled to this sultan, and persuaded him to support his claims to the throne of Byzantium, and to declare war against Theodore Lascaris. The war proved fatal for the sultan, who was killed in the battle of Antioch, and Alexis III. was made prisoner. Theodore Lascaris had married Anna Angela-Comnena, the second daughter of Alexis III., but this circumstance did not prevent him from confining his father-in-law to a monastery at Nicaea. (1210.) There Alid III. died some years after. Being at an advanced age; the exact year of his birth is not known. (Nicetas, Alexis Angelus, Isaacius Angelus, iii. 8, &c; Isaccius et Alex. phil., c. 11; Villehardouin, De la Conquête de Constantinople, Paris, 1838, c. 51, 55, &c.) [W. P.] ALEXIS or ALEXIUS IV. ANGELOUS (*A'Acj3os or 'A'Acj3os 'A'Apaylov), was the son of the emperor Isaac II. Angelus. It is mentioned under ALEXIS III. that, after the deposition of this emperor, he and his father were placed on the throne by the Crusaders. Alexis IV. was crowned together with Isaac II. on the 29th of July, 1203, and, to secure himself on the throne, engaged the Crusaders to continue at Constantinople. He had promised them to put an end to the sultan of the Greek Church, but did not do anything for that purpose, nor did he fulfil his other engagements towards the Crusaders. At the same time, he did not understand how to maintain his dignity among the turbulent and haughty barons of Italy, France, and Flanders, who were assembled in his capital. Serious differences consequently arose between him and his deliverers. Alexis Ducas, summoned Murzuphalus, an ambitious and enterprising man, took advantage of these troubles, and suddenly seized the crown. By his order Alexis IV. was put to death on the 28th of January, 1204; Isaac II. died of grief. (Nicetas, Isacius Angelus, i. c. 38; &c.; Isacius et Alex fil.; Villehardouin, libl. c. 51, 56, 60, &c., 102—107.)

ALEXIS or ALEXIUS V. DUCUS (*A'Acj3os or 'A'Acj3os Acj3Aين; surname "Murzuphalus") on account of the close junction of his shaggy eyebrows, was crowned emperor of Constantinople on the 8th of February, 1204, after having been present at the murder of Alexis IV., who was put to death by his order. His earlier life is almost unknown. Nicetas, however, states, that he had always been impetuous and voluble; on the other hand, he was a man of great courage and energy. Immediately after he had usurped the throne, the Crusaders, who were still assembled under the walls of Constantinople, laid siege to this city. Alexis V. disdained to conclude peace with them on dishonourable conditions, and prepared for resistance, in which he was vigorously assisted by Theodore Lascaris. However, courage suddenly abandoned him, and he fled to the deposed emperor Alexis III., whose daughter Eudoxia Angeli commenced he had just married. Constantinople was taken by storm by the Crusaders (12th of April, 1204), who, after having committed those horrors, of which Nicetas, an eyewitness, gives such an emphatical description, chose Baldwin, count of Flanders, emperor of Constantinople, but leaving him only the fourth part of the empire. After being deprived of sight by his father-in-law, Alexis V. fled to the Morea, but was arrested and carried to Constantinople, where the Crusaders put him to death by casting him from the top of the Theodosian column. (1204.) (Nicetas, Muryzuphalus; Isacius Angelus et Alex. fil. c. 4, 5; Gesta Francorum, c. 94; Villehardouin, libl. c. 51, 56, 60, &c., 96, 106, 113—115, 127, &c.)

ALIMENTUS. *A'Acj3os, Metropolitan of Nicaea, composed a Canon or Hymn on St. Demetrius the Martyr. It is uncertain when he lived. The canon is in manuscript. See Leunclav. Francof. 1596. See Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. xi. p. 558. [A. J. C.]

ALEXIUS, Patriarch of Constantinople, a member of the monastery of Studius (founded a. d. 460), succeeded Eustathius as Patriarch a. d. 1025. In A. d. 1034 he crowned Michael IV. the favourite of Zoe, who, to make way for him, procured the death of her husband, the Emperor Romanus. He thwarted the attempts of John (the emperor's brother) to gain the patriarchal see (a. d. 1036), and died a. d. 1043. Decrees of his are extant, ap. Jus Gr. Rom., vol. i. lib. iv. p. 250, Leunclav. Francof. 1596. See Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. xi. p. 558. [A. J. C.]

ALIACMON. [Palestinianus.] L. A'ILIE'NUS, plebeian aedile B. c. 454, accused Veturius, the consul of the former year, on account of selling the booty which had been gained in war, and placing the amount in the aedarium. (Liv. iii. 31.)

ALGOS (*A'Acj3os), is used by Hierod (Theog. 227) in the plural, as the personification of sorrows and griefs, which are there represented as the daughters of Eris. [L. S.]

ALIAMON. [Palestinianus.] L. A'ILIE'NUS, plebeian aedile B. c. 454, accused Veturius, the consul of the former year, on account of selling the booty which had been gained in war, and placing the amount in the aedarium. (Liv. iii. 31.)

ALIMENTUS, L. C'YNIOS, a celebrated Roman annalst, antiquary, and jurist, who was praetor in Sicily, B. c. 209, with the command of two legions. He wrote an account of his imprisonment in the second Punic war, and a history of Gorgias Leontinus; but these works probably formed part of his Annales. (Liv. xxi. 38.) He is frequently cited by Festus, and the fragments which have been thus preserved were collected by Wasse, and may be found appended to Curi's Systium.

Niebuhr (i. p. 272) praises Alimentus as a really critical investigator of antiquity, who threw light on the history of his country by researches among its ancient monuments. That he possessed eminent personal qualities, such as a great man, is clear, inasmuch as Hannibal, who used to treat his Roman prisoners very roughly, made a distinction in his behalf, and gave him an account of his passage through Gaul and over the Alps, which Alimentus afterwards incorporated in his history. It is only in his fragments that we find a distinct statement of the earlier relation between Rome and Latium, which in all the annals has been misrepresented by national pride. The point, however, upon which Niebuhr lays most stress, is the remarkable difference between Alimentus and all other chroniclers in dating the building of the city about the fourth year of the 12th Olympiad.
This difference is the more important in an historical view, from Alimentus having written on the old Roman calendar and having carefully examined the most ancient Etruscan and Roman chronology. It is ingeniously accounted for by Niebuhr, by supposing our author to have reduced the ancient cyclical years, consisting of ten months, to an equivalent number of common years of twelve months. Now, the pontiffs reckoned 132 cyclical years before the reign of Tarquinius Priscus, from which time, according to Julius Gracchus, the use of the old calendar was discontinued. The reduction makes a difference of 22 years, for 132—120 = 22, and 22 years, added to the era of Polybius and Nepos, viz. Ol. 7, 2, bring us to the very date of Alimentus, Ol. 12, 4.

Alimentus composed a treatise De Officio Jurisconsulti, containing at least two books; one book De Veris priscis, one De Consulatu Polio et, one De Comitia, one De Festis, two, at least, Mystagogicon, and several De Re Militari. In the latter work he handles the subjects of military levies, of the ceremonies of declaring war, and generally of the Jus Foederal. (Gell. xvi. 4; Voss. Hist. Gr. iv. 13, fin., Hist. Lat. i. 4; F. Lachmann, de Pontio. Histor. Tit. Lexi Comm. i. 17, 4to. 1822; Zimmern, Reim. Recit.-gesch. i. § 75.)

ALIMENTUS, M. CINCIUS, tribune of the plebs n. c. 204, proposed in his tribuneship the law known by the name of Cincius Lex de Danis et Memeridianis, or Memeridian Lex. (Liv. xxiv. 4; Cic. Catu. 4, de Ovst. ii. 71, ad Att. i. 20; Festus, s. v. Memeridianus.) This law was confirmed in the time of Augustus. (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Cincius Lex.)

ALIPHERUS or HALIPHERUS (Ἀλιφέρος), one of the sons of Lycaon, killed by Zeus with a flash of lightning for their insolence. (Apollod. iii. 8, § 1.) The town of Aliphe or Aliphea in Arcadia was believed to have been founded by him, and to have derived its name from him. (Paus. viii. 3. § 1, 26. § 4; Steph. Byz. s. v. Αλιφέρος.)

ALITTA or ALILAT (Ἀλίττα or Αλῖλατ), the name by which, according to Herodotus (i. 131, iii. 8), the Arabs called Aphrodite Urania. (L. S.)

ALLECTUS, was raised to the highest dignities in Britain during the dominion of Carausius; but the crimes which he committed, and the fear of punishment on account of them, led him in A. D. 293 to murder Carausius and assume the imperial title in Britain for himself. He enjoyed his honours for three years, at the end of which Constantius sent Aselepidotus with an army and fleet against him. Allectus was defeated in A. D. 296, and Britain was thus cleared of usurpers. (Aurel. Vict. de Caes. 39; Entrop. ix. 14.) On the annexed coin the inscription is IMP. C. ALLECTUS. P. P. AUR.

A. ALIENUS. 1. A friend of Cicero's, who is spoken of by him in high terms. He was the legate of Q. Cicero in Asia, b. c. 60 (Cic. ad Qu.}

FR. I. 1 § 3), and prætor in b. c. 49. (Ad Att. x. 15.) In the following year, he had the province of Sicily, and sent to Caesar, who was then in Africa, a large body of troops. He continued in Sicily till b. c. 47, and received the title of consul. Two of Cicero's letters are addressed to him. (Hirt. Bell. Afr. 2, 54; Cic. ad Fam. xiii. 76, 79.) His name occurs on a coin, which has on one side C. ALIENUS IMP. COS. ITAL. and on the other A. ALIENUS PROCO. 2. Was sent by Dolabella, b. c. 43, to bring to him the legions which were in Egypt. On his return from Egypt with four legions, he was surprised by Carausius in Palestine, who was at the head of an army. As his forces were so inferior, Almianus joined Carausius. (Appian, B. C. ii. 78, iv. 59; Cic. Phil. xi. 12, 13; Carausius, ap. Cic. ad Fam. xili. 12, 12.) This Alimentus may perhaps be the same person as No. 1.

A.LLUCIUS, a prince of the Celtiberi, betrothed to a most beautiful virgin, who was taken prisoner by Scipio in Spain, b. c. 209. Scipio generously gave her to Allicius, and refused the presents she and relatives brought the same year. (Polyb. x. 19; Val. Max. iv. 3, § 1; Sil. Ital. xv. 368, &c.)

AMO, a god of a river in the neighbourhood of Rome, who, like Tiberinus and others, were prayed to by the augurs. In the water of Almo the statue of the mother of the gods used to be washed. (Cic. de Nat. Deor. iii. 20; comp. Varro, de Ling. Lat. v. 71, ed. Müller.)

AMOPS (Ἀμώπης), a giant, the son of Poseidon and Helle, from whom the district of Almopia and its inhabitants, the Almopes in Macedonia, were believed to have derived their name. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Δαμώπης.)

ALEOIDEAE, ALOYADEAE, or ALOYADEA (Ἀλωυαίδαι, Αλωυαίδα or Αλωυαίδα), are patronymic forms from Alous, but are used to designate the two sons of his wife Iphimeida by Poseidon: viz. Otus and Ephialtes. The Aloidae are renowned in the earliest stories of Greece for their extraordinary strength and daring spirit. When they were nine years old, each of their bodies measured nine cubits in breadth and twenty-seven in height. At this early age, they threatened the Olympian gods with war, and attempted to pile mount Ossa upon Olympus, and Pelion upon Ossa. They would have accomplished their object, says Homer, had they been allowed to grow up to the age of manhood; but Apollo destroyed them before their beards began to appear. (Od. xi. 365, &c.)

In the Iliad (v. 365, &c.; comp. Philostr. de Vit. Soph. ii. 1 § 1) the poet relates another feat of their early age. They put the god Ares in chains, and kept him imprisoned for thirteen months; so that he would have perished, had not Hermes been informed of it by Erichthonius, and secretly liberated the prisoner. The same stories are related by Apollodorus (4. 7, § 4), who however does not make them perish in the attempt upon Olympus. According to him, they actually piled the mountains upon one another, and threatened to change land into sea and sea into land. They are further said to have grown every year one cubit in breadth and three in height. As another proof of their daring, it is related, that Ephialtes sued for the hand of Hera, and Otus for that of Artemis. But this led to their destruction in the island of Naxos. (Comp.
Hyginus (Fab. 28) relates their death in a similar manner, but makes Apollo send the fatal stag. (Comp. Callim. Hymn. in Dion. 264; Apollon. Rhod. 1. 484, with the Schol.) As a punishment for their presumption, they were, in Hades, tied to a pillar with serpents, with their faces turned away from each other, and were perpetually tormented by the shrieks of an owl. (Munck, ad Hygin. i. iv. 156, &c.) Here Artemis appeared as a daughter of the river god Alpheus, who loved her, and under which she was worshipped at Letrini in Elis (Paus. vii. 22. § 5; Strab. viii. p. 343), and in Ortygia. (Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. ii. 12, Nem. i. 3.)

Apollo, a Spaniard in Hannibal's army, who was a friend and hospes of the Saguntines, went into Saguntum, when the city was reduced by the last extremity, in endeavour to persuade the inhabitants to accept Hannibal's terms. (Liv. xxi. 5. § 12.)

ALPHAEA, ALPHEAEA, or ALPHEIUSA (Ἀλφαεα, Ἀλφαέα, or Ἀλφείσια), a surname of Artemis, which she derived from the river god Alpheus, who loved her, and under which she was worshipped at Letrini in Elis (Paus. vii. 22. § 5; Strab. viii. p. 343), and in Ortygia. (Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. ii. 12, Nem. i. 3.)

ALPHAEAS, a name by which Ovid (Met. v. 467) designates the nymph of the Sicilian well Arethusa, because it was believed to have a subterraneous communication with the river Alpheas, in Peloponnesus. (I. S.)

ALPHAEUS or ALPHAEUS (Ἀλφαῖος, Ἀλφαέας), the god of the river Alpheas in Peloponnesus, a son of Oceanus and Theys. (Pind. Nem. ii. 1.; Hes. Theog. 338.) According to Pausanias (v. 7. § 2) Alpheas was a passionate hunter and fell in love with the nymph Arethusa, but she fled from him to the island of Ortygia near Syracuse, and metamorphosed herself into a wolf, whereupon Alpheas became a river, which flowing from Peloponnesus under the sea to Ortygia, there united its waters with those of the well Arethusa. (Comp. Schol. ad Pind. Nem. i. 3.)

This story is related somewhat differently by Ovid. (Met. v. 572, &c.) Arethusa, a fair nymph, once while bathing in the river Alpheas in Arcadia, was surprised and pursued by the god; but Artemis took pity upon her and changed her into a wolf, which flowed under the earth to the island of Ortygia. (Comp. Serv. ad Virg. Aen. ii. 334.; Virg. Aen. v. 3.; Stat. Silv. 2. i. 203; Theoc. i. 271, iv. 239; Lucian, Dial. Maris. 3.) Artemis, who is here only mentioned incidentally, was, according to other traditions, the object of the love of Alpheus. Once, it is said, when pursued by him she fled to Letrini in Elis, and here she covered her face and those of her companions (nymphs) with mud, so that Alpheus could not discover or distinguish her, and was obliged to return. (Paus. vii. 22. § 5.) This occasioned the building of a temple of Artemis Alphaeas at Letrini. According to another version, the goddess fled to Ortygia, where she had likewise a temple under the name of Alphna. (Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. ii. 12.) An allusion to Alpheus' love of Artemis is also contained in the fact, that at Olympia the two divinities had one altar in common. (Paus. v. 14. § 5; Schol. ad Pind. Olt. v. 10.) In these accounts two or more distinct stories seem to be mixed up together, but they probably originated in the popular belief, that there was a natural subterraneous communication between the river Alpheus and the well Arethusa. For, among several other things it was believed, that a cup thrown into the Alpheus would make its reappearance in the well Arethusa in Ortygia. (Strab. vi. p. 270, viii. p.) ALTAEA.

343; Sec. Q. 20; Fulgent. Myth. iii. 12.) Plutarch (de Plin. 19) gives an account which is altogether unconnected with those mentioned above. According to him, Alpheus was a son of Helios, and killed his brother Cercaphus in a contest. Haunted by despair and the Erinnyes son of Helios, and killed his brother Cercaphus in a contest. Haunted by despair and the Erinnyes, he leapt into the river Nyctimus which hence received the name Alpheus. [L. S.]

ALPHENOR. [Nimphs.]

ALPHENUS VARUS. [Varus.]

ALPHESOEIA (Alpheeia). 1. The mother of Adonis. [Adonis.]

3. According to Theocritus (iii. 45) a daughter of Bias, and the wife of Pelias. The latter, however, is usually called Anaxibia.

4. An Indian nymph, who was passionately loved by Dionysus, but could not be induced to yield to his wishes, until the god changed himself into a tiger, and thus compelled her by fear to allow him to carry her across the river Sollax, from which this circumstance received the name of Tigris. (Plut. de Plin. 24.) [L. S.]

ALPHIEUS MYTILENAEUS (Alphieus Missouri), the author of about twelve epigrams in the Greek Anthology, some of which seem to point out the time when he wrote. In the seventh epigram (Jacobs) he refers to the state of the Roman empire, as embracing almost all the known world; in the ninth he speaks of the restored and flourishing city of Troy; and in the tenth he alludes to an epigram by Antipater Sidonius. Now Antipater lived under Augustus, and Troy had received great favours from Julius Caesar and Augustus. (Strab. xiii. p. 889.) Hence it is not improbable that Alpheus wrote under Augustus. It is true that in the fourth epigram he addresses a certain Macrinus, but there is no reason to suppose that this was the emperor Macrinus. Another difficulty has been started, on the ground that the eleventh epigram was inscribed, as we learn from Pausanias (viii. 52. § 3), on the statue of Philopoemen in Tegea, and that it is very improbable that such a statue should have stood without an inscription till the time of Alpheus. But the simple fact is, that for reason can be discovered attributing this epigram to Alpheus. (Jacobs, Anthol. Graec. xiii. p. 839.) [P. S.]

ALPINUS AVITUS. [Avitus.]

ALPINUS, a name which Homaroe (sat. i. 10. 36) gives in ridicule to a bombastic poet. He probably means M. Furius Bibacrus. [Bibacrus.]

ALPINUS MONTANUS, one of the Treviri, the most powerful of the Belgic people, and the commander of a cohort in the army of Vitellius, was sent into Germany after the battle of Cremona, a.d. 70. Together with his brother, D. Alpinus, he joined Civilis in the next year. (Tac. Hist. iii. 35, iv. 31, v. 59.) [Civis.]

ALTAEA (Aldea), a daughter of the Aetolian king Thestius and Eurysthemia, and sister of Leucippus and Philoctetes, Ephesian, &c. She was married to Oeneus, king of Calydon, by whom she became the mother of Troezen, Tyreus, Clymenus, and Meleager, and of two daughters, Gorga and Deianira. (Apollod. i. 7. § 10, 8. § 1.) Apollodorus states, that according to some, Meleager was regarded as the fruit of her intercourse with Ares, and that she was mother of Deianira by Dionysus. (Comp. Hygin. Fab. 129, 171, 174.) Altaea is especially celebrated in ancient story on account of the tragic fate of her son Meleager, who also became the cause of her death. Some say that she hung herself, others that she killed herself with a dagger. (Apollod. i. 3, § 3; Ov. Met. viii. 445, &c.) [L. S.]

ALTHEMENES or ALTHABEMENES (althemenes or Althabemenes), a son of Catreus, king of Crete. In consequence of an oracle, that Catreus would lose his life by one of his children, Althemenes quitted Crete together with his sister Anemoyme, in order to avoid becoming the instrument of his father's death. He lived in the region of the Phlegres, and was called Cretenia, and in remembrance of the god of his own native island, he erected on mount Atabrys an altar to Zeus Atabryus. His sister was seduced in Rhodes by Hermes, but Althemenes, disbelieving her account, killed her by kicking her with his foot. When Catreus had become advanced in years, he had an invincible desire to see his only son once more, and to place his crown in his hands. He accordingly sailed to Rhodes. On his landing there, he and his companions were attacked by shepherds, who mistook them for pirates. During the ensuing struggle, Althemenes came to the protection of his subjects, and shot his own father dead. When he became aware of what he had done, he prayed to the gods, and was swallowed up by the earth. This is the account of Apollodorus (iii. 2. § 1, &c.), with which Diodorus (v. 59) agrees in the main points, except that he represents Althemenes as wandering about after the murder, and at last dying with grief. He adds, that the Rhodians subsequently worshipped him as a hero. [L. S.]

ALTHIPUS (Althipus), a son of Poseidon and Leitis, a daughter of Orus, king of Troezen. The territory of Troezen was called after him Altheopia. In his reign Pallas and Poseidon disputed the possession of the country with each other. (Paus. ii. 30. § 6.) [L. S.]

ALYATTES (Alyattes), king of Lydia, succeeded his father Sadyattes, n. c. 618. Sadyattes during the last six years of his reign had been engaged in a war with Miletus, which was continued by his son five years longer. In the last of these years Alyattes burnt a temple of Athena, and falling sick shortly afterwards, he sent to Delphi for advice; but the oracle refused to give him an answer till he had rebuilt the temple. This he did, and recovered in consequence, and made peace with Miletus. He subsequently carried on war with Cyaxares, king of Media, drove the Cimmerians out of Asia, took Smyrna, and attacked Chazemene. The war with Cyaxares, which lasted for five years, from n. c. 590 to 585, arose in consequence of Alyattes receiving under his protection some Semythians who had fled to him after injuring Cyaxares. An eclipse of the sun, which happened while the armies of the two kings were fighting, led to a peace between them, and this was cemented by the marriage of Astyages, the son of Cyaxares, with Astyages, the daughter of Alyattes. Alyattes died in n. c. 561 or 560, after a reign of fifty-seven years, and was succeeded by his son Croesus, who appears to have been previously associated with his father in the government. (Herod. i. 16-22, 25, 73, 74.)

The tomb (Arga) of Alyattes is mentioned by Herodotus (i. 93) as one of the wonders of Lydia. It was north of Sardis, near the lake Gygeas, and consisted of a large mound of earth, raised upon a produced by taking each of the fifteen modes in the \textit{Essai sur la Musique}, and not p. 297, ed. Heyler; neither one or the other. Iamblichus wrote a life, which he thanks him for a geographical treatise or literary rock—a white, horizontally stratified earthy limestone, cut away so as to appear part of the structure. The upper portion, he adds, is sand and gravel, apparently brought from the bed of the Hermus. He found on the top the remains of a foundation nearly eighteen feet square, on the north of which was a huge circular stone ten feet in diameter, with a flat bottom and a raised edge or lip, evidently placed there as an ornament on the apex of the tumulus.

\textit{Alypius}, the author of a Greek musical treatise entitled \textit{eicatwvญυαι χορευς}. There are no tolerably sure grounds for identifying him with any one of the various persons who bore the name in the times of the later emperors, and of whose history anything is known. According to the most plausible conjecture, he was that Alypius whom Eunapius, in his Life of Iamblichus, celebrates for his acute intellect and diminutive stature, and who, being a friend of Iamblichus, probably flourished under Julian and his immediate successors. This Alypius was a native of Alexandria, and died there at an advanced age, and therefore can hardly have been the person called by Ammianus Marcellinus \textit{Alypius Antiochensis}, who was first prefect of Britain, and afterwards employed by Julian in his attempt to rebuild the Jewish temple. Julian addresses two epistles (29 and 30) to Alypius as Meursius supposes, if indeed he was Antiochian than that he was the Alexandrian who was first prefect of Britain, and died there at an advanced age, and therefore can hardly have been the person called by Ammianus Marcellinus \textit{Alypius Antiochensis}, who was first prefect of Britain, and afterwards employed by Julian in his attempt to rebuild the Jewish temple. Julian addresses two epistles (29 and 30) to Alypius as Meursius supposes, if indeed he was Antiochian than that he was the Alexandrian.

\textit{Alypius} (\textit{Aλυπιος}), a son of Iococus and brother of Penelope and Lecandus. After his father's death, he reigned in conjunction with his brother over Acrania, and is said to have founded the town of Alyzeia there. (\textit{Strab.} x. p. 452; \textit{Steph. Byz.} s. v. \textit{Αλυτεια}. [L. S.]).

\textit{AMA\textbullet\textcircled{D}OCUS} (\textit{Αμαδωκος}) or \textit{MEDOCUS} (\textit{Μεδοκς}), a common name among the Thracians. It was also, according to Ptolemy, the name of a people and mountains in Thrace. (\textit{Paus.} i. 4. § 4) speaks of an Amadocus who came from the Hyperboreans. 1. King of the Odrysae in Thrace, was a friend of Alcibiades, and is mentioned at the time of the battle of Aegospotami, B. C. 405. (Diod. xiii. 103.) He and Seuthes were the most powerful princes in Thrace when Xenophon visited the country in B. C. 400. They were, however, frequently at variance, and were reconciled to one another by Thrasybulus, the Athenian commander, in B. C. 390, and induced him to make the allies of Athens. (\textit{Xen.} \textit{Amax.} vii. 2. § 52, 3. § 16, 7. § 3, &c.; \textit{Held.} iv. 8. § 26; Diod. xiv. 94.) This Amadocus may perhaps be the same as the one mentioned by Aristotle, who, he says, was attacked by his general Seuthes, a Thracian. (\textit{Pom.} x. p. 182, ed. Götting.)

2. A Ruler in Thrace, who inherited in conjunction with Beriades and Cersobleptes the dominions of Cotys, on the death of the latter in B. C. 398. Amadocus was probably a son of Cotys and a brother of the other two princes, though this is not stated by Demosthenes. (\textit{Demi. in Aristoc.} p. 623, &c.) [\textit{Cersoblepites}.] Amadocus seems to have had a son of the same name. (\textit{Ioseph. Philipp.} p. 83, 3. compared with Harpocr. s. v. \textit{Αμαδωκος}).

3. One of the princes of Thrace, who was defeated and taken prisoner by Philip, king of Macedonia, B. C. 184. (Liv. xxix. 35.)

\textit{Ama\textbullet\textcircled{S}ia} is mentioned by Valerius Maximus (viii. 3. § 1) as an instance of a female who pleaded her own cause before the praetor. (About B. C. 77.) She was called \textit{Androgyn}, from having a man's spirit with a female form. (\textit{Compare AFRANIA and Hortensia}).
by Servius (ad Aen. iv. 72) and by Lydus (de Mens. iv. 34); comp. Klaßen, Aenaeus und die Penaten, p. 299, &c.

AMALTHEIA.

C. AMAFA'NIUS or AMAFI'NIUS was one of the earliest Roman writers in favour of the Epicurean philosophy.

AMANTUS (A'dyapotroς), of Alexandria, wrote a commentary upon one of Theocritus' Idyls (Epigr. M. p. 273, 40, ed. Sylla), and a work entitled περὶ εἰκώνων. Respecting his time, we only now that he lived subsequently to Juba, king of Mauretania. (Athen. viii. p. 343, e, x. p. 414, f.)

AMBRYNCEUS (Aμαρψευς), a chief of the Eleans, and son of Onesimadas or of Acestor. (Hygin. Fab. 97; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 303.) According to Hyginus, Amarchicalus himself joined the expedition against Troy with nineteen ships. Homer, on the other hand, only mentions his son Diados (Amarcheides) as paraking in the Trojan war. (II. ii. 622, iv. 517.) When Amarchicalus died, his sons celebrated funeral games in his honour, in which Nestor, as he himself relates (II. xxiii. 629, &c.), took part. According to Pausanias (v. i. § 8) Amarchicalus had been of great service to Augus. against Hercules, in return for which Augus shared his throne with him. [L. S.]

AMARYNTUS (Aμαργαντός), a hunter of Artemis, from whom the town of Amancythus in Eubea (Steph. Byz. says Euboea itself) was believed to have derived its name. (Strab. x. p. 448.) From this hero, or rather from the town of Amancythus, Artemis derived the surname Amarchythus or Amarysia, under which she was worshipped there and also in Attica. (Paus. i. 31. § 3, comm. Dict. of Ant. s.v. 'Aμαργαντός.)

AMASIS (Aμασίς).

1. King of Egypt in early times, according to Diodorus (i. 60), in whose reign Egypt was conquered by Actiarse, king of Ethiopia. [Aricines.]

2. King of Egypt, succeeded Apries, the last king of the line of Psammetichus, in a. c. 569. He was of comparatively low origin (Herodotus, ii. 172, calls him ἑμιμέθης), and was born at Siuph, a town in the Saitic nome. When the Egyptians revolted against Apries, Amasis was sent to quell the insurrection, but went over to the side of the rebels, and was proclaimed king by them. He defeated Apries in a battle near Momenphis, and took him prisoner. He seemed disposed to treat his captive with great mildness, but was induced to deliver him up into the hands of the Egyptians, who put him to death. It was probably to strengthen himself against a powerful party formed against him amongst the warrior-caste, that he cultivated the friendship of the Greeks. He not only gave up to them the city of Naucratis, which had hitherto been their only mart, but opened all the mouths of the Nile to the Greeks. He not only gave up to them the city of Naucratis, which had hitherto been their only mart, but opened all the mouths of the Nile to the Greeks. He not only gave up to them the city of Naucratis, which had hitherto been their only mart, but opened all the mouths of the Nile to the Greeks. He not only gave up to them the city of Naucratis, which had hitherto been their only mart, but opened all the mouths of the Nile to the Greeks. He not only gave up to them the city of Naucratis, which had hitherto been their only mart, but opened all the mouths of the Nile to the Greeks. He not only gave up to them the city of Naucratis, which had hitherto been their only mart, but opened all the mouths of the Nile to the Greeks. He not only gave up to them the city of Naucratis, which had hitherto been their only mart, but opened all the mouths of the Nile to the Greeks. He not only gave up to them the city of Naucratis, which had hitherto been their only mart, but opened all the mouths of the Nile to the Greeks.
Amasia, agriculture, commerce, and the arts flourished greatly. The extension of Egyptian commerce was much favoured by the conquest of Cyprus, which he made tributary. His reign was one of almost uninterrupted peace and prosperity, which gave him leisure for adorning Egypt with several magnificent buildings and works of art. (iii. 175, 176) The plans of conquest which Cyrus had been unable to carry into effect, were followed out by Cambyses, who in b. c. 525 led an army against Egypt. According to the story told by Herodotus (iii. 1), Cambyses had been incensed by a deception practised upon him by Amasis, who, pretending to comply with a demand of the Persian king, that he should send him his daughter to adorn his harem, substituted the daughter of Apries for his own. Amasis however did not live to see the fall of his country. He died before Cambyses reached the borders, after a reign of 44 years, and was buried at Seis in the tomb which he had constructed in the temple of Athena. His corpse was afterwards taken out of the tomb and shamefully insulted by the order of Cambyses. (iii. 16.) As a governor he exhibited great abilities, and was the author of several useful regulations (ii. 177), but he appears to have indulged in more familiarity towards those about him than was altogether consistent with his kingly dignity. (Herod. ii. 161—182, iii. 1—16; Diod. i. 68, 95.)

3. A Persian of the tribe of the Maraphii, who was sent by Aryandes, the governor of Egypt under Cambyses, to the head of an army, to assist Pherecydes, the mother of Artaxerxes II., king of Cyrene. He took Barea by stratagem and treachery, and made an unsuccessful attempt upon Cyrene. He was then recalled by Aryandes. On its march back the Persian army suffered severely from the Libyans. (Herod. iv. 167, 201, 203.)

AMASTRIS or AMESTRIS (Ἀμαστρίς or Αμαστρίς). 1. The wife of Xerxes, and mother of Artaxerxes II. According to Herodotus, she was the daughter of Otanes, according to Ctesias, who calls her Amistros, of Onophas. She was cruel and vindictive. On one occasion she sacrificed fourteen youths of the noblest Persian families to the god said to dwell beneath the earth. The tale of her horrible mutilation of the wife of Maestus, recorded by Herodotus, gives us a lively picture of the intrigues and cruelties of a Persian harem. She survived Xerxes. (Herod. vii. 61, 62; Ov. Amor. iii. 15, 15; Virg. Aen. xii. 600; Dionys. i. 64.)

AMATA, the wife of king Latinus and mother of Lavinia, who, when Aeneas sued for the hand of the latter, offered him, because she had already promised Lavinia to Turnus. At the same time she was instigated by Alecto, who acted according to the request of Juno, to stir up the war with Turnus. This story fills the greater part of the seventh book of Virgilius's Aeneid. When Amata was informed that Turnus had fallen in battle, she hung herself. (Virg. Aen. xii. 600; Dionys. i. 64.)

AMATHUS (Ἀμαθοῦς), a son of Hecules, from whom the town of Amathus in Cyprus was believed to have derived its name. According to some traditions, however, its name was derived from Amathus, the mother of Cinyras. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἀμαθός.)

AMATHU'SIA or AMATHU'NTIA (Ἀμαθοῦσία or Ἀμαθοῦντια), a surname of Aphrodite, which is derived from the town of Amathus in Cyprus, one of the most ancient seats of her worship. (Tac. Annal. iii. 62; Ov. Amor. iii. 15, 15; Virg. Aen. 242; Catull. lviii. 51.)

AMATIUS, surnamed Pseudomarcus, a person of low origin, who pretended to be either the son or grandson of the great Marius. On the death of Julius Caesar c. 44, he came forward as a popular leader, and erected an altar to Caesar on the spot where his body had been burned. He was, however, shortly afterwards seized by the consul Antony and put to death without a trial. This illegal act was approved by the senate in consequence of the advantages they derived from it. Valerius Maximus (ix. 15. § 2) says, that his name was Herophilus. (Appian, B. c. ii. 2, 3; Liv. Epit. 116; Cic. ad Att. xii. 49, xiv. 6—8; Philostr. i. 2; Nicolaus Damascenus, Vit. Aug. c. 14. p. 258, ed. Carpz.)

AMAZONES (Ἀμαζόνες), a warlike race of females, who act a prominent part in several of the adventures of Greek mythology. All accounts of them agree in the statement, that they came from the country about the Caucasus, and that their principal seats were on the riverThemodorus, in the neighbourhood of the modern Trebizond. From thence they are said to have at different times invaded Thrace, Asia Minor, the islands of the Aegean, Greece, Syria, Arabia, Egypt, and Libya.
The country about the Thermodon with its capital Thessaly was inhabited only by the Amazons, who were governed by a queen. The Gargareans, a race of men, were separated from them by a mountain, but once every year the Amazons met the Gargareans in the mountains for the purpose of propagating their race, and then returned to their own country. Their children, when of the female sex, were brought up by the Amazon mothers, and trained in their customary pursuits of war, riding, hunting, and cultivating the land; but each girl had her right breast cut off; their male children, on the other hand, were sent to the Gargareans, or put to death. (Strab. x. p. 503, &c.; Diod. ii. 45, &e., iii. 52, &c.; Justin, ii. 4.) The principal gods they worshipped were Ares and Artemis Taurpolea. The foundation of several towns in Asia Minor and in the islands of the Aegean is ascribed to them, e. g. of Ephesus, Smyrna, Cyme, Myrina, and Paphos. Strabo doubts the existence of such a race of females, while Diodorus attempts to give an account of them, which assumes all the appearance of history. That the Amazons were regarded as a real historical race down to a late period, is evident from the tradition, that, when Alexander the Great approached the country of the Amazons, their queen Thalestris hastened to him, in order to come mother by the conqueror of Asia. (Plut.
Aen. 46.)

But we confine ourselves here to noticing some of the mythical adventures with which the Amazonians are connected. They are said to have invaded Lycia in the reign of Lobates, but were destroyed by Bellerophon, who happened to be staying at the king's court. (Hom. Il. vi. 186, &c.; Schol. ad Leopoü, 17.) [Bellerophontes, Laomond.] At the time when Priam was yet a young man, they invaded Phrygia, and fought with the Phrygians and Trojans. (Hom. Il. iii.
189, &c.) The ninth among the labours imposed upon Heracles by Eurytheus, was to take from Hippolyte, the queen of the Amazons, her girdle, the ensign of her kingly power, which she had received as a present from Ares. (Apollod. ii. 5. 9; Diod. iv. 16; Hygin. Fab. 30; Quint. Smyrn.
xi. 244.) [Heracles.] In the reign of Theseus they invaded Attica. (Paus. i. 2; Pint. Thes. 244.) In the reign of Tarquinius Priscus. He belonged to the population. Bellovesus and Sigovcsus drew settlements, in consequence of the great number of their people between the Meuse and the Rhine, who were formerly tributary to the Aduatici, but were now independent. (Comp. Müller, Oroch., p. 536, &c.)
The representation of these warlike women occupied the Greek artists very extensively, and we still possess a large series of the most beautiful works of art, such as paintings on vases and walls, bronzes, reliefs, and gems, in which the Amazons and their battles with men are represented. The most celebrated works of this kind in antiquity were the battle of the Amazons with the Athenians in the Pocile at Athens, by Nicon (Paus. i. 15.
§ 2), on the shield of Athena, and on the foot-stock of the Olympian Zeuses, by Philidas. (I. 17.
§ 2.) Amazons were also represented by Alcamenes in the pediment of the temple of Zeuses at Olympia.
(v. 10. § 2.) Respecting the extant representations of Amazons and their customs, see Müller, Hauth.

AMAZONIUS, a surname of Apollo, under which he was worshiped, and had temple at Pyrrhichus in Iaconia. The name was derived either from the belief that the Amazonians had penetrated into Peloponnesus as far as Pyrrhichus, or that they had founded the temple
there. (Paus. iii. 25. § 2.) [L. S.]

AMBIGATUS, king of the Celts in Gaul in the reign of Tarquiniius Priscus. He belonged to the Bituriges, the most powerful of the Celtic people. When Ambigatus was advanced in years, he sent out Bellovses and Sigovses, the sons of his sister, with large swarms of his people to seek new settlements, in consequence of the great number of the population. Bellovses and Sigovses went beyond the course they should take; the latter in consequence went to the Hervynian forest and the former into Italy. (Liv. v. 34.)

AMBIVIRIX, a chief of the Eburones, a Gallic
people between the Meuse and the Rhine, who were formerly tributary to the Aquitani, but were ways in which it has been attempted to account for the origin of the story about the Amazons, two deserve to be mentioned. One opinion is, that the peculiar way in which the women of some of the Caucasian districts lived, and performed the duties which in other countries devolve upon men, together with the many instances of female bravery and courage which are noticed as remarkable even by modern travellers, were conveyed to the inhabits of western Asia and the Greeks in vague and obscure reports, and thus gave rise to the belief in the existence of such a warlike race of women, and that these rumours and reports were subsequently worked out and embellished by popular tradition and poetry. Others think that the Amazons were originally priestesses of Artemis (the moon), whose worship was widely spread in Asia, and which they are said to have established in various parts. It is further inferred, from the name Amazones, that these priestesses mutilated their bodies by cutting off their breasts in a manner similar to that in which the Galli and other priests mutilated their bodies, and that thus the Amazons represented the male ideal in the female sex, just as the Galli represeated the female ideal in the male sex. But it would be difficult, in the first place, to prove the existence of such priestesses, and in the second, to show how they could have occasioned the belief in a whole female race of this kind. Neither the poetical nor historical traditions about the Amazons contain anything to render this opinion very plausible;
and, in the absence of all positive evidence, the first opinion has much more to recommend it.

AMBIVIRIX, a chief of the Eburones, a Gallic
people between the Meuse and the Rhine, who were formerly tributary to the Aquitani, but were delivered by Caesar from the payment of this tribute. In A.D. 54, Caesar placed a legion and five cohorts under the command of Q. Titurius Sabinus and L. Aurunculeius Cotta, in the territories of the Eburones for the purpose of passing the winter there. But fifteen days after they had been stationed in their territories, the Eburones revolted at the instigation of Ambiorix and Catuvolcus, another chief, besieged the Roman camp, and destroyed almost all the Roman troops, after they had been induced by Ambiorix to leave their camp under promise of a safe-conduct. After their destruction Ambiorix hastened to the Adutici and Nervii, and induced them in conjunction with the Eburones, to attack the camp of Q. Cicero, who was stationed for the winter among the Nervii. The firmness of Cicero, and the defeat of the Gauls on the arrival of Caesar, compelled Ambiorix to raise the siege. In the following years Ambiorix continued to prosecute the war against Caesar, but though all his plans were thwarted, and the different troops he raised were defeated by Caesar, he always escaped falling into the hands of the conqueror. (Caes. B. G. v. 24, 26—51, vi. 5, 29—43, viii. 24, &c.; Dion Cass. xi. 5—10, 31, &c.; Liv. Epit. 106.) According to Florus (iii. 10, § 3) he escaped the vengeance of the Romans by fleeing beyond the Rhine.

AMBROSIUS TURPIUS. [TURPIUS.]

AMBROSIUS (?Ambrosiua), a daughter of Ambius, from whom the town of Ambraeia derived its name. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Eustath. ad Dionys. Perieg. 492.) Other traditions represent her as a grand-daughter of Apollo, and a daughter of Melas, king of the Dryopes. (Anton. Lib. 4.) A third account derived her from Ambias, a son of Theophrastus and grandson of Jecon. (Steph. Byz. l. c.) [L. S.]

AMBROSIUS (?Ambrosius) ALEXANDRIUS, a nobleman and courtier (S. Epiph. adv. Taer. 64. [44] § 3) flourished A. D. 230. At first a partisan of the emperor Maximinus (Euseb. H. E. vii. 18) and Macedonian, he was won to the faith by Origen, whose convert a fellow-student he became (Orig. Ep. ad Africam. vol. i. p. 29), and was ordained deacon. S. Hier. Vir. Illustr. 56.) He plied Origen with questions, and in writing his Commentaries (Treg. 1181.), supplying him with answers in abundance. He shone as a Conserver of the succession of Julius Maximinus (Euseb. vi. 18) A. D. 336, and died and before A. D. 47 and 253. His letters to Origen (praised by t. Jerome) are lost; part of one exists ap. Orig. de Orat. c. 5. p. 208, A. E. (See Routh’s Palaeog. Sacra. ii. p. 367.) Orig. dedicated to his Epistle to Martyrdom; Books against heretics: Commentary on St. John’s Gospel; and On Prayer.

AMBROSIUS, ST., bishop of MILAN, was born probably at Augusta Treverorum (Treves), which was the seat of government for the province Gaul, in which his father was prefect. His biographers differ as to whether the date of his birth was 333 or 340 A. D., but the latter is probably the true date. Circumstances occurred in his infancy which were understood to portend his future greatness. His father having died, Ambrose, then a boy, accompanied his mother to Rome, where he received the education of an advocate under Anicius Probus and Symmachus. He began pleading cases at Milan, then the imperial residence, and soon gained a high reputation for forensic eloquence. This success, together with the influence of his family, led to his appointment (about 370 A. D. or a little later) as consular prefect of the provinces of Liguria and Aemilia, whose seat of government was Milan. The struggle between the Catholics and Arians was now at its height in the Western Church, and upon the death of Aurelius, bishop of Milan, in 574, the question of the appointment of his successor led to an open conflict between the two parties. Ambrose exerted his influence to restore peace, and addressed the people in a conciliatory speech, at the conclusion of which a child in the further part of the crowd cried out “Ambrose episcopus.” The words were received as an oracle from heaven, and Ambrose was elected bishop by the acclamation of the whole multitude, the bishops of both parties uniting in his election. It was in vain that he adopted the strangest devices to alter the determination of the people; nothing could make them change their mind (Paulin. Vit. Ambros. pp. 2, 3): in vain did he flee from Milan in the night; he mistook his way, and found himself the next morning before the gate of the city. At length he yielded to the express command of the emperor (Valentinian I.), and was consecrated on the eighth day after his baptism, for at the time of his election he was only a catechumen. Immediately after his election he gave all his property to the church and the poor, and adopted an ascetic mode of life, while the public administration of his office was most firm and skillful. He was a great patron of monasticism: about two years after his consecration he wrote his three books “De Virginibus,” and dedicated them to his sister Marcellina. In the Arian controversy he espoused the orthodox side at his very entrance on his bishopric by demanding that his baptism should be performed by an orthodox bishop. He applied himself most diligently to the study of theology under Simplician, a presbyter of Rome, who afterwards became his successor in the bishopric. His influence soon became very great, both with the people and with the emperor Valentinian and his son Gratian, for whose instruction he composed his treatises “De Fide,” and “De Spiritu Sancto.” In the year 377, in consequence of an invasion of Italy by the northern barbarians, Ambrose fled to Illyricum, and afterwards (in Cæce’s opinion) visited Rome. After his return to Milan, he was employed by the court on important political affairs. When Maximus, after the death of Gratian (383), threatened Italy, Justina, the mother of the young emperor Valentinian II., sent Ambrose on an embassy to the usurper, whose advance the bishop succeeded in delaying. At a later period Ambrose went again to Treves on a like mission; but his conduct on this occasion gave such offence to Maximus, that he was compelled to return to Italy in haste. While pursuing these political services to Justina and Valentinian, Ambrose was at open variance with them on the great religious question of the age. Justina was herself an Arian, and had brought up the young emperor in the same tenets.
Her contest with Ambrose began in the year 380, when she appointed an Arian bishop to the vacant see of Sirmium; upon which Ambrose went to Sirmium, and, a miraculous judgment on an Arian who insulted him having struck terror into his opponents, he consecrated Anemarius, who was of the orthodox party, as bishop of Sirmium, and then returned to Milan, where Justina set on foot several intrigues against him, but without effect. In the year 382, Palladius, who was Sevustinianus, two Arian bishops, petitioned Gratian for a general council to decide the Arian controversy; but, through the influence of Ambrose, instead of a general council, a synod of Italian, Illyrian and Gallic bishops was assembled at Aquileia, over which Ambrose presided, and by which Palladius and Sevustinianus were deposed.

At length, in the years 385 and 386, Ambrose and Justina came to open conflict. Justina, in the name of the emperor, demanded of Ambrose the use of at least one of the churches in Milan, for the performance of divine worship by Arian ecclesiastics. Ambrose refused, and the people rose up to take his part. At Easter (385) an attempt was made by Justina to take forcible possession of the basilica, but the show of resistance was so great, that the attempt was abandoned, and the court was even obliged to apply to Ambrose to quell the tumult. He answered, that he had not stirred up the people, and that God alone could still them. The people now kept guard about the bishop's residence and the basilica, which the imperial forces hesitated to attack. In fact, the people were almost wholly on the side of Ambrose, the Arian party consisting of few beyond the court and the Gothic troops. Auxentius, an Arian bishop, who was Justina's chief adviser in these proceedings, now challenged Ambrose to a public disputation in the emperor's palace; but Ambrose refused, saying that a council of the church was the only proper place for such a discussion. He was next commanded to leave the city, but the show of resistance was so great, that he ordered to do, and in this refusal the people still supported him. In order to keep up the spirits of the people, he introduced into the church where they kept watch the regular performance of antiphonal hymns, which had been long practised in the Eastern Church, but not hitherto introduced into the West. At length, the contest was decided about a year after its commencement by the miracles which are reported to have attended the discovery of the relics of two hitherto unknown martyrs, Gervasius and Protasius. A blind man was said to have been restored to sight, and several demons dispossessed. These events are recorded by Ambrose himself, by his secretary Paulinus, and by his disciple Augustine, who was in Milan at the time; but a particular discussion of the truth of these miracles would be out of place here. They were denied by the Arians and discredited by the court, but the impression made by them upon the people in general was such, that Justina thought it prudent to desist from her attempt. (Ambros. Epist. xii. xx. xxii. § 2. lvi. lii. Paulin. Vit. Ambros. § 14-17, p. 4. Ben.; Augustin. Confess. ix. 7. § 14-16, De Civ. Dei, xxii. 8. § 2. Serm. 518, 286.)

An imperial rescript was however issued in the same year for the toleration of all sects of Christians, any offence against which was made high treason (Cod. Theodos. IV. De Fide Catholicae); but we have no evidence that its execution was attempted; and the state of the parties was quite altered by the death of Justina in the next year (387), when Valentinian became a Catholic, and still more completely by the victory of Theodosius over Maximus (388). This event put the whole power of the empire into the hands of a prince who was a firm Catholic, and over whom Ambrose speedily acquired such influence, that, after the massacre at Thessalonica in 390, he refused Theodosius admission into the council of Milan for a period of eight months, and only restored him after he had performed a public penance, and had confessed that he had learnt the difference between an emperor and a priest.

Ambrose was an active opponent not only of the Arians, but also of the Macedonians, Apollinarians, and Novatians, and of Jovinian. It was probably about the year 384 that he successfully resisted the petition of Symmachus and the heathen senators of Rome for the restoration of the altar of Victory. He was the principal instructor of Augustine in the Christian faith. [Ambrosius.]

The latter years of his life, with the exception of a short absence from Milan during the usurpation of Eugenius (393), were devoted to the care of his diocese. He died on the 4th of April, A. D. 397.

As a writer, Ambrose cannot be ranked high notwithstanding his great eloquence. His theological knowledge scarcely extended beyond a fair acquaintance with the works of the Greek fathers from whom he borrowed much. His works bear also the marks of haste. He was rather a man of action than of letters.

His works are very numerous, though several of them have been lost. They consist of Letters, Sermons, and Orations, Commentaries on Scripture, Treatises in commendation of celibacy and monasticism, and other treatises, of which the most important are: "Hexaemeron," an account of the creation; "De Officiis Ministeriorum," which is generally considered his best work; "De Mysteriis;" "De Sacramentis;" "De Poenitentia;" and the above-mentioned works, "De Fide," and "De Spiti Sanctoro," which are both upon the Trinity. The well-known hymn, "Te Deum laudamus," has been ascribed to him, but its date is at least a century later. There are other hymns ascribed to him, but upon doubtful authority. He is believed to have settled the order of public worship in the churches of Milan in the form which it had till the eighth century under the names of "Officium Ambrosianum" and "Missae Ambrosiana.

The best edition of his works is that of Benedictines, 2 vols. fol., Paris, 1686 and 1697, with an Appendix containing a life of Ambrose by his secretary Paulinus, another in Greek, which was lost in 1182. Two works of Ambrose, Epistola ad initianos, and Epistola de Fide, has been discovered by Angelo Mai, and are published by him in the seventh volume of his Scriptorum Veterum Nova Collectio. [P. S.]

AMBRYSIUS, a hearer of Didymus, at Alexandria, lived A. D. 392, and was the author of Commentaries on Job, and a book in verse against Apollinaris of Laodicea. Neither is extant. (Hieron. de Vir. Illust. § 126.) [A. J. C.]

AMBRYON (Ἀμβρυών) wrote a work of Theocritus the Chian, from which Diogenes Lae...
tius (v. 11) quotes an epitaph of Theocritus against Aristocles.

AMBRYSSUS (Ἀμβρυσσος), the mythical founder of the town of Ambryssus or Amphryssus in Phocis. (Paus. x. 36. § 2.)

AMBULIA, AMBIULII, and AMBULIUS (Ἀμβυλία, Ἀμβυλίοι, and Ἀμβυλίος), surnames under which the Spartans worshipped Athena, the Dioscuri, and Zeus. (Paus. iii. 13. § 4.) The meaning of the name is uncertain, but it has been supposed to be derived from δαίδαλος, and to designate those divinities as the delayers of death.

AMBUSTUS, the name of a family of the patrician Fabia gens. The first member of the Fabia gens, who acquired this cognomen, was Q. Fabius Vibulanus, consul in b. c. 412, who appears to have been a son of N. Fabius Vibulanus, consul in b. c. 421. From this time the name Vibulanus was dropped, and that of Ambustus took its place. The latter was in its turn supplanted by that of Maximus, which was first acquired by Q. Fabius, son of No. 7 [see below], and was handed down by him to his descendants.

1. Q. Fabius M. P. Q. N. Vibulanus Ambustus, consul in b. c. 412. (Liv. iv. 52.)

2. M. Fabius Ambustus, Pontifex Maximus in the year that Rome was taken by the Gauls, b. c. 390. His three sons [see Nos. 3, 4, and 5] were sent as ambassadors to the Gauls, when the latter were besieging Clusium, and took part in a sally of the besieged against the Gauls. The Gauls demanded that the Fabii should be surrendered to them for violating the law of nations; but upon the senate refusing to give up the guilty parties, they marched against Rome. The three sons were in the same year elected consular tribunes. (Liv. v. 35, 36, 41; Plut. Cam. 17.)

3. K. Fabius M. P. Q. N. Ambustus, son of No. 2 and brother to Nos. 4 and 5, was quaestror in b. c. 409, with three plebeians as his colleagues, which was the first time that quaestors were chosen from the plebs. (Liv. iv. 54.) He was consular tribune for the first time in 404 (iv. 61), again in 401 (v. 10), a third time in 395 (v. 24), and a fourth time in 390. [See No. 2.]

4. N. Fabius M. P. Q. N. Ambustus, son of No. 2 and brother to Nos. 3 and 5, consular tribune in b. c. 406 (Liv. iv. 55), and again in 390. [See No. 2.]

5. Q. Fabius M. P. Q. N. Ambustus, son of No. 2 and brother to Nos. 3 and 4, was consular tribune in b. c. 390. [See No. 2.]

6. M. Fabius K. P. M. N. Ambustus, son, as appears, of No. 3, was consular tribune in b. c. 381. (Liv. vi. 25.) He had two daughters, of whom the elder was married to Serv. Sulpicius, and the younger to C. Licinius Stolo, the author of the Licinian Regations. According to the story recited by Livy, the younger Fabia induced her sister to assist her husband in obtaining the consulship for the plebeian order, into which she had carried. (vi. 34.) Ambustus was consular tribune second time in 369, and took an active part in support of the Licinian Regations. (vi. 36.) He as censor in 363. (Fast. Capitol.)

7. M. Fabius N. F. M. N. Ambustus, son, as appears, of No. 4, was consul in b. c. 360, and carried on the war against the Faliscii and Tarquiniienses, whom he also conquered. As he was absent from Rome when the time came for holding the comitia, the senate, which did not like to entrust them to his colleague, who had appointed a plebeian dictator, and still less to the dictator himself, nominated interreges for the purpose. The object of the patricians was to secure both places in the consulship for their own order again, which was effected by Ambustus, who seems to have returned to Rome meantime. He was appointed the eleventh interrex, and declared two patricians consuls in violation of the Licinian law. (Liv. vii. 17.) He was consul a third time in 354, when he conquered the Tibrutes and obtained a triumph in consequence. (vii. 18, 19; Fast. Triumph.) In 351 he was appointed dictator merely to frustrate the Licinian law again at the comitia, but did not succeed in his object. (Liv. vii. 22.) He was alive in 325, when his son, Q. Fabius Maximus Rullianus, was master of the horse to Papirius, and fled to Rome to implore protection from the proximate danger of the dictator. He interceded on his son's behalf both with the senate and the people. (viii. 33.)

8. C. Fabius (C. P. M. N.) Ambustus, consul in b. c. 358, in which year a dictator was appointed through fear of the Gauls. (Liv. vii. 12.)

9. M. Fabius M. F. N. N. Ambustus, son apparently of No. 7, and brother to the great Q. Fabius Maximus Rullianus, was master of the horse in b. c. 322. (Liv. viii. 38.)

10. Q. Fabius (Q. F. Q. N.) Ambustus, dictator in b. c. 321, but immediately resigned through some fault in the election. (Liv. ix. 7.)

11. C. Fabius M. F. N. N. Ambustus, son apparently of No. 7, and brother to No. 9, was appointed master of the horse in b. c. 315 in place of Q. Aulus, who fell in battle. (Liv. ix. 28.)

AMENIAS. (Ἀμενιας), a younger brother of Aeschylus, of the Attic demos of Pallene according to Herodotus (viii. 84, 93), or of that of Decola according to Plutarch (Them. 14), distinguished himself at the battle of Salamis (b. c. 480) by making the first attack upon the Persian ships, and also by his pursuit of Artemisia. He and Eumenes were judged to have been the bravest on this occasion among all the Athenians. (Herod. Plat. lii. 30; Dio. xil. 27.) Aelian mentions (v. ii. v. 19), that Aeminius prevented the condemnation of his brother Aeschylus by the Areopagus. (Aeschylus, p. 41, a.)

AMEINOCLES (Ἀμεινόκλης), a Corinthian shipbuilder, who visited Samos about b. c. 704, and built four ships for the Athenians. (Thuc. iii. 13.) Pliny (H. N. vi. 56) says, that Thucydides mentioned Aeminiocles as the inventor of the trireme; but this is a mistake, for Thucydides merely states that triremes were first built at Corinth in Greece, without ascribing their invention to Aeminiocles. According to Syncellus (p. 212, c), triremes were first built at Athens by Aeminiocles.

AMEIPSIAS. (Ἀμειψιας), a comic poet of Athens, contemporary with Aristophanes, whom he twice conquered in the dramatic contests, gaining the second prize with his ὀνομαστήρας when Aristophanes was third with the "Clouds" (425 b. c.), and the first with his Καυσατρής, when Aristophanes gained the second with the "Birds." (414 b. c.) Argument in Aristoph. Nath. et Adv. The Kónos appears to have had the same subject and aim as the "Clouds." It is at least certain that Sophocles appeared in the play, and that the Chorus consisted of Φροντιστῶν. (Diog. Laert. ii. 28; Athen. v. p. 218.) Aristophanes alludes to Ameipsias in the "Frogs" (v. 12—14), and we are told in the anonymous life of Aristophanes, that when Aristophanes first exhibited his plays, in the names of other poets, Ameipsias applied to him the proverb τετράδι γεγονός, which means "a person who labours for others," in allusion to Heracles, who was born on the fourth of the month.

Ameipsias wrote many comedies, out of which there remain only a few fragments of the following: οἱ πολλοί καὶ μετέχοντες, Κακτόβων (doubtful), Κόνων, Μακάριος, Βασίλειος, Ερείπιος, and of some the names of which are unknown. Most of his plays were of the old comedy, but some, in all probability, were of the middle. (Meineke, Frag. Com., i. p. 199, ii. p. 701.)

AMELIUS (Ἀμηλίος), a native of Aegina according to Suidas (s. v. Ἀμηλίος), but a Tuscan according to Porphyry (vul. Plotin.?), belonged to the new Platonic school, and was the pupil of Plotinus and master of Porphyry. He quoted the opinion of St. John about the Ἀγγέλους without mentioning the name of the Apostle: this extract has been preserved by Eusebius. (Prosop. Evang. xi. 19.) See Suid. Prophyr. u. e.; Syrinx, xiii. Metaph., p. 47, a. 61, b. 69, a. 88, b. Bentley, On Free-Thinking, p. 182, &c., Lond. 1743; Fabric. Bibli. Græc. iii. p. 160.

AMENES (Ἀμηνῆς), an ancient Greek surgeon, mentioned by Galen as the inventor of some ingenious bandages. (De Fussis, c. 58, 61, 89, vol. xii. pp. 496, 407, 493, ed. Chart.) Some fragments of the works of a surgeon named Ameipsias (of which name Ameipsis is very possibly a corruption) still exist in the manuscript Collection of Surgical Writers by Nicetas (Fabricius, Bibli. Græc. vol. xii. p. 778, ed. vet.), and one extract is preserved by Oribasius (Coll. Medic. xlvii. 30) in the fourth volume of Cardinal Mai's Collection of Classic Anecdotae e Virtutibus, &c., p. 99, Rom. 1831, 8vo. His date is unknown, except that he must have lived in or before the second century after Christ. He may perhaps be the same person who is said by the Scholast on Theocritus (Idyll. viii. 128) to have been put to death by Ptolemy Philadelphia, about b. c. 264, for plotting against his life. (W. A. G.)

AMERICANUS (Ἀμερικανός), of Macedonia, a grammarian. Westernmore, a work entitled Παλαιονα, which gave an account of the meaning of words, and another called Ρυγμακῶν. (Athen. iv. p. 176, c. c, xv. p. 681, &c.; Schol. ad Apoll. Rhod. ii. 384, 1284; Kius, ad Heog. s. v. Ἀμερικανός.)

AMERISTUS (Ἀμερίστος), the brother of the poet Steichon, is mentioned by Proclus (ad Euthyd. ii. p. 19) as one of the early Greek geometers. He lived in the latter part of the seventh century b. c.

AMESTRIS. [Ἀμεστρίς.]

AMIA'NUS, whom Cicero mentions in a letter to Atticus (vi. 1. § 13), written b. c. 50, was probably a debtor of Atticus in Cilicia.

AMISO'DARUS (Ἀμισοδάρος), a King of Lycia, who was said to have brought up the monster Chimaera. (Hom. L. ii. 328; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1062; Apollod. ii. 3. § 1; Aelian, I. A. ix. 23.) His sons Antynius and Maris were slain at Troy by the sons of Nestor. (ii. xvi. 317, &c.)

AMITON (Ἀμίτων), of Eleusineto in Crete, is said to have been the first person who sang to the lyre amatory poems. His descendants were called Amitoras (Ἀμίτωρες). (Athen. xiv. p. 638, b.) There seems some corruption in the text of the Athenaeus, as the two names Amintos and Amitos do not correspond. Instead of the former we ought perhaps to read Ametor. (Comp. Etym. M. p. 83, 15, ed. Syllburg; Hesych. s. v. Αμίτωρ.)

AMMIA'NUS (Ἀμμιανός), a Greek epigrammatist, but probably a Roman by birth. The Greek Anthology contains 27 epigrams by him (Jacobs, iii. pp. 93—98), to which must be added another contained in the Vatican MS. (Jacobs xiii. p. 693), and another, which is placed among the anonymous epigrams, but which some MSS assign to Ammianus. (Jacobs, iv. p. 127, No. xiii.) They are all of a factitious character. In the Planudean MS he is called Abbianus, and Wernsdorf supposes to be a Greek form of Avianus or Avienus. (Poet. Lat. Min. v. p. ii. p. 675.)

The time at which he lived may be gathered with tolerable certainty, from his epigrams. Tha he was a contemporary of the epigrammatist Lucilius, who lived under Nero, has been inferred from the circumstance that both attack an eutor name Placens. (Ammian, Ep. 2; Lucil. Ep. 89, aq Jacobs.) One of his epigrams (13) is identical with the last two lines of one of Martial's (ix. 30) who is supposed by some to have translated these lines from Ammianus, and therefore to have lived after him. But the fact is equally well explained on the supposition that the poets were contemporaries. From two other epigrams of Ammianus (Jacobs, vol. iv. p. 127, No. 42, and vol. vii. p. 125), we find that he was contemporary with the sophist Antonius Polemo, who flourished under Trajan and Hadrian. (Jacobs, Anthol. Graec. x. pp. 312, 313, xiii. p. 840.)

AMMIA'NUS MARCELLI'NUS, "the last subject of Rome who composed a profane historian in the Latin language," was by birth a Greek, at himself frequently quotes (xxxii. sub fin. xix. 8. § 33, xxxii. 6. § 20, &c.), and a native of Syrian Antioch, as we infer from a letter addressed to him by Lysimachus. (See Vales. proof, in Ammian Marcellin.) At an early age he embraced the profession of arms, and was admitted among the protectores domestici, which proves that he belonged to a distinguished family, since none were enrolled in that corps except young men of noble blood, officers whose valour and fidelity had been proved in long service. Of his subsequent promotion nothing is known. He was attached to the staff of...
Ursicinus, one of the most able among the generals of Constantius, and accompanied him to the East in 350. He returned with his commander to Italy four years afterwards, from thence passed over into Gaul, and assisted in the enterprise against Sylvanus, again followed Ursicinus when despatched for a second time to the East, and appears to have never quitted him until the period of his final disgrace in 360. Ammianus subsequently attended the emperor Julian in his campaign against the Persians, was present at Antioch in 371, when the plot of Theodorus was detected in the reign of Valens, and witnessed the tortures inflicted upon the conspirators. (xxix. i. § 24.) Eventually he established himself at Rome, where he composed his history, and during the progress of the task read several portions publicly, which were received with great applause. (Liban. Epist. xxxclxlii. p. 60, ed. Wolf.) The precise date of his death is not recorded, but it must have happened later than 390, since a reference occurs to his consulship of Neoterius, which belongs to that year.

The work of Ammianus extended from the accession of Nerva, A. D. 96, the point at which the histories of Tacitus and the biographies of Suetonius terminated, to the death of Valens, A. D. 378, comprising a period of 282 years. It was divided into thirty-one books, of which the first thirteen re lost. The remaining eighteen embrace the acts of Constantius from A. D. 333, the seventeenth year of his reign, together with the whole career of Gallus, Julianus, Jovinus, Valentinianus, and Valens. The portion preserved includes the transactions of twenty-five years only, which proves that the earlier books must have presented a very condensed abridgment of the events contained in the long space over which they stretched; and once we may feel satisfied, that what has been aved is much more valuable than what has perished.

Gibbon (cap. xxvi.) pays a well deserved tribute to the accuracy, fidelity, and impartiality of Ammianus. We are indebted to him for a knowledge of many important facts not elsewhere recorded, and for much valuable insight into the modes of thought and the general tone of public opinion prevalent in his day. His history must not, however, be regarded as a complete chronicle of that period: those proceedings only are brought forward prominently in which he himself was engaged, and early all the statements admitted appear to have been drawn upon his own observations, or upon the information derived from trustworthy eye-witnesses. A considerable number of dissertations and digressions are introduced, many of them highly interesting and valuable. Such are his notices of the institutions and manners of the Sueves (xiv. 4), the Scythians and Sarmatians (xvii. 12), of the Iuns and Alani (xxlii. 2), of the Egyptians and their country (xxii. 6, 14-16), and his geographical discussions upon Gaul (xv. 9), the Pontus (xii. 8), and Thrace (xxvii. 4), although the accuracy of many of his details has been called in question by D'Aubigné. Less legitimate and less decided are his geological speculations upon earthquakes (xvii. 7), his astronomical inquiries into eclipses (xx. 3), comets (xxiv. 10), and the regulation of the calendar (xxvi. 1), his medical researches into the origin of epidemics (xix. 4), his oological theory on the destruction of ligions by mosquitoes (xviii. 7), and his horticultural essay on the improvement of palms (xxiv. 3). But in addition to the accuracy and honesty of purpose, he was gifted with a large measure of strong common sense which enabled him in many points to rise superior to the prejudice of his day, and with a clear-sighted independence of spirit which prevented him from being dazzled or overawed by the brilliancy and the terrors which enveloped the imperial throne. The wretched vanity, weakness, and debauchery of Constantius, rendering him an easy prey to the designs of the profligate minions by whom he was surrounded, the female intrigues which ruled the court of Gallus, and the conflicting elements of vice and virtue which were so strongly combined in the character of Valentinianus, are all sketched with boldness, vigour, and truth. But although sufficiently acute in detecting and exposing the follies of others, and especially in ridiculing the absurdities of popular superstition, Ammianus did not entirely escape the contagion. The general and deep-seated belief in magic spells, omens, prodigies, and oracles, which appears to have gained additional strength upon the first introduction of Christianity, evidently exercised no small influence over his mind. The old legends and doctrines of the Pagan creed and the subtle mysticism which philosophers pretended to discover lurking below, when mixed up with the pure and simple but startling tenets of the new faith, formed a confused mass which few intellects, except those of the very highest class, could reduce to order and harmony.

A keen controversy has been maintained with regard to the religious creed of our author. (See Bayle.) There is nothing in his writings which can entitle us to decide the question positively. In several passages he speaks with marked respect of Christianity and its professors (xxxi. sub fin., xxii. 11, xxvii. 3; compare xxii. 12, xxiv. 4); but even his strongest expressions, which are all attributed by Gibbon "to the incomparable pliancy of a polytheist," afford no conclusive evidence that he was himself a disciple of the cross. On the other hand he does not scruple to stigmatize with the utmost severity the savage fury of the contending sects (xxii. 5), nor fail to reprobrate the bloody violence of Damonus and Ursinus in the contest for the see of Rome (xxvii. 3): the absence of all censure on the apostasy of Julian, and the terms which he employs with regard to Nemesis (xiv. 11, xxii. 3), the Genius (xxi. 14), Morceus (xxiv. 5, xxv. 4), and other deities, are by many considered as decisive proofs that he was a pagan. Indeed, as Heyne justly remarks, many of the statements of this epoch seem purposely to avoid committing themselves. Being probably devoid of strong religious principles, they felt unwilling to hazard any declaration which might one day expose them to persecution and prevent them from adopting the various forms which the faith of the court might from time to time assume.

Little can be said in praise of the style of Ammianus. The melodious flow and simple dignity of the purer models of composition had long ceased to be relished, and we too often detect the harsh diction and involved periods of an imperfectly educated foreign soldier, relieved occasionally by the pompous inflation and flashy glitter of the rhetorical schools. His phraseology as it regards the significance, grammatical inflexions, and syntactical combinations of words, probably represents the current language of the age, but must be pronounced full of barbarisms and solecisms when judged according to the standard of Cicero and Livy.

The Edito Princeps of Ammianus Marcellinus, edited by Angelus Sabinius, was printed at Rome, in folio, by George Sachsel and Barth. Golsch in the year 1474. It is very incorrect, and contains 13 books only, from the 14th to the 26th, both inclusive. The remaining five were first published by Accorsi, who, in his edition printed in folio at Augsburg in 1532, boasts that he had corrected five thousand errors.

The most useful modern editions are those of Gronovius, 4to., Lugd. Bat. 1693; of Ernesti, 8vo. Lips. 1778; but above all, that which was commenced by Wagner, completed after his death by Erhardt, and published at Leipsic, in 3 vols. 8vo. 1808. [W. R.]

AMMON (Ἀμον), originally an Aethiopian or Libyan divinity, whose worship subsequently spread all over Egypt, a part of the northern coast of Africa, and many parts of Greece. The real Egyptian name was Amun or Amon (Herod. ii. 42; Plut. de Is. et Os. 9); the Greeks called him Zeus Ammon, the Romans Jupiter Ammon, and the Hebrews Amon. (Jerem. xlvi. 28.) That in the countries where his worship was first established he was revered in certain respects as the supreme divinity, is clear from the fact, that the Greeks recognised in him their own Zeus, although the identity of the two gods in later times rests upon philosophical speculations, made at a period when the original character of Ammon was almost lost sight of, and a more spiritual view of him substituted in its place.

The most ancient seat of his worship appears to have been Meroe, where he had a much revered oracle (Herod. i. 29); thence it was introduced into Egypt, where the worship took the firmest root at Thebes in Upper Egypt, which was therefore frequently called by the Greeks Diospolis, or the city of Zeus. (Herod. ii. 42; Diod. i. 15.) Another famous seat of the god, with a celebrated oracle, was in the oasis of Ammonium (Siwah) in the Libyan desert; the worship was also established in Cyrenaica. (Paus. x. 13, § 3.) The god was represented either in the form of a ram, or as a human being with the head of a ram (Herod. f. c.; Strob. xvii. p. 812); but there are some representations in which he appears altogether as a human being with only the horns of a ram. (Serv. ad Pud. 3) calls him dies ovium. If we take all these circumstances into consideration, it seems clear that the original idea of Ammon was that of a protector and leader of the flocks. The Aethiopians were a nomadic people, flocks of sheep constituted their principal wealth, and it is perfectly in accordance with the notions of the Aethiopians as well as Egyptians to worship the animal which is the leader and protector of the flock. This view is supported by various stories about Ammon. Hyginus (Post. Astr. i. 20) whose account is only a rationalistic interpretation of the origin of the god's worship, relates that some African of the name of Ammon brought to Libya, who was then the possession of Egypt, a large quantity of cattle. In return for this, Liber gave him a piece of land near Thebes, and in commemoration of the benefits he had conferred upon the god, he was represented as a human being with horns. What Pausanias (iv. 23, § 5) and Eustathius (ad Diony. Periq. 219) remark, as well as one of the many etymologies of the name of Ammon from the Egyptian word Amun, which signifies a shepherd, or to feed, likewise accord with the opinion that Ammon was originally the leader and protector of flocks. Herodotus relates a story to account for the ram's head (ii. 42): Heracles wanted to see Zeus, but the latter wished to avoid the interview; when, however, Heracles at last had recourse to entreaties, Zeus contrived the following expedient: he cut off the head of a ram, and holding this before his own head, and having covered the remaining part of his body with the skin of the ram, he appeared before Heracl•. Hence, Herodotus adds, the Thracians never sacrificed a ram, except in a year of calamity, and on such occasion they kill and flay a ram, and with its skin they dress the statue of Zeus (Ammon); by the side of this statue they then place that of Hercules. A similar account mentioned by Servius (ad Aen. iv. 196) may serve as a commentary upon Herodotus. When Bacchus, or according to others, Heracles went to India and led his army through the desert of Libya, he was at last quite exhausted with thirst, and invoked his father, Jupiter. Hereupon a ram appeared, which led Hercules to a place where it opened a spring in the sand by sprinkling with its foot. For this reason, says Servius, Jupiter Ammon, whose name is derived from ἄμος (sand), is represented with the horns of a ram. (Comp. Hygin. Fab. 138, Post. Astr. i. 20 Lucan, Pharsol. ix. 511.) There are several other traditions, with various modifications arising from the time and place of their origin; but all agree in representing the ram as the guide and deliverer of the wandering herdsmen and herdsmen in the deserts either in a direct way, or by giving oracles. Ammon, therefore, who is identical with the ram, is the guide and protector of man and of all his possessions; he stands in the same relation to mankind as the common ram to his flock.

The introduction of the worship of Ammon from Aethiopia into Egypt was symbolically represented in a ceremony which was performed at Thebes once in every year. On a certain day, the image of the god was carried across the river Nile into Libya, and after some days it was brought back, as if the god had arrived from Aethiopia. (Diod. i. 97.) The same account is given by Eustathius (ad Hom. iv. p. 128), though in a somewhat different form. He relates, that according to some, the Aethiopians used to fetch the images of Zeus and other gods from the great temple of Zeus at Thebes; with these images they went about, at a certain period, in Libya, celebrated a splendid festival for twelve days—for this, he adds, is the number of the gods they worship. This number twelve contains an allusion to the number of signs in the zodiac, of which the ram (caper) is one. Thus we arrive at the second phases in the character of Ammon, who is here conceived as the ram in the sign of Capricorn (Zetas dignified in the skin of a ram. See Hygin. Fab. 138, Post. Astr. i. 20; Macrob. Sat. i. 21, 18; Aelian, V. H. x. 18.) This astronomical character of Ammon is of later origin, an perhaps not older than the sixth century before Christ. The speculating Greeks of still later times (ad Aen. vi. 68, &c.) make Ammon a king of Libya, describes him (11, &c.) as the spirit pervading the universe, an as the author of all life in nature. (Comp. Plat. de Is. et Os. 9, 21.) The new Platonists perceived in Ammon their demiurgos, that is, the creator and preserver of the world. As this subject belongs more especially to the mythology of Egypt, we cannot here enter into a detailed discussion about the nature and character which the later Greeks assigned to him, or his connexion with Dionysus and Hercules. Respecting these points and the various opinions of modern critics, as well as the different representations of Ammon still extant, the reader may consult Jablonsky, Pantheon Aegypt.; Bohlen, "Das alte Aegypt., mit besonderer Rucksicht auf Egypten," ii. c. 2, § 9; J. C. Frichard, Egyptian Mythology; J. F. Champollion, Pachonli Egyptiens, ou Chronologie des Personages de l'ancienne Egypte, &c., Paris, 1823.

The worship of Ammon was introduced into Greece at an early period, probably through the medium of the Greek colony in Cyrene, which must have formed a connexion with the great oracle of Ammon in the Oasis soon after its establishment. Ammon had a temple and a statue, the gift of Pindar, at Thebes (Paus. ix. 16. § 1), and another at Sparta, the inhabitants of which, as Pausanias (iii. 18. § 2) says, consulted the oracle of Ammon in Libya from early times more than the other Greeks. At Aphyris, Ammon was worshipped, from the time of Lycurgus, as zealously as in Ammonium. Pindar the poet honoured the god with a hymn. At Megalopolis the god was represented with the head of a ram (Paus. viii. 32. § 1), and the Greeks of Cyrenaica dedicated at Delphi a chariot with a statue of Ammon, (x. 13. § 3.) The hegemon which Alexander paid to the god in the Oasis is well known. [L. S.]

AMMON (Ἀμμών), a geometrical, who made a measurement of the walls of Rome, about the time of the first invasion of the Goths, and found them to be 21 miles in circuit. (Olymipodorus, ap. Phot. Cod. 80, p. 63, ed. Bekker.) [P. S.]

AMMONAS (Ἀμμονᾶς) or AMOUN (Αούν), founder of one of the most celebrated monastic communities in Egypt. Obliged by his relations to marry, he persuaded his bride to perpetual continence (Socin. Hist. Eccles. L. 14) by the authority of St. Paul's Epistle to the Corinthians. (Socin. Hist. Eccles. p. 23.) They lived together thus for 18 years, when at her wish, for greater perfection, they parted, and he retired to Scetis and Mt. Nitria, to the south of Lake Maroetis, where he lived 22 years, visiting his sister-wife twice in the year. (Ibid, and Pallad. Hist. Laur. c. 7; Ruffin, Vit. Patr. c. 29.) He died before St. Antony (from whom there is an epistle to him, S. Athan. Opp. vol. i. pt. 2, p. 959, ed. Bened.), i.e. before A.D. 365, for the latter asserted that he beheld the soul of Ammon borne by angels to heaven (Vit. S. Antonii et S. Athanasii., § 60), and as St. Athanasius's history of St. Antony preserves the order of time, he died perhaps about A.D. 320. There are seventeen or nineteen Rules of Asceticism (kedusmus) ascribed to him; the Greek original exists in MS. (Lambecius, Biblioth. Vindel. li. iv. cod. 136, No. 6); they are published in the Latin version of Gerhard Vossius in the Biblioth. P. Petri Aegyptici, vol. ii. p. 484, Paris. 1636. In the Inscriptions of the Coptic Church of Ammon, or one bearing the same name, exist also in MS. (Lambecus, l. c. Cod. 155, No. 2) [A. J. C.]

AMMONIA (Ἀμμονία), a surname of Hera, under which she was worshipped in Ellis. The inhabitants of Ellis had from the earliest times been in the habit of consulting the oracle of Zeus Ammon in Libya. (Paus. v. 15. § 7.) [L. S.]

AMMONIANUS (Ἀμμονιανός), a Greek grammarian, who lived in the fifth century after Christ. He was a relation and a friend of the philosopher Syrinnus, and devoted his attention to the study of the Greek poets. It is recorded of him that he had an ass, which became so fond of poetry from listening to its master, that it neglected its food. (Damosius, ap. Phot. p. 333, ed. Bekker; Suid. s. v., Ἀμμονιανός and Οσίας Ἀπόσ.) AMMONIUS, a favourite of Alexander Balas, king of Syria, to whom Alexander entrusted the entire management of public affairs. Ammonius was avaricious and cruel; he put to death numerous friends of the king, the queen Laodice, and Antigonus, the son of Demetrius. Being detected in plotting against the life of Ptolemy Philometor, about b. c. 147, the latter required Alexander to surrender Ammonius to him; but though Alexander refused to do this, Ammonius was put to death by the inhabitants of Antioch, whom Ptolemy had induced to espouse his cause. (Liv. Epit. 50; Joseph. Ant. xiii. 4. § 5; Did. Exe. 29, p. 628, ed. Wess.)

AMMONIUS (Ἀμμονίων) of ALEXANDRIA, the son of Ammonius, was a pupil of Alexander, and one of the chief teachers in the gymnosophical school founded by Aristarchus. (Suid. s. v., Ἀμμονίων.) He wrote commentaries upon Homer, Pindar, and Aristophanes, none of which are extant. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. p. 712; Matter, Essais historiques sur l'Ecole d'Alexandre, i. pp. 179, 233.)

AMMONIUS (Ἀμμονίων), of ALEXANDRIA, Presbyter and Oeconomus of the Church in that city, and an Egyptian by birth, A. D. 458. He subscribed the Epistle sent by the clergy of Egypt to the emperor Leo, in behalf of the Council of Chalcodon. (Concilia, ed. Labbe, vol. iv. p. 697, b.) He wrote (in Greek) On the Difference between Nature and Person, against the Monophysite heresy of Eutyches and Dioscorus (not extant); an Exposition of the Book of Acts (ap. Catena Graec. Patr. in Act. SS. Athanasii, Soro, Ozan. 1838, ed. Signor); a Commentary on the Pauline (used by Nicetas in his Catena in the Cataca in the Catena Graecorum Patrum in S. Joan. ed. Cordorii, fol.
AMMONIUS ('Aμμονίους), the monk, flourished a. d. 572. He was one of the Four Great Brothers (so called from their height), disciples of Pambo, the monk of Mt. Nitria (Vita Pamphi, R. 29; Pallad. Hist. 5. 347, p. 534). He knew the Bible by heart, and carefully studied Didymus, Origen, and the other ecclesiastical authors. In a. d. 339-341 he accompanied St. Athanasius to Rome. In a. d. 371-3, Peter II. succeeded the latter, and when he fled to Rome from his Arian persecutors, Ammonius retired from Canopus into Palestine. He witnessed the cruelties of the Saracens against the monks of Mount Sinai a. d. 377, and received intelligence of the sufferings of others near the Red Sea. On his return to Egypt, he took up his abode at Memphis, and described these distresses in a book which he wrote in Egyptian. This being found at Naukratis by a priest, named John, was by him translated into Greek, and in that form is extant, in Cod. Alexand. Aphrodis. epi. 6 (p. 86, ed. Corbíus, 8vo., Par. 1660). Ammonius is said to have cut off an ear to avoid promotion to the episcopate. (Socr. iv. 23; Pallad. Hist. Lec. c. 12.)

AMMONIUS ('Aμμονίους) the Peripatetic, who wrote only a few poems and declamations. He was a different person from Ammonius, the teacher of Plotinus. (Longin. ap. Porphyry. in Plotin. vit. c. 20; Philostr. ii. 27; Ruhnken, Diss. de Longino.)

AMMONIUS ('Αμμόνιος), a Greek poet, who lived in the reign of the emperor Theodosius II. He wrote an epic poem on the insurrection of the Goths under Gunias (a. d. 400), which he called Tavria, and is said to have read in a. d. 458 to the emperor, who received it with great approbation (Socr. Hist. Eccl. vi. 6; Nicephor. xii. 6). Who this Ammonius was, and whether the line quoted in Ap. Euseb. Hist. c. 12, ed. Rosavd, p. 180, 8vo., is from him, or from one Ammonius, and the two epigrams in the Anthologia Graeca (iii. 3, p. 841; ed. Jacobus), which bear the same name, belong to him, is uncertain.

AMMONIUS, an ambon or HAMMONIUS, an amassador of Ptolemaeus Auletes, who was sent to Rome n. c. 56 to seek assistance against the Alexandrians, who had opposed the king. (Cic ad Fam. i. 1.) He is perhaps the same person a the Ammonius who is spoken of as one of the agents of Cleopatra in n. c. 44. (Ad Att. xv. 15.)

AMMONIUS, called SACCAS ('Ομμονίος Σάκκας, i.e. Ἀμμόνιος Σάκκαρτος), or sack-carrier, because his official employment was carrying the corn, laden at Alexandria, as a public porter (saccares, se Gothofred ad Cod. Theodos. 14, th. 22), was born of Christian parents. Porphyry ascribes (ib. Christian. ap. Euseb. H. E. vi. 19), Eusebius (l. c.) and St. Jerome (Vit. Ill. § 55) deny, that he apostatized from the faith. At any rate he combined the study of philosophy with Christianity and is regarded by those who maintain his apostasies as the founder of the later Platonic School.
Among his disciples are mentioned Longinus, Hermannus, Plotinus (Amm. Marcell. xxii.), both Origens, and St. Hermas. He died A.D. 243, at the age of more than 80 years. A life of Aristeiris, prefixed to the Commentary of his namesake the age of more than 80 years. A life of Aristo¬ Origens, and St. Heraclaa. lie died 243, at

AMPELIUS. We possess a short tract bear¬ ing the title Lucti Ampelit Liber Memorialis. It was first made known by Salmasius, in 1638, from a MS. in the library of Juretus, and subsequent editors following his example have generally ap¬ pended it to editions of Florus. We conclude from internal evidence (cc. 29, 47), that it must have been composed after the reign of Trajan, and before the final division of the Roman empire. Himerius, Ammannius Marcellinus, and Symmachus make frequent mention of an Ampelius, who en¬ joyed the high dignities of magister officiorum, proconsul and praefectus urbi under Valentinian and his immediate successors, and the name occurs in connexion with thirteen laws of the Theodosian code. Sidonius Apollinaris also (ix. 301) com¬ memorates the learning of an Ampelius, but we nowhere find any allusion which would enable us to establish a connexion between the person or persons spoken of by these writers and the compiler of the Liber Memorialis. On the contrary Glaser has argued from various sources of the most striking objects and phaenomena of the material universe and the most remarkable events in the history of the world, the whole classified systematically under proper heads, and divided into fifty chapters. It is of little value in any point of view. Nearly all the facts recorded are to be found elsewhere in a more detailed and satis¬ factory form, and truth is so blended with false¬ hood, and the blunders committed so numerous, that it cannot be used with safety for reference. The style, where it is not a mere catalogue of hood, and the blunders committed so numerous, cisms of Salmasius, Muretus, Freinsheim, Hein- sius, Perizonius and other scholars will be found in the edition of Duker at the end of his Florus. (Lug. Bat. 1722—1744, and reprinted at Leips. 1832.) Ampelius was first published in a separate form, with very useful prolegomena, by Tzschucke (Leips. 1793), and subsequently by Pockwitz (Lünenb. 1823), and F. A. Beck. (Leips. 1836.)

[28x1219]AMPHICRATES (Ἀμφικράτης), a Greek sophist and rhetorician of Athens. He was a contemporary of Tignares (c. 70), and being exiled (we know not for what reason) from Athens, he went to Seleuceia on the Tigris. The inhabitants of this place requested him to teach rhetoric in their city, but he haughtily refused, saying, that the vessel was too small to contain a dolphin. He then went to Cleopatra, the daughter of Mithridates, who was married to Tignares, and who seems to have become attached to him. Amphicrates soon drew suspicions upon himself, and was forbidden to have any intercourse with the Greeks, whereupon he starved himself to death. (Plut. Lucull. 22.) Longinus (de Sublim. p. 54, ed. Tomp) mentions him along with Hesiodas and Matræ, and censures him for his affectation of sublimity. Whether he is the same person as the Amphicrates who wrote a work on celebrated men (μελετὴ τῶν ἐρευνων).
AMPHIDAMAS.

AMPHILOCHUS.

Androver, Athen. xiii. p. 576; Diog. Laert. ii. 101), is uncertain. [L.S.]

AMPHICRATES, a Greek sculptor, probably of Athens, since he was the maker of a statue which the Athenians erected in honour of a courtesan, who having learnt from Harmodius and Aristogiton their conspiracy against Hippias and Hipparchus, was tortured to death by the tyrants, without disclosing the secret. Her name was Leana (a lioness); and the Athenians, unwilling openly to honour a courtesan, had the statue made in the form of a lioness; and, to point out the act which it meant to commemorate, the animal’s tongue was omitted. We know nothing of the sculptor’s age, unless we may infer from the narrative that the statue was made soon after the expiration of the Peisistratidae. (n.c. 510.) In the passage of Pliny, which is our sole authority (xxiv. 19, § 12), there is a manifest corruption of the text, and the reading Amphiceratii is only a conjecture, though a most probable one, by Sillig. (Comm. ad Paus. i. 27, § 3.)

AMPHICTYON (Ἀμφικτυών), a son of Deucalion and Pyrrha (Apollod. i. 7, § 2), or according to others an autokthôn, who after having married Craenis, the daughter of Craenis, king of Attica, expelled his father-in-law from his kingdom and usurped his throne. He ruled for twelve years, and was then in turn expelled by Erichthonius. (Apollod. iii. 14, § 5, &c.; Paus. i. 2, § 5.) According to Eustathius (ad Hom. p. 277), he was married to Chthonopatra, by whom he had a son, Phycus, the father of Locrus. According to Stephanus Byzantius (s. v. Φύκος), however, Aetolus was a son and Phycus a grandson of Amphicyton. He was believed to have been the first who introduced the custom of mixing wine with water, and to have dedicated two altars to Dionysus Orthos and the nymphs. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1815.) Dionysius of Halicarnassus (iv. 25), who calls him a son of Hellen, Pausanias (x. 8, § 1), and others, regard Amphicyton as the founder of the amphictyony of Thermopylae, and in consequence of this belief a sanctuary of Amphictyon was built in the village of Anthela on the Asopus, which was the most ancient place of meeting of this amphictyony. (Herod. vii. 200.) But this belief is without any foundation, and arose from the ancients assigning the establishment of their institutions to some mythical hero. (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Amphicytions.) [L.S.]

AMPHICYTONIS (Ἀμφικτυωνις), a surname of Demeter, derived from Anthela, where she was worshipped under this name, because it was the place of meeting for the amphictyony of Thermopylae, and because sacrifices were offered to her at the opening of every meeting. (Herod. vii. 200; Strab. ix. p. 429.) [L.S.]

AMPHIDAMAS (Ἀμφιδάμας). 1. A son of Lycurgus and Cleophaile, and father of Antimachus, who married Eurystheus. (Apollod. iii. 9, § 2.) According to Pausanias (viii. 4, § 6) and Apollonius Rhodius (i. 163) he was a son of Aeukles, and consequently a brother of Lycurgus, Cepheus, and Aegeus, and took part in the expedition of the Argonauts. (Hygin. Fab. 14.)

2. A king of Chalces in Euboea, after whose death his sons celebrated funeral games, in which Hesiod won the prize in a poetical contest. It consisted of a golden tripod, which he dedicated to the Muses of Helicon. (Hes. Op. et D. 554, &c.)

8. The father of Clysonymus, whom Patroclus killed when yet a child. (Hom. II. xxiii. 97; Apollod. iii. 12, § 8.) Other mythical personages of this name occur in Apollod. ii. 5, § 11; Hygin. Fab. 14; Hom. II. x. 266, &c. [L.S.]

AMPHIDAMAS or AMPHYDAMAS (Ἀμφιδάμας, Ἀμφύδαμας), general of the Eleusians in B. C. 218, was taken prisoner by Philip, king of Macedonia, and carried to Olympia, but was set at liberty on his undertaking to bring over his countrymen to Philip’s side. But not succeeding in his attempt, he went back to Philip, and is spoken of as defending Amus against the charges of Apelles. (Polyb. iv. 75, 94, 96.)

AMPHIDICUS (Ἀμφίδικος), a Thesalian who, in the war of the Seven against his native city, slew Parthenopaeus. (Apollod. iii. 6, § 8.) According to Euripides (Phoen. 1156), however, it was Perierymen who killed Parthenopaeus. Pausanias (ix. 18, § 4) calls him Amphicus, whence some critics wish to introduce the same name among the Epigoni, and according to others among the descendants of Amphilochus. (Suid. s.v. Παυσαν. i. 18, § 4.)

AMPHICTHYES or AMPHICHERUS (Ἀμφιχθής), a surname of Dionysus. (Orph. Ἰμμαν. 52. 1, 51. 10.) It is believed that at Athens, where the Dionysiac festivals were held annually, the name signified yearly, while at Thebes, where they were celebrated every third year, it was interpreted to be synonymous with τεχνής. [L.S.]

AMPHYGYEEIS (Ἀμφυγγύης), lame or limping on both feet, a surname of Hephaestus, given him because Zeus threw him from Olympus upon the earth for having wished to support Hera. (Hom. Il. i. 599; comp. Apollod. i. 3, § 5.) [Hephaestus.]

AMPHILOCHUS (Ἀμφιλόχος), a son of Amphiaras and Eriphyle, and brother of Ajax. (Apollod. iii. 7, § 2; Hom. Od. xv. 248.) When his father went against Thbes, Amphilochus was, according to Pausanias (v. 17, § 4), yet an infant, although ten years afterwards he is mentioned as one of the Epigoni, and according to some traditions assisted his brother in the murder of his mother. [Alcmeon.] He is also mentioned among the suitors of Helen, and as having taken part in the Trojan war. On the return from this expedition he together with Mopsus, who was like himself a seer, founded the town of Mallos in Cilicia. Hence he proceeded to his native place, Argos. But as he was not satisfied with the state of affairs there, he returned to Mallos. When Mopsus refused to allow him any share in the government of their common colony, the two seers fought a single combat in which both were killed. This combat was described by some as having arisen out of a dispute about their prophetic powers. Their tombs, which were placed in such a manner that the one could not be seen from the other, existed as late as the time of Strabo, near mount Margasa, not far from Pyra- mus. (Strab. iv. p. 675; Lycephon, 439, with the Schol.) According to other traditions (Strab. iv. p. 642), Amphilochus and Calchas, on their return from Troy, went on foot to the celebrated grove of the Clarion Apollo near Colophon. In some accounts he was said to have been killed by Apollo. (Hes. op. strab. xiv. p. 676.) According to Thucydides (ii. 58) Amphilochus returned from Troy to Argos, but being disatisfied there, he emigrated and founded Argos Amphilochium on the Ambracian gulf. Other accounts, however,

AMPHILOCHIUS (Ἀμφιλόχιος), a seer in Greek, was believed to be endowed with prophetic powers; (Strab. vii. p. 326), or to Amphilochus the son of Ammon, to ascribe the foundation of this town to Alcmaeon (Od. xxii. 284/7). There are two other mythical personages of this name, one a grandson of our Amphilothesis (Apollod. iii. 7. § 7), and the other a son of Dryas. (Parthen. Erot. 37.)

AMPHILOCHIUS, of Athens, a writer on agriculture mentioned by Varro (R. R. i. i) and Columella (I. 1). Pliny also speaks of a work of his "De Medica et Cytisio." (II. N. xviii. 16. a. 43.)

There are two other mythical personages of this name, one a grandson of our Amphilothesis (Apollod. iii. 7. § 7), and the other a son of Dryas. (Parthen. Erot. 37.)

AMPHILOCHIUS, bishop of Athens, the friend of St. Basil and St. Gregory of Nazianzus, was born at Caesarea, and began life as a pleader. (Bunsen, Annal. Politic. Eccl. iii. p. 145, A.; and Gallandia Biblioth. Patr. vol. vii. Prologem.; Epist. S. Greg. Naz. 9 (159), Paris 1840.) He lived in retirement with his father at Ozyalla in Cappadocia, till he was summoned to reside over the see of Iconium in Lycaonia, or Pisidia in A.D. 373-4. St. Basil's Congratulatory Epistle on the occasion is extant. (Ep. 398, n. 161, vol. iii. p. 251, ed. Bened.) He soon after paid St. Basil a visit, and persuaded him to undertake his work "On the Holy Ghost" (vol. iii. p. 1), which he finished in A.D. 375 (Sixt. Basil. Caen. Epist. vii. 10). The latter had received St. Basil's promised book on the Divinity of the Holy Ghost, when in A.D. 377 he sent a synodical letter (extant, ap. Manis's Concilia, vol. iii. p. 605) to certain bishops, probably of Lycaea, infected with, or in danger of, Macedonism. The Arian persecution of the church ceased on the death of Valens (A.D. 378), and in 381, Amphilochos was present at the Oecumenical Council of Constantinople. While there he signed, as a witness, St. Gregory Nazianzen's will (Opp. S. Greg. Nax. 9159. Paris. 1840.) He lived a long time, perhaps received St. Basil's promised book on the Divinity of the Holy Ghost, and was slain by Telemachus. (Horn. Od. ii. 870, &c.) Combeois has collected his fragments (Life of St. Basil. iv. p. 382.)

AMPHIMACHUS (Ἀμφιμάχος), a celebrated seer in the time of Peisistratus. Herodotus (i. 62) calls him an Acaean, but Plato (Platon. p. 243, A.) and Clemens Alexandrinus (Strom. i. p. 333) speak of him as an Athenian. He may have been originally an Acaean, and perhaps received the franchise at Athens from Peisistratus. This supposition removes the necessity of Valckenaer's emendation. (Ad Herod. l.c.)

AMPHIMACHUS (Ἀμφιμαχός). 1. A son of Teues and Theronice, and grandson of Actor or of Poseidon. He is mentioned among the suitors of Helen, and was one of the four chiefs who led the Epeians against Troy. (Apollod. iii. 10. § 8; Paus. v. 3. § 4; Hom. Il. ii. 926.) He was slain by Hector. (II. xiii. 185, &c.)

2. A son of Nomion, who together with his brother Nestes led a host of Carians to the assistance of the Trojans. He went to battle richly adorned with gold, but was thrown by Achilles into the sea. (Hom. Il. ii. 870, &c.; Conon (Narrat. 6) calls him a king of the Lycaeans."

Two other mythical personages of this name occur in Apollod. ii. 4. § 5, and Paus. v. 3. § 4. [L. S.]

AMPHIMACHUS (Ἀμφιμαχός), obtained the satrapy of Mesopotamia, together with Arbelitis, in the division of the province by Antipater in B.C. 321. (Arrian, ap. Phot. p. 71, b. 26, ed. Bekker; Diod. xviii. 39.)

AMPHIPEDON (Ἀμφιπέδων), a son of Melaneus of Itaca, with whom Agamemnon had been staying when he came to call upon Odysseus to join the Greeks against Troy, and whom he afterwards recognised in Hades. (Hom. Od. xxiv. 193, &c.) He was one of the suitors of Penelope, and was slain by Telemachus. (Od. xxii. 294.) Another mythical personage of this name occurs in Ovid. (Met. v. 75.) [L. S.]
AMPHION.

AMPHIONE ('Antpiv6prj), the wife of Aeson and mother of Jason. When her husband and her son Promachus had been slain by Pelias, and she too was on the point of sharing their fate, she fled to the hearth of Pelias, that his crime might be aggravated by murdering her on that sacred spot. She then cursed the murderer of her relatives, and plunged a sword into her own breast. (Diod. iv. 50; Apollon. Rhod. i. 45.) Two mythical personages of this name are mentioned in Diod. iv. 53, and in the Iliad, xvi. 44. [L. S.]

AMPHION/ON ('Antpiv6prj). 1. A son of Zeus and Antiope, the daughter of Nycteus of Thebes, and twin-brother of Zethus. (Ov. Met. vi. 110, &c.; Apollod. iii. 6, § 5.) When Antiope was with child by the father of the gods, fear of her own father induced her to flee to Epopeus at Sicyon, whom she married. Nycteus killed himself in despair, but charged his brother Lycurus to avenge him on Epopeus and Antiope. Lycurus accordingly marched against Sicyon, took the town, slew Epopeus, and carried Antiope with him to Eleutheria in Boeotia. During her imprisonment there she gave birth to two sons, who, when they were found, were brought up by shepherds. (Apollod. l. c.) According to Hyginus (Fab. 7), Antiope was the wife of Lycurus, and was seduced by Epopeus. Hereupon she was repudiated by her husband, and it was not until after this event that she was visited by Zeus. Diuce, the second wife of Lycurus, was jealous of Antiope, and had her put in chains; but Zeus helped her in escaping to mount Citharion, where she gave birth to her two sons. According to Apollodorus, she remained in captivity for a long time after the birth of her sons, who grew up among the shepherds, and did not know their descent. Hermes (according to others, Apollo, or the Muses) gave Amphion a lyre, which henceforth practised song and music, while his brother spent his time in hunting and tending the flocks. (Horat. Epist. i. 18, 41, &c.) The two brothers are represented in the Phocnian (Phocn. i. 185, 209) calls "the Dioscuri with white horses," fortified the town of Entreass near Thespius, and settled there. (Steph. Byz. s. v.) Antiope, who had in the meantime been very ill-treated by Lycurus and Diuce, escaped from her prison, her chains having miraculously been loosened; and her sons, on recognising their mother, went to Thebes, killed Lycurus, tied Diuce to a bull, and had her dragged about till she too was killed, and then threw her body into a well, which was from this time called the well of Diuce. After having taken possession of Thebes, the two brothers fortified the town by a wall, the reasons for which are differently stated. It is said, that when Amphion played his lyre, the stones not only moved of their own accord to the place where they were wanted, but fitted themselves together so as to form the wall. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 740, 755, with the Schol.; Syncell. p. 123, d.; Horat. ad Pison. 394, &c.) Amphion afterwards married Niobe, who bore him many sons and daughters, all of whom were killed by Apollo. (Apollod. iii. 5, § 6; Phot. Bibl. 7, 8; Hygin. Fab. 7, 8; Hom. Od. xi. 260, &c.; Paus. iv. § 5, 4; comp. Niobe.) As regards the death of Amphion, Ovid (Met. vi. 271) relates, that he killed himself with a sword from grief at the loss of his children. According to others, he was killed by Apollo because he made an assault on the Pythian temple of the god. (Hygin. Fab. 9.) Amphion was buried together with his brother at Thebes (or, according to Stephanus Byzantinus, ζ. e. Τιθόνως, at Tithorea), and the Tithoreauns believed, that they could make their own fields more fruitful by taking, at a certain time of the year, from Amphion's grave a piece of earth, and putting it on the grave of Antiope. For this reason the Tithoreauns watched the grave of Amphion at that particular season. (Paus. ix. 17, § 3, &c.) In Hades Amphion was punished for his conduct towards Leto. (ix. 5, § 4.) The following passages may also be compared: Paus. ii. § 6, 2, vi. 20, § 3; Propert. iii. 12, 29. The punishment inflicted by Amphion and his brother upon Diuce is represented in one of the finest works of art still extant—the celebrated Farnese bull, the work of Apollonius and Tauruscos, which was discovered in 1546, and placed in the palace Farnese at Rome. (Pliny, H. N. xxxvi. 4; Heyne, Antiquar. Aesfätte, ii. p. 163, &c.; comp. Müller, Orchom. p. 227, &c.)

2. A son of Zeus and husband of Persephone, by whom he became the father of Chloris. (Hom. Od. xi. 291, &c.) In Homer, this Amphion, king of Caria, is a distinct person from the son of Niobe; but in earlier traditions they seem to have been regarded as the same person. (Eu- static, ad Hom. p. 1684; Müller, Orchom. pp. 231, 370.)

There are three other mythical personages of this name, one a leader of the Epeians against Troy (Hom. H. xiii. 692), the second one of the Argonauts (Apollon. Rhod. i. 176; Orph. Arg. 214; Hygin. Fab. 14), and the third one of the sons of Niobe. [Niobe.] [L. S.]

AMPHION ('Antpiv6prj). 1. A sculptor, son of Acestor, pupil of Polichus of Cosm, and teacher of Pise of Calaurcia, was a native of Chosussos, and flourished about n. c. 426 or 424. He executed a group in which Battus, the colonizer of Cyrene, was represented in a chariot, with Libya crowning him, and Cyrene as the charioteer. This group was dedicated at Delphi by the people of Cyrene. (Paus. vi. 3, § 2, x. 15, § 4.)

2. A Greek painter, was contemporary with Apelles (n. c. 352), who yielded to him in arrangement or grouping (celebat Amphioni dispositione, Plin. xxx. 36, § 10: but the rending of Amphion is doubtful: Melanthio is Brother's conjecture; MELANTHIUS). [P. S.]

AMPHIS (Αμφίς), an Athenian comic poet, of the middle comedy, contemporary with the philosopher Plato. A reference to Phryne, the Thespian, in one of his plays (Athen. xiii. p. 591, d.), proves that he was alive in n. c. 332. We have the titles of twenty-six of his plays, and a few fragments of them. (Suidas, s. v.; Pollux, i. 239; Diod. Laert. iii. 27; Athen. xiii. p. 507, &c.; Meineke, i. p. 408, &c.)

AMPHISSUS (Αμφίσσος), a son of Apollo and Dryope, is said to have been of extraordinary strength, and to have built the town of Octa on the mountain of the same name. Here he also founded two temples, one of Apollo and the other of the Nymphs. At the latter, games were celebrated down to a late period. (Anton. Lib. 32.) [L. S.]
AMPHITRITE.

AMPHITRATUS (Ἀμφιτράτος) and his brother Rhces were the charioteers of the Dioscuri. They were believed to have taken part in the expedition of Jason to Colchis, and to have occupied a part of that country which was called after them Hethocla, as ἀθλόσης signifies a charioteer. (Strab. xi. p. 495; Justin. xiii. 3.)

Pliny (L. N. vi. 5) calls them Amphitrus and Thelchus. (Comp. Meir. i. 19. § 110; Isidor. Orig. xv. 1; Ammian. Marcellin. xiii. 8.)

AMPHITRITE (Ἀμφιτρίτη), a Greek sculptor, flourished about B.c. 324. From the works of him with which Pliny (xxxvi. 4. § 10) and Tiatian (Orat. in aerat. 59, p. 114, Worth.), it is supposed that most of his statues were cast in bronze, and that many of them were likeness.

AMPITHEMIS (Ἀμπιθῆμις), a son of Apollo and Acacallis, who became the father of Nasan and Caphaurus, or Cephalion, by the nymph Tritonis. (Hygin. Fab. 14; Apollon. Rhod. iv. 1494.)

AMPHITRITÆ (Ἀμφιτρίτες), a colossal statue of her exists in the Villa Albani, and she frequently appears on coins of Syracuse. The most beautiful specimen extant is that on the arch of Augustus at Rimini. (Winkelmann, Allc Denkmäler, i. 36; Hirt, Mythol. Bilderbuch. ii. p. 169.)

AMPHITRYON or AMPHITRUO (Ἀμφιτρύω), a son of Alcaeus, king of Troezen, by Hippomene, the daughter of Meleagros. (Apollod. ii. 4. § 3.)

Pausanias (viii. 14. § 2) calls his mother Laonome. While Electryon, the brother of Alcaeus, was reigning at Mycenae, the sons of Pterelas together with the Taphians invaded his territory, demanded the surrender of the kingdom, and threw away his oxen. The sons of Electryon entered upon a contest with the sons of Pterelas, but the combatants on both sides all fell, so that Electryon had only one son, Licymnus, left, and Pterelas likewise only one, Eueres. The Taphians, however, escaped with the oxen, which they entrusted to Polyxenus, king of the Eleans. Thence they were afterwards brought back to Mycenae by Amphitryon after he had paid a ransom. Electryon now resolved upon avenging the death of his sons, and to make war upon the Taphians. During his absence he entrusted his kingdom and his daughter Alcmele to Amphitryon, on condition that he should not marry her till after his return from the war. Amphitryon now restored to Electryon the oxen he had brought back to Mycenae; one of them turned wild, and as Amphitryon attempted to strike it with his club, he accidentally hit the head of Electryon and killed him on the spot. Sthenelus, the brother of Electryon, availed himself of this opportunity for the purpose of expelling Amphitryon, who together with Alcmele and Licymnus went to Thebes. Here he was purified by Creon, his uncle. In order to win the hand of Alcmele, Amphitryon prepared to avenge the death of Alcmele's brothers on the Taphians (Telebounis), and requested Creon to assist him in his enterprise, which the latter promised on condition that Amphitryon should deliver the Cadmean country from a wild fox which was making great havoc there. But as it was decreed by fate that this fox should not be overtaken by any one, Amphitryon went to Cephalus of Athens, who possessed a famous dog, which, according to another decree of fate, overtook every animal it pursued. Cephalus was induced to lend Amphitryon his dog on condition that he should receive a part of the spoils of the expedition against the Taphians. Now when the dog was hunting the fox, Fute got out of its dilemma by Zeus changing the two animals into stone. Assisted by Cephalus, Panopcs, Helcitus, and Creon, Amphitryon now attacked and ravaged the islands of the Taphians, but could not subdue them so long as Pterelas lived. This chief had on his head one golden hair, the gift of Poseidon, which rendered him immortal. His daughter Comaetho, who was in love with Amphitryon, cut off this hair, and after Pterelas had died in consequence, Amphitryon took possession of the islands, and having put to death Comaetho, and given the islands to Cephalus and Helcitus, he returned to Thebes with his spoils, out of which he dedicated a tripod to Apollo Ismenius. (Apollod. ii. 4. § 6, 7; Paus. ix. 10. § 4; Herod. v. 9.) Respecting the amour of Zeus with Alcmele during the absence of Amphitryon see ALCMENE. Amphitryon fell in a war against Erginus, king of the Minyans, in which he and Hercules delivered Thebes from the tribute which the city had to pay to Erginus as an atonement for the murder of Clymenus. (Apollod. ii. 4, § 8, &c.) His tomb was shown at Thebes in the time of Pausanias. (I. 41, § 1; compare Hom. Od. xi. 266, &c.; Heck. Sent. Her. init.; Dion. iv. 9, &c.; Hygin. Fab. 29, 544; Müller, Orchom. p. 207, &c.) Asclepius and Sophocles wrote each a tragedy of the name of Amphitryon, which are now lost. We still possess a comedy of Plautus, the "Amphitruo," the subject of which is a ludicrous representation of the visit of Zeus to Alcmeone in the disguise of her lover Amphitryon. [L. S.]

AMPHITRYONIDES or AMPHITRYONIDES (Ἀμφιτρυώναδες), a patronymic from Amphitryon, by which Hecules is sometimes designated, because his mother was married to Amphitryon. (Ov. Met. ix. 149, xv. 49; Find. Orbit. i. 39, Inf. vi. 56.) [L. S.]

AMPHIUS (Ἀμφίοος), a son of Menoeceus and brother of Acrasias. These two brothers took part in the Trojan war against their father's advice, and were slain by Diomedes. (Hom. II. ii. 826, &c. xi. 326, &c.) Another hero of this name, who was an ally of the Trojans, occurs in I. v. 612. [L. S.]

AMPHEOTES (Ἀμφιοῦτης), a son of Alcmeon by Calirrhoë, and brother of Acarnan. [AcarNAn.] A Trojan of this name occurs Hom. I. xii. 415. [L. S.]

AMPHEOTES (Ἀμφιοῦτης), the brother of Craterus, was appointed by Alexander the Great commander of the fleet in the Hellespont, b.c. 333. Amphoutes subdued the islands between Greece and Asia which did not acknowledge Alexander, cleared Crete of the Persians and pirates, and sailed to Poloeomenus b.c. 331, to put down a rising against the Macedonian power. (Arr. L. 23, iii. 4; Curt. iii. 1, iv. 5, 8.)

T. AMPHIUS BALBUS. [BalBus.]

T. AMPHIUS FLAVIANUS. [Flavianus.]

AMPYCIDES (Ἀμπύκηδης), a patronymic from Ampyus or Amyxus, applied to Mopsus. (Ov. Met. viii. 336, 350, xii. 456, 524; Apollon. Rhod. i. 1083; comp. Orph. Argy. 721.) [L. S.]

AMPYCUS (Ἀμπύκος). 1. A son of Pelias, husband of Chloris, and father of the famous seer Mopsus. (Hygin. Fab. 14, 128; Apollon. Rhod. i. 1083; Ov. Met. xii. 456.) Pausanias (v. 17. § 4, vii. 18. § 4) calls him Ampyx. 2. A son of Japetus, a bard and priest of Ceres, killed by Petalus at the marriage of Perseus. (Ov. Met. x. 110, &c.) Another personage of this name occurs in Orph. Argy. 721. [L. S.]

AMPYX (Ἀμπύξ). 1. [AMPYCUS.] 2. There are two other mythical personages of this name, Ov. Met. vii. 184, xii. 450.) [L. S.]

AMULIUS. [Romulus.]

AMULIUS, a Roman painter, who was chiefly employed in decorating the Golden House of Nero. One of his works was a picture of Minerva, which always looked at the spectator, whatever point of view he chose. Pliny calls him "gravis et severus, demque floridus," and adds, that he only painted or a few hours in the day, and that with such a regard for his own dignity, that he would not lay aside his toga, even when employed in the midst of scuffling and machinery. (Plin. xxxv. 37: "ossa, in an emendation of this passage, among other alterations, substitutes Fabulus for Amusius. His reading is adopted by Jamin and Sillig; but he seems to be no sufficient ground to reject the lid reading.) [P. S.]

AMYCLAEUS (Ἀμύκλαεος), a surname of Apollo, derived from the town of Amycla in Locris, where he had a celebrated sanctuary. His colossal statue there is estimated by Pausanias (iii. 19. § 3) at thirty cubits in height. It appears to have been very ancient, for with the exception of the head, hands, and feet, the whole resembled more a brazen pillar than a statue. This figure of the god wore a helmet, and in his hands he held a spear and a bow. The women of Amycla made every year a new xýrav for the god, and where it made it was also called the Chiton. (Paus. iii. 16. § 2.) The sanctuary of Apollo contained the throne of Amycla, a work of Bathycles of Magnesia, which Pausanias saw. (iii. 16. § 6, &c.; comp. Welcker, Zeitschrift für Geschichte der alten Kunst, i. 2, p. 280, &c.)

AMYCLAEUS (Ἀμύκλαεος), a Corinthian sculptor, who, in conjunction with Dylacus, executed in bronze a group which the Phocians dedicated at Delphi, after their victory over the Thebans at the beginning of the Persian war, n. c. 480. (Paus. x. 1. § 4, 13. § 4; Herod. viii. 27.) The subject of this piece of sculpture was the contest of Heracles with Apollo for the sacred tripod. Heracles and Apollo were represented as both having hold of the tripod, while Lyceus and Artemis supported Apollo, and Hermes was encouraged by Athene. The legend to which the group referred is related by Pausanias (x. 13. § 4); the reason for such a subject being chosen by the Phocians on this occasion, seems to be their own connexion with Apollo as guardians of the Delphic oracle, and, on the other hand, because the Thebans who had been defeated at Delphi were Heraclidae, and their war-cry "Athene Ironia." (Müller, Archäol. der Kunst, § 89, an. 3.) The attempt of Heracles to carry off the tripod seems to have been a favourite subject with the Greek artists: two or three representations of it are still extant. (Winckelmann, Werke, ix. p. 256, ed. 1823; Sillig, s. v.; compare Dyllocus, Chionik.) [P. S.]

AMYCLAS (Ἀμύκλας), a son of Lacedaemon and Sparta, and father of Hynichus by Diomedes, the daughter of Lapithus. (Apollod. iii. 10. § 3; Paus. x. 9. § 3, vii. 18. § 4.) He was king of Locris, and was regarded as the founder of the town of Amycla. (Paus. iii. 1. § 3.) Two other mythical personages of this name occur in Puthen. Evrot. 15, and Apollod. III. 9. § 1. [L. S.]

AMYCLIDES, a patronymic from Amycles, by which Ovid (Met. x. 192) designates Hynichus, who, according to some traditions, was a son of Amyclas. [L. S.]

AMYCLUS (Ἀμύκλος), or AMYCLAS (Ἀμύκλας) of Heraclea, one of Plato's disciples. (Diog. Laert. iii. 46; Adian. V. H. iii. 19.)

AMYCUS (Ἀμύκος). 1. A son of Poseidon by Bithynia, or by the Bithynian nymph Melia. He was ruler of the country of the Bebryces, and when the Argonauts landed on the coast of his dominions, he challenged the bravest of them to a boxing match. Polydectes, who accepted the challenge, killed him. (Apollod. i. 9. § 20; Hygin. Fab. 17; Apollon. Rhod. ii. init.) The Scholast on Apollonius (ii. 98) relates, that Polydectes bound Amycus. Previous to this fatal encounter with the Argonauts, Amycus was killed with Lyco by king of Myca, who was supported by Heracles, and in it Myron, the brother of Amycus, fell by the hands of Heracles. (Apollod. ii. 5. § 2;
board a vessel, the crew began to quarrel, and did not cease until the branch was thrown overboard. Three other mythical personages of this name occur in Ov. Met. xii. 245; Virg. Aen. x. 705, compared with Hom. ii. vi. 289; Virg. Aen. xii. 509, compared with v. 297. [L. S.]

AMYMO'NE (Ἀμυμώνη), one of the daughters of Danus and Elephants. When Danaus arrived in Argos, the country, according to the wish of Poseidon, which was indulgent at Amymone, was suffering from a drought, and Danaus sent at Amymone to fetch water. Meeting a stag, she shot at it, but hit a sleeping satyr, who rose and pursued her. Poseidon appeared, and rescued the maiden from the satyr, but appropriated her to himself, and then showed her the wells at Lerna. (Apollod. vi. 289; Virg. Aen. xii. 509, compared with v. 297. [L. S.])

According to another form of the tradition, Amymone fell asleep on her expedition in search of water, and was surprised by a satyr. She invoked Poseidon, who appeared and cast his trident at the satyr, which however struck into a rock, so that the Satyr escaped. Poseidon, after ravishing the maiden, bade her draw the trident from the rock, from which a threefold spring gushed forth immediately, which was called after her the well of Amymone. Her son by Poseidon was called Nauplius. (Hygin. Fab. 169; Lucian, Dial. Mariv. 6; Paus. ii. 37. § 1.) The story of Amymone was the subject of one of the satyric dramas of Aeschylus, and is represented upon a vase which was discovered at Naples in 1790. (Böttiger, Amalthaea, ii. p. 275. [L. S.])

AMYNANDER (Ἀμυνάνδρος), king of the Aetolians, first appears in history as mediator between Philip of Macedonia and the Aetolians. (n. c. 208.) When the Romans were about to wage war on Philip, they sent ambassadors to Amyander to inform him of their intention. On the commencement of the war he came to the camp of the Romans and promised them assistance: the task of bringing over the Aetolians to an alliance with the Romans was assigned to him. In n. c. 196 he took the towns of Phoca and Cenchreæ and invaded Attica; but was called after him the conclusion of peace he was allowed to retain the crown by the murder of Pausanias, son of Philip. (Isocr. Het. 8; Paus. vii. 57.)

It was under him that Macedonia became tributary to the Persians. Megabazus, whom Darius on his return from his Scythian expedition had left at the head of 80,000 men in Europe (Herod. iv. 143), sent after the conquest of Paeonia to require corn and water of Amynander, who immediately complied with his demand. The Persian envoys on this occasion behaved with much insolence at the banquet to which Amynander invited them, and were murdered by his son Alexander. (See p. 118, b.) After this we find nothing recorded of Amynander, except his offer to the Peisistratidæ of Athens in Chalcidice, when Hippias had just been disappointed in his hopes of a restoration to Athens by the power of the Spartan confederacy. (Herod. v. 44; Müller, Ann. ii. § 16; Wasse, ad Thuc. ii. 99.) Amynander died about 498 n. c. leaving the kingdom to Alexander.

amyntas. (Ἀμυντας), king of Macedonia, was son of Philip, the brother of Perdiccas II. (Thuc. ii. 95.) He succeeded his father in his appanage in Upper Macedonia, of which Perdiccas seems to have wished to deprive him, as he had before endeavored to wrest it from Philip, but had been hindered by the Athenians. (Thuc. i. 57.)

In the year 429 n. c. Amynander, aided by Sitalces, king of the Odrysian Thracians, stood forward to contest with Perdiccas the throne of Macedonia itself; but the latter contrived to obtain peace through the mediation of Seuthes, the nephew of the Thracian king (Thuc. ii. 101; Isocr. Het. 8; Paus. vii. 57.) and Amynander was thus obliged to content himself with his hereditary principality. In the thirty-fifth year, however, after this, n. c. 394, he obtained the crown by the murder of Pausanias, son of the usurper Aëtopus. (Diod. xiv. 89.) It was nevertheless contested with him by Argaeus, the son of Pausanias, who was supported by Bardylis, the Illyrian chief: the result was, that Amynander was driven from Macedonia, but found a refuge among the Thessalians, and was enabled by their aid to recover his kingdom. (Diod. xiv. 92; Isocr. Archid. p. 125, b. c.; comp. Diod. xvi. 4; Cie. de Off. ii. 11.) But before his flight, when hard pressed by Argaeus and the Illyrians, he had given up to the Olynthians a large tract of territory bordering upon their own,— desparing as it would seem, of a restoration to the throne and willing to cede the land in question to Olynthus rather than to his rival. (Diod. xiv. 92, xvi. 19.) On his return he claimed back what he professed to have entrusted to them as a deposit, and as they refused to restore it, he applied to Sparta for aid. (Diod. xv. 19.) A similar application was also made, b. c. 382, by the towns of Acarnania and Apollonia, which had been threatened by Olynthus for declining to join her confederacy. (Xen. Hell. v. 2 § 11, &c.) With the consent of the allies of Sparta, the required succour was given, under the command successively of Eudamidas (with whom his brother Phoebidas was associated), Teleutas, Agesipolis, and Polyblades, by the last of whom Olynthus was reduced, n. c. 379. (Diod. xv. 19—23; Xen. Hell. v. 2, 3.) Throughout the war, the Spartans were vigorously seconded by Amyntas, and by Dardas, his kinsman, prince of Elymum. Besides this alliance with Sparta, which he appears to have preserved without interruption to his death, Amyntas united himself also with Jason of Pherae (Diod. xv. 60), and carefully cultivated the friendship of Athens, with which state he would have a bond of union in their common jealousy of Olynthus and probably also of Thebes. Of his friendship towards the Athenians he gave proof, 1st, by advocating their claim to the possession of Amphipolis (Aesch. Hesp. Πάραρ. p. 32); and, 2ndly, by adopting Iphicrates as his son. (Id. p. 32.) It appears to have been in the reign of Amyntas, as is perhaps implied by Strabo (Ecc. vii. p. 330), that the seat of the Macedonian government was removed from AEgae or Edessa to Pella, though the former still continued to be the burying-place of the kings.

* There is some discrepancy of statement at this point. Justin (vii. 4) and Asian (xii. 43) call Amynander the son of Menelaus. See, too Diod. xv. 60, and Wesseling, ad loc.

Justin (vii. 4) relates, that a plot was laid for his assassination by his wife Eurydice, who wished to place her son-in-law and paramour, Ptolemy of Alorus, on the throne, but that the design was discovered to Amyntas by her daughter. Diodorus (xv. 71) calls Ptolemy of Alorus the son of Amyntas; but see Wesseling's note ad loc., and Thirlwall, Gr. Hist. vol. v. p. 162. Amyntas died in an advanced age, n. c. 370, leaving three legitimate sons, Alexander, Perdiccas, and the famous Philip. (Just. l. c.; Diod. xv. 60.)

3. Grandson of Amyntas II., was left an infant a nominal possession of the throne of Macedon, when his father Perdiccas III. fell in battle against the Illyrians, n. c. 360. (Diod. xvi. 2.) He was quietly excluded from the kingly power by his uncle Philip, b. c. 359, who had at first acted merely as regent (Just. vii. 5), and who felt himself so safe in his usurpation, that he brought up Amyntas at his court, and gave him one of his daughters in marriage. In the first year of the reign of Alexander the Great, b. c. 336, Amyntas was executed for a plot against the king's life. Thirlw. Gr. Hist. vol. v. pp. 163, 166, 177, vol. vi. p. 99, and the authorities to which he refers; just. xii. 6, and Freinsheim, ad Curt. vi. 9, 17.)

4. A Macedonian officer in Alexander's army, son of Andromenes. (Diod. xvii. 45; Curt. vii. 1. § 40; Arrian, iii. p. 79, ed. Steph.) After the battle of the Granicus, n. c. 384, when the garrison of Sardis was quietly surrendered to Alexander, Amyntas was the officer sent forward to receive it from the commander, Metronins. (Arr. i. 17, c.; Freinsheim, Soph. in Curt. ii. 6, 12.) Two years after, b. c. 332, we again hear of him as being sent into Macedonia to collect levies, while Alexander after the siege of Gaza advanced to Egypt; and he returned with them in the ensuing year, when the king was in possession of Susa. (Arr. iii. p. 64, c.; Curt. iv. 6. § 30, v. 1. § 40, vii. 1. § 38.) After the execution of Philotas on a charge of treason, b. c. 330, Amyntas and two other sons of Andromenes (Attalus and Simmias) were arrested on suspicion of having been engaged in the plot. The suspicion was strengthened by their known intimacy with Philotas, and by the fact that their brother Polemo had fled from the camp when the latter was apprehended (Arr. iii. pp. 72, i. 73, a.), or according to Curtius (vii. 1. § 10), when he was given up to the torture. Amyntas defended himself and his two brothers (Arr. iii. p. 73, c.), and their innocence being further established by Polemo's re-appearance (Curt. vii. 2. § 1, &c.; Arr. iii. p. 73, a.), they were acquitted. Some little time after, Amyntas was killed by an arrow at the siege of a village. (Arr. iii. l. c.) It is doubted whether the son of Andromenes is the Amyntas mentioned by Curtius (iii. 9. § 7) as commander of a portion of the Macedonian troops at the battle of Issus, n. c. 333; or again, the person spoken of as leading a brigade at the forcing of the "Persian Gates," n. c. 331. (Curt. iv. § 40.) But "Amyntas" appears to have been a common name among the Macedonians. (See Curt. iv. 13, § 28, v. 2. § 5, vii. 2. § 14, 16, vi. 7, § 15, vi. 9. § 28.)

5. The Macedonian fugitive and traitor, son of Antiochus. Arrian (p. 17, f.) ascribes his flight from Macedonia to his hatred and fear of Alexander the Great; the ground of these feelings is not stated, but Mitford (ch. 44. sect. 1) connects him with the plot of Pausanias and the murder of Philip. He took refuge in Ephesus under Persian protection; whence, however, after the battle of the Granicus, fearing the approach of Alexander, he escaped with the Greek mercenaries who garrisoned the place, and fled to the court of Dareius. (Arr. l. c.) In the winter of the same year, b. c. 333, while Alexander was at Phasis in Lycaea, discovery was made of a plot against his life, in which Amyntas was implicated. He appears to have acted as the channel through whom Dareius had been negotiating with Alexander the Lycosthen, and had promised to aid him in mounting the throne of Macedon on condition of his assassinating his master. The design was discovered through the confession of Assises, a Persian, whom Dareius had dispatched on a secret mission to the Lyceosthen, and who was apprehended by Parmenio Phrygus. (Arr. i. pp. 24, e. 25, b.)

At the battle of Issus we hear again of Amyntas as a commander of Greek mercenaries in the Persian service (Arr. iii. 11. § 18; comp. Arr. ii. p. 40, b.); and Plutarch and Arrian mention his advice vainly given to Darius shortly before, to await Alexander's approach in the large open plains to the westward of Cilicia. (Plut. Alex. p. 675, b.; Arr. ii. pp. 33, c. 34, a.) AMYNTAS.

On the defeat of the Persians at the battle of Issus, Amyntas fled with a large body of Greeks to Tripolis in Phocisicia. There he seized some ships, with which he passed over to Cyprus, and thence to Egypt, of the sovereignty of which—a double traitor—he designed to possess himself. The gates of Pelusium were opened to him on his pretending that he came with authority from Darius: thence he pressed on to Memphis, and being joined by a large number of Egyptians, defeated in a battle the Persian garrison under Mazaces. But this victory made his troops over-confident and insouciant, and, while they were dispersed for plunder, Mazaces sallied forth upon them, and Amyntas himself was killed with the greater part of his men. (Diod. xvii. 48; Arr. ii. p. 40, c.; Curt. iv. i. § 27, &c., iv. 7, § 1, 2.)

It is supposed that the present article may have been the Amyntas who is mentioned among the ambassadors sent to the Boiotians by Philip, n. c. 338, to prevent the contemplated alliance of Thebes with Athens. It may also have been the son of Andromenes. (Plut. Dem. pp. 849, 854; Diod. xii. p. 85.)

6. A king of Galatia and several of the adjacent countries, mentioned by Strabo (xii. p. 569) as contemporary with himself. He seems to have first possessed Lycaonia, where he maintained more than 300 flocks. (Strab. xii. p. 568.) To this he added the territory of Dardica by the murder of its prince, Antipater, the friend of Cicero (Cic. ad Fam. xiii. 73), and Isæus and Cappadocia by Roman favor. Plutarch, who enumerates him among the adherents of Antony at Actium (Ant. p. 944, c.), speaks probably by anticipation in calling him king of Galatia, for he did not succeed to that till the death of Deiotaros (Strab. xiii. p. 567); and the latter is mentioned by Plutarch himself (Ant. p. 945, b.), as deserting to Octavius, just before the battle, together with Amyntas.

While pursuing his schemes of aggrandizement, and endeavouring to reduce the refractory highlanders around him, Amyntas made himself master of Homonoia (Strab. xii. p. 569), or Homona (Plin. H. N. v. 27), and slew the prince of that place; but his death was avenged by his widow, and Amyntas fell a victim to an ambush which she laid for him. (Strab. l.c.)

COIN OF AMYNTAS, KING OF GALATIA.

AMYNTAS (Ἀμύντας), a Greek writer of a work entitled Στρατηγικ, which was probably an account of the different halting-places of Alexander the Great in his Asiatic expedition. He perhaps accompanied Alexander. (Nīke, Cheiroiul, p. 205.) From the references that are made to it, it seems to have contained a good deal of historical information. (Athen. ii. p. 67, a, n. x. p. 442, b, xi. p. 506, d, xii. pp. 514, f, 528, c.; Sicel. H. N. v. 14, xvii. 17.)

AMYNTAS, surgeon. [AMMENTES.]

AMYTHAON.

AMYNTIANNUS (Ἀμυτιανός), the author of a work on Alexander the Great, dedicated to the emperor M. Antoninus, the style of which Photius blames. He also wrote the life of Olympias, the mother of Alexander, and a few other biographies. (Phot. Cod. 131, p. 97, ed. Bekker.) The Scholion on Pindar (ad Ol. iii. 82) refers to a work of Amyntiannus on elephants.

AMYNTOR (Ἀμύντωρ), according to Homer (II. x. 266), a son of Ormenus of Eion in Thessaly, where Autolycus broke into his house and stole the beautiful helmet, which afterwards came into the hands of Meiones, who wore it during the war against Troy. Amyntor was the father of Crantor, Euaemon, Astydamia, and Phoenix. The last of these was cursed and expelled by Amyntor for having entertained, at the instigation of his mother Cleobule or Hippodamia, an unlawful intercourse with his father's mistress. (Hom. II. ix. 484, &c.; Lycophr. 417.) According to Apollodorus (ii. 7, § 7, iii. 13, § 7), who states, that Amyntor blinded his son Phoenix, he was a king of Ionia, and was slain by Herodes, to whom he refused a passage through his dominions, and the hand of his daughter Astydamia. (Comp. Diod. iv. 37.) According to Ovid (Met. viii. 307, xii. 364, &c.), Amyntor took part in the Cynodanian hunt, and was king of the Dolopes, and when conquered in a war by Perseus, he gave him his son Crantor as a hostage. [L. S.]

AMYRIS (Ἀμυρίς), a Sybarite in Italy, surmised "the Wise," whose son was one of the suitors of Agartha, at the beginning of the sixth century, B. C. Amyris was sent by his fellow-citizens to consult the Delphic oracle. His reputation for wisdom gave rise to the proverb, "Ἀμυριαί, ὁ πεποιημένος, "the wise man is mad." (Herod. vi. 126; Athen. xii. 504.) According to Ctesias (ap. Phot. Cod. 205; Ath. xlii. 73), Amyrtaeus reigned 99 years, being the only king of the 28th dynasty. His name on the monuments is thought to be Aomnhorte. (Schol. on Herod. ii. 47.)

AMYRTAEUS (Ἀμυρταῖος). 1. The name, according to Ctesias (op. Phot. Cod. 72, p. 37, Bekker), of the king of Egypt who was conquered by Cambyses. (Prammentus.)

2. A Saite, who, having been invested with the title of king of Egypt, was joined with Imarus the Libyan in the command of the Egyptians when they rebelled against Artaxerxes Longimanus (n. c. 460). After the first success of the Egyptians, n. c. 456 [Achaemenes], Artaxerxes sent a second immense army against them, by which they were totally defeated. Amyrtaeus escaped to the island of Elbo, and maintained himself as king in the marshy districts of Lower Egypt till about the year 414 B. C., when the Egyptians expelled the Persians, and Amyrtaeus reigned six years, being the king of that dynasty. His name on the monuments is thought to be Aomnhorte. Eusebius calls him Amyrites and Amyrtannus (Ἀμυρταννός). (Herod. ii. 140, iii. 15; Thuc. i. 110; Diod. xi. 74, 75; Ctesias, op. Phot. pp. 27, 32, 40, Bekker; Euseb. Chron. Armen. pp. 108, 342, ed. Zotarch and Mai; Wilkinson's Ant. Egypt. i. p. 205.)

AMYRTUS (Ἀμυρτύς), a son of Poseidon, from whom the town and river Amyrus in Thessaly were believed to have derived their name. (Steph. Byz. s. v.; Val. Placce. ii. 11.)

AMYTHA'ON (Ἀμύθαιων), a son of Cretheus and Tyro (Hom. Od. xi. 235, &c.), and brother of Aecon and Pheres. (Hom. Od. xi. 259.) He dwelt at Pylos in Messenia, and by Iphomebe...
ANACREON.

The editions of Anacreon are very numerous. The best are those of Brunck, Strassburg, 1786; Fischer, Lips. 1793; Melchior, Glogau, 1825; and Bergk, Lips. 1834. [P. S.]
ANAGYMEN (Ἀναγυμήν), the goddess rising out of the sea, a surname given to Aphrodite, in allusion to the story of her being born from the foam of the sea. This surname had not much celebrity previous to the time of Apelles, but his famous painting of Aphrodite Anadyomene, in which the goddess was represented as rising from the sea and drying her hair with her hands, at once drew great attention to this poetical idea, and excited the emulation of other artists, painters as well as sculptors. The painting of Apelles was made for the inhabitants of the island of Cos, who set it up in their temple of Astarte. Its beauty induced Augustus to have it removed to Rome, and the Cons were indemnified by a reduction in their taxes of 100 talents. In the time of Nero the greater part of the picture had become effaced, and it was replaced by the work of another artist. (Strab. xiv. p. 657; Plin. H. N. xxxv. 36. §§ 12. and 15; Auson. Ep. 109; Paus. ii. 1. § 7.)

ANAEA (Ἀναία), an Amazon, from whom the town of Anaea in Caria derived its name. (Steph. Byz. s. n. ; instab. ed. Darmst. Periog. 926.)

ANAGALLIS, [Ἀγαλλίς, AGALLIA.]

ANAGNOSTES, JOANNES (Ἀναγνώστης, Αναγνώστης), wrote an account of the storming of his native city, Thessaloniki, by the Turks under Amurath II. (A. D. 1430), to which is added a "Monodia," or lamentation for the event, in prose. The work is printed, in Greek and Latin, in the "Gnomon" of Leo Allatios, Rom. 1653, 8vo., pp. 318—380. The author was present at the siege, after which he left the city, but was induced to return to it by the promises of the conqueror, who two years afterwards deprived him of all his property. (Haneckius, de Hist. Byz. Script. i. 36, p. 636; Wharton, Supp. to Cave, Hist. Lit. ii. p. 136.)

ANAITIS, [Ἀναίτις, Anaitis], an Asiatic divinity, whose name appears in various modifications, sometimes written Anaita (Strab. xvi. p. 738), sometimes Anaites (Plut. Artax. 27), sometimes Tanais (Clem. Alex. Protostep. p. 43), or Nanaen. (Macrob. i. 1. 13.) Her worship was spread over several parts of Asia, such as Armenia, Cappadocia, Assyria, Persis, &c. (Strab. xii. p. 512, xii. p. 559, xv. p. 733.) In most places where she was worshipped we find numerous slaves (ἱερόδοκοι) of both sexes consecrated to her, and in Acilisene these slaves were taken from the most distinguished families. The female slaves prostituted themselves for a number of years before they married. These priests seem to have been in the enjoyment of the sacred land connected with her temples, and we find mention of sacred cows also being kept at such temples. (Plut. Lucull. 24.) From this and other circumstances it has been inferred, that the worship of Anaitis was a branch of the Indian worship of nature. It seems, at any rate, clear that it was a part of the worship so common among the Asiatics, of the creative powers of nature, both male and female. The Greek writers sometimes identify Anaitis with their Artemis (Paus. iii. 16. § 6; Plut. l.c.), and sometimes with their Aphrodite. (Clem. Alex. l. c. ; Agathias, i. 2.; Ammian. Marc. xxiii. 3; Spartan. Carac. 7; comp. Creuzer, Symbol. ii. p. 22, &c.)

war, which is known in history under the name of the Isaurian war, lasted till 497, and partly till 498, when it was finished to the advantage of the emperor by the captivity and death of the ring-leaders of the rebellion. John the Scythian, John the Hunchbacked, and under them Justinus, who became afterwards emperor, distinguished themselves greatly as commanders of the armies of Anastasius. The following years were signalized by a sedition in Constantinople occasioned by disturbances between the factions of the Blue and the Green, by religious troubles which the emperor was able to quell only by his own humiliation, by wars with the Arabs and the Bulgarians, and by earthquakes, famine, and plague. (A. D. 500.) Anastasius tried to relieve his people by abolishing the church of the sacred "Diptycha" or tables.

Imperially after these calamities, Anastasius was involved in a war with Cabadis, the king of Persia, who destroyed the Byzantine army commanded by Hypacius and Patricius Phrygius, and ravaged Mesopotamia in a dreadful manner. Anastasius purchased peace in 505 by paying 11,000 pounds of gold to the Persians, who, being threatened with an invasion of the Huns, restored to the emperor the provinces which they had overrun. From Asia Anastasius sent his generals to the banks of the Danube, where they fought an unsuccessful but not inglorious campaign against the East-Goths of Italy, and tried, but in vain, to defend the passage of the Danube against the Bulgarians. These indefatigable warriors crossed that river in great numbers, and ravaging the greater part of Thrace, appeared in sight of Constantinople; and no other means were left to the emperor to secure the immediate neighbourhood of his capital but by constructing a fortified wall across the isthmus of Constantinople from the coast of the Propontis to that of the Pontus Euxinus. (A. D. 507.) Some parts of this wall, which in a later period proved useful against the Turks, are still existing. Clovis, king of the Franks, was created consul by Anastasius, who destroyed the Byzantine army commanded by Hypacius and Patricius Phrygius, and ravaged Mesopotamia in a dreadful manner. Anastasius purchased peace in 505 by paying 11,000 pounds of gold to the Persians, who, being threatened with an invasion of the Huns, restored to the emperor the provinces which they had overrun. From Asia Anastasius sent his generals to the banks of the Danube, where they fought an unsuccessful but not inglorious campaign against the East-Goths of Italy, and tried, but in vain, to defend the passage of the Danube against the Bulgarians. These indefatigable warriors crossed that river in great numbers, and ravaging the greater part of Thrace, appeared in sight of Constantinople; and no other means were left to the emperor to secure the immediate neighbourhood of his capital but by constructing a fortified wall across the isthmus of Constantinople from the coast of the Propontis to that of the Pontus Euxinus. (A. D. 507.) Some parts of this wall, which in a later period proved useful against the Turks, are still existing. Clovis, king of the Franks, was created consul by Anastasius.

The end of the reign of Anastasius cannot well be understood without a short notice of the state of religion during this time, a more circumstantial account of which the reader will find in Evagrius and Theophanes cited below.

As early as 466, Anastasius, then only a Silentiarius, had been active in promoting the Eutychian Palladius to the see of Antioch. This act was made a subject of reproach against him by the orthodox patriarch of Constantinople, Euphemius, who, upon Anastasius succeeding Zenobius on the throne, persuaded or compelled him to sign a confession of faith according to the orthodox principles laid down in the council of Chalcedon. Notwithstanding this confession, Anastasius continued an adherent to the doctrines of Eutychius, and in 486 he had his enemy, Euphemius, deposed and banished. It is said, that at this time Anastasius sowed great propensities to the sect of the Arians. The successor of Euphemius was Macedius, who often thwarted the measures of the emperor, and who but a few years afterwards was riven from his see, which Anastasius gave to the arian bishop Timotheus, who opposed the orthodox in many matters. Upon this, Anastasius wasathematized by pope Symnachus, whose successor, Hormidas, sent deputies to Constantinople in the purpose of restoring peace to the Church of the East. However, the religious motives of these disturbances were either so intimately connected with political motives, or the hatred between the parties was so great, that the deputies did not succeed. In 514, Vitalianus, a Gothic prince in the service of the emperor, put himself at the head of a powerful army, and laid siege to Constantinople, under the pretext of compelling Anastasius to put an end to the vexations of the orthodox church. In order to get rid of such an enemy, Anastasius promised to assemble a general council, which was to be presided over by the pope, and he appointed Vitalianus his commander-in-chief in Thrace. But no sooner was the army of Vitalianus disbanded, than Anastasius once more eluded his promises, and the predomination of the Eutychians over the orthodox lasted till the death of the emperor. Anastasius died in 518, at the age of between eighty-eight and ninety-one years. Evagrius states, that after his death his name was erased from the sacred "Diptycha" or tables.

Religious hatred having more or less guided modern writers as well as those whom we must consider as the sources with regard to Anastasius, the character of this emperor has been described in a very different manner. The reader will find these opinions carefully collected and weighed with prudence and criticism in Tillemont's "Histoire des Empereurs." Whatever were his vices, and however amorous and faithless he was, Anastasius was far from being a common man. Tillemont, though he is often misled by bigotry, does not blame him for many actions, and praises him for many others for which he has been frequently reproached. He considers him as "un Bas Empire," does not condemn him; and Gibbon commends him, although principally for his economy. (Evagrius, iii. 29; Cedrenus, pp. 354-365; ed. Paris; Theophanes, pp. 115-141; ed. Paris; Gregor. Turon. ii. 38.)

ANASTASIIUS II., emperor of Constantinople. The original name of this emperor was Artemius, and he was one of the ministers (Protonoemata) of the emperor Constantine, who had his eyes put out by the traitor Rufus, in the month of June A. D. 713. Artemius, universally esteemed for his character and his qualities, was chosen in his stead, and, although his reign was short and disturbed by troubles, he gave sufficient proofs of being worthy to reign. After having punished Rufus and his accomplices, he appointed the Isaurian Leo, who became afterwards emperor, his general in chief against the Arabs, bywhom the southern provinces of the empire were then continually harassed. He formed the bold plan of burning the naval stores of the enemy on the coast of Syria, stores necessary for the construction of a large fleet, with which the Arabs intended to lay siege to Constantinople. The commander of the Byzantine fleet was John, who combined the three dignities of grand treasurer of the empire, admiral, and dean of St Sophia, and who left Constantinople in 715. But the expedition failed, and a mutiny broke out on board the ships, in consequence of which John was massacred, and Theodosius, once a receiver of the taxes, proclaimed emperor. It is probable that the rebel had many adherents in the Asiatic provinces; for while he sailed with his fleet to Constantinople, Anastasius, after having left a strong garrison for the defence of his capital, went to Nicæa for the purpose of preventing all danger from that side. After an obstinate resistance during six months, Constantine was taken by surprise in the month of January 716, and Anastasius, besiegèd in Nicæa, surrendered on condition of having his life preserved. This was granted to him by the victorious rebel, who ascended the throne under the name of Theodosius III. Anastasius retired to a convent at Thessalonica. In the third year of the reign of Leo III, Isaurius (721), Anastasius conspired against this emperor at the instigation of Nicæus Xyloclès. They hoped to be supported by Terbellis or Tébellis, bishop of Boulogne, and the enterprise proved abortive, and the two conspirators were put to death by order of Leo. (Theopomphus, pp. 321, &c.; Zonaras, xiv. 26, &c.; Cedrenus, p. 449, ed. Paris.) [W. P.]

ANASTASIUS, abbot of St. Euthymius in Palestine, about 741 A. D., wrote a Greek work on the Jews, a Latin version of which by Turrianius is printed in Canisius Antiquar. Lctt. iii. pp. 123—180. The translation is very imperfect. A MS. of the original work is still extant. (Catul. Vindobon. pt. 1, cod. 307, num. 2, p. 420.) [P. S.]

ANASTASIUS, a Graeco-Roman jurist, who interpreted the Digest. He is cited in the Basilica (ed. Heimbach. ii. p. 10; ed. Fabrot iv. p. 701, vii. p. 250), in which, on one occasion, his opinion is placed in opposition to that of Stephanus. Beyond this circumstance, we can discover in his fragments no very strong reason for supposing him to have been contemporary with Justinian II. Reitz, however, considered it certain that he was so, and accordingly marked his name with an asterisk in the list of jurists subjoined to his edition of Theophilius. (Lec. 1xx. p. 1234.) The name is so common, that it would be rash to identify the jurist with contemporary Anastasii; but it may be stated, that among more than forty persons of the same name, Fabricius mentions one who was consul 361. (xxi. 6. § 5.) Whether he held the same office continuously from 496 or 500 to the same author, or whether he were at first praefect of some other district, is uncertain. The same author, in his Comment. de I.ell. Pers. n. 339, but without mention of his district. (Cod. Th. 11. tit. 1. s. 38, 39.) He is, however, with forensic eminence, from Berytus he proceeded to Rome, and gained admission to the palaces of the emperor. Here he rapidly obtained favour, was respected even by his enemies, and was successively promoted to various honours. He became consularius of Galatia, and we find him named vicarius of Asia under Constantius, A. D. 339 (Cod. Th. 11. tit. 30. s. 19.). A constitution of this emperor, with forensic eminence, from Berytus he proceeded to Rome, and gained admission to the palaces of the emperor. Here he rapidly obtained favour, was respected even by his enemies, and was successively promoted to various honours. He became consularius of Galatia, and we find him named vicarius of Asia under Constantius, A. D. 339 (Cod. Th. 11. tit. 30. s. 19.). A constitution of this emperor, in the year 608, was published by Grzetzer in Greek and Latin, Ingolstadt, 1606, 4to. It is a loose, illogical rhapsody, without any grace of style, and very inaccurate as to facts. An account of the other writings ascribed to these three Anastasii, and discussions respecting their authorship, will be found in Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. x. p. 571), and Cave. (Hist. Lit.) [P. S.]

ANATOLIUS, of Berytus, afterwards P. P. (praefectus procurator) of Illyricum, received a legal education in the distinguished law-school of his native place, and soon acquired great reputation in his profession of jurisconsult. Not content, however, with forensic eminence, from Berytus he proceeded to Rome, and gained admission to the palaces of the emperor. Here he rapidly obtained favour, was respected even by his enemies, and was successively promoted to various honours. He became consularius of Galatia, and we find him named vicarius of Asia under Constantius, A. D. 339 (Cod. Th. 11. tit. 30. s. 19.). A constitution of the same year is addressed to him, according to the corrupt reading, with the title vicarius Africae; but the opinion of Godfroi, that here also the title vicarius Africae should be read, is supported by the application of the epithet "Sinaita" to them. The "Hodegus" of Nicephorus and other writers to Anastasius I., patriarch of Antioch, but events are mentioned in it which occurred long after his death. Others have thought that he was the author of the work originally, but that it has been greatly interpolated. It was, however, most probably the production of the third Anastasius. It was published by Grzetzer in Greek and Latin, Ingolstadt, 1606, 4to. It is a loose, illogical rhapsody, without any grace of style, and very inaccurate as to facts. An account of the other writings ascribed to these three Anastasii, and discussions respecting their authorship, will be found in Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. x. p. 571), and Cave. (Hist. Lit.) [P. S.]

ANASTASIUS, metropolitan bishop of Nice (about 520—536 a. d.), wrote or dictated, in Greek, a work on the Psalms, which is still extant. (Bild. Mos. p. 389.) [P. S.]

ANASTASIUS I., bishop of Rome, from 538 to his death in 602, took the side of Jerome in his controversy with Rufinus respecting Origen. He excommunicated Rufinus and condemned the works of Origen, confessing, however, that he had never heard Origen's name before the translation of one of his works by Rufinus. (Constant, Epist. Pontif. Rom. p. 715.) Jerome praises him in the highest terms. (Epist. 16.) [P. S.]

ANASTASIUS II., bishop of Rome from 496 to his death in 548, made an unsuccessful attempt to compose the quarrel between the Greek and Latin Churches, which had been excited by Arius. There are extant two letters which he wrote to the emperor Anastasius on this occasion, and one which he wrote to Clovis, king of the Franks, in Balanuza, Nov. Collect. Concil. p. 1457. [P. S.]
that he was identical with the Anatolius who is often cited in the Geoponica by one or other of the three names, Anatolius, Vindanius, or Vindania-num, Barytius. These names have sometimes been erroneously supposed to designate three different individuals. (Niclas, Prolegom. ad Geopon. p. xlviii. n.) The work on Agriculture written by this Anatolius, Photius (Cod. 163) thought the best work on the subject, though containing some marvellous and incredible things. Our Anatolius may also be identical with the author of a treatise concerning Sympathies and Antipathies (τετρ. Συμπαθή eis καὶ Ἀντιπαθής), the remains of which may be found in Fabricius (Bibl. Gr. i. p. 29); but we are rather disposed to attribute this work to the same Anatolius, if we are not mistaken, henceforth, no one who violates the laws, however high may be his judicial or military rank, shall be allowed to depart with impunity." It appears that he acted up to his virtuous resolution.

He was not only an excellent governor, but extremely clever, of very various abilities, eloquent, defatigable, and ambitious. Part of a panegyric upon Anatolius composed by the sophist Himerius, has been preserved by Photius, but little if anything illustrative of the real character of Anatolius is to be collected from the remains of this panegyric. (Wernsdorff, ad Himerianus, xxxii. and 297.) If we would learn something of the private history of the man, we must look into the letters of Libauus and of Eunapius. In the 18th letter of Libanus, which is partly written in a tone of pigne and pervigilia, it is difficult to say bow far the censure and the praise are ironical. Libanius seems to insinuate, that his powerful acquaintance was stunted and ill-favoured in person;
did not scruple to enrich himself by accepting presents voluntarily offered; was partial to the Syrians, and was apt, in his prosperity, to look down upon his contemporaries.

Among his accomplishments it may be mentioned that he was fond of poetry, and so much admired the poetic effusions of Milesius of Smyrna, that he called him Milesius the Muse. Anatolius himself received from those who wished to detract from his reputation the nickname Agrorius, a word which has puzzled the whole tribe of commentators and lexicographers, including Faber, Ducange, and Tomp. It is probably connected in some way with the stage, as Eunapius refers for its explanation to the κωσμολόγοι τῶν ἡμερῶν ἡφαίστων. He was a heathen, and clung to his religion at a time when heathenism was unfashionable, and when the tide of opinion had begun to set strongly towards Christianity. It is recorded, that, upon his arrival in Athens, he rather ostentatiously performed sacridences, and visited the temples of the gods.

An error of importance concerning Anatolius occurs in a work of immense learning and deservingly high authority. Jnc. Godofroi states, in the Prospograplia attached to his edition of the Theodscian Code, that 16 letters of St. Basil the Great (viz. letters 391-406) are addressed to Anatolius.

This error, which we have no doubt originated from the accidental descent of a sentence that beonged to the preceding article on Aphrodisius, has been overlooked in the revision of Ritter.

ceased persons, to the exclusion of their rightful heirs. He perished in A.D. 557, in an earthquake at Byzantium, whither he had removed his residence from Berytus. (Agath. Hist. v. 3.) [J. T. G.]

ANATOLIUS (Ἀνατολίους), Patriarch of Constantinople (A.D. 449), presided at a synod at Constantinople (A.D. 450) which condemned Eutyches and his followers, and was present at the general council of Chalcedon (A.D. 451), out of the twenty-eighth decree of which a contest sprung up between Anatolius and Leo, bishop of Rome, respecting the relative rank of their two sees. A letter from Anatolius to Leo, written upon this subject in A.D. 457, is still extant. (Cvce, Hist. Litt. aD. 449.) [P. S.]

ANATOLIUS (Ἀνατολής), Bishop of Laodicea (A.D. 270), was an Alexandrian by birth. Eusebius marks him first among the men of his age, in literature, philosophy, and science, and states, that the Alexandrines urged him to open a school of Aristotelian philosophy. (H. E. vii. 32.) He was of great service to the Alexandrines when they were besieged by the Romans, A.D. 262. From Alexandria he went into Syria. At Caesarea he was ordained by Theochristus, who destined him to be his successor in the bishopric, the duties of which he discharged for a short time as the vicar of Theochristus. Afterwards, while proceeding to attend a council at Antioch, he was detained by the people of Laodicea, and became their bishop. Of his subsequent life nothing is known; but some he is said to have suffered martyrdom. He wrote a work on the chronology of Easter, a large fragment of which is preserved by Eusebius. (L. c.) The work exists in a Latin translation, which some ascribe to Rufinus, under the title of "Volumen de Paschate," or "Canones Paschales," and which was published by Aegidius Bucherius in his Doctrina Temporum, Antwerp, 1634. He also wrote a treatise on Arithmetic, in ten books (Hier. de Vir. Illust. c. 73), of which some fragments are preserved in the Theol. Græcia tis Ἀριστοτεικής. Some fragments of his mathematical works are printed in Fabric. Bib. Græc. iii. p. 492. [P. S.]

ANAX (Ἀναξ). 1. A giant, son of Urnan and Gaea, and father of Asterius. The legends of Miletus, which for two generations bore the name of Animorat, described Anax as king of Animorat; but in the reign of his son the town and territory were conquered by the Cretan Miletus, who changed the name Animorat into Miletus. (PAUS. i. 35, 2. § 3.)

2. A surname or epithet of the gods in general, characterizing them as the rulers of the world; but the plural forms, "Anaxer, or Anaxer, or Anaxikes paides," were used to designate the Dioscuri. (Paus. ii. 22, § 7, x. 38, § 3; Cie. de Nat. Deor. iii. 31; Aelian. V. H. ii. 4; Plut. Them. 33.)

In the second of the passages of Pausanias here referred to, in which he speaks of a temple of the Anaxikes paides at Amphissa, he states, that it was a doubtful point whether they were the Dioscuri, the Curetes, or the Cabeiri; and from this circumstance a connexion between Amphissa and Samothrace has been inferred. (Comp. Eustath. ad Hom. pp. 182, 1596.) Some critics identify the Anaxes with the Eamik of the Hebrews. [L. S.]

ANAXAGORAS (Ἀναξαγόρας), a Greek philosopher, was born at Clazomenae in Ionia about the year B.C. 499. His father, Hegesilus, left him in the possession of considerable property, but as he intended to devote his life to higher ends, he gave it up to his relatives as something which ought not to engage his attention. He is said to have gone to Athens at the age of twenty, during the contest of the Greeks with Persia, and to have lived and taught in that city for a period of thirty years. He became here the intimate friend and teacher of the most eminent men of the time, such as Euripides and Pericles; but while he thus gained the friendship and admiration of the most enlightened Athenians, the majority, uneasy at being disturbed in their hereditary superstitions, soon found reasons for complaint. The principal cause of hostility towards him must, however, be looked for in the following circumstance. As he was a friend of Pericles, the party which was disfavouring the Persian war, and who opposed the disposition of the people towards the philosopher as a favourable opportunity for striking a blow at the great statesman. Anaxagoras, therefore, was accused of impiety. His trial and its results are matters of the greatest uncertainty on account of the different statements of the ancients themselves. (Diog. Laert. ii. 12, &c.; Plut. Pericl. 32, Nicom. 23.) It seems probable, however, that Anaxagoras was accused twice, once on the ground of impiety, and a second time on that of partiality to Persia. In the first case it was only owing to the influence and eloquence of Pericles that he was not put to death; but he was sentenced to pay a fine of five talents and to quit Athens. The philosopher now went to Lampsacus, and it seems to have been during his absence that the second charge of ἐπιστέρως was brought against him, in consequence of which he was condemned to death. He is said to have received the intelligence of his sentence with a smile, and to have died at Lampsacus at the age of seventy-two. The inhabitants of this place honoured Anaxagoras not only during his lifetime, but after his death also. (Diog. Laert. ii. c. 3; Dict. of Ant. s. v. 'Ἀναξαγόρας'.)

Diogenes Laertius, Cicero, and other writers, call Anaxagoras a disciple of Anaximenes; but this statement is not only connected with some chronological difficulties, but is not quite in accordance with the accounts of other writers. Thus much, however, is certain, that Anaxagoras struck into a new path, and was dissatisfied with the systems of his predecessors, the Ionic philosophers. It is he who laid the foundation of the Attic philosophy, and who stated the problem which his successors laboured to solve. The Ionic philosophers had endeavoured to explain nature and its various phenomena by regarding matter in its different forms and modifications as the cause of all things. Anaxagoras, on the other hand, conceived the necessity of seeking a higher cause, independent of matter, and this cause he considered to be νοῦς, that is, mind, thought, or intelligence. This νοῦς, however, is not the creator of the world, but merely that which originally arranged the world and gave motion to it; for, according to the axiom that out of nothing nothing can come, he supposed the existence of matter from all eternity, though before the νοῦς was exercised upon it, it was in a chaotic confusion. In this original chaos there was an infinite number of homogeneous parts (ὑμνομορία) as well as heterogeneous ones. The νοῦς united the former and separated from them what was heterogeneous, and out of this process arose the things we see in this world. Thī union and separation, however, were made in such a manner, that each thing contains in itself parts of other things or heterogeneous elements, and is what it is, only on account of the preponderance of certain homogeneous parts which constitute its character. The πῶς, which thus regulated and formed the material world, is itself also cogestensive, and consequently the principle of all cognition: it alone can see truth and the essence of things, while our senses are imperfect and often lead us into error. Anaxagoras explained his dualistic system in a work which is now lost, and we know it only from such fragments as are quoted from it by later writers, as Plato, Aristotle, Plutarch, Diogenes Laertius, Cicero, and others. For a more detailed account see Ritter, Diogenes Laertius, Cicero, and others. For a more detailed account see Ritter, Diogenes Laertius, Cicero, and others. ANAXANDRUS (Ἀναξάνδρος), king of Sparta, 12th of the Agids, son of Eurycrates, is named by Pausanius as commanding against Aristomenes, and to the end of the second Messenian war, b.c. 668; but probably on mere conjecture from the statement of Tyrtaeus (given by Strabo, viii. p. 362), that the grandfathers fought in the first, the genealogy of the grandsons in the second. (Paus. iii. 3.) Several statements of Tyrtaeus (given by Strabo, viii. p. 35, 55, 66, 75), but not the same as the writer on scene-painting mentioned by Vitruvius.

AGATHARCHUS. [P. S.]

ANAXANDER (Ἀναξάνδρος), king of Sparta, flourished about b.c. 460, and executed the statue of Jupiter in bronze set up at Olympia by the states which had united in repelling the invasion of Xerxes. (Paus. v. 23. § 5.) He is supposed to be the same person as the sculptor mentioned in an epigram by Anacreon (Ἀναξάνδρος), i. p. 55, 58, 66 (necess), but not the same as the writer on scene-painting mentioned by Vitruvius.

ANAXANDRUS (Ἀναξάνδρος), an Athenian comic poet of the middle comedy, was the son of Anaxander, a native of Cameirus in Rhodes. He began to exhibit comedies in b.c. 376 (Morm. Par. Ep. 34), and 29 years later he was present, and probably exhibited, at the Olympic games celebrated by Philip at Dium. Aristotle held him in high esteem. (Rhet. iii. 10—12; Eth. End. vi. 10; Nicom. vii. 10.) He is said to have been the first poet who made love intrigues a prominent part of comedy. He gained ten prices, the whole number of his comedies being sixty-five. Though he is said to have destroyed several of his plays in anger at their rejection, we still have the titles of thirty-three.

ANAXANDRIDES was also a dithyrambic poet, but we have no remains of his dithyrambs. (Suidas, s.v.; Athen. ix. p. 374; Meineke; Bode.) [P. S.]

ANAXARCHUS (Ἀναξάρχος), a philosopher of Abdera, of the school of Democritus, flourished about 340 b.c. and onwards. (Diog. Laert. i. 58, 657, 674.) He accompanied Alexander into Asia, and gained his favour by flattery and wit. From the casiness of his temper and his love of pleasure he obtained the appellation of ἐδοξαμοικός. When Alexander had killed Cleitus, Anaxarchus consoled him with the maxim "a king can do no wrong." After the death of Alexander, Anaxarchus was thrown by shipwreck into the power of Nicocreon, king of Cyprus, to whom he had given mortal offence, and who had him pounded to death in a stone mortar. The philosopher endured his sufferings with the utmost fortitude. Cicero (Tuscul. ii. 21, de Nat. Deor. iii. 33) is the earliest authority for this tale. Of the philosophy of Anaxarchus we know nothing. Some writers understand his title ἐδοξαμοικός as meaning, that he was the teacher of a philosophy which made the end of life to be ἐδοξαμοικός, and they made him the founder of a sect called ἐδοξαμοικοῦ, of which, however, he himself is the only person mentioned. Strabo (p. 594) ascribes to Anaxarchus and Callisthenes the recession of Homer, which Alexander kept in Darius's perfume-casket, and which is generally attributed to Aristotle. (Artios. 1. 19, Plato. Alc. 55; Plin. iii. 25; Aelian, V. N. c. 37; Brucker, Hist. Philos. i. p. 1307; Duhm, Protus de Anaxarchus, Lips. 1782.) [P. S.] ANAXA'RIE, a maiden of the island of Cyprus, who belonged to the ancient family of Teucer. She remained unmoved by the distress, and to check the rising fortunes of Athens, she hastened to the island of Cyprus, who belonged to the ancient family of Teucer. She remained unmoved by the distress, and to check the rising fortunes of Athens, in the temple of Venus Propserina. (Ov. Met. xiv. 698, &c.)

ANAXI'AS or ANAXIS (Ἀναξίας or Ἀναξίς), a son of Castor and Elaeira or Hilaera, and brother of Mnasius, with whom he is usually mentioned. The temple of the Dioscouri at Argos contained also the statues of these two sons of Castor (Paus. ii. 22. § 6), and on the throne of Amycla both were represented riding on horseback. (iii. 18. § 7.)

ANAXIBIA (Ἀναξίβια). 1. A daughter of Bias and wife of Pelias, by whom she became the mother of Acamas, Peleisidoe, Pelops, Hippodame, and Alcestis. (Apollod. i. 9. § 10.)

2. A daughter of Cratinus, and second wife of Nestor. (Apollod. i. 9. § 9.)

3. A daughter of Pleisthenes, and sister of Agamemnon, married Strophius and became the mother of Pythres. (Paus. ii. 29. § 4; Schol. ad Eurip. Orest. 764, 1235.) Hyginus (Fab. 117) calls the wife of Strophius Aystychosa. Eustathius (ad ll. ii. 296) confounds Agamemnon's sister with the second wife of Nestor, who was a sister of Agamemnon. There is another Anaxibia in Plut. de Plat. Fam. 4. (L. S.)

ANAXIBIUS (Ἀναξίβιος), was the Spartan admiral stationed at Byzantium, to whom the Cyprian Greeks, on their arrival at Tragus on the Euxine, sent Chereisophus, one of their generals, at his own proposal, to obtain a sufficient number of ships to transport them to Europe. (n. c. 400. Xen. Anab. v. 1. § 4.) When however Chereisophus met them again at Ephesus, he brought back nothing from Anaxibius but civil words and a promise of employment and pay as soon as they came out of the Euxine. (Anab. vi. 1. § 16.) On their arrival at Chrysopolis, on the Asiatic shore of the Bosporus, Anaxibius, being bribed by Pharmacabuxus with great promises to withdraw them from their satrapy, again engaged to furnish them with pay, and brought them over to Byzantium. Here he attempted to get rid of them, and to send them forward on their march without fulfilling his agreement. A tumult ensued, in which Anaxibius was compelled to fly for refuge to the Acropolis, and which was quelled only by the remonstrances of Xenophon. (Anab. vii. 1. § 1-33.) Soon after this the Greeks left the town under the command of the adventurer Coeratades, and Anaxibius forthwith issued a proclamation, subsequently acted on by Aristarchus the Harmost, that all Cyprian soldiers found in Byzantium should be sold for slaves. (Anab. vii. 1. § 36. 2. § 6.) Being however soon after superseded in the command, and finding himself neglected by Pharmacabuxus, he attempted to revenge himself by persuading Xenophon to lead the army to invade the country of the satrap; but the enterprise was stopped by the prohibition and threats of Aristarchus. (Anab. vii. 2. § 5-14.) In the year 389, Anaxibius was sent out from Sparta to supersede Dercylidas in the command at Abydos, and to check the rising fortunes of Athens in the Hellespont. Here he met at first with some successes, till at length Iphicrates, who had been sent against him by the Athenians, contrived to intercept him on his return from Antandrus, which he had promised to revolt to him, and of which he had gone to take possession. Anaxibius was suddenly on the Athenian ambuscade, and foreseeing the certainty of his own defeat, desired his men to save themselves by flight. His own duty, he said, required him to die there; and, with a small body of comrades, he remained on the spot, fighting till he fell. (Xen. Hell. iv. 8. § 32-39.)

ANAXI'CRADES (Ἀναξικράτης), a Greek writer of uncertain date, one of whose statements is compared with one of Cleitomedus. He wrote a work on Argolis. (Schol. ad Eurip. Med. 19, ad Androm. 222.)

ANAXI'DANUS (Ἀναξίδανος), king of Sparta, 11th of the Euryptydids, son of Zeuxidamus, contemporary with Anaxander, and lived to the conclusion of the second Messenian war, n. c. 660. (Paus. ii. 7. 15.)

ANAXI'DANUS (Ἀναξίδανος), an Athenian ambassador, sent to Rome in n. c. 155. (Polyb. xxxi. 6, 8, xxxiii. 2.)

ANAXI'LAUS or ANAXILA'US (Ἀναξιλαύς, Ἀναξιλαύς), an Athenian comic poet of the middle age, contemporary with Plato and Demostenes, the former of whom he attacked in one of his plays. (Diog. Laert. iii. 28.) We have a few fragments and the titles of nineteen of his comedies, eight of which are on mythological subjects. (Ptol. ii. 29. 34; x. 190; Athen. pp. 95, 171, 374, 416, 635; Meineke; Bode.)

ANAXI'LAUS (Ἀναξιλαύς), a Greek historian, of uncertain date. (Dionys. Ant. Rom. i. 1; Diog. Laert. i. 107.)

ANAXI'LAUS (Ἀναξιλαύς), of Byzantium, one of the parties who surrendered Byzantium to the Athenians in n. c. 408. He was afterwards brought to trial at Sparta for this surrender, but was acquitted, insomuch as the inhabitants were almost starving at the time. (Xen. Hell. i. 3. § 19; Plut. Alex. pp. 208, d, 209, a.; comp. Dion. xiii. 67, and Wesseling's note; Polyben. i. 47. § 2.)

ANAXI'LAUS (Ἀναξιλαύς or ΑΝΑΞΙΛΑΥΟΣ), or ANAXI'LAUS (Ἀναξιλαύος), tyrant of Rhegium, was the son of Cretines, and of Messenian origin. He was master of Rhegium in n. c. 494, when the Samians and other Ionian fugitives seized upon Zancle. Shortly afterwards he drove them out of this town, peoples it with fresh inhabitants, and changed its name into Messene. (Herod. vii. 22, 23; Thuc. viii. 4; comp. Aristot. Pol. v. 10. § 4.) In 400 he obtained the assistance of the Carthaginians for his father-in-law, Terillus of Himera, against Thurii. (Herod. vi. 165.) The daughter of Anaxilas was married to Hiero. (Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. i. 112.) Anaxilas died in 476, leaving Micythus guardian of his children, who obtained possession of their inheritance in 467, but was soon after deprived of the sovereignty by the people. (Diod. xii. 48, 65, 76.) The chronology of Anaxilas has been discussed by Bentley (Disc. on Plut. p. 105, &c., ed. of 1777), who has shown that the Anaxilas of Pausanius (iv. 23. § 3) is the same as the one mentioned above.
The use of the Gnomon was first introduced that of the intelligible (compare the doctrine of Anaximenes concerning air, Plut. de Place. Phil. i. 3), the last step of which was afterwards to be taken by Anaxagorism in the introduction of voüs. But this opinion cannot be distinctly traced in any author earlier than Alexander of Aphrodisias (ap. Simp. Phys. fol. 32, a.), though Aristotle seems to allude to it (de Coel. iii. 5). Other accounts represent Anaximander as leaving the nature of the àsveipov indeterminate. (Diog. Laert. i. c.; Simplex. Phys. fol. 6, a.; Plut. Place. Phil. i. 3.) But Aristotle in another place (Metaph. xi. 2), and Theophrastus (ap. Simp. Phys. fol. 6, b, 33, a), who speaks very definitely and seems to refer to Anaximander's own words, describe him as regarding the àsveipov as consisting of a mixture of simple unchangeable elements (the ànvovrjXov of Anaxagoras). Out of this material all things were organized, not by any change in its nature, but by the concurrence of homogeneous particles already existing in it; a process which, according to Anaxagoras, was effected by the agency of intelligence (voüs), whilst Anaximander referred it to the conflict between heat and cold, and to the affinities of the particles. (Plut. ap. Euseb. Præp. Evæg. i. 8.) Thus the doctrines of both philosophers would resemble the atomic theory, and so be opposed to the opinions of Thales, Anaximenes, and Diogenes of Apollonia, who derived all substances from a single but changeable principle. And as the elemental matter of Thales corresponded to the earth, from which Homer makes all things to have sprung, so the àsveipov of Anaximander, including all in a confused unorganized state, would be the philosophical expression of the Chaos of Hesiod. (Ritter, Art. Anaximander, in Ersch and Gruber's Encyc.) In developing the consequences of his fundamental hypothesis, whatever that may really have been, Anaximander did not escape the extravagances into which a merely speculative system of physics is sure to fall. He held, that the earth was of a cylindrical form, suspended in the middle of the universe, and surrounded by water, air, and fire, like the coats of an onion; but that the exterior stratum of fire was broken up and collected into masses; whence the sun, moon, and stars; which, moreover, were carried round by the three inerbes in which they were respectively fixed. (Euseb. l. c.; Plut. de Place. ii. 15, 16; Arist. de Coel. ii. 13.) According to Diogenes, he thought that the moon borrowed its light from the sun, and that the latter body consisted of pure fire and was not less than the earth; but the statements of Plutarch (de Place. ii. 20, 25) and Stobaeus (Ekol. i. 26, 27) are more worthy of credit; namely, that he made the moon 19 and the sun 28 times as large as the earth, and thought that the light of the sun issued through an orifice as large as the earth; that the moon possessed an intrinsic splendour, and that its phases were caused by a motion of rotation. For his theory of the original production of animals, including man, in water, and their gradual progress to the condition of land animals, see Plut. de Place. v. 19; Euseb. l. c.; Plut. Serm. viii. 8; Orig. Phil. c. 6; and compare Diod. i. 7. He held a plurality of worlds, and of gods; but in what sense is not clear. (Cic. de Nat. Deor. i. 10; Plut. de Place. l. 7.)

into Greece by Anaximander or his contemporaries. (Favorin. op. Diog. l. c.; Plin. ii. 9; Herod. ii. 109. The assertion of Diogenes that he invented this instrument, and also geographical maps, cannot be taken to prove more than the extent of his reputation. On the subject of the Gnomon, see Salmas. Plin. excav. p. 445, b, q, ed. Utrecht, 1839, and Schaubach, Gesch. d. Griech. Astronomie, p. 119, &c. It probably consisted of a style on a horizontal plane, and its first use would be to determine the time of noon and the position of the meridian by its shortest shadow during the day; the time of the solstices, by its shortest and longest meridian shadows; and of the equinoxes, by the rectilinear motion of the extremity of its shadow: to the latter two purposes Anaximander is said to have applied it; but since there is little evidence that the equinoctial and equinoctial circles were known in Greece at this period, it must be doubted whether the equinox was determined otherwise than by a rough observation of the equality of day and night. (Schaubach, p. 140, &c.) Anaximander flourished in the time of Polycrates of Samos, and died soon after the completion of his 64th year, in Ol. viii. 2 (a. c. 547), according to Apolloides. (op. Diog. l. c.) But since Polycrates began to reign in a. c. 552, there must be some mistake in the time of Anaximander's death, unless the eder Polycrates (mentioned by Suidas, s. v. Ἱσσως) be meant. (Clinton, Fast. Holc.) (For the ancient sources of information see Pellel, Hist. Philosoph. Graeco-Romanae ex fontium locis context.)

ANAXIMENES (Ἀναξίμην), who is usually placed third in the series of Ionian philosophers, was born at Miletus, like Thales and Anaximander, with both of whom he had personal intercourse; for besides the common tradition which makes him a disciple of the latter, Diogenes Laertius quotes at length two letters said to have been written to Pythagoras by Anaximenes; in one of which he gives an account of the death of Thales, speaking of him with reverence, as the first of philosophers, and as having been his own teacher. In the other, he congratulates Pythagoras on his removal to Crotona from Samos, while he was himself at the mercy of the tyrants of Miletus, and was looking forward with fear to the approaching war with the Persians, in which he foresaw that the Ionians must be subdued. (Diog. Laert. ii. 3, &c.)

There is no safe testimony as to the exact periods of the birth and death of Anaximenes: but since there is sufficient evidence that he was the teacher of Anaxagoras, a. c. 480, and he was in repute in a. c. 544, he must have lived to a great age. (Strab. xiv. p. 645; Cic. de Nat. Doctr. i. 11; Origen, vol. iv. p. 293.) The question is discussed by Clinton in the Philological Museum. (Vol. i. p. 86, &c.)

Like the other early Greek philosophers, he employed himself in speculating upon the origin, and accounting for the phenomena, of the universe; and as Thales held water to be the material cause out of which the world was made, so Anaximenes considered air to be the first cause of all things, the primary form, as it were, of matter, into which the other elements of the universe were resolvable. (Aristot. Metaph. i. 3.) For both philosophers science was a part of philosophy, and the philosophical science by tracing all material things up to a single element: while Anaximander, on the contrary, regarded the substance out of which the universe was formed as a mixture of all elements combined in a single whole. The doctrine of Anaximenes, finite things were formed from the infinite air, was that of compression and rarefaction produced by motion which had existed from all eternity: thus the earth was created out of air made dense, and from the earth the sun and the other heavenly bodies. (Plut. op. Enseh. ProcP. Ecoun. i. 8.) According to the same theory, heat and cold were produced by different degrees of density of the primal element: the clouds were formed by the thickening of the air; and the earth was kept in its place by the support of the air beneath it and by the flatness of its shape. (Plut. de Fr. Frig. 7, de Place, Ph. iii. 4; Aristot. Metaph. ii. 13.)

Hence it appears that Anaximenes, like his predecessors, held the eternity of matter; nor indeed does he seem to have believed in the existence of anything immaterial; for even the human soul, according to his theory, is, like the body, formed of air (Plut. de Place. Ph. i. 3); and he saw no necessity for supposing an Agent in the work of creation, since he held that motion was a natural and necessary law of the universe. It is therefore not unreasonable in Plutarch to blame him, as well as Anaximander, for assigning only the material, and no efficient, cause of the world in his philosophical system. (Plut. l. c.)

ANAXI'MENES (Ἀναξίμην) of Lampsacus, son of Aristocles, and pupil of Zelus and Diogenes the Cynic. He was a contemporary of Alexander the Great, whom he is said to have instructed, and whom he accompanied on his Asiatic expedition. (Suidas, s. v. Αἰθρός; Eustath. ad Aristot. Eth. iii. 8.) 2. A history of Alexander the Great. (Diog. Laert. ii. 3; Harpocrat. s. v. Ἀλέξανδρος, who quotes the 2nd book of it.) 3. A history of Greece, which Pausanias (vi. 18. § 2) and Suidas, about the manner in which he saved his native town from the wrath of Alexander for having espoused the cause of the Persians. His grateful fellow-citizens rewarded him with a statue at Olympia. Anaximenes wrote three historical works: 1. A history of Philip of Macedon, which consisted at least of eight books. (Harpocrat. s. v. Καθάλη, Ἀλέξανδρος; Eustathius. ad Aristot. Eth. iii. 8.) 2. A history of Alexander the Great. (Diog. Laert. ii. 3; Harpocrat. s. v. Ἀλέξανδρος, who quotes the 2nd book of it.) 3. A history of Greece, which Pausanias (vi. 18, § 2) calls τὰ ἔνθεν Ἑλλήνων ἀρχαία, which, however, is more commonly called παραποιήματα ἐποίησις or παραποίημα ἐποίησις (Athen. vii. p. 231; Diol. xv. 86.) It comprised in twelve books the history of Greece from the earliest mythical ages down to the battle of Mantinea and the death of Epaminondas. He was a very skilful rhetorician, and wrote a work calaminating the three great cities of Greece, Sparta, Athens, and Thebes, which he published under the name of Theopompus, his personal enemy, and in which he imitated the style of the latter so perfectly, that every one thought it to be really his work. This production Anaximenes sent to those cities, and thus created exasperation against his enemy in all Greece. (Paus. vi. 8, § 3; Suid. l. c.) The histories of Anaximenes, of which only very few fragments are now extant, are censured by Plutarch (Proc. Pol. 6) for the numerous prolix and rhetorical speeches he introduced in them. (Pomp. Omnia Epist. 41. De Saec. 12; Dacier, de dic. Deumith, 3.) The fact that we possess so little of his histories, shews that the ancients did not think highly of them, and that they were more of a rhetorical than an historical character. He enjoyed some reputation as a teacher of rhetoric and as an orator, both in the assembly of the people and in the courts of justice (Dionys. Hal. L.c.; Paus. L.c.), and also wrote speeches for others, such as the one which Euthius delivered against Phrynnye. (Athen. xiii. p. 591; comp. Harpoc. x. c. Ed.)

There have been critics, such as Casaubon (ad Diog. Laer. ii. 3), who thought that the rhetorician and the historian Anaximenes were two distinct persons; but their identity has been proved by very satisfactory arguments. What renders him a person of the highest importance in the history of Greek literature, is the following fact, which has been firmly established by the critical investigations of our own age. He is the only rhetorician previous to the time of Aristotle whose scientific treatise on rhetoric is now extant. This is the so-called ἔρωτα ἐπὶ τῆς ἀργυραῖας, which is usually printed among the works of Aristotle, to whom, however, it cannot belong, as all critics agree. The opinion that it is a work of Anaximenes is usually printed among the works of Aristotle, to whom, however, it cannot belong, as all critics agree. The opinion that it is a work of Anaximenes extended his subject beyond the limits adopted by his predecessors, with whose works he was well acquainted. He divides eloquence into forensic and deliberative, but also suggests that a third kind, the epideictic, should be separated from them. As regards the plan and construction of the work, it is evident that its author was not a philosopher: the whole is a series of practical suggestions how this or that subject should be treated under various circumstances, as far as argumentation, expression, and the arrangement of the parts of a speech are concerned. (Vossius, de Histor. Graec. p. 92, &c., ed. Westermann; Ruhnken, Hist. Crit. Ost. Graec. p. 86; Westermann, Gesch. der Griech. Beredsamkeit, § 69.)

[LS.]

ANAXIPPUS (Ἀναξιππος), an Athenian comic poet of the new comedy, was contemporary with Antigonus and Demetrius Poliorcetes, and flourished about b.c. 303. (Suidas, σ. τ.) We have the titles of four of his plays, and perhaps of one more. (Meineke, i. pp. 469-70.)

[LS.]

ANAXIS (Ἀνάξις), a Boeotian, wrote a history of Greece, which was carried down to b.c. 360, the year before the accession of Philip to the kingdom of Macedonia. (Diod. xv. 95.)

[LS.]

ANAXO (Ἀνάξω), 1. [Alysene.] 2. A woman of Troezen, whom Theseus was said to have carried off. After slaying her sons, he violated her daughters. (Plut. Thesea. 29.)

[LS.]

ANCAEUS (Ἀνκαίος). 1. A son of the Ar- manid Lycurgus and Creophile or Eurynomos, and father of Apagenor. (Apollod. i. 8. §§ 10, 10. § 3; Hygin. Fab. 173; Hom. II. 7. 609.) He was one of the Argonauts and partook in the Calydonian hunt, in which he was killed by the boar. (Apollod. i. 9. §§ 16 and 23; comp. Paus. viii. 5. § 24, § 22; Apollon. Rhod. ii. 894; Or. Met. vii. 400.)

2. A son of Poseidon and Astypalaea or Atla, king of the Leleges in Samos, and husband of Samia, the daughter of the river-god Maenander, by whom he became the father of Perikles, Eneos, Samos, Alcithoress, and Persia. (Paus. i. 14. § 1; Callim. Hymn, in Del. 50.)

This hero seems to have been confounded by some mythographers with Ancaeus, the son of Lycurgus; for, according to Hyginus (Fab. 14), Ancaeus, the son of Poseidon, was one of the Argonauts, but not the other; and Apollonius Rhodius (ii. 867, &c.) relates, that after the death of Tiphys, Ancaeus, the son of Poseidon, became the helmsman of the ship Argo, which is just what Apollodorus relates of Ancaeus, the son of Lycurgus. Lycophron (449), moreover, in speaking of the death of the son of Lycurgus by the Calydonian boar, mentions a proverb, which, according to the Scholiast on Apollonius (i. 165), originated with Ancaeus, the son of Poseidon. The story of the proverb runs thus: Ancaeus was fond of agricultural occupations, and planted many vines. A seer said to him that he would not live to taste the wine of his vineyard. When Ancaeus afterwards was on the point of putting a cup of wine, the growth of his own vineyard, to his mouth, he scorned the seer, who, however, answered, Πειθωνίας καὶ παράγεις τά καλά χελῶν δερφίων. "There is many a slip between the cup and the lip." At the same instant a tumult arose, and Ancaeus was informed that a wild boar was near. He put down his cup, went out against the animal, and was killed by it. Hence this Greek phrase was used as a proverb, to indicate any unforeseen occurrence by which a man's plans might be thwarted. (See Thrillwall in Philolog. Museum, vol. i. p. 106, &c.)

A third Ancaeus occurs in R. xxii. 635. (LS.)

Q. ANCHA'RIUS. 1. A senator, and of praetorian rank, was killed by Marius on the return of the latter from Africa to Rome in b.c. 37 (Appian, B. c. i. 75.)

2. Tribune of the plebe in the consulsiphip of Caesar and Bibulus, b.c. 59. He took an active part in opposing the agrarian law of Caesar, and in consequence of his services to the aristocratic party obtained the praetorship in b.c. 56. He succeeded L. Piso in the province of Macedonia in the following year. (Cic. pro Sest. 53, in Pison. 36; Schol. Bob. pro Sest. p. 304, in Pison. p. 317, ed. Orelli.) One of Cicero's letters is written to him (ad Fam. xiii. 40.).

ANCHA'RIUS PRISCUS. [Priscus.]

ANCHESMIUS (Ἀγχαςμιος), a surname of Zeus, derived from the hill Anchisius in Attica, on which, as on several Attic hills, there was a statue of the god. (Paus. i. 32. § 2.)

ANCHI'ALE (Ἀγχιάλη), a daughter of Japeius and mother of Cydnus, who was believed to have founded the town of Anchiale in Cilicia. (Steph. Byz. s. e.) Another personage of this name occurs in Apollon. Rhod. i. 1130. (LS.)

ANCHI'ALUS (Ἀγκυαλός). Three mythical personages of this name occur in Hom. Od. i. 180, viii. 112; Il. v. 60. (LS.)

ANCHI'ALUS, MICHAEL (Ἀγκυαλός), patriarch of Constantinople from 1167 to 1185 A. D., was a warm opponent of the union of the Greek and Roman churches, and an eminent Aristotelian philosopher. His extant works are, 1. Five synodal decrees, published in Greek and Latin in the Jus Gr. Rom. (iii. p. 227), and 2. A dialogue with the emperor Marcus Comnenus concerning the claims of the Roman pontiff. Of the latter work only some extracts have been published, by Leo Allatius. (De Eccles. Occident. atque Orient. perpet. Consess.) [P. S.]

ANCHI'NOE. [Achinoe.]

ANCHI'MO'LUS (A'xyxh'odan), the son of Aster, was at the head of the first expedition sent by the Spartans to drive the Pisistratidae out of Athens; but he was defeated and killed, about n. c. 511, and was buried at Alcipeae in Attica. (Herod. v. 63.)

ANCHI'SES (A'xyxh'os), a son of Carys and Themis, the daughter of Ilus. His descent is traced by Aeneas, his son (Hom. II. xx. 208, &c.), from Zeus himself. (Comp. Apollod. iii. 1 2. § 2; Tacit. ad Lycoph. 1232.) Hyginus (Fab. 94) makes him a son of Assaracus and grandson of Carys. Anchises was related to the royal house of Troy and king of Dardanus on mount Ida. In beauty he equaled the immortal gods, and was beloved by Aphrodite, by whom he became the father of Aeneas. (Hom. II. xx. 12; Hes. Thoc, 1008; Apoll. Hygin. l. c.) According to the Homeric hymn on Aphrodite (45, &c.), the goddess had commanded him to give out that the child was his, and added the threat that Zeus would destroy him with a flash of lightning if he should ever betray the real mother. When, therefore, on one occasion Anchises lost control over his tongue and boasted of his intercourse with the goddess, he was struck by a flash of lightning, which according to some traditions killed, but according to others only blinded or lamed him. (Hygin. l. c.; Serv. ad Aen. ii. 649.) Virgil in his poem makes Anchises survive the capture of Troy, and Aeneas carries his father on his shoulders from the burning city, that he might be assisted by his wise counsel during the voyage, for Virgil, after the example of Eumaeus, attributes prophetic powers to Anchises. (Aen. ii. 687, with Serv. note.) According to Virgil, Anchises died soon after the first arrival of Aeneas in Sicily, and was buried on mount Eryx. (Aen. iii. 710, v. 759, &c.) This tradition seems to have been firmly believed in Sicily, and not to have been merely an invention of the poet, for Dionysius of Halicarnassus (i. 53) states, that Anchises had a sanctuary at Egesta, and the funeral games celebrated in Sicily in honour of Anchises seem to have continued down to a late period. (Qv. Paut. iii. 543.) According to other traditions Anchises died and was buried in Italy. (Dionys. i. 64; Strab. v. p. 229; Aurel. Vict. De Orig. Cont. Rom. 10, &c.) A tradition preserved in Pausanias (viii. 12. § 5) states, that Anchises died in Arcadia, and was buried there by his son at the foot of a hill, which received from him the name of Anchisia. There were, however, some other places besides which boasted of possessing the tomb of Anchises; for some said, that he was buried on mount Ida, in accordance with the tradition that he was killed there by Zeus (Vandasth. ad Hom. p. 494), and others, that he was interred in a place on the gulf of Thermus near the Hollespont. (Conon, 46.)

According to Apollodorus (iii. 12. § 2), Anchises had by Aphrodite a second son, Lyurus or Lyurus, and Homer (II. xxi. 429) calls Hippodamia the eldest of the daughters of Anchises, but does not mention her mother's name. An Anchises of Sicyon occurs in II. xxiii. 266. [L. S.]

ANCHI'SI'ADES (A'xyxh'isad), a patrician from Anchises, used to designate his son Aeneas. (Hom. II. xvi. 754; Virg. Aen. vi. 348), and Echepolus, the son of Aeneas of Sicyon. (Hom. II. xxi. 296.) [L. S.]

ANCHI'RU'RUS (A'xyxh'ouros), a son of the Phrygian king Midas, in whose reign the earth opened in the neighbourhood of the town of Celaceae in Phrygia. Midas consulted the oracle in what manner the opening might be closed, and he was commanded to throw into it the most precious thing he possessed. He accordingly threw into it a great quantity of gold and silver, but when the chasm still did not close, his son Anchirurus, thinking that life was the most precious of all things, mounted his horse and leapt into the chasm, which closed immediately. (Plut. Parall. 5.) [L. S.]

ANCUS MARCIUS, the fourth king of Rome, is said to have reigned twenty-three or twenty-four years, from about n. c. 638 to 614. According to tradition he was the son of Numia's daughter, and sought to tread in the footsteps of his grandfather by reestablishing the religious ceremonies which had fallen into neglect. But a war with the Latins called him from the pursuits of peace. He conquered the Latins, took many Latin towns, transported the inhabitants to Rome, and gave them the Aventine to dwell on. These conquered Latins, according to Niebuhr's views, formed the original Plebs. (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Plebs.) It is related further of Ancus, that he founded a colony at Ostia, at the mouth of the Tiber; built a fortress on the Janiculum as a protection against Etruria, and united it with the city by a bridge across the Tiber; dug the ditch of the Quirites, as it was called, which was a defense for the open ground between the Caelian and the Palatine; and built a prison to restrain offenders, who were increasing. (Liv. i. 32, 33; Dionys. iii. 36—45; Cic. de Rep. ii. 18; Plut. Num. 21; Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, i. p. 352, &c.; Arnold, Hist. of Rome, i. p. 19.)

ANDO'BALES. [Indibilis.]

ANDOCIDES (Adoniodis), one of the ten Attic orators, whose works were contained in the Alexandria Canon, was the son of Leogoras, and was born at Athens in n. c. 467. He belonged to the ancient eunapid family of the Corycees, which traced its pedigree up to Odysseus and the god Hermes. (Plut. Vit. X. Orat. p. 834, b., Ael. 21 comp. Andoc. de Redit. § 33; de Myster. § 141.) Being a noble, he of course joined the oligarchical party at Athens, and through their influence obtained, in n. c. 436, together with Glancon, the command of a fleet of twenty sail, which was to protect the Corecyreans against the Corinthians (Thuc. i. 51; Plut. Vit. X. Orat. l. c.) After this he seems to have been employed on various occasions as ambassador to Thessaly, Macedonia, Mclossia, Thebes, Italy, and Sicily (Andoc. c. Ael. § 41); and, although he was frequently attacked for his political opinions (c. Ael. § 8), he yet maintained his ground, until in n. c. 415, when he became involved in the charge brought against Aelciades for having profaned the mysteries an mutated the Hermæa. It appeared the more likely that Andocides was an accomplice in the latter of these crimes, which was believed to be a preliminary step towards overthrowing the democratic constitution, since the Hermæa standing close to his house in the phyle Aegæis was among the very few which had not been injured. (Plut. L. c.; Nepos, Alloc. 3; Sluiter, loc. Andoc. c. 3.) Andocides was accordingly seized and thrown into prison, but after some time recovered his liberty by a promise that he would reveal the names of the real perpetrators of the crime; and on the suggestion of one Charmidcs or Timaeus [De Myst. § 48; Plut. Atic. 488, ed. Bekker; Tzetz. Chth. vi. 373, &c.] in c. 411, Andocides returned to Athens on the establishment of the oligarchical government of the Four Hundred, hoping that a certain service he had rendered the Athenian ships at Samos would secure him a welcome reception. (De Red. §§ 11, 12.) But no sooner were the oligarchs informed of the return of Andocides, than their leader Peisander had him seized, and accused him of having supported the party opposed to them at Samos. During his trial, Andocides, who perceived the exasperation prevailing against him, leaped to the altar which stood in the court, and received the exasperation prevailing against him, and was allowed to remain at Athens, De Myst. § 29.) It was on this occasion, Lys. c. Andoc. § 6.) The means he employed to gain the friendship of powerful men were sometimes of the most disreputable kind; among which a service he rendered to a prince in Cyprus is particularly mentioned. (Con. Plut. B. c. 488, ed. Bekker; Tzetz. Chth. viii. 373, &c.) In n. c. 411, Andocides went to Cyprus, where for a time he enjoyed the friendship of Evagoras; but, by some circumstance or other, he exasperated his friend, and was consigned to prison. Here again he escaped, and after the victory of the democratic party at Athens and the abolition of the Four Hundred, he ventured once more to return to Athens; but as he was still suffering under the sentence of civil disfranchisement, he endeavoured by means of bribes to persuade the prytanes to allow him to attend the assembly of the people, the latter, however, expelled him from the city. (Lys. c. Andoc. § 29.) It was on this occasion, c. 411, that Andocides delivered the speech still extant "on his Return" (πρὸς τὸν ἀνεμοὺς εἰρήνην), which he petitioned for permission to reside at Athens, but in vain. In this his third exile, Andocides went to reside in Elis (Plut. Vit. X. Orat. c. 835, a.; Phot. L. c.), and during the time of his absence from his native city, his house there was occupied by Cleophon, a manufacturer of lyres, who had placed himself at the head of the democratic party. (De Myst. § 146.)

Andocides remained in exile till the year B.C. 93, after the overthrow of the tyranny of the Thirty by Thrasylus, when the general amnesty then proclaimed made him hope that its benefit would be extended to him also. He himself says (De Myst. § 139), that he returned to Athens from Cyprus, from which we may infer, that although he was settled in Elis, he had gone from thence to Cyprus for commercial or other purposes; for it appears that he had become reconciled to the princes of that island, as he had great influence and considerable landed property there. (De Red. § 20, De Myst. § 4.) In consequence of the general amnesty, he was allowed to remain at Athens, enjoyed peace for the next three years, and recovered his property. According to Lysias (c. Andoc. § 53, comp. § 11), it was scarcely ten days after his return that he brought an accusation against Archippus or Aristippus, which, however, he dropped on receiving a sum of money. During this period Andocides became a member of the senate, in which he appears to have possessed great influence, as well as in the popular assembly. He was gymnasiarch at the Hephaestia, was sent as architeorus to the Isthmian and Olympic games, and was at last even entrusted with the office of keeper of the sacred treasury. But these distinctions appear to have excited the envy and hatred of his former enemies; for in the year B.C. 399, Callias, supported by Cephisius, Agyrrhis, Meletus, and Epichares, urged the necessity of preventing Andocides from attending the assembly, as he had never been formally freed from the civil disfranchisement. But as Callias had but little hope in this case, he brought against him the charge of having profaned the mysteries and violated the laws respecting the temple at Eleusis. (De Myst. § 110, &c.) The orator pleaded his case in the oration still extant, "on the Mysteries" (τὰς μουσικὰς ἑρμοφραγμον καταναλωσις), and was acquitted. After this attempt to crush him, he again enjoyed peace and occupied his former position in the republic for upwards of six years, at the end of which, in B.C. 394, he was sent as ambassador to Sparta respecting the peace to be concluded in consequence of Conon's victory over Cnidas. On his return he was accused of illegal conduct during his embassy (συνεργοευθυνον). The speech "On the peace with Lacedaemon" (περὶ τοῦ συμμαχουτος εὐφρατον), which is still extant, refers to this affair. It was spoken in B.C. 393. (Clinton places it in 391.) Andocides was found guilty, and sent into exile for the fourth time. He never returned afterwards, and seems to have died soon after this blow. Andocides appears to have left no issue, since at the age of seventy he had no children (De Myst. §§ 146, 148), though the scholiast on Aristophanes (Vesp. 1262) mentions Antiphon as a son of Andocides. This was probably owing to his wandering and unsteady life, as well as to his dissolute character. (De Myst. § 140.) The large fortune which he had inherited from his father, or acquired in his commercial undertakings, was greatly diminished in the latter years of his life. (De Myst. § 144; Lys. c. Andoc. § 81.) Andocides has no claims to the esteem of posterity, either as a man or as a citizen. Besides the three orations already mentioned, which are undoubtedly genuine, there is a fourth against Alcibiades (κατὰ Ἀλκηθείδαν), said to have been delivered by Andocides in B.C. 415; but it is in all probability spurious, though it appears to contain genuine historical matter.
ANDRAGATHUS.

Taylor ascribed it to Phaenax, while others think it more probable that it is the work of some of the later rhetoricians, with whom the accusation or defence of Alcibiades was a standing theme. Besides these four orations we possess only a few fragments and some very vague allusions to other orations. (Sluiter, Lect. Aud. p. 239, &c.) As an orator Andocides does not appear to have been held in very high esteem by the ancients, as he is seldom mentioned, though Valerius Theron is said to have written a commentary on his orations. (Suidas, s. v. Theon.) We do not hear of his having been trained in any of the sophistical schools of the time, and he had probably developed his talents in the practical school of the popular assembly. Hence his orations have no mannerism in them, and are really, as Plutarch says, simple and free from all rhetorical pomp and ornament. (Comp. Dionys. Hal. de Lys. 2, de Thucyd. Juct. 51.) Sometimes, however, his style is diffuse, and becomes tedious and obscure. The best among the orations is that on the Mysteries; but, for the history of the time, all are of the highest importance. The orations are printed in the collections of the Greek orators by Aldus, H. Stephens, Reiske, Bekker, and others. The best separate editions are those of Sauppe, Zurich, 1833. The most important works on the life and orations of Andocides are: J. O. Sluiter, Lectiones Andocidae, Leyden, 1804, pp. 1-99, reprinted at Leipzig, 1834, with notes by C. Schiller; a treatise of A. G. Becker prefixed to his German translation of Andocides, Quedlinburg, 1832, Bvo.; Ruhnken, Hist. Crit. Oult. Graec. pp. 47-57; Westermann, Gesch. der Griech. Beredsamkeit, §§ 42 and 43. [L. S.]

ANDRAEMON (Ἀνδραμέων). 1. The husband of Gorgo, the daughter of the Calydonian king Oeneus, and father of Thoas. When Diosmedes delivered Oeneus, who had been imprisoned by the sons of Agrius, he gave the kingdom to Andraemon, since Oeneus was already too old. (Apollod. l. o. §§ 6 and 7; Hom. III. ii. 639; Paus. v. 8. § 5.) Antoninus Libanians (37) represents Oeneus as reigning over his kingdom after his liberation. The tomb of Andraemon, together with that of his wife Gorgo, was seen at Amphissa in the time of Pausanias. (x. 33. § 3.) Apollodorus (ii. 8. § 3) tells Oxylos a son of Andraemon, which might seem to allude to a different Andraemon from the one we are here speaking of; but there is evidently some mistake here; for Pausanias (i. 4. and Strabo (x. p. 463, &c.) speak of Oxylos as the son of Haemon, who was a son of that Thoas, so that the Oxylos in Apollodorus must be a great-grandson of Andraemon. Hence Heyne proposes to read Atheneus instead of Andraemon. 2. A son of the Oxylos mentioned above, and of Dryocele, who was mother of Amphissus by Apollo. (Ov. Met. ix. 363; Anton. Lib. 32.) There are two other mythical personages of this name, the one a son of Codrus (Paus. vii. 3. § 3), and the other a Pylian, and founder of Colophon. (Strab. xiv. p. 633.) [L. S.]

ANDREAEMONIDES (Ἀνδραεμώνιδης), a patronymic from Andraemon, frequently given to his son Thoas. (Hom. II. ii. 636, vii. 168, &c.) [L. S.]

ANDRAGATHUS (Ἀνδραγάθος) was left by Demetrius in command of Amphipolis, b. c. 287, but treacherously surrendered it to Lysimachus. (Polyen. iv. 12. § 2.)

ANDREAS.

ANDRANODO'RUS, the son-in-law of Hiero, was appointed guardian of Hieronymus, the grandson of Hiero, after the death of the latter. He advised Hieronymus to break off the alliance with the Romans, and connect himself with Hannibal. After the assassination of Hieronymus, Andranodorus seized upon the island and the citadel with the intention of usurping the royal power; but finding difficulties in the way, he judged it more prudent to surrender them to the Syracusans, and was elected in consequence one of their generals. But the suspicions of the people becoming excited against him, he was killed shortly afterwards, b. c. 214. (Liv. xxiv. 4—7, 21—25.)

ANDREAS (Ανδρέας), of uncertain date, wrote a work on the cities of Sicily, of which the thirty-third book is referred to by Athenaeus. (xiv. p. 634, a.)

ANDREAS (Ἀνδρέας), of Argos, a sculptor, whose time is not known. He made a statue of Lysippus, the Elean, victor in the boys' wrestling. (Paus. vi. 16. § 5.) [P. S.]

ANDREAS (Ἀνδρέας), the name of several Greek physicians, whom it is difficult to distinguish from each other. The Andreas Comes, quoted several times by Aetius (which title means Comes Medicus, Doctor Medicus), was certainly the latest, and probably lived shortly before Aetius himself (that is, in the fourth or fifth century after Christ), as the title was only introduced under the Roman emperors. (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Architec.) If, for want of any positive data, all the other passages where the name Andreas occurs be supposed to refer to the same person (which may possibly be the case), he was a native of Carystus in Euboea (Cassius Intros. Problem. Phys. § 58), the son of Chrysar or Chrysoar (ο δ' ἀνδρέας Χρυσαρος ή Χρυσαρος), if the name be not corrupt (Galen, Excerpt. Vocum Hippocr. s. v. Βρευκος, vol. xix. p. 105), and one of the followers of Herophilus (Cels. De Medie. v. Praef. p. 81; Soran. De Arte Osteot. c. 48. p. 101.) He was physician to Polycrates Philetator, king of Egypt, and was killed in the battle of Raphia (b. c. 217), by the Macedonian commander, the son of Theodotus the Aeolid, who had secretly entered the tent with the intent to murder the king. (Polyb. v. 31.) He wrote several medical works, of which nothing remains but the titles, and a few extracts preserved by different ancient authors. He was probably the first person who wrote a treatise on hydrophobia, which he called Kαιδιωνος. (Cael. Aurel. De Mort. Aug. iii. 9, p. 218.) If one of his works Περὶ τῆς Ταρατρῆς Γενεαλογία On Medical Genealogy, he is said by Sosibius, in his life of Hippocrates (Hippocr. Opera, vol. i. p. 551), to have given a false and scandalous account of that great physician, saying that he had been obliged to leave his native country on account of his having set fire to the library at Chios; story which, though universally considered to be totally unfounded, was repeated with some variations by Varro (in Pliny, H. N. xxix. 2) or John Tzetzes (Chil. vii. Hist. 155, in Fabric. Biblioth. Graec. vol. xii. p. 681, ed. opt., and was much embellished in the middle ages. (See Hist. of the Seven Wise Masters, in Ellis's Specimens Early English Metrical Romances, vol. ii. p. 4.) Eratosthenes is said to have accused Andreas plagiarism, and to have called him Bibliographos οι Ανδρέας ου Ανδρέας of Books. (Elyma-ANDREUS.

[ W. A. G.]

ANDREAS, bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia, probably about 500 A. D., wrote a Commentary on the Apocalypse, which is printed in the principal editions of Chrysostom's works. He also wrote a work entitled "Theaumata Spiritualis," fragments of which are extant in the "Eclogae Vaticanae" of John, patriarch of Antioch. (Nessel. Jut. Vindobl. Pl. i., cod. 276, No. 1. p. 381.)

[ P. S.]

ANDREAS, archbishop of Crete, was a native of Damascus. He was first a monk at Jerusalem, whence he is called in some ancient writings "of Jerusalem" ("Ιερουσαλημων"), then deacon at Constantinople, and lastly archbishop of Crete. His time is rather doubtful, but Cave as shown that he probably flourished as early as 595. (Hist. Ed. sub anno 680) In 680 he was sent by Theodorus, the patriarch of Jerusalem, to act 60th council of Constantinople, against the Monotheletists, where he was ordained a deacon, one of whom was still extant in which he thanks the keepers of the documents, for communicatit to him the acts of the synod. It seems to have been soon after this council that he was made bishop of Crete. A doubtful tradition relates that he died on the 14th of June, 724. (Fabric. Hist, de la Méd.; Isenese, Bibliothe. Bullion, Chirurg. ed Mai; Vindobl. em. vol. xiii. p. 590, &c., ed. Wess.; Polyb. xxxiv. 19. Pat. Val. ed. Mai; Flor. ii. 14; Velluti. i. 11; Paus. viii. 13 § 1.)

[ P. S.]

2. A writer of uncertain date, the author of a work upon Naxos. (Athen. iii. p. 78 c.; Parthen. c. 9, 19.)

ANDRO. [Andron.] ANDROBIUS, a painter, whose time and country are unknown. He painted Scyllis, the diver, cutting away the anchors of the Persian fleet. (Plin. xxxiv. 40. § 32.)

ANDROBULUS, a sculptor, celebrated as a maker of statues of philosophers. (Plin. xxxiv. 19. § 26.)

ANDROCLEIDES (Ἀνδροκληδης), a Thelian, who was bribed by Timocrates, the emissary of Tissaphernes in n. c. 395, in order to induce the Thebans to make war upon the Spartans, and that bring back Agesilas from Asia. (Xen. Hell. ii. 5 § 1; Plut. Lys. 27; Paus. iii. 9 § 4.) An androcleides is mentioned in n. c. 382 as one of the leaders of the party opposed to Phoebidas, who had seized the citadel. (Xen. Hell. v. 2. § 31.)

ANDROCLICUS (Ἀνδροκλῆς), an Athenian demagogue and orator. He was a contemporary and enemy of Alcibiades, against whom he brought forward witnesses, and spoke very vehemently in the affair concerning the mutilation of the Herm, n. c. 415. (Plut. Alcib. 19; Andoed. de Myst. § 27.) It was chiefly owing to his exertions that Alcibiades was punished. After this event, Androcles was for a time at the head of the democratic party; but during the revolution of n. c. 411, in which the democracy was overthrown, and the oligarchical government of the Four Hundred was established, Androcles was put to death. (Thuc. viii. 65.) Aristotle (Rhet. ii. 23) has preserved a sentence from one of Androcles' speeches, in which he used an incorrect figure.

ANDROCLES, the slave of a Roman consul of whom the following story is related by Aulus Gallius (v. 14) on the authority of Appian Phistiones, who lived in the reigns of Tiberius and Caligula, and who affirmed that he himself had been a witness of the scene. Androclus was sentenced to be exposed to the wild beasts in the circus; but a lion which was set loose upon him, instead of springing upon his victim, exhibited signs of recognition, and began licking him. Upon inquiry it appeared that Androclus had been compelled by the severity of his master, while in Africa, to run away from him. Having one day taken refuge in a cave from the heat of the sun, a lion entered, apparently in great pain, and seeing him, went up to him and held out his paw. An-dreaded found that a large thorn had pierced it, which he drew out, and the lion was soon able to use his paw again. They lived together for some time in the cave, the bear catering for his benefactor. But at last, tired of this strange life, Androcles left the cave, was apprehended by some soldiers, brought to Rome, and condemned to the wild beasts. He was pardoned, and presented with the lion, which he used to lead about the city. (C.P.M.)

ANDROCYDES (Ἀνδροκύδης), of Cyzicus, a Greek painter, a contemporary and rival of Zeuxis, flourished from 400 to 377 B.C. (Plin. xxxvi. 36. § 3.) He painted, partly on the spot and partly in Thebes, a skimish of horse which took place near Plataea shortly before the battle of Leuctra (Plut. Pelo. 25), and a picture of Scylla surrounded by fishes. The latter picture was much praised for the beauty of the fishes, on which the artist was supposed to have bestowed the more pains, on account of his being fond of fish. (Pliny. Quast. Conv. iv. 4. § 2; Polec. op. Athen. viii. p. 341. a.)

ANDROCYDES (Ἀνδροκύδης), a Greek physician, who lived in the reign of Alexander the Great, B.C. 336—323. There is a story told of him by Pliny (H. N. xiv. 7), that he wrote a letter to that prince cautioning him against the immoderate use of wine, which he called "the blood of the earth." It is mentioned also by the same author (xiv. 37. § 10), that he ordered his patients to cat a radish as a preservative against intoxication, from having observed (it is said) that the wine always turned away from a radish if growing near it. It is very possible that this Androcles may be the same person who is mentioned by Theopomnus (Hist. Plant. iv. 10 [al. 20] 20), and also by Athenaeus (vi. p. 250. b.) [W. A. G.]

ANDROETAS (Ἀνδρόητας), of Tenedos, the author of a Περί Τενοίδων της Περιστερίως (Schol. ad Apoll. Rhod. ii. 159.)

ANDROGEUS (Ἀνδρόγειος), a son of Minos and Pasiphaë, or Crete, who is said to have conquered all his opponents in the games of the Panathenaeans at Athens. This extraordinary good luck, however, became the cause of his destruction, though the mode of his death is related differently. According to some accounts Aegens sent the man he dreaded to fight against the Marathonian bull, who killed him; according to others, he was assassinated by his defeated rivals on his road to Thebes, whether he was going to take part in a solemn contest. (Apollod. iii. 1. § 2, 15. § 7; Paus. i. 27. § 8.) According to Diodorus (iv. 60) it was Androcles himself who had him murdered near Oenoe, on the road to Thebes, because he feared lest Androcles should support the sons of Pallas against him. Hyginus (Fab. 41) makes him fall in a battle during the war of his father Minos against the Athenians. (See some different accounts in Plut. Thes. 15; Serv. ad Aen. vi. 14.) But the common tradition is, that Minos made war on the Athenians in consequence of the death of his son. Propertius (iii. 1. 64) relates that Androclus was restored to life by Asclepius. He was worshiped in Attica as a hero, an altar was erected to him in the port of Phalerus (Paus. i. 1. § 8), and games, ἄποραγόντα, were celebrated in his honour every year in the Ceramicus. (Dict. of Ant. a. c. ἄποραγόντα.) He was also worshiped under the name Ephyrogramos, i.e. he who ploughs or possesses extensive fields, whence it has been inferred that originally Androcles was worshipped as the intercessor of agriculture into Attica. [L.S.]

ANDROMACHE (Ἀνδρόμαχη), a daughter of Eteon, king of the Cilician Thebans, and one of the noblest and most amiable characters in the Iliad. Her father and her seven brothers were slain by Achilles at the taking of Thebes, and her mother, who had purchased her freedom by a large ransom, was killed by Artemis. She was married to Hector, by whom she had a son, Scamandrios (Astyanax), and for whom she entertained the most tender love. (Apollod. iii. 11. § 6.) See the beautiful passage in Homer, Η. vi. 390—502 where she takes leave of Hector when he is going to battle, and her lamentations about his fall, xxii. 460, &c.; xxiv. 723, &c. On the taking of Troy her son was hurt from the wall of the city, and she herself fell to the share of Neoptolemus (Pyrrhus), the son of Achilles, who took her to Epeirus, and to whom she bore three sons, Molossus, Pielus, and Pergamus. Here she was four times a heroum was erected to her memory. (Paus. i. 11. § 9; comp. Dictys Cret. vi. 7, &c.; Eur. Andromache.) Andromache and her son Scamandros were painted in the Leosth at Delphi I. Polygnotus. (Paus. x. 25, in fin.) [L.S.]

ANDROMACHUS (Ἀνδρόμαχος). 1. Commander of the Eleans in B.C. 364, was defeated by the Arcadians and killed himself in consequence (Xen. Hell. vii. 4. § 19.)

2. Ruler of Tauromenium in the middle of the fourth century B.C., and the father of the historic Timaeus, is said to have been by far the best of the rulers of Sicily at that time. He assisted Timoleon in his expedition against Dionysius, B.C. 344. (Diod. xvi. 7, 68; Plut. Timol. 10.) Reporting the statement of Diodorus that he found Tauromenium, see Wesseling, ad Diod. xiv. 59.

3. The commander of the Cyriacks fleet at the siege of Syracuse by Dionysius (Ann. i. 30.) He may have been the same Andromaches who was shortly afterwards appointed governor Celeo-Syria, and was burnt to death by the Samarians. (Curt. iv. 5, 8.)

4. The father of Achaeus [see p. 8, a], and t brother of Ladice, who married Seleucus Callius, was detained as a prisoner by Ptolemy Alexemys, but was liberated about B.C. 320. The intercession of the Rhodians. (Polyb. iv. 18. 22.)

5. Of Aspendus, one of Ptolemy Philopato commanders at the battle of Raphia, in whi Antiochus the Great was defeated, B.C. 2. After the battle Ptolemy left Andromachus command of Celeo-Syria and Phoenicia. (Polyb. vi. 64, 93, 85, 87.)
ANDROMEDA.

6. An ambassador of Ptolemy Philometor, sent to Rome c. 154. (Polyb. xxxii. 5.)

8. A Greek rhetorician, who taught at Nicomedia in the reign of Domitian. (Eudoc. p. 58; uid. s. v. Zeph.)

ANDROMACHUS (Ἀνδρομάχος). 1. Commonly called "the Elder," to distinguish him from his son of the same name, was born in Crete, and was physician to Nero, A.D. 54—68. He is principally a diplomatist. He is referred (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Architect), and also having been the inventor of a very famous compound medicine and antidote, which was called for his name "Theriac Andromachi," which enjoyed a great reputation, and which retains its place in some foreign Pharmacopoeias to the present day. (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Theriac.)

Andromachus has left us the directions for making its strange mixture in a Greek elegiac poem, consisting of one hundred and seventy-four lines, and dedicated to Nero. Galen has inserted it entire (De Antid. i. 6, and De Ther. 1 Pis. c. 6. vol. xiv. pp. 32—42), and says, that Andromachus chose this form for his receipt as being more easily remembered than prose, and less likely to be altered. The poem has been published in a separate form by Franc. Ideber (Blib. Gr. 8vo. 1841), in an anaglyph still extant.

3. A Greek rhetorician, who taught at Nicomedia in the reign of Domitian. (Eudoc. p. 58; uid. s. v. Zeph.)

ANDRONICUS (Ἀνδρονίκος). 1. Of Alexandria, whose work entitled Κοινεία is referred to by Atheneus. (iv. p. 184, b.)

2. Of Ephesus, who wrote a work on the Seven Sages of Greece, which seems to have been entitled Τηκτονόμος. (Diog. Laert. i. 30, 119; Schol. ad Pind. Isch. ii. 17; Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 532, b.; Suid. and Phot. s. v. Σαλονδράνθος.)

3. A Greek physician, who is supposed by Plutarch (Thea. c. 25) in conjunction with Helenicus. (Comp. Tactae, ad Lycochr. 694, 1283; Schol. ad Asch. Pers. 182.)

ANDRONICUS, a sculptor, whose age and country are unknown, made a statue of Harmonia, the daughter of Mars and Venus. (Tatian, Orat. in Graec. 55, p. 110, Worsh.)

ANDRONIKUS (Ἀνδρόνικος), a fellowship of the Seven Sages of Greece, which seems to have been the subject of dramas, and which are now lost. The story of which is preserved in several different passages of the ancients in the neighbourhood of Iope in Phocis, where others assign to it a place of the same name in Aetolia. The tragic poets often made the story of Andromeda the subject of dramas, which are now lost. The moment in which she is removed from the rock by Perseus is represented in an amphiglyph still extant. (Les plus beaux Monuments de Rome, No. 63.)

ANDRONICUS.

Andronicus was succeeded by Alexius II., whom Andronicus put to death in the month of October 1183, and thereupon he ascended the throne. [ALEXIS II.] Agnes or Anna, the widow of Alexis, and daughter of Louis VII. king of France, a child of eleven years, was compelled to marry Andronicus, who was then advanced in years. His reign was short. He was hated by the nobles numbers of whom he put to death, but was beloved by the people. His administration was wise; and he remedied several abuses in civil and ecclesias tical matters. William II., the Good, king of Sicily, whom the fugitive Greek nobles had per suaded to invade Greece, was compelled by Andronicus to desist from his attack on Constanti tople and to withdraw to his country, after he had destroyed Thessalonica. Thus Andronicus though tinguished quite sure on the throne, when the im pudence of his lieutenant, the superstition

description, as to appear more like a romance than a

1183, and thereupon he ascended the throne. [ALEXIS II.]

some woman without knowing that they were rivals, and by an unhappy mistake Manuel was slain by the hand of his brother. Their father, Michael, died of grief, and the emperor, exasperated against his grandson, showed some intention to exclude him from the throne. Thus a dreadful civil war, or rather three wars, arose between the emperor and his grandson, which lasted from 1321 till 1328, when at last the emperor was obliged to abdicate in favour of the latter. ANDRONICUS CYRRIHSTES (so called from his native place, Cyril), was the builder of the octagonal tower at Athens, vulgarly called the tower of the winds,” Vitruvius (i. 6. § 4), after stating, that some make the number of the winds to be four, but that those who have examined the subject more carefully distinguished eight, adds, “Especially Andronicus Cyrrestes, he also set up at Athens, as a representation of the winds (metem), an octagonal tower of marble, and on the several sides of the octagon he made sculptured images of the several winds, each image skilfully towards the wind it represented,” (that the figure of the north wind was sculptured on the north-west, have distyle porticoes of the Corinthian style of the sculpture and architecture is thought attested beyond all doubt. He was twice married, first to Agnes or Irene, daughter of Henry, duke of Brunswick, and after her death to Anna, countess of Savoy, by whom he had two sons, John and Emanuel. At his death, in 1341, he left them under the guardianship of John Cantacuzenus, who soon became to reign in his own name. Besides his dramas, Livius Andronicus wrote, and the 3000 craters in the Equus Trojanus

The date of the building is uncertain, but the style of the sculpture and architecture is thought to belong to the period after Alexander the Great. The clepsydra also was probably of that improved kind which was invented by Ctesibius, about 135 n. c. (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Horologium.) Müller places Andronicus at 100 B. c. (Attika, in Erch and Gruber’s Encyclop. vi. p. 238.)

From the words of Vitruvius it seems probable that Andronicus was an astronomer. The mechanical arrangements of his horological works of course his work, but whether he was properly the architect of the building we have nothing to determine, except the absence of any statement to the contrary.

ANDRONICUS, LIVIUS, the earliest Roman poet, as far as poetical literature is concerned; for whatever popular poetry there may have existed at Rome, its poetical literature begins with this writer. (Quintil. x. 2. § 7.) He was a Greek and probably a native of Tarentum, and was made prisoner by the Romans during their wars in southern Italy. He then became the slave of M. Livius Salinator, perhaps the same who was consul in b.c. 219, and again in b.c. 207. Andronicus instructed the children of his master, but was afterward restored to freedom, and received from his patron the Roman name of Livius. (Eurum. in Basch, Chron. ad Oct. 146.) During his stay at Rome, Andronicus made himself a perfect master of the Latin language, and appears to have exerted himself chiefly in creating a taste for regular dramatic representations. His first drama was acted in b.c. 240, in the consulsip of C. Claudius and M. Tudianus (Cie. Brut. 18, comp. Tusc. Quaest. 1. 1, de Senect. 14; Liv. vii. 2; Gellius, xvii. 21); but whether it was a tragedy or a comedy is uncertain.

That he wrote comedies as well as tragedies, is certain, but whether it was a tragedy or a comedy is uncertain. (Diomedes, iii. p. 486; Flavius Vopisc. Numericus, 13; the author of the work de Commed. et Trag.) The number of his dramas was considerable, and we still possess the titles and fragments of at least fourteen. The subjects of them were all Greek, and they were little more than translations or imitations of Greek dramas. (Suet. de Iulia. Grammar. 1; Diomed. l. c.) Andronicus is said to have died in b.c. 221, and cannot have lived beyond b. c. 214. (Osann, AnaL Civ. p. 28.) As to the poetical merit of these compositions we are unable to form an accurate idea, since the extant fragments are few and short. The language in them appears yet in a rude and undeveloped form, but it has nevertheless a solid basis for further development. Cicero (Brut. 18) says, that in his time they were no longer worth reading, and that the 600 miles in the Clytemnestra and the 3000 craters in the Equus Trojanus could not afford any pleasure upon the stage. (ad Fam. vil. 1.) In the time of Horace, the poems of Andronicus were read and explained in schools; and Horace, although not an admirer of early Roman poetry, says, that he should not like to see the works of Andronicus destroyed. (Hor. Epist. ii. 1. 69.)

Besides his dramas, Livius Andronicus wrote:
ANDRONICUS.

I. A Latin Odyssey in the Saturnian verse (Cic. Brut. 10), but it is uncertain whether the poem was an imitation or a mere translation of the Homeric poems. 2. Hymns (Liv. xxvii. 27; Fest. p. 20; Plut. de Scil.).

The fragments of Livius Andronicus are contained in the collections of the fragments of the Roman dramatists mentioned under Accius. The fragments of the Odyssean Latina are collected in H. Dünzter et L. Lehrs, de Versu quem vocant Saturnino, pp. 40-48; all the fragments are contained in Dünzter's Livii Andronici Fragmenta collecta et illustrata, &c. Berlin, 1836, 8vo. ; comp. Ossian, Analecta Critica, c. 1. [L. S.]

ANDRONICUS (Ἀνδρόνικος), a Macedonian, is first mentioned in the war against Antiochus, b.c. 190, as the governor of Ephesus. (Liv. xxvii. 18.) He is spoken of in b.c. 169 as one of the generals of Perseus, king of Macedonia, and was sent by him to burn the dock-yards at Thessalonica, which he delayed doing, wishing to gratify the Romans, according to Diodorus, or thinking that the king would repent of his purpose, as Livy states. He was shortly afterwards put to death by Perseus. (Liv. xiv. 10; Diod. Sec. p. 579; Wess.; Appian, de Rob. Mac. 14.)

ANDRONICUS (Ἀνδρόνικος), of Olynthus, who is probably the same as the son of Ag Merrus mentioned by Arrian (Anab. iii. 23), was one of the four generals appointed by Antigonus to form the military council of the young Demetrius, in b.c. 314. He commanded the right wing of Demetrius' army at the battle of Gaza in 312, and after the loss of the battle, and the subsequent retreat of Demetrius, was left in command of Tyre. He refused to surrender the city to Ptolemy, who, however, obtained possession of it, but spared the life of Andronicus, who fell into his hands. (Diod. xix. 69, 86.)

ANDRONICUS (Ἀνδρόνικος), a Greek physician, mentioned by Galen (De Compos. Medicam. sec. Locos. vili. v. 114) and Theodorus Prisicnus (Rer. Medica. i. 18, ii. 1, 6, pp. 18, 37, ed. Argent.), who must therefore have lived some time before the second century after Christ. No other particulars are known respecting him; but it may be remarked, that the Andronicus quoted several times by Galen with the epithet Peripateticus or Rhodius, is probably quite another person. He is called by Iraquellus (De Nobilitate. c. 31), and after him by Fabricius (Hist. Gr. vili. p. 62, ed. vet.), a Rhodian of Rhodes, but this is incorrect. Andronicus and Titianus appear to have been two different persons. [W. A. G.]

ANDRONICUS (Ἀνδρόνικος), a Greek poet and contemporary of the emperor Constantius, about a. d. 360. Libanius (Epist. 75; comp. De Vita Sua. p. 68) says, that the sweetness of his poetry gained him the favour of all the towns (probably of Egypt) as far as the Ethiopians, but that the full development of his talents was checked by the death of his mother and the misfortune of his native town (Hermopolis). If he is the same as the Andronicus mentioned by Photius (Cod. 279, p. 536, a. Bekk.) as the author of dramas and various other poems, he was a native of Hermopolis in Egypt, of which town he was decurio. Themistius (Orat. xxix. p. 418, &c.), who speaks of a young poet in Egypt as the author of a tragedy, epic poems, and dithyrambs, appears likewise to allude to Andronicus. In a. d. 359, Andronicus, with several other poets, took part in a contest in Egypt, incurred the suspicion of indulging in pagan practices. He was tried by Paulus, whom the emperor had despatched for the purpose, but he was found innocent and acquitted. (Ammian. Marcellin. xix. 12.) No fragments of his works are extant, with the exception of an epigram in the Greek Anthology. (vii. 181.) [L. S.]

ANDRONICUS (Ἀνδρόνικος), of Rhodes, a Peripatetic philosopher, who is reckoned as the tenth of Aristotle's successors, was at the head of the Peripatetic school at Rome, about n. c. 68, and was the teacher of Boethus of Sidon, with whom Strabo studied. (Strab. iv. pp. 633, 757; Ammon. in Aristot. Catag. p. 8, a, ed. Ald.) We know little more of the life of Andronicus, but he is of special interest in the history of philosophy, from the statement of Plotinus (Sull. c. 26), that he published a new edition of the works of Aristotle and Theophrastus, which formerly belonged to the library of Apollion, and were brought to Rome by Sulla with the rest of Apollion's library in n. c. 84 Tyrrannio commenced this task, but apparently did not do much towards it. (Comp. Porphyry. Vit. Phil. c. 24; Boethius, de Aristol. de Intercrpet. p. 292 ed. Basil. 1870.) The arrangement which Andronicus made of Aristotle's writings seems to be that which forms the basis of our present editions and we are probably indebted to him for the preservation of a large number of Aristotle's works.

Andronicus wrote a work upon Aristotle, fifth book of which contained a complete list of philosophical writings, and he also wrote commentaries upon the Physics, Ethics, and Categories. None of these works is extant, for the paraphrase of the Nicomachean Ethics, which is ascribed to Andronicus of Rhodes, was written by some one else, and may have been the work of Andronicus Callistus of Thessalonica, who was professor at Rome, Bologna, Florence, and Paris, in the latter half of the fifteenth century. Andronicus Callistus was the author of the work Πεπληγων, which also ascribed to Andronicus of Rhodes. The Πεπληγων was first published by Höschel, Aug. Vi del. 1594, and the Paraphrase by Heinsius, as anonymous work, Lugd. Bat. 1607, and afterward by Heinsius as the work of Andronicus of Rhod. Lug. Bat. 1617, with the Πεπληγων attached it. The two works were printed at Cantab. 167; and Oxon. 1699. (Stahr. Aristotelis, ii. p. 129.)

ANDRONIDAS (Ἀνδρόνιδας), was with C indicates the place of the Homeric Achaeans. In n. c. 146, he was sent by Metel to Dicaeus, the commander of the Achaeans, offer peace; but the peace was rejected, and Andronidus seized by Dicaeus, who however released him upon the payment of a talent. (Polyb. xxix. 20, xii. 4, 5.)

ANDROSTHENES (Ἀνδρόσθηνες). 1. Thusas, one of Alexander's admirals, sailed to Nearchus, and was also sent by Alexander to explore the coast of the Persian gulf. (Strab. p. 766; Arrian, Anab. vii. 20.) He wrote account of this voyage, and also a Τὰς ἀγάπης τῶν τιμωρομένων. (Athen. iii. p. 59, b.) Compare Nécan. Hecat. p. 63, Huid. Theophr. de Caus. Pl. ii. 5; Vossius, de Histor. Graeca. p. 98, ed. Wessmann.
2. Of Cysicus, left by Antiochus the Great in India, to convey the treasures promised him by the Indian king Sophaganesus. (Polyb. xi. 31.)

3. Of Corinth, who defended Corinth against the Romans in B.C. 198, and was defeated in the following year by the Achaenians. (Liv. xxxiii. 23; xxxiii. 14, 15.)

4. Of Theseas, called by Caesar the praetor of the country (by which he means merely the military commander), shut the gates of Gomphi against Caesar in B.C. 48, in consequence of the defeat at Dyrroschemium. (Ces. B. C. iii. 80.)

ANDROSTHENES (Ἀνδρόσθηνος), an Athenian sculptor, the disciple of Eucnades, completed the statue of Theseus, or the roof of the temple of Apollo at Delphi, which had been left unfinished by Praxias. (Paus. x. 19. § 3.) The time when he lived is not exactly known; it was probably about 440 B.C. (ad Demosth. c. 116, p. 594) states, that he was one of the leading demagogues of his time. He seems to have been a particularly skilful and elegant speaker.

ANDROTION (Ἀνδρότιον), a son of Andron, a pupil of Isocrates, and hestor, was a son of Andron, a surname of Athena under which she was worshipped and had a temple at Mochome in Messenia. It was believed to have been built by Diomedes, because in consequence of his prayers the goddess had subdued the storms which did injury to the country. (Paus. iv. 35. § 5.)

ANELESTUS (Ἀνέλεστος), the son of Sperthias, a Laconian ambassador, who was sent at the beginning of the Peloponnesian war, B.C. 430, to solicit the aid of the king of Persia. He was surrounded by the Athenians, together with the other ambassadors who accompanied him, by Sadocus, son of Sitalces, king of Thrace, taken to Athens, and there put to death. (Herod. vii. 137; Thuc. ii. 67.)

ANEROESTES, or ANEROESTES (Ἀνέροιςτος, Ἀνέροιςτης), king of the Gausati, a Gallic people between the Alps and the Rhone, who was induced by the Boii and the Insubres to make war upon the Romans. He accordingly invaded Italy in B.C. 225, defeated the Romans near Faesulae, but in his return home was intercepted by the consul C. Atius, who had come from Corsica. A battle ensued near PIsae, in which the Gauls were defeated with immense slaughter, but Atius was killed. Anerostes, in despair, put an end to his own life. (Polyb. ii. 22, 26, &c., 31; comp. Emp. Orig. i. 5; Oros. iv. 3; Zonaras, viii. 20.)

ANESIDORA (Ἀνεσίδωρα), a spender of gifts, a surname given to Gaea and to Remoter indici, a Lacedaemonian ambassador, who was sent to Rome and the Insubres to solicit the aid of Persia. He accordingly invaded Italy in B.C. 225, defeated the Romans near Faesulae, but in his return home was intercepted by the consul C. Atius, who had come from Corsica. A battle ensued near PIsae, in which the Gauls were defeated with immense slaughter, but Atius was killed. Anerostes, in despair, put an end to his own life. (Polyb. ii. 22, 26, &c., 31; comp. Emp. Orig. i. 5; Oros. iv. 3; Zonaras, viii. 20.)

ANGERONA (Angrona), a Roman divinity, of whom it is difficult to form a distinct idea, on account of the contradictory statements about her. According to one class of passages she is the goddess of anguish and fear, that is, the goddess who exercises a irresistible pressure upon the mind of a man, and also relieves men from it (Verrius Flaccus, ap. Macrobr. Sat. i. 10.) Her statue stood in the temple of Volupia, near the porta Romana, close by the Forum, and she was represented with her mouth bound and sealed up (as obligatio et signatum, Macrobr. l.e.; Plin. H. N. iii. 9), which according to Massius Sabinus (ap. Macrobr. l.c.) indicated that those who concealed their anxiety in patience would by this means attain the greatest happiness. Hartung (Die Relig. d. Altert. ii. p. 247) interprets this as a symbolical suppression of cries of anguish, because such cries were always unlucky omens. He also thinks that the statute of the goddess of anguish was placed in the temple of the goddess of delight, to indicate that the latter did exercise her influence upon the former, and change sorrow into joy. Julius Modestus (ap. Macrobr. l.c.) and Festus (s. v. Angerona major) give an historical origin to the worship of this divinity, for they say, that at one time men and beasts were visited by a disease called angina, which disappeared as soon as sacrifices were vowed to Angeron. (Comp. Orelli, Inscrip. p. 87. No. 116.)
Other accounts state that Angerona was the goddess of silence, and that her worship was introduced at Rome to prevent the secret and sacred name of Rome being made known, or that Angerona was herself the protecting divinity of Rome, who by laying her finger on her mouth enjoined men not to divulge the secret name of Rome. (Plin. L. s.; Macrobr. Sat. iii. 9.) A festival, Angerona, was celebrated at Rome in honour of Angerona, every year on the 12th of December, on which day the pontiffs offered sacrifices to her in the temple of Volupia, and in the curia Acculem. (Varro de Ling. Lat. vi. 23; Plin. and Macrobr. u.c.)

ANGITTA or ANQUITTA, a goddess worshipped by the Marsians and Marabrians, who lived about the shores of the lake Fucinus. She was believed to have been once a being who actually lived in that neighbourhood, taught the people remedies against the poison of serpents, and had derived her name from being able to kill serpents by her incantations (from antai or angaius. Serv. ad Aen. vii. 750). According to the account given by Servius, the goddess was of Greek origin, for Angitia, says he, was the name given by the Marabrians to Medea, who, after having left Colchis, came to Italy with Jason and taught the people the above mentioned remedies. Silius Italicus (viii. 498, &c.) identifies her completely with Medea. Her name occurs in several inscriptions (Orelli, p. 87, No. 116; p. 535, No. 1846), in one of which she is mentioned along with Angerona, and in another her name appears in the plural form. From a third inscription (Orelli, p. 87, No. 115) it seems that she had a temple and a treasury belonging to it. The Silvia Angitia between Alba and Fucinus derived its name from her. (Solin. c. 2.) [L. S.]

ANIA'NUS, the referendarius (Dufresne, Gloss. s. v.) of Alaric the second, king of the Visigoths, and employed in that capacity to authenticate with his subscription the official copies of the Breviary. (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Breviarius.) In his subscription he used the words Anicius, vir spectabilis subscripti et editi, and it is probable that, from a misunderstanding of the word editi, proceeded the common notion that he was the author of the Romano-Gothic code, which has thence been called Breviariam Aniciam. The subscription took place at Aire (Aulae) in Gascoigne, a.d. 506. (Silbernard, ad Helec. Hist. Jur. Germ. § 15.) Sigebert (de ecclcsiasticis scriptoribus, c. 70, cited by Ign. Godofroi, Prolegomena in Cod. Theodos. § 5) says, that Ananius translated from Greek into Latin the work of Chrysostom upon St. Mark, but respecting the above mentioned remedies, he gives no name. (L. S.)

ANIA'NUS (Aiones), son of Apollo by Creut. (Pavon.)

ANIA'NUS (Anianus), the legate of Paullus in the Macedonian war, b.c. 168. (Liv. xliii. 46.)

ANICIUS. 1. A freedman of Nero, who was employed by the emperor to murder Agrippina. He was subsequently induced by Nero to confess having committed adultery with Octavia, but in consequence of his conduct in this affair he was banished to Sardinia, where he died. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 3, 7, 8, 62; Dion Cass. lxxii. 13; Suet. Ner. 85.)

2. A freedman of Polemo, who espoused the party of Vitellius, and excited an insurrection against Vespasian in Pontus, a.d. 70. It was however put down in the same year, and Anicius, who had taken refuge at the mouth of the river Cobius, was surrendered by the king of the Sodouchi to the lieutenant of Vespasian, and put to death. (Tac. Hist. iii. 47, 48.)

3. A Greek grammarian, who appears to have written a glossary. (Albin. xi. p. 583, c.; comp. Alephr. i. 28, with Bergier's note.)

ANICIA GEN$, Persons of the name of Anicius are mentioned first in the beginning of the second century B. C. Their cognomen was GALLUS those whose cognomen is not mentioned are given under ANICUS.

ANICIUS. 1. CN. ANICIUS, a legate of Paullus in the Macedonian war, b. C. 168. (Liv. xliii. 46.)

2. T. ANICIUS, who said that Q. Cicero has given him a commission to purchase a place in the suburbs for him, b. C. 54. (Cic. ad Qn. Fr. iii. i. 57.)

3. C. ANICIUS, a senator and a friend of Cicero, whose villa was near that of the latter. Cicero gave him a letter of introduction to Q. Cornelinus in Africa, when Anicius was going there with the privilege of a legatus libera (Cic. ad Qn. Fr. ii. 19, ad Fam. vi. 26, 41.)

ANIGRIDES (Anirridai), the nymphs of the river Anigris in Elis. On the coast of Elis, not far from the mouth of the river, there was a grove sacred to them, which was visited by persons afflicted with cutaneous diseases. They were cured here by prayers and sacrifices to the nymphs, or by bathing in the river. (Paus. v. 5 s. 6; Strabo viii. p. 346; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 880.) L. S.

ANIUS. 1. A son of Apollo by Creus or according to others by Rhoeo, the daughter of Staphylus, who when her pregnancy began was exposed by her angry father in a cave on the waves of the sea. The chief landed Delos, and when Rhoeo was delivered of a boy's consecrated him to the service of Apollo, who dowered him with prophetic powers. (Diod. v. 6)
ANNA COMNENA.

Conon, Narrat. 41.) Anius had by Dryopis three daughters, Oeno, Spermo, and Elais, to whom Dionysia gave the power of producing at will any quantity of wine, corn, and oil—whence they were called Oenotropa. When the Greeks on their expedition to Troy landed in Delos, Anius endeavored to persuade them to stay with him for nine years, as it was decreed by fate that they should not take Troy until the tenth year, and he promised with the help of his three daughters to supply them with all they wanted during that period. (Pherecyd. ap. Tzet. ad Leogoph. 569; Ov. Met. xiii. 623, &c.; comp. Dicty Grec. i. 23.) After the fall of Troy, when Aeneas arrived in Delos, he was kindly received by Anius (Ov. a. d. Virg. Aen. iii. 80, with Servius), and a Greek tradition stated that Aeneas married a daughter of Anius, of the name of Lavinia, who was, like her father, endowed with prophetic powers, followed Aeneas to Italy, and died at Laviniun. (Dionys. Hal. i. 59; Anvil. Vict. De Orig. Gent. Rom. 9; comp. Hartung, Die Heilig. d. Rom. i. p. 67.) Two other mythical personages, one a son of Aeneas by Lavinia, and the other a king of Etruria, from whom the river Anio derived its name, occur in Serv. ad Aen. iii. 80, and Plut. Parall. 40. [L. S.]

ANNA. [Anna Perenna.]

ANNA COMNENA (Anna Kouprei), the daughter of Alexis I. Comnenus, and the empress Irene, was born in A. 1083. She was destined to marry Constantine Ducas, but he died while she was still a child; and she was subsequently married to Nicephorus Bryennius, a Greek nobleman. Her love for him was sincere and founded upon real and lasting union. She was thoroughly acquainted with Aristotle and Plato. She was very learned in every branch of science, and she tells us in the preface to her Alexias, that she was thoroughly acquainted with Aristotle and Plato. The vanity of a female philosopher was flattered with the homages she received from the Greek scholars and artists, and during a long period hers and her husband's house was the centre of the arts and sciences of Constantinople. Her love for her husband was sincere and founded upon real and lasting union. She was thoroughly acquainted with Aristotle and Plato.

ANNA PEIENNA. (Anna Perenna.)

This celebrated work is a biography of her father, the emperor Alexis I. It is divided into fifteen books. In the first nine she relates with great propriety the youth of Alexis, his exploits against the Turks, Seljuks, and the Greek rebels Asia and Epirus, his accession, and his wars against the Normans in Epirus. The tenth book is remarkably interesting, containing the relation of the transactions between Alexis and the Western princes which led to the first crusade, and the arrival of the Crusaders at Constantinople. The following three contain the relations of Alexis with the Crusaders who had then advanced into Asia, and his last contest with the Norman Boemond, then prince of Antioch, in Greece and Epirus. In the fourteenth book are related the successful wars of Alexis against the Turks after they had been weakened by the Crusaders; and in the fifteenth she gives a rather short relation of the latter part of the reign of her father. This division shows that she did not start from a historical but merely from a biographical point of view.

To write the life of a man like Alexius I. was a difficult task for his daughter, and this difficulty did not escape her sagacity. "If I praise Alexius," she says in the preface, "the world will accuse me of having paid greater attention to his glory than to truth; and whenever I shall be obliged to blame some of his actions, I shall run the risk of being accused of impious injustice." However, this self-justification is mere mockery. Anna knew very well what she would write, and far from deserving the reproach of "impious injustice," she only deserts that of "pious injustice." The Alexias is history in the form of a romance.—embellished with truth with two purposes,—that of presenting Alexius as the Mars, and his daughter as the Minerva of the Byzantines. Anna did not invent facts, but in painting her portraits she always dyes her pencil in the colour of vanity. This vanity is threefold,—personal, domestic, and national. Thus Alexius is spotless; Anna becomes an oracle; the Greeks are the first of all the nations, and the Latinns are wicked barbarians. Bohemond alone is worthy of all her praise; but it is said that she was admired by, and that she admired in her turn, the gallant prince of the Normans.

The style of the author is often affected and loaded with false erudition; unimportant details are constantly treated with as much as and even more attention than facts of high importance. These are the defects of the work, but whoever will take the trouble to discover and discard them, will find the Alexias the most interesting and one of the most valuable of the historical productions of the Byzantine literature.

The editio princeps of the Alexias was published by Hoechelins, Augsburg, 1610, 4to. This is only an abridgment containing the fifteen books reduced to eight. The next is by Possinus, with a Latin translation, Paris, 1651, fol. Du Cange has written some valuable notes to the Alexius, which are contained in the Paris edition of Cinnamus. (1670, fol.) The best edition is by Schopen (2 vols. 8vo.), with a new Latin translation, Bonn, 1839. The translation of Possinus is very bad. The work was translated into French by Cousin (le président), and a German translation is contained in the first volume of the "Historische Memoiren," edited by Fr. von Schelker (W. v. A. N. 20). ANNA PERENNA, a Roman divinity; the legends about whom are related by Ovid (Fast. iii. 523, &c.) and Virgil. (Aen. iv.) According to them she was a daughter of Belus and sister of Dido. After the death of the latter, she fled from Carthage to Italy, where she was kindly received by Aeneas. Here her jealousy of Lavinia was roused, and being warned in a dream by the spirit of Dido, she fled and threw herself into the river Numbricia. Henceforth she was worshipped as the nymph of that river under the name of Perenna, and for previously her name had simply been Anna. A second story related by Ovid states, that when the plebs had seceded to the mons nevæ and...
ANNIA GENs. were in want of food, there came from the neighbouring Bovillae an aged woman of the name of Anna, who distributed cakes among the hungry multitude, and after their return to the city the grateful people built a temple to her. A third story, likewise related by Ovid, tells us that, when Mars was in love with Minerva, and when the god took hold of her veil and wanted to kiss her, she laughed to scorn. Ovid (Fast. ii. 657, &c.) remarks that Anna Perenna was considered by some as Luna, by others as Themis, and by others again as Io, the daughter of Inachus, or as one of the nymphs who brought up the infant Jove. Now as Macrobius (Sat. i. 12) states, that at her festival, which fell on the 15th of March, and was celebrated by the Romans with great joy and merriment, the people prayed ut annotare perennare quelle commoda locut, it seems clear that Anna Perenna was originally an Italian divinity, who was regarded as the giver of life, health, and plenty, as the goddess whose powers were most manifest at the return of spring when her festival was celebrated. The identification of this goddess with Anna, the sister of Dido, is undoubtedly of late origin. (Hartung, Die Relig. d. Röms. ii. p. 229, &c.)

ANNAEUS CORNUTUS. [Cornutus.]

ANNAEUS FLORUS. [Florus.]

ANNAEUS LUCANUS. [Lucanus.]

ANNAEUS MELLA. [Mella.]

ANNAEUS SENECA. [Seneca.]

ANNAEUS STATTIUS. [Stattius.]

ANNALIS, a cognomen of the Villia gens, which was first acquired by L. Villius, tribune of the plebs, in B.C. 179, because he introduced a law fixing the year (annus) at which it was allowable for a person to be a candidate for the public offices. (Liv. xl. 44.) The other persons of this name are:

1. Sex. Villius (Annalis), a friend of Milo's (Cic. ad Fam. ii. 6), probably the same as the Sex. Annalis, of whom Quintilian speaks. (vi. 3. § 88.)

2. L. Villius Annalis, praetor in B.C. 43, was proscribed by the triumvirs, and betrayed to death by his son. He is probably the same as the L. Villius L. F. Annalis mentioned in a letter of Caesius to Cicero, B.C. 51. (ad Fam. viii. 8.) His son was killed shortly afterwards in a drunken brawl by the same soldiers who had killed his father. (Appian, B. C. iv. 17; Val. Max. ix. 11. § 6.)

M. Annæus, legate of M. Cicero during his government in Cilicia, B.C. 51. Annæus appears to have had some pecuniary dealings with the inhabitants of Sardis, and Cicero gave him a letter of introduction to the praetor Thraemus, that the latter might assist him in the matter. In Cicero's campaign against the Parthians in B.C. 50, Annæus commanded part of the Roman troops. (Cic. ad Fam. xii. 55, 57, xv. 4.)

ANNIA. 1. The wife of L. Cinna, who died B.C. 84, in his fourth consulship. She afterwards married M. Piso Calpurnianus, whom Sulla compelled to divorce her, on account of her previous connexion with his enemy Cinna. (Val. Patr. ii. 41.)

2. The wife of C. Papius Celsus, and the mother of Milo, the contemporary of Cicero. [Milo.]

ANNIA GENs, plebeian, was of considerable antiquity. The first person of this name whom Livy mentions, is the Latin prætor L. Annus of ANNICERIS, a Roman colony, (B.C. 340.) [Annus, No. 1.] The cognomens of this gens under the republic are: Aemilius, Belliienus, Cimber, Luscus, Milo. Those who have no cognomens are given under Annius.

According to Eckhel (v. p. 134), the genuine coins of the Annii have no cognomens upon them. The one figured below, which represents the head of a woman, and on the reverse Victory drawn by a quadriga, with the inscriptions C. Annus, T. F. T. N. Procos. Ex. S. C. and L. Fabi L. F. Hii(s), is supposed to refer to C. Annius, who fought against Sertorius in Spain. [Annius, No. 7.] It is imagined that L. Fabricus may have been the quaestor of Annius, but nothing is known for certain.

T. Annia'nus, a Roman poet, lived in the time of Trajan and Hadrian, and was a friend of A. Gallus, who says that he was acquainted with ancient literature. Among other things, he appears to have written few sonnena verses. (Gell. vii. 7, ix. 10, xx. 8.)

HANNIBAL. [Hannibal.]

ANNEI'cERIS ('Aristippus), a Cyrenean philosopher [Aristippus], of whom the ancients have left us very vague and contradictory accounts. He is said to have ransomed Plato for 20 minae from Dionysius of Syracuse (Diog. Laert. ii. 86); but we read, on the other hand, that he was a disciple of Parmenides, whose succession from Aristippus in the order of discipleship was as follows:—Aristippus, Arete, Aristippus the younger, Antipater, Epimenides, Parmenides. Plato, however, was contemporary with the first Aristippus, and therefore one of the above accounts of Anniceris must be false. Hence Menage on Laertius (l. c.) and Kuster on Suidas (s. v.) have supposed that there were two philosophers of the name of Anniceris, the one contemporary with Plato, the other with Alexander the Great. If so, the latter is the one of whose system some notices have reached us, and who forms a link between the Cyrenians and Epicurean schools. He was opposed to Epicurus in two points: (1) he denied that pleasure was merely the absence of pain, for if so death would be a pleasure; and (2) he attributed to every separate act a distinct object, maintaining that there was no general end of human life. In both these statements he asserted the principle of Aristippus. But he differed from Aristippus, inasmuch as he allowed that friendship, patriotism, and similar virtues, were good in themselves; saying that the wise man will derive pleasure from such qualities, even though they cause him occasional trouble, and that a friend should be chosen not only for our own need, but for kindness and natural affection. Again he denied that reason (4 lýgos) alone can secure us from error, maintaining that habit (dæl^er) was also necessary (Suidas and Diog. Laert. i. c.; Clem. Alex. Strom ii. p. 417; Bruckcr, Hist. Crit. Phil. ii. 3; Ritter Geschichte der Phil. vii. 3.)

Adrian (V. H. ii. 27}
says that Annicola (probably the elder of the two) was distinguished for his skill as a charioteer.

ANNIUS. 1. L. Annius, of Setia, a Roman colony, was praetor of the Latins, b.c. 340, at the time of the great Latin war. He was sent as ambassador to Rome to demand for the Latins perfect equality with the Romans. According to the Roman story, he dared to say, in the capitol, that he defied the Roman Jupiter; and as he hurried down the steps of the temple, he fell from the top to the bottom, and was taken up dead. (Liv. viii. 3-6.)

2. Annius, a freedman, the father of Cn. Plavius, who was curule aedile in b.c. 304. (Cull. vi. 9; Liv. ix. 46.)

3. T. Annius, a tribune for founding colonies in Cisalpine Gaul, was obliged by a sudden rising of the Boii to take refuge in Mutina, b.c. 218. (Liv. xxi. 25.)

4. Annius, a Campanian, who is said to have been sent as ambassador to Rome after the battle of Cannae, b.c. 216, to demand that one of the consuls should henceforth be a Campanian. (Val. Max. vi. 4; § 11; Liv. xxiiii. 6, 22.)

5. L. Annius, tribune of the plebs, b.c. 110, attempted with P. Lucullus to continue in office the next year, but was resisted by his other colleagues. (Sall. Jug. 37.)

6. P. Annius, tribune of the soldiers, was the murderer of M. Antonins, the orator, in b.c. 87, and brought his head to Marius. (Val. Max. ixi. 2; § 2; Appian, B. G. i. 72.)

7. C. Annius, sent into Spain by Sulla about b.c. 82 against Sertorius, whom he compelled to retire into Cartagha. (Plut. Sertor. 7.)

8. Q. Annius, a senator, one of Catiline's co-conspirators, b.c. 63. He was not taken with Cethegus and the others, and we do not know his future fate. (Sall. Cat. 17, 50; comp. Q. Cic. de Pet. C. 3.)

ANNIUS BASSUS. [Bassus.]

ANNIUS FAUSTUS. [Faustus.]

ANNIUS GALLUS. [Gal/us.]

ANNIUS POLLIO. [Pollio.]

ANSER, a friend of the triumvir M. Antonins, and one of the detractors of Virgil. Ovid calls him procuar. (Virg. Ec. xi. 56; Serv. ad loc. et ad Ecl. vii. 21; Prop. ii. 25, 84; Ov. Trist. ii. 435; Cic. Philipp. xiii. 5; Weichert, Poetar. Lat. Heliodor. p. 160, &c.; Lips. 1830.)

ANTAEAS. ['Att'is], a surname of Demeter, Rheus, and Cybele, probably signifies a goddess whom man may approach in prayers. (Orph. Hymn. 44.1; Apollon. i. 1141; Hesych. s. v.)

ANTAEUS (Anta'ias), a. A son of Poseidon and Ge, a mighty giant and wrestler in Libya, whose strength was invincible so long as he remained in contact with his mother earth. The strangers who came to his country were compelled to wrestle with him; the conquered were slain, and out of their skulls he built a house to Poseidon.

Hercules discovered the source of his strength, he lifted him up from the earth, and crushed him in the air. (Apollod. ii. 5; § 11; Hygin. Fab. 31; Diod. iv. 17; Pind. Isthm. iv. 87, &c.; Lucan, Pharsal. iv. 590, &c.; Juven. iii. 89; Ov. I. 397.)

The tomb of Antaeus (Antae'colae), which formed a modius high in the shape of a man stretched out at full length, was shewn near the town of Tingis in Mauretania down to a late period (Strab. xvi. p. 829; P. Mela, iii. 10, § 35, &c.), and it was believed that whenever a portion of the earth covering it was taken away, it ruined until the houle was filled up again. Sertorius is said to have opened the grave, but when he found the skeleton of sixty cubits in length, he struck with horror and had it covered over again immediately. (Strab. l. c.; Plut. Sertor. 9.)

2. A king of Issa, a town in the territory of Cyrene, who was sometimes identified by the ancients with the giant Antaeus. He had a daughter Alecia or Bace, whom he promised to him who should conquer in the foot race. The prize was won by Alexidamas. (Pind. Puth. ix. 188, &c., with the Schol.) A third personage of this name occurs in Virg. Aen. x. 501. [L. S.]

ANTAGOORAS (Anta'goras), of Rhodes, a Greek epic poet who flourished about the year b.c. 270. He was a friend of Antigonus Gonatas and a contemporary of Aratus. (Paun. i. 2; § 8; Plut. Apollod. p. 162, &c.; Sympos. iv. p. 608, &c.) He is said to have been very fond of good living, respecting which Plutarch and Athenaeus (vii. p. 340, &c.) relate some facetious anecdotes. Antagoras wrote an epic poem entitled Theleia (Ov. Fast. Vita Arato, pp. 444, 446, ed. Buhrle). This poem he is said to have read to the Boeotians, to whom it appeared so tedious that they could not abstain from yawning. (Apostol. Proverb. Cent. v. 82; Maxim. Confl. ii. p. 500, ed. Cambebus.) He also composed some epigrams of which specimens are still extant. (Diog. Laert. iv. 20; Anthol. Graec. iv. 147.)

ANTALCIDAS. [Antal'cidas], the Spartan, appears to have been one of the ablest politicians ever called forth by the emergencies of his country, an apt pupil of the school of Lysander, and, like him, thoroughly versed in the art of courtly diplomacy. His father's name, as we learn from Plutarch (Arct. p. 1022, &c.), was Leon—the same, possibly, who is recorded by Xenophon (Hell. ii. 3. § 10) as Ephor εὐθυμοὺς in the fourteenth year of the Peloponnesian war. At one of the most critical periods for Sparta, when, in addition to a strong confederacy against her of Grecian states assisted by Persian money, the successes of Pharnabazus and Conon and the restoration of the long walls of Athens appeared to threaten the re-establishment of Athenian dominion, Antalcidas was selected as ambassador to Tiribazus, satrap of western Asia, to negotiate through him a peace for Sparta with the Persian king, b.c. 393. (Hell. iv. 8. § 12.) Such a measure would of course deprive Athens and the hostile league of their chief resources, and, under the pretext of general peace and concord, might leave Sparta at liberty to consolidate her precarious supremacy among the Greeks of Europe. The Athenians, alarmed at this step, also despatched an embassy, with Conon at its head, to counteract the efforts of Antalcidas, and deputies for the same purpose accompanied them from Thebes, Argos, and Corinth. In consequence of the strong opposition made by these states, Tiribazus did not venture to close with Sparta without authority from Artaxerxes, but he secretly furnished Antalcidas with money for a navy, to harass the Athenians and their allies, and drive them into wishing for the peace. Moreover, he seized Conon, on the pretext that he had unduly used the king's forces for the extension of Athenian dominion, and threw him into prison. (Conon.) Tiribazus was detained at court by the king, to whom he had gone to give a report of his measures, and was superseded for a time in his satrapy by Struthas, a warm friend of Athens. The war therefore continued for some years; but in B.c. 388 the state of affairs appeared to give promise of success if a fresh negotiation with Persia were attempted. Tiribazus had returned to his former government, Pharnabazus, the opponent of Spartan interests, had gone up to the capital to marry Amata, the king’s daughter, and had entrusted his government to Ariobarzanes, with whom Antalcidas had a connexion of hospitality (ξέρτας ἐκ παρακής). Under these circumstances, Antalcidas was once more sent to Asia both as commander of the fleet (παπαγός, παπαγός) and ambassador. (Hell. v. 1. § 6, 28.) On his arrival at Ephesus, he gave the charge of the squadron to Nicocolus, as his lieutenant (εὐτοστολός), and sent him to aid Abydus and keep Iphicrates in check, while he himself went to Tiribazus, and possibly proceeded with him * to the court of Artaxerxes on the more important business of his mission. In this he was completely successful, having prevailed on the king to aid Sparta in forcing, if necessary, the Athenians and their allies to accede to peace on the terms which Persia, acting under Spartan influence, should dictate. On his return however to the sea-coast, he received intelligence that Nicocolus was blockaded in the harbour of Abydus by Iphicrates and Datis. He accordingly proceeded by land to Abydus, where he sailed out with the squadron by night, having spread a report that the Chalcedonians had sent him to aid. Sailing northward, he stopped at Percope, and when the Athenians had passed that place in fancied pursuit of him, he returned to Abydus, where he hoped to be strengthened by a reinforcement of twenty ships from Syracuse and Italy. But hearing that Tiribazus (of Clytthus, not the hero of Phyle) was advancing from Thrace with eight ships to join the Athenian fleet, he put out to sea, and succeeded by a stratagem in capturing the whole squadron. (Hell. v. 1. §§ 25-27; Polyaen. ii. 4, and Schneider in loc. Xen.) He was soon after joined by the expected ships from Sicily and Italy, by the fleet of all the Ionian towns of which Tiribazus was master, and even by some which Ariobarzanes furnished from the satrapy of Pharnabazus. Antalcidas now determined to proceed immediately to the Persian court, on which he had sent a final message to Persia, and thus was concluded, peace being the fruit of Antalcidas’ labours. (Hell. v. 1.) On the subject of the peace, see Thirlwall, Gr. Hist. vol. iv. p. 445; Mitford, ch. 25, sec. 7, ch. 27, sec. 2.

Our notices of the rest of the life of Antalcidas are scanty and doubtful. From a passing allusion in the speech of Callistatus the Athenian (Hell. vi. 3. § 12), we learn that he was then (b.c. 371) absent on another mission to Persia. Might this have been with a view to the negotiation of peace in Greece (see Hell. vi. 3), and likewise have been connected with some alarm at the probable interest of Timotheus, son of Conon, at the Persian court? (See Diod. xx. 50; Dem. c. Timoth. p. 338; Thirlwall, vol. v. p. 68.) Plutarch again (Ages. 613, c.) mentions Antalcidas as a sign of some persons, that at the time of the invasion of Laconia by Epaminondas, b.c. 369, Antalcidas was one of the ephors, and that, fearing the capture of Sparta, he conveyed his children for safety to Cythera. The same author informs us (Arias. p. 1022, d.), that Antalcidas was sent to Persia for supplies after the defeat at Leuctra, b.c. 371, and was coldly and superciliously received by the king. If, considering the general looseness of statement which pervades this portion of Plutarch, it were allowable to set the date of this mission after the invasion of 369, we might possibly connect it with the attempt at pacification on the side of Persia in 368. (Hell. vii. 1. § 27; Diod. xxv. 70.) This would seem indeed to be inconsistent with Plutarch’s account of the treatment of Antalcidas by Artaxerxes; but that might perhaps be no overwhelming objection to our hypothesis. (See, Thirlwall, vol. v. p. 125.) The embassy in question took place immediately after the battle of Leuctra, the anecdote (Ages. 613, c.) of the ephorship of Antalcidas in 369 of course refutes what Plutarch (Arias. 1022, d.) would have us infer, that Antalcidas was driven to suicide by his failure in Persia and the ridicule of his enemies. But such a story is on other grounds intrinsically improbable, and savours much of the period at which Plutarch wrote, when the conduct of some later Romans, miscalculated Stoics, had served to give suicide the character of a fashionable resource in cases of distress and perplexity. * * *

ANTANDER (Ἀντάνδερ), brother of Agathocles, king of Syracuse, was a commander of the troops sent by the Syracusans to the relief of Croesus whom besieged by the Briti in b.c. 317. During his brother’s absence in Africa (b.c. 310), he was left together with Erymnon in command of Syracuse, and wished to surrender it to Hamilcar. He appears, however, to have still retained, or at least regained, the confidence of Agathocles, for he is mentioned afterwards as the instrument of his brother's cruelty. (Diod. xir. 3, xx. 16, 72.)

Antander was the author of an historical work, which Diodorus quotes. (Erat. xii. 24, p. 492, ed. Wess.)

ANTEIA ('Apreia), a daughter of the Lydian king Iobates, and wife of Proetus of Arcos, by whom she became the mother of Maera. (Apollod. ii. 2, § 1; Hom. II. i. 160; Pind. Pyth. vii. 339; Serv. ad Hom. p. 349.) According to the Homeric account, she was one of the wisest among the elders at Troy, and received Menelaus and Odysseus into his house when they came to Troy as ambassadors. (II. iii. 146, &c., 263, &c.) He also advised his fellow-citizens to restore Helen to Menelaus. (II. vii. 848, &c.) This is the substance of all that is said about him in the Homeric poems; but the suggestion contained therein, that Antenor entertained a friendly disposition towards the Greeks, has been seized upon and exaggerated by later writers. Before the Trojan war, he is said to have been sent by Priam to Greece to claim the surrender of Hisone, who had been carried off by the Greeks; but this mission was not followed by any favourable result. (Dares Phryg. 5.) When Menelaus and Odysseus landed at Troy, they would have been killed by the sons of Priam, had it not been for the protection which Antenor afforded them. (Dict. Cret. i. 11.) Just before the taking of Troy his friendship for the Greeks assumes the character of treachery towards his own country; for when sent to Agamemnon to negotiate peace, he devised a plan of delivering the city, and even the palladium, into their hands. (Dict. Cret. iv. 22, v. 8; Serv. ad Aen. i. 246, 651, li. 15; Stephan. ad Lyogorg. 339; Suidas, s. v. παλαιδος.) When Troy was plundered, the skin of a panther was hung up at the door of Antenor's house, as a sign for the Greeks not to commit any outrage upon it. (Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. v. 100; Paus. x. 17; Strab. xiii. p. 606.) His history after this event is related differently. Dictys (v. 17; comp. Serv. ad Aen. ix. 264) states, that he founded a new kingdom at Troy upon and out of the remains of the old one; and according to others, he embarked, with Menelaus and Helen, was carried to Libya, and settled at Cyrene (Pind. Pyth. v. 110); or he went with the Heneti to Thrace, and thence to the western coast of the Adriatic, where the foundation of several towns is ascribed to him. (Strab. s. v.; Serv. ad Aen. i. 1; Liv. i. 1.) Antenor with his family and his house, on which the panther's skin was seen, was painted in the Lesche at Delphi. (Paus. l. c.)

ANTEVERVORTA, the son of Euphranor, an Athenian sculptor, made the first bronze statues of Harmodius and Aristogiton, which the Athenians set up in the Ceramicus. (b. c. 509.) These statues were carried off to Susa by Xerxes, and their place was supplied by others made either by Callias or by Praxiteles. After the conquest of Persia, Alexander the Great sent the statues back to Athens, where they were again set up in the Ceramicus. (Paus. iii. 8, § 6; Arrian. Anab. iii. 16, vii. 19; Plin. xxxiv. 9; ib. 19, § 10; Böckh, Corp. Inscrip. ii. p. 340.) The return of the statues is ascribed by Pausanias (l. c.) to one of the Antiochi, by Valerius Maximus (ii. 10, ext. § 1) to Seleucus; but the account of Arrian, that they were returned by Alexander, is to be preferred. (See also Mennul. Piatet. 14.)

ANTEVERVORTA, a Greek writer of uncertain date, wrote a work upon the history of Crete, which on account of its excellence was called Δατρα, inasmuch as, says Prolemy Hephæstion (op. Phot. Cod. 159, p. 151, b. Belik., the Cretans called that which is good Δατρα. (Aelian, H. N. xvii. 53; Pint. de mol. Hist. c. 28.)

ANTEVERVADES (Ἀντειβάδης), a patronymic from Antenor, and applied to his sons and descendants. (Verg. Aen. vi. 484; Hom. II. xi. 221.) At Cyrene, where Antenor according to some accounts had settled after the destruction of Troy, the Antenorides enjoyed honourable honours. (Pind. Pyth. v. 108.)

ANTEROS. (Ἐρός.)

ANTEVORTA, also called Porrurima or Prorsa (Ov. Fast. i. 638; Gell. xvi. 16), together with Postvorta, are described either as the two sisters or companions of the Roman goddess Carmenta. (Ov. l. c.; Macrobi. Sat. l. 7.) It seems to be clear, from the manner in which Macrobius speaks of Antevorta and Postvorta, that originally they were only two attributes of the one goddess Carmenta, the former describing her knowledge of the future and the latter that of the past, analogous to the two-headed Janus. But that in later times Antevorta and Postvorta were regarded as two distinct beings, companions of Carmenta, or as two Carmentae, is expressly said by Varro (ap. Gell. l. c.), Ovid, and Macrobius. According to Varro, who also says, that they had two altars at Rome, they were invoked by pregnant women, to avert the dangers of child-birth. (L. S.)

ANTHAEUS (Ἀνθαίος) or Antaeus, a physician, whose ridiculous and superstitious remedy for hydrophobia is mentioned by Pliny. (H. N. xxvii. 2.) One of his prescriptions is preserved by Galen. (De Compon. Medicis, sec. Locos, iv. b. vol. xli. p. 764.) Nothing is known of the events of his life, but, as Pliny mentions him, he must have lived some time in or before the first century after Christ.

ANTHEUS (Ἀνθεύς), a son of Poseidon and Alcyone, the daughter of Atlas. He was king of Troezen, and believed to have built the town of Antehla, and according to a Boetian tradition, the town of Antedon also. Other accounts stated, that Antedon derived its name from a nymph Antedon. (Paus. ii. 30, § 7, &c., xxii. 22, § 5.)

ANTHEUS LINDIUS (Ἀνθεύς), a Greek poet, of Lindus in Rhodes, flourished about b. c. 596. He was one of the earliest eminent composers of phallic songs, which he himself sung at the head of his phallophori. (Ath. x. p. 445.) Hence he is ranked by Athenaeus (l. c.) as a comic poet, but this is not precisely correct, since he lived before the period when comedy assumed its proper form. It is well observed by Bode (Dram. Dichtkunst, ii. p. 16), that Anthas, with his comus of phallo- plor, stands in the same relation to comedy as Arion, with his dithyrambic chorus, to tragedy. (See also Dict. of Ant. s. v. Comedia.)  [P. S.]

ANTHEON.  [Anthas.]  ANTHEIA (Ἀντθεία), the blooming, or the friend of flowers, a surname of Hera, under which she had a temple at Argos. Before this temple was the mound under which the women were buried who had come with Dionysus from the Aegean islands, and had fallen in a contest with the Argives and Persians. (Paus. ii. 22 § 1.) Anthia was the mother of Nausis as a surname of Aphrodite. (Hesych. s. v. 1.)

ANTHIILLI (Ἀνθῆιλλι), certain divinities whose images stood before the doors of houses, and were exposed to the sun, whence they derived their name. (Aeschyl. Agam. 530; Lobeck, ad Soph. Afrac. 805.)  [L. S.]

ANTHEMUS, emperor of the West, remarkable for his ability to support the sinking fortunes of the Western empire. He was the son of Procopius, and son-in-law of the emperor Marcian, and on Riedem applying to the eastern emperor Leo for a successor to Majorian in the west, he was in A. D. 467 named for the office, in which he was confirmed at Rome. His daughter was married to Riedem; but a quarrel arising between Anthemius and Riedem, the latter acknowledged Olybrius as emperor, and laid siege to Rome, which he took by storm in 473. Anthemius perished in the assault. His private life, which seems to have been good, is given in the panegyric upon him by Sidonius Apollonius, whom he patronized; his public life in Jornandes (de Ref. Got. c. 45), Maresullinis (Chron.), and Theophanes (p. 101). See Gibbon, Decline and Fall c. 36.  [A. P. S.]

ANTHEMUS (Ἀνθήμιος), an eminent mathematician and architect, born at Tralles, in Lydia, in the sixth century after Christ. His father's name was Stephanus, who was a physician (Alex. Tull. iv. 1, p. 198); one of his brothers was the celebrated Alexander Trallianus; and Athanas mentions (Hist. v. p. 149), that his three other brothers, Dioscorus, Melidoras, and Olympeus, were each eminent in their several professions. He was one of the architects employed by the emperor Justinian in the building of the church of St. Sophia, A.D. 532 (Procop. in Combeis. Manip. Rom. C. Pol. p. 293; Agath. Hist. v. p. 149, &c.; Du Cange, C. Polis Christ. lib. iii. p. 11; Anselm. Bandur. ad Antip. C. Pol. p. 779), and to him Eutocius dedicated his Commentary on the Conic of Apollonius. A fragment of one of his mathematical works was published at Paris, 4to. by M. Dupuy, 1777, with the title "Fragment d'un Ouvrage Grec d'Anthemius sur des Paradoxes de Mécanique; revu et corrigé sur quatre Manuscrits, avec une Traduction Françoise et des Notes." It is also to be found in the fourth-volume of the Hist. de l'Acad. des Inscriptions, 1786, pp. 72, 392—451.  [W. A. G.]

ANTHEUS (Ἀνθέως), probably only another form of Anthas. It occurs in Stephanus Byzantius, who calls him the founder of Anthane in Laconia; and in Plutarch (Quaesit, Gr. 19) who says, that the island of Calauria was originally called, after him, Anthedonía.  [L. S.]

ANTHEUS (Ἀνθές), the blooming, a surname of Dionysus. (Paus. vii. 21 § 2.) Anthius, a surname which Dionysus bore at Athens, is probably only a different form for Anthus. (Paus. i. 51 § 2.)

ANTHES (Ἀνθής), a Greek sculptor of considerable reputation, though not of first-rate excellence, flourished about 180 n. c. (Plin. xxxiv. 19, where Anthus is a correction for the common reading Anthus).  [P. S.]

ANTHINUS (Ἀνθίνοος) or ANTHUS (Ἀνθῆς)? FURUS, a Roman jurisconsult, of uncertain date. He was probably not later than Severus Alexander. He wrote a work upon the Edict, in which the Florentine Index to the Digest is entitled μησος οἰκερων βιβλίων περὶ περ. but there are only three extracts made from it in the Digest, and all of these are taken from the first book. This has led many to hold the compilers of the Digest possessed only an imperfect copy of his work. (P. I. Besier, Diss. de Furio Anthinos, J. c. ejusque fragmentis, Lug. Bat. 1803.)  [J. T. G.]

ANTHIMUS (Ἀνθίμοος), bishop of Tripolis in Pontus, was made patriarch of Constantinople by the influence of the empress Theodora (A. D. 535), and about the same time was drawn over to the Eutychian heresy by Severus. Soon after his election to the patriarchate, Agapetus, the bishop of Rome, sent to Constantinople, and obtained from the emperor Justinian a sentence of deposition against Anthimus, which was confirmed by a synod held at Constantinople under Memmas, the successor of Anthimus. (A. D. 536; Novell. 42; Mansi, Nova Collect. Concill. viii. pp. 821, 869, 1149-1158; Labbe, v.; Agapetus.) Some fragments of the delate between Anthimus and Agapetus are preserved in the presence of Justinian are preserved in the Acts of the Councils.  [P. S.]

ANTHIPPUS (Ἀνθίπποος), a Greek comic poet, a play of whose is cited by Athenacus (ix. p. 403), where, however, we ought perhaps to read Aristó- y.  [Anaxippus.]  [P. S.]

ANTHIUS (Ἀνθίους), a son of Antonius and Hippodameia, who was torn to pieces by the horses of his father, and was metamorphosed into a bird which imitated the neighing of a horse, but always fled from the sight of a horse. (Anton. Lib. 7; Plin. H. N. x. 57.)  [L. S.]

ANTHIA GENS, of which the cognomens are Briso and Ristro, seems to have been of considerable antiquity. The only person of this name, who has no cognomen, is St. Anthius.

ANTIANIRA (Ἀντίανιρα). 1. The mother of the Argonaut Idmon by Apollo. (Orph. Arg. 187.) The scholiast on Apollonius Rhodius (i. 139), however, calls Asteria the mother of Idmon. 2. A daughter of Mencias, and mother of the Argonaut Eurytion and Eccione, whom she bore to Eumaeus. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 56; Hygin.Fab. 14.)  [L. S.]

ANTIAS, a cognomen of the Valeria Gens, derived from the Roman colony of Antium.

1. Vitalis ANTIAS, was sent with five ships in the c. 215 to convey to Rome the Carthaginian ambassadors, who had been captured by the Romans on their way to Philip of Macedon. (Liv. xxiii. 34.)
2. Q. VALERIUS ANTIAS, the Roman historian, was either a descendant of the preceding, or derived the surname of Antias from his being a native of Antium, as Pliny states. (H. N. Prael.) He was a contemporary of Quadrigharius, Sisenna, and Rutilius (Vell. Pat. ii. 9), and lived in the former half of the first century before Christ. Krause, without mentioning his authority, states that Antias was praetor in a. u. c. 67, a. e. 137, as early as the twelfth book (or according to some readings in the twenty-second), and the work extended to seventy-five books at least. (Gell. vii. 9.) Cases in which the statements of Antias are opposed to those of all other writers, and there can be little doubt that Livy's judgment is correct. Antias was in no difficulty about any of the particulars of the early history: he fabricated the most cürious narrations, and was patronymically distinguished by his exaggerations in numbers. Plutarch seems to have drawn much of his early history from him, and Livy too appears to have derived the name of at least three Greek physicians.

ANTICLEIDES. 1. An inhabitant of Chios, mentioned in one of the spurious letters of Euripides (Eurip. Epist. 2, vol. ii. p. 500, ed. Beck), who (if he ever really existed) must have lived in the fifth century b. c. He flourished about 336. (Plin. xxxv. 40, b. c.) Whether these works were all written by Anticleides of Athens, cannot be decided with certainty.

ANTIDAMAS, or ANTIDAMUS, of Heraclea, wrote in Greek a history of Alexander the Great and moral works, which are referred to by Fulgentius. (s. v. Vespillones, fabre.)

ANTIDOTUS, an Athenian comic poet, of whom we know nothing, except that he was one of the middle comedians, which is evident from the fact that a certain play, the 'Oqmia, is ascribed both to him and to Alexis. (Athen. xiv. 642.) We have the titles of two other plays of his, and it is thought that his name ought to be restored in Athenaeus (i. p. 28, e.) and Pollux (vi. 99). (See Meineke, i. p. 416.)

ANTIDOTUS, an enigmatic painter, the disciple of Euphranor, and teacher of Nicias the Athenian. His works were few, but carefully executed, and his colouring was somewhat harsh (severior).

ANTIGENES, 1. A Spartan who, according to Diogenes Laertius, killed Epaminondas at the battle of Mantinea. The descendants of Antigenses are said to have obtained the name of Antigones by the Laconian democrats, on account of his having struck Epaminondas with a mace (Plut. Alex. l. c.) Whether these works were all written by Anticleides of Athens, cannot be decided with certainty.

ANTIGENES, a Spartan who, according to Diogenes Laertius (Ap. Plat. Apeis. 55), killed Epaminondas at the battle of Mantinea. Whether these works were all written by Anticleides of Athens, cannot be decided with certainty.

ANTIDES. (Kptio-), 1. One of the followers of Cleophantus, who espoused with his troops the side of Emnenes. (Apollod. iii. 16.) It is uncertain whether this Anticleio is the same as the one whose son Periphetes was killed by Theseus. Of this Periphetes she was the mother as the one whose son Periphetes was killed by Theseus. Of this Periphetes she was the mother of the spurious letters of Euripides (Eurip. Epist. 2, vol. ii. p. 500, ed. Beck), who (if he ever really existed) must have lived in the fifth century b. c. He flourished about 336. (Plin. xxxv. 40, b. c.) Whether these works were all written by Anticleides of Athens, cannot be decided with certainty.

ANTIGONE.

Aurelius (De Morb. Actit. ii. 10, p. 46), and he is probably the physician mentioned by Galen (Comment. in Hippocr. “De Nat. Hom.” ii. 6, vol. xv. p. 136), together with several others who lived about that time, as being celebrated anatomists.

3. One of Galen's contemporaries at Rome in the second century after Christ, who was a pupil of Quintus and Marimus, and had an extensive and lucidive practice. Galen gives an account (De Praecon. ad Posth. c. 3, vol. xiv. p. 613) of their differing in opinion as to the probable result of the illness of the philosopher Eudemus. (Le Clerc, Hist. de la Méd.; Fabricius, Biblioth. Gr. vol. xiii. p. 63, ed. vett.; Haller, Biblioth. Mediae. Prior. tom. i.) [W.A.G.]

ANTIGENIDAS (Ἀντιγένιδας), a Theban, the son of Satyrus or Dionysius, was a celebrated flute-player, and also a poet. He lived in the time of Alexander the Great. (Suidas and Harpocrat. s. v.; Plut. de Alex. fort. p. 355, a., de Music. p. 1138, a.; Cie. Brut. 50; Bode, Gesch. d. lyrisch. Dichtkunst d. Hell. ii. p. 321, &c.) His two daughters, Molo and Satyna, who followed the profession of their father, are mentioned in an epigram in the Greek Anthology. (v. 206.)

ANTIGONUS. [Ἀντιγόνος, sculptor.]

ANTIGONE (Ἀντιγόνη), 1. A daughter of Oedipus by his mother Jocaste. She had two brothers, Eteocles and Polynices, and a sister Ismene. In the tragic story of Oedipus Antigone appears as a noble maiden, with a truly heroic attachment to her father and brothers. When Oedipus, in despair at the fate which had driven him to murder his father, and commit incest with his mother, had put out his eyes, and was obliged to quit Thebes, he went to Atica guided and accompanied by his attached daughter Antigone. (Apollod. iii. 5. § 8, &c.) She remained with him till he died in Colonus, and then returned to Thebes. Haemon, the son of Creon, had, according to Apollodorus, died before this time; but Sophocles, to suit his own tragic purposes, represents him as alive and falling in love with Antigone. When Polynices, subsequently, who had been expelled by his brother Eteocles, marched against Thebes (in the war of the Seven), and the two brothers had fallen in single combat, Creon, who now succeeded to the throne, issued an edict forbidding, under heavy penalties, the burial of their bodies. While every one else submitted to this impious command, Antigone alone defied the tyrant, and buried the body of Polynices. According to Apollodorus (iii. 7, § 1), Creon had her buried alive in the same tomb with her brother. According to Sophocles, she was shut up in a subterraneous cave, where she killed herself, and Haemon, on hearing of her death, killed himself by her side; so that Creon too received his punishment. A different account of Antigone is given by Hyginus. (Fab. 72.)

Aeschylos and Sophocles made the story of Antigone the subject of tragedies, and that of the latter, one of the most beautiful of ancient dramas, is still extant. Antigone acts a part in other extant dramas also, as in the Seven against Thebes of Aeschylus, in the Oedipus in Colonus of Sophocles, and in the Phoenissae of Euripides.

1. A daughter of Eurytion of Pithia, and wife of Pelcus, by whom she became the mother of Polydorus. When Pelcus had killed Eurytion during the chase, and fled to Acastus at Iolcus, he drew upon himself the hatred of Astydamia, the wife of Acastus. [Acastus.] In consequence of this, she sent a calumniatory message to Antigone, stating, that Pelcus was on the point of marrying Sterope, a daughter of Acastus. Hereupon Antigone hung herself in despair. (Apollod. iii. 18. § 1-3.)

2. A daughter of Laomedon and sister of Priam. She boasted of excelling Hera in the beauty of her hair, and was punished for her presumptuous vanity by being changed into a stork. (Ov. Met. vi. 93.)

4. A daughter of Pherecs, married to Pyrrhus or Cometes, by whom she became the mother of the Argonaut Asterion. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 32; Orph. Arg. 161; Hygin. Fab. 14.) [L. S.]

ANTIGONE (Ἀντιγόνη), the daughter of Cassander (the brother of Antipater), was the second wife of Ptolemy Lagus, and the mother of Berenice, who married first the Macedonian Philip son of Amyntas, and then Ptolemy Soter. (Droysen, Gesch. d. Nachfolger Alexanders, p. 418, &c. and Tab. viii. 6.)

2. The daughter of Berenice by her first husband Philip, and the wife of Pyrrhus. (Plut. Pyrrh. 4.)

ANTIGONIDAE, the descendants of Antigonus, king of Asia. The following genealogic table of this family is taken from Droysen's Geschichte der Nachfolger Alexanders.

Antigonas, died b. c. 301. Married Strattonice, daughter of Corinnaus.

Philip, died b. c. 396.

Demetrius I. (Poliorcetes), k. of Macedonia, died b. c. 263. Married
1. Phila, d. of Antipater.

ANTIGONUS, a Greek writer, in the history of Italy. (Pest. s. v. Roman; Dionys. Hal. i. 6.) It has been supposed that the Antigonus mentioned by Plutarch (Romal. 17) is the same as the historian, but the saying there noted belongs to a king Antigonus, and not to the historian. [L. S.]

ANTIGONUS (Ἀντιγόνοϛ), son of Alexander, was sent by Perseus, king of Macedonia, as ambassador into Boeotia, in B.C. 172, and succeeded in inducing the towns of Coroneia, Thebes, and Halinarius to remain faithful to the king. Polyb. xxvii. 5. [L. S.]

ANTIGONUS (Ἀντιγόνοϛ), of Alexandria, grammarian who is referred to by Erotian in his grammarian of the generals of Alexander the Great, and in a division of the empire after his death (B.C. 13), he received the provinces of the Greater Syria, Lycaonia, and Pamphylia. Perdiccas, who had been appointed regent, had formed the plan of taking the sovereignty of the whole of Alexander's dominions, and therefore resolved upon the fate of Pithon, he thought it more prudent to get rid of Antigonus, who was likely to stand in the way of his ambitious projects. Perceiving the danger which threatened him, Antigonus fled with the cities of his former provinces with the addition of his provinces and the assistance of Antigonus, who was now declared regent; he restored to Antigonus the territory of his father, and claimed the regency for himself. He was supported by Antigonus, and their confederacy was soon afterwards joined by Ptolemy. But they found a formidable rival in Eumenes, who was appointed by Polyperchon to the command of the troops in Asia. Antigonus commanded the troops of the confederates, and the struggle between him and Eumenes lasted for two years. The scene of the first campaign (B.C. 318) was Asia Minor and Syria, of the second (B.C. 317) Persia and Media. The contest was at length terminated by a battle in Gabiene at the beginning of B.C. 316, in which Eumenes was defeated. He was surrendered to Antigonus the next day through the treachery of the Argymopas, and was put to death by the conqueror.

Antigonus was now by far the most powerful of Alexander's generals, and was by no means disposed to share with his allies the fruits of his victory. He began to dispose of the provinces as he thought fit. He caused Pithon, a general of great influence, to be brought before his council, and condemned to death on the charge of treachery, and executed several other officers who showed symptoms of discontent. After taking possession of the immense treasures collected at Ecbatana and Susa, he proceeded to Babylon, where he called upon Seleucus to account for the administration of the revenues of this province. Such an account, however, Seleucus refused to give, maintaining that he had received the province as a free gift from Alexander's army; but, admonished by the recent fate of Pithon, he thought it more prudent to get out of the reach of Antigonus, and accordingly left Babylon secretly with a few horsemen, and fled to Egypt.

The ambitious projects and great power of Antigonus now led to a general coalition against him, consisting of Seleucus, Ptolemy, Cassander, and Lysimachus. The war began in the year 315, and was carried on with great vehemence and alternate success in Syria, Phoenicia, Asia Minor, and Greece. After four years, all parties became exhausted with the struggle, and peace was accordingly made, in B.C. 311, on condition that the Greek cities should be free, that Cassander should retain his authority in Europe till Alexander Augustus came of age, that Lysimachus and Ptolemy... should keep possession of Thrace and Egypt respectively, and that Antigonus should have the government of all Asia. The name of Seleucus, strangely enough, does not appear in the treaty.

This peace, however, did not last more than a year. Ptolemy was the first to break it, under pretence that Antigonus had not restored to liberty the Greek cities in Asia Minor, and accordingly sent a fleet to Cilicia to dislodge the garrisons of Antigonus from the maritime towns. (n. c. 310.)

Ptolemy was at first successful, but was soon deprived of all he had gained by the conquests of Demetrius (Poliorectes), the son of Antigonus. Meanwhile, however, the whole of Greece was in the power of Cassander, and Demetrius was therefore sent with a large fleet to effect a diversion in his father's favour. Demetrius met with little opposition; he took possession of Athens in n. c. 307, where he was received with the most extravagant flattery. He also obtained possession of Megara, and would probably have become master of the whole of Greece, if he had not been recalled by his father to oppose Ptolemy, who had gained the island of Cyprus. The fleet of Demetrius met that of Ptolemy off the city of Salamis in Cyprus, and a battle ensued, which is one of the most memorable of the naval engagements of antiquity. Ptolemy was entirely defeated (n. c. 306), and Antigonus assumed in consequence the title of king, and the diadem, the symbol of royal power in Persia. He also conferred the same title upon Demetrius, between whom and his father the most cordial friendship and unanimity always prevailed.

The example of Antigonus was followed by Ptolemy, Lysimachus, and Seleucus, who are from this time designated as kings. The city of Antigoneia on the Orontes in Syria was founded by Antigonus in the preceding year (n. c. 307).

Antigonus thought that the time had now come for crushing Ptolemy. He accordingly invaded Egypt with a large force, but his invasion was as unsuccessful as Cassander's had been; he was obliged to retire with great loss. (n. c. 306.)

He next sent Demetrius to besiege Rhodes, which had refused to assist him against Ptolemy, and had hitherto remained neutral. Although Demetrius made the most extraordinary efforts to reduce the place, he was completely baffled by the energy and perseverance of the besieged; and was therefore glad, at the end of a year's siege, to make peace with the Rhodians on terms very favourable to the latter. (n. c. 304.) While Demetrius was engaged against Rhodes, Cassander had recovered his former power in Greece, and this was one reason that made Antigonus anxious that his son should make peace with the Rhodians. Demetrius crossed over into Greece, and after gaining possession of the principal cities without much difficulty, collected an assembly of deputies at Corinth (n. c. 303), which conferred upon him the same title that had formerly been bestowed upon Philip and Alexander. He now prepared to march northwards against Cassander, who, alarmed at his dangerous position, sent proposals of peace to Antigonus. The proud answer was, "Cassander must yield to the pleasure of Antigonus." But Cassander had not sunk so low as this: he sent ambassadors to Seleucus and Ptolemy for assistance, and induced Lysimachus to invade Asia Minor in order to make an immediate diversion in his favour. Antigonus proceeded in person to oppose Lysimachus, and endeavoured to force him to an engagement before the arrival of Seleucus from upper Asia. But in this he could not succeed, and the campaign accordingly passed away without a battle. (n. c. 302.)

During the winter, Seleucus joined Lysimachus, and Demetrius came from Greece to the assistance of his father. The decisive battle took place in the following year (n. c. 301), near Ipsus in Phrygia. Antigonus fell in the battle, in the eighty-first year of his age, and his army was completely defeated. Demetrius escaped, but was unable to restore the fortunes of his house. [Demetrius] The dominions of Antigonus were divided between the conquerors: Lysimachus obtained the greater part of Asia Minor, and Seleucus the countries between the coast of Syria and the Ephrates, together with a part of Phrygia and Cappadocia. (Diod. lib. xvii. xx.; Plut. Eumenes and Demetrius; Droysen, Geschichte der Nachfolger Alexanders; Thirwall's Greece, vol. vii.)

The head on the following coin of Antigonus. Fröhlich supposes to be Neptune's, but Eckhel thinks that it represents Dionysus, and that the coin was struck by Antigonus after his naval victory over Cyprus, in order to show that he should subdue all his enemies, as Dionysus had conquered his in India. (Eckhel, vol. ii. p. 118.)

ANTIGONUS ('Aντίγονος), of Carystus, is supposed by some to have lived in the reign of Ptolemaeus Philadippus, and in others in that of Eumenes. Respecting his life nothing is known, but we possess by him a work called tarpas, παπερικαυ γαργαγάλιον (Historiae Mirabilia), which consists for the most part of extracts from the "Asculations" attributed to Aristotle, and from similar works of Callimachus, Timaeus, and others which are now lost. It is only the circumstance that he has thus preserved extracts from other and better works, that gives any value to this compilation of strange stories, which is evidently made without skill or judgment. It was first edited together with Antonius Liberals, by Xylander Basel, 1568, 8vo. The best editions are those Meursius, Lugd. Bat. 1613, 4to, and of J. Becmann, Leipzg, 1791, 4to. Antigonus also wrote an epic poem entitled Ariarneos, of which two lines are preserved in Athenaeus. (iii. p. 82.) T. Anthologia Graeca (ix. 409) contains an epitaph of Antigonus. [L. S.]

ANTIGONUS ('Aντίγονος), of Cuma, Asia Minor, a Greek writer on agriculture, who referred to by Pliny (Eisch. libb. viii. xiv. 278.), Varro (De Re Rust. i. 1), and Columella 1), but whose age is unknown. [L. S.]

ANTIGONUS DOSON ('Aντίγονος Δοσόν) so called because it was said he was always able to give but never did, was the son of Olympias Larissa and Demetrius of Cyrene, who was a son of Demetrius Poliorcetes and a brother of Antigonus.
ANTIGONUS. 189

ANTIGONUS (Ἀντίγονος), king of Judæa, the son of Aristobulus II., and the last of the Macabees who sat on the royal throne. After his father had been put to death by Pompey's party, Antigonus was driven out of Judæa by Antipater and his sons, but was not able to obtain any assistance from Caesar's party. He was at length restored to the throne by the Parthians in B.C. 40. Herod, the son of Antipater, fled to Rome, and obtained from the Romans the title of King of Judæa, through the influence of Antony. Herod now marched against Antigonus, whom he defeated, and took Jerusalem, with the assistance of the Roman general Sosius, after a long and obstinate siege. Antigonus surrendered himself to Sosius, who handed him over to Antony. Antony had him executed at Antioch as a common malefactor in B.C. 37. (Joseph. Antiq. xiv. 13-16, B. J. i. 13, 14; Dion Cass. xlix. 22. Respecting the difference in chronology between Josephus and Dion Cassius, see Wernsdorf, de Fide Librorum Macc. p. 24, and Ideler, Chronol. ii. p. 389, &c.)

ANTIGONUS (Ἀντίγονος), a writer on painting, mentioned by Dio- genes Laërtius (vit. 12), is perhaps the same as the sculptor, whom we know to have written on statuary. [P. S.]

ANTIGONUS, a general of Pergamus in the war with the Romans, was sent to Aenia to guard the coast. (Liv. xiv. 26, 32.)

ANTIGONUS, a Greek sculptor, and an eminent writer upon his art, was one of the artists who represented the battles of Attalus and Eumenes against the Gauls. (Plin. xxxiv. 19. § 24.) He lived, therefore, about 239 B.C., when Attalus I., king of Pergamus, conquered the Gauls. A little further on, Pliny (§ 26) says, “Antigonus et perrixyomenon, tyrannicaeque supra dictos, where one of the best MSS. has “Antignotaes et lutuctores, perixyomenon,” &c. [P. S.]

ANTIGONUS (Ἀντίγονος), a Greek army surgeon, mentioned by Galen, who must therefore have lived in or before the second century after Christ. (Galen, De Consp. Medicin. sec. Locos, ii. 1, vol. xii. pp. 557, 580.) Marcellus Empiricus quotes a physician of the same name, who may subsequently attempted to prevent the formation of the Achaean league, and died in B.C. 239, at the age of eighty, after a reign of forty-four years. He was succeeded by Demetrius II. (Plut. Demetri. 51, Pyrrhus, 26; Justin, xiv. 1, xxxvi. 1—3, xvi. 2, Polyb. iv. 43, &c.; Lucian, Macrob. c. 11; Niebuhr, Kleine Schriften, p. 227, &c.) Antigonus’ surname Gonatas is usually derived from Gonnos or Gouni in Thessaly, which is supposed to have been the place of his birth or education. Niebuhr (c.), however, remarks, that Thessaly did not come into his father’s possession till Antigonus had grown up, and he thinks that Gonatas is a Macedonian word, the same as the Roman gowards, which signifies an iron plate protecting the knee, and that Antigonus obtained this surname from wearing such a piece of defensive armour.

very possibly be the same person (Marc. Empir. De Motuvm. c. 8. pp. 266, 267, 274); and Lucian mentions an impudent quack named Antigonus, who among other things said, that one of his patients had been restored to life after having been buried for twenty days. (Lec. Philopoeus, §§ 21, 23, 26, vol. iii. ed. Tauchn.)

ANTILEON (Ἀντιλέων), a Greek author who wrote a work on chronology (Ὑποκρόνοι), the second book of which is referred to by Diogenes Laërtius. (iii. 2.) Whether he is the same person as the Antileon mentioned by Pollio (ii. 4, 131) is uncertain. [L. S.]

ANTILOCUS (Ἀντιλόχος), a son of Nestor, king of Pylos, by Anaxibia (Apollod. i. 9, § 9), or according to the Odyssey (i. 451), by Eurydice. Hyginus (Fab. 252) states, that as an infant he was exposed on mount Ida, and suckled by a dog. He is mentioned among the suitors of Helen. (Apollod. iii. 10, § 8.) According to the Homeric account, he accompanied his father to Troy, but Nestor being advised by an oracle to guard his son against an Ethiopian, gave him Chaloon as his constant attendant. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1697.) Antilochus appears in the Homeric poems as one of the youngest, handsomest, and bravest among the Greeks, and is beloved by Achilles. (Od. iii. 112; II. xxii. 536, 607, xvii. 16.) He fell at Troy by the hands of Memnon, the Ethiopian. (Od. iv. 186, &c., xi. 522; Pind. Pyl. vi. 32, &c.) Hyginus, in one passage (Fab. 112) states that he was slain by Memnon, and in another (Fab. 113) he makes Hector his conqueror. The remains of Antilochus were buried by the side of those of his friends Achilles and Patroclus (Od. xxiv. 78), and in Hades or the island of Leuke he likewise accompanied his friends. (Od. xxiv. 16; Paus. iii. 19, § 11.) Philostratus (Her. iii. 2) gives a different account of him. When Nestor went to Troy, his son was yet too young to accompany him; but in the course of the war he came to Troy and applied to Achilles to soothe the anger of his father at his unexpected arrival. Achilles was delighted with the beauty and the warlike spirit of the youth, and Nestor too was proud of his son, and took him to Agamemnon. According to Philostratus, Antilochus was not slain by the Ethiopian Memnon, but by a Trojan of that name. Achilles not only avenged his death on Memnon, but celebrated splendid funeral games, and burnt the head and armour of Memnon on the funeral pyre. (Comp. Böckh, ad Pind. p. 299.) Antilochus was painted by Polygnotus in the Lesche of Delphi. (Paus. x. 30, § 1; Philostr. Icon. ii. 7.) [L. S.]

ANTILOCUS (Ἀντιλόχος), a Greek historian, who wrote an account of the Greek philosophers from the time of Pythagoras to the death of Epicurus, whose system he himself adopted. (Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 133.) He seems to be the same as the Antiloche mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius (De Cont. Vert. 4; comp. Aenigm. Descript. Opytvm, xlix.) Theodoret (Therap. viii. p. 908) quotes an Antilochus as his authority for placing the tomb of Cecrops on the acropolis of Athens, but as Clemens of Alexandria (Propept. p. 18) and Athenæus (adv. Gvnt. vi. 6) refer for the same fact to a writer of the name of Antiloche, there may possibly be an error in Theodoret. [L. S.]

ANTIMACHIDES, architect. [ANTISTATES.]

ANTIMACHUS (Ἀντιμάχος), a Trojan, who, when Menelaus and Odysseus came to Troy to ask for the surrender of Helen, advised his countrymen to put the ambassadors to death. (Hom. II. xi. 122, &c., 133, &c.) It was Antimachus who principally insisted upon Helen not being restored to the Greeks. (II. xi. 125.) He had three sons, and when two of them, Peisander and Hippodochus, fell into the hands of Menelaus, they were both put to death.

There are three other mythical personages of this name. (Hygin. Fab. 170; Schol. ad Pind. Idam. iv. 104; Or. Med. xii. 460.) [L. S.]

ANTIMACHUS (Ἀντιμάχος), 1. Of Claros, a son of Hipparchus, was a Greek epic and elegiac poet. (Cic. Brut. 51; Or. Trist. i. 61.) He is usually called a Colophonian, probably only because Claros belonged to the dominion of Colophon. He flourished during the latter portion of the Peloponnesian war. (Diod. xiii. 106.) The statement of Suidas that he was a disciple of Panysius would make him belong to an earlier date, but the fact that he is mentioned in connexion with Lysander and Plato the philosopher sufficiently indicates the age to which he belonged. (Plut. Lynd. 16; Proclus, ad Plat. Tha. i. p. 28.) Plutarch relates that at the Lysandria— for thus the Samians called their great festival of the Herma— to honour Lysander—Antimachus entered upon a poetical contest with one Niceratus of Heraclea. The latter obtained the prize from Lysander himself, and Antimachus, disheartened by his failure, destroyed his own poem. Plato, then a young man, happened to be present, and consoling the unsuccessful poet by saying, that ignorance, like blindness, was a misfortune to those who laboured under it. The meeting between Antimachus and Plato is related differently by Cicero (i. c.), who also places it manifestly at a different time and probably also at a different place; for, according to him, Antimachus once read to a numerous audience his voluminous poem (Thebaids), and his hearers were so wearied with it, that all gradually left the place with the exception of Plato, whereupon the poet said, "I shall nevertheless continue to read for one Plato is worth more than all the thousand of other hearers." Now an anecdote similar to the one related by Cicero is recorded of Antagoras [ANTAGORAS], and this repetition of the same occurrence, together with other improbable happenings, have led Weecker (Der Epigraphus Cyclus, p. 105, &c.) to reject the two anecdotes altogether as inventions, made either to show the misanthropic character of those epic, or to insinuate that, though they did not suit the taste of the multitude they were duly appreciated by men of learning and intelligence.

The only other circumstance of the life of Antimachus that we know is, his love for Lyde, who was either his mistress or his wife. He follows her to Lydia; but she appears to have died soon after, and the poet returned to Colophon, where he made conversation in the compilation of an elegy called Lyde, which was very celebrated in antiquity. (Athen. xiii. p. 599; Brunck, Anwelt. p. 219.) This elegy, which was very long, consisted of accounts of the misfortunes of all the mythical heroes who, like the poet, had been unfortunate through the early death of their beloved. (Plut. Consol. ad Apollon. p. 106, &c.) Thus contained vast stores of mythical and quarian information, and it was chiefly for this a not for any higher or poetical reason, that Agatharchides made an abridgment of it. (Phot. Biblioth. p. 101, ed. Bekker.)

The principal work of Antimachus was his epic poem called Thebaids (Thebaidi), which Cicero designates as magnificent volumen. Parphryus (ad Hom. ad Pison. 146) says, that Antimachus had spun out his poem so much, that in the 24th book (volumen) his Seven Heroes had not yet arrived at Thebes. Now as in the remaining part of the work the poet had not only to describe the war of the Seven, but also probably treated of the war of the Epigoni (Schol. ad Aristoph. Pax. 1286), the length of the poem must have been immense. It was, like the elegy Lydes, full of mythological lore, and all that had any connexion with the subject of the poem was incorporated in it. It was, of course, difficult to control such a mass, and hence we find it stated by Quintilian (x. 1. § 55; comp. Dionys., Hal. De verbo. Coepos. 22), that Antimachus was unsuccessful in his descriptions of passion, that his work was not new to his readers, and that he was deficient in arrangement. His style also had not the simple and easy flow of the Homeric poems. He borrowed expressions and phrases from the tragic writers, and frequently introduced Doric forms. (Schol. ad Nisus Thoasii. 3.) Antimachus was thus one of the forerunners of the poets of the Alexandrine school, who wrote more for the learned and a select number of readers than for the public at large. The Alexandrine grammarians assigned to him the second place among the epic poets, and a select number of readers than for the public at large. ANTINOUGH (Antinous), a son of Eupitheus of Thucen, and one of the suitors of Penelope, who during the absence of Odysseus even attempted to make himself master of the kingdom and threaten the life of Telemachus. (Hom. Od. xxii. 48, &c., lv. 630, &c., xvi. 371.) When Odysseus after his return appeared in the disguise of a beggar, Antinous insulted him and threw a foot-stool at him. (Od. xvii. 42, &c.) On this account he was the first of the suitors who fell by the hands of Odysseus. (xxi. 8, &c.) [L. S.]

ANTINOUS (Antinous), a chief among the Molossians in Epeirus, who became involved, against his own will, in the war of Perseus, king of Macedonia, against the Romans. His family and that of another chief, Cephalus, were connected with the royal house of Macedonia by friendship, and although he was convinced that the war against Rome would be ruinous to Macedonia and threatened the life of Telemachus. (Horn. Od. xxii. 48, &c., lv. 630, &c., xvi. 371.) When Odysseus after his return appeared in the disguise of a beggar, Antinous insulted him and threw a foot-stool at him. (Od. xvii. 42, &c.) ANTINOUS (Antinous), a youth, probably of low origin, born at Bithynium or Claudopolis in Bithynia. On account of his extraordinary beauty he was taken by the emperor Hadrian to be his page, and soon became the object of his extravagant affection. Hadrian took him with him on all his journeys. It was in the course of one of these that he was drowned in the Nile. It is uncertain whether his death was accidental, or whether he threw himself into the river, either from disgust at the life he led, of a superstitious belief that by so doing he should avert some calamity from the emperor. Dion Cassius favours the latter supposition. The grief of the emperor knew no bounds. He strove to perpetuate the memory of his favourite by monuments of all kinds. He rebuilt the city of Bera in the Thesalai, near which Antinous was drowned, and gave it the name of Antinopis. He enrolled Antinous amongst the gods, caused temples to be erected to him in Egypt and Greece (at Mantinea), and statues of him to be set up in almost every part of the world. In one of the sanctuaries dedicated to him coins were delivered in his name. Games were also celebrated in his honour. (Dict. of Ant. s. v. "Aurelius.") A star between the eagle and the zodiac, which the courtiers of the emperor pretended had then first made its appearance, and was the soul of Antinous, received his name, which it still bears. A large number of works of art of all kinds were executed in his honour, and many of them are still extant. They have been diffusely described and classified by Konrad Levezow in his treatise Über den Antinons dergestellt in den Kunstblättern des Alterthums. The death of Antinous, which took place probably in A. D. 122, seems to have formed an em in the history of ancient art. (Dion Cass. lxxv. 11; Spartan. Hadrian. 14; Paus. viii. 9. § 4.)

[ANTIOCHUS]

There were various medals struck in honour of Antinous in the Greek cities, but none at Rome or in any of the Roman colonies. In the one annexed, which was struck at Bithynium, the birthplace of Hadrian, the inscription is Η ΠΑΤΡΙΣ ΑΝΤΙΝΩΝ ΘΕΟΝ, that is, "His native country (reverences) the god Antinous." The inscription on the reverse is nearly effaced on the medal from which the drawing was made: it was originally ΑΠΙΑΝΗΝ ΒΙΟΝΑΕΝ. On it Mercury is represented with a bull by his side, which probably represented with a bull by his side, which probably has reference to Apeis. (Eckhel, vi. p. 526, &c.)

ANTIOCHIS (Ἁντίοχις). 1. A sister of Antiochus the Great, married to Xerxes, king of Armenia, a city between the Euphrates and the Tigris. (Polyb. viii. 23.)

2. A daughter of Antiochus the Great, married to Ariarathes, king of Cappadocia, bore to her husband two daughters and a son named Mithridates. (Polyb. viii. 3.)

3. A daughter of Achaeus, married to Attalus, and the mother of Attalus I., king of Pergamus. (Strab. xiii. p. 624.)

ANTIOCHUS (Ἁντίοχος). There are three mythical personages of this name, concerning whom nothing of any interest is related. (Diod. iv. 37; Paus. i. 5. § 2, x. 10. § 1; Apollod. ii. 4. § 5, &c.; Hygin. Fab. 170.)

ANTIOCHUS (Ἁντίοχος), of Aegae in Cilicia, a sophist, or as he himself pretended to be, a Cynic philosopher. He flourished about A. D. 200, during the reign of Severus and Caracalla. He belonged to a distinguished family, some members of which were afterwards raised to the consulship at Rome. He took no part in the political affairs of his native place, but with his large property, which was increased by the liberality of the emperors, he was enabled to support and relieve his fellow-citizens whenever it was needed. He used to spend his nights in the temple of Asclepius, partly on account of the dreams and the communications with the god in them, and partly on account of the conversation of other persons who likewise spent their nights there without being able to sleep. During the war of Caracalla against the Parthians he was at first of some service to the Roman army by his Cynic mode of life, but afterwards he deserted to the Parthians together with Tiridates.

Antiochus was one of the most distinguished rhetoricians of his time. He was a pupil of Durannus, the Assyrian, and Dioniysius, the Milesian. He used to speak extempore, and his declamations and orations were distinguished for their pathos, their richness in thought, and the precision of their style, which had nothing of the pomp and bombast of other rhetoricians. But he also acquired some reputation as a writer. Philostratus mentions an historical work of his (τοιροπλα) which is praised for the elegance of its style, but what was the subject of this history is unknown. Phrynichus (p. 32; refers to a work of his called Ἀγογεία. Philostr. Vit. Soph. ii. 4. § 4; Dion Cass. lxxvii. 19. Suidas, s. e.; Eudoc. p. 58.)

[ANTIOCHUS (Ἁντίοχος), of Alexandria wrote a work on the Greek poets of the middle Attic comedy. (Athen. xi. p. 292.) Fabrius thinks that he is, perhaps, the same man as the mythographer Antiochus, who wrote a work on mythical traditions arranged according to the place where they were current. (Ptolem. Hecphast. 9; Phot. Cod. 190.) Some writers are inclined to consider the mythographer as the same with Antiochus of Aegae or Antiochus of Syracuse; but nothing certain can be said about the matter. (L. S. Antiochus (Ἁντίοχος), of Arcadian, was the envoy sent by his state to the Persian court in the c. 367, when embassies went to Susa from most of the Greek states. The Arcadians, probably through the influence of Pelopidas, the Thespian ambassador, were treated as of less importance than the Eleans—an affront which Antiochus resented by refusing the presents of the king. (Xen. Hell. vii. 1. § 63, &c.; Xenophon says, that Antiochus had conquered in the pannonium; or Pausanias informs us (vi. 3. § 4), that Antiochus the pannoniast, was a native of Lepreum, and that he conquered in this contest once in the Olympic games, twice in the Nemean, and twice in the Isthmian. His statue was made by Nico adipatos, a son of Hendric, and was erected by the Arcadians as one of their towns, whence Xenophon calls Antiochus: Arcadian; but it is more usually reckoned as belonging to Elis.

ANTIOCHUS (Ἁντίοχος), of Ascalon, a founder, as he is called, of the fifth Academy, a friend of Lucullus the antagonist of Mithridates and the teacher of Cicero during his studies in Athens (n. c. 79); but he had a school at Alexandria also, as well as in Syria, where he seems to have ended his life. (Plut. Cic. c. 4, Lucull. c. 4 Cic. Acad. ii. 19.) He was a philosopher of considerable reputation in his time, for Strabo in... scribing Ascalon, mentions his birth there as a mark of distinction for the city (Strab. xiv. p. 759), and Cicero frequently speaks of him in affectionate and respectful terms as the best and wisest of the Academics, and the most polished and acute philosopher of his age. (Cic. Acad. ii. 35, Brut. 91.)

He studied under Plato, Archelaus, and the master of the fourth Academy. He is, however, better known as the adversary than the disciple of Plato; and Cicero mentions a treatise called Sosus (Cic. Acad. iv. 4), written by him against his master, in which he refutes the scepticism of the Academics. Another of his works, called "Canonica," is quoted by Sextus Empiricus, and appears to have been a treatise on logic. (Sext. Emp. vii. 201, see not. in loc.)

The sceptical tendency of the Academic philosophy before Antiochus, probably had its origin in Plato's successful attempts to lead his disciples to abstract reasoning as the right method of discovering truth; and to this extent the sceptics found support in the views of the senses. Cicero even ranks Plato himself with those philosophers who held, that there was no such thing as certainty in any kind of knowledge (Acad. ii. 23); as if his depreciation of the senses as trustworthy organs of perception, and of the kind of knowledge which they convey, invalidated also the conclusions of the reason. There is, however, no doubt that later philosophers, either by insisting too exclusively on the uncertainty of the senses (in order like Arcesilas to exaggerate by comparison the value of speculative truth), or like Carneades and Philo, by extending the same fallibility to the reason likewise, had gradually fallen into a degree of scepticism that seemed to strike at the root of all truth, theoretical and practical. It was, therefore, the chief object of Antiochus, besides inculcating particular doctrines in moral philosophy, to examine the grounds of our knowledge, and our capacities for discovering truth; though no complete judgment can be formed of his success, as the book in which Cicero gave the fullest representation of his opinions has been lost. (Cic. ad Fam. i. 8.)

He professed to be reviving the doctrines of the old Academy, or of Plato's school, when he maintained, in opposition to Philo and Carneades, that he intellect had in itself a test by which it could distinguish truth from falsehood; or in the language of the Academics, discern between the things arising from actual objects and those conceptions that had no corresponding reality. (Cic. Acad. ii. 13.) For the argument of the sceptics was, that if two notions were so exactly similar as not they could not be distinguished, neither of them could be said to be known with more certainty than the other; and that every true notion was liable to have a false one of this kind attached to it: therefore nothing could be certainly known. (Id. 13.) This reasoning was obviously overthrown by the assertion, that the mind contained within itself the standard of truth and falsehood; and was also met more generally by the argument that all such reasoning refutes itself, since it proceeds upon principles assumed to be true, and then excludes that there can be no certain ground for any assumption at all. (Id. 34.) In like manner antiocicu seems to have taken the side of the Academics in defending the senses from the charge of utter fallaciousness brought against them by the Academics. (Id. 32.)

It is evident that in such discussions the same questions were examined which had formerly been more thoroughly sifted by Plato and Aristotle, in analysis of the nature of science and treating of the different kinds of truth, and of the means of acquiring them. The Academics despised, so the notices extant of Antiochus' moral teaching seem to shew, that without yielding to the paradoxes of the Stoics, or the latitudinarianism of the Academics, he held in the main doctrines nearly coinciding with those of Aristotle: as, that happiness consists essentially in a virtuous life, yet is not independent of external things. (Id. 42, de Fin. v. 25, Tusc. Quaesit. v. 8.) So he denied the Stoic doctrine, that all crimes were equal (Acad. ii. 43), but agreed with them in holding, that all the emotions ought to be supposed within the soul and the body, and that Cicero inclines to rank him among the Stoics (id. 43), it appears that he considered himself an eclectic philosopher, and attempted to unite the doctrines of the Stoics and Peripatetics, so as to revive the old Academy. (Sext. Empir. i. 235.) [C. E. P.]

ANTIOPHUS (Ἀντίοχος), or an Astronomer of uncertain date, whose work "Ἀποτελεσματικά" still exists in MS. in various libraries, and has not yet been printed. (Fabr. Bibl. Gr. iv. p. 151.) There is an introduction to the Tetrabiblos of Ptolemaeus, of which the original text with a Latin translation by H. Wolf was published at Basel, 1559, fol., as the work of an anonymous writer. T. Gale (ad Annal. de Myst. p. 364) claims this introduction as the work of Antiocbus, whose name, however, occurs in the work itself. (P. 194.) [L. S.]

ANTIOPHUS (Ἀντίοχος), or an Athenian, was left by Alcibiades at Notium in command of the Athenian fleet, n. c. 407, with strict injunctions not to fight with Lysander. Antiochus was the master of Alcibiades' own ship, and his personal friend; he was a skilful seaman, but arrogant and heedless of consequences. His intimacy with Alcibiades had first arisen upon an occasion mentioned by Plutarch (Alcib. 19), who tells us, that Alcibiades in one of his first appearances in the popular assembly allowed a tame quail to escape from under his cloak, which occurrence suspended the business of the assembly, till it was caught by Antiocbus and given to Alcibiades.

Antiocbus gave no heed to the injunctions of Alcibiades, and provoked Lysander to an engagement in which fifteen Athenian ships were lost, and Antiocbus himself was slain. This defeat was one of the main causes that led to the second banishment of Alcibiades. (Xen. Hell. i. 5, § 11, &c.; Diod. xiii. 71; Plut. Alcib. 35.)

ANTIOPHUS I. (Ἀντίοχος), king of Comagene, a small country between the Euphrates and mount Taurus, the capital of which was Samosata. It formerly formed part of the Syrian dominion of the Seleucidae, but probably became an independent principality during the civil wars of Antiochus Grypus and his brother. It has been supposed by some, that Antiocbus Asiaticus, the last king of Syria, is the same as Antiocbus, the first king of Comagene; but there are no good reasons for this opinion. (Clinton, F. H. iii. p. 343.)
This king is first mentioned about B. C. 69, in the campaign of Lucullus against Tigranes. (Dion Cass. Frag. xxxv. 2.)

After Pompey had deposed Antiochus Asiaticus, the last king of Syria, B. C. 65, he marched against Antiochus of Commagene, with whom he shortly afterwards concluded a peace. (b. c. 64.) Pompey added to his dominions Seleucia and the conquests he had made in Mesopotamia. (Appian, Mithr. 106, 114.) When Cicero was governor of Cilicia (b. c. 51), he received from Antiochus intelligence of the movements of the Parthians. (Cic. ad Fam. xvi. 1, 3, 4.) In the civil war between Caesar and Pompey (b. c. 49), Antiochus assisted the latter with troops. (Caesar, B. C. iii. 5; Appian, B. C. ii. 49.) In B. C. 36, Ventidius, the legate of M. Antonius, after conquering the Parthians, marched against Antiochus, attracted by the great treasures which this king possessed; and Antonius, arriving at the army just as the war was commencing, took it into his own hands, and laid siege to Samosata. He was, however, enabled to take the place, and was glad to retire after making peace with Antiochus. (Dion Cass. xlii. 20-22; Plat. Ant. 34.)

A daughter of Antiochus married Orodes, king of Parthia. (Dion Cass. xlii. 23.) We do not know the exact period of the death of Antiochus, but he must have died before B. C. 51, as his successor Mithridates is mentioned as king of Commagene in that year. (Plut. Ant. 61.)

ANTIOCHUS II. (Ἀντίοχος), king of COMMAGENE, succeeded Mithridates I., and was summoned to Rome by Augustus and executed in B. C. 29, because he had caused the assassination of an ambassador, whom his brother had sent to Rome. Augustus gave the kingdom to Mithridates II., who was then a boy, because his father had been murdered by the king. (Dion Cass. iii. 43, liv. 9.)

ANTIOCHUS III. (Ἀντίοχος), king of COMMAGENE, seems to have succeeded Mithridates II. We know nothing more of him than that he died in A. D. 17. (Tac. Ann. ii. 42.) Upon his death, Commagene became a Roman province (Tac. Ann. ii. 56), and remained so till A. D. 38, when Antiochus Epiphanes was appointed king by Caligula.

ANTIOCHUS IV. (Ἀντίοχος), king of COMMAGENE, surnamed EPIPHANES (Ἐπιφάνης), was apparently a son of Antiochus III., and received his paternal dominion from Caligula in A. D. 38, with a part of Cilicia bordering on the sea-coast in addition. Caligula also gave him the whole amount of the revenues of Commagene during the twenty years that it had been a Roman province. (Dion Cass. lix. 3; Suet. Cal. 16.) He lived on most intimate terms with Caligula, and he and Herod Agrippa are spoken of as the instructors of the emperor in the art of tyranny. (Dion Cass. lix. 24.) This friendship, however, was not of very long continuance, for he was subsequently deposed by Caligula and did not obtain his kingdom again till the accession of Claudius in A. D. 41. (Dion Cass. lix. 6.) In A. D. 43 his son, also called Antiochus Epiphanes, was betrothed to Drusilla, the daughter of Agrippa. (Joseph. Ant. xix. B. § 1.) In A. D. 53 Antiochus put down an insurrection of some.bandana tribes in Cilicia, called Cilitea. (Tac. Ann. xii. 55.) In A. D. 55 he received orders from Nero to levy troops to make war against the Parthians, and in the year 69 he served under Corbulo against Tigrdates, brother of the Parthian king Vologeses. (xiii.

7, 37.) In consequence of his services in this war, he obtained in the year 61 part of Armenia. (xiv. 26.) He espoused the side of Vespasian, when he was proclaimed emperor in A. D. 70; and he is then spoken of as the richest of the tributary kings. (Tac. Hist. ii. 81.) In the same year he sent forces, commanded by his son Antiochus, to assist Titus in the siege of Jerusalem. (Joseph. B. J. Jud. v. 11 § 3; Tac. Hist. v. 1.) Two years afterwards, A. D. 72, he was accused by Ptolemaus, the governor of Syria, of conspiring with the Parthians against the Romans, and was in consequence deprived of his kingdom, after a reign of thirty-four years from his first appointment by Caligula. He first retired to Lacedaemon, and then to Rome, where he passed the remainder of his life with his sons Antiochus and Callinicus, and was treated with great respect. (Joseph. B. J. vii. 7.) There are several coins of this king extant, from which we learn, that the name of his wife was Isoute. In the one annexed he is called BAXIAETE NEPA2 ANTI0X02. On the reverse a scorpion is represented, surrounded with the foliage of the laurel, and inscribed KOMMArHNftN. (Eckhel, iii. p. 255, &c.; comp. Clinton, F. H. iii. p. 343, &c.)

ANTIOCHUS (Ἀντίοχος), an EPIGRAMMATIC poet, one of whose epigrams is extant in the Greek Anthology. (xi. 412.)

[LS.]

ANTIOCHUS HIERAX (Ἀντίοχος Ἦρας), so called from his grasping and ambitious character, was the younger son of Antiochus II., king of Syria. On the death of his father in B. C. 246 Antiochus waged war upon his brother Seleucus Callinicus, in order to obtain Asia Minor for himself as an independent kingdom. This war lasted for many years, but Antiochus was at length entirely defeated, chiefly through the efforts of Attalus, king of Pergamus, who drove him out of Asia Minor. Antiochus subsequently fled to Egypt where he was killed by robbers in A. D. 227. He married a daughter of Zelas, king of Bithynia. (Justin. xxxvii. 2, 3; Poly. arm. iv. 17; Plat. Moc. p. 489, a.; Euseb. Chron. Arm. pp. 346, 347 Clinton, F. H. iii. pp. 311, 312, 413.) Apollo i represented on the reverse of the annexed coin (Eckhel, iii. p. 219.)

COIN OF ANTIOCHUS HIERAX.
ANTIQUITY.

ANTIQUUS, a Jurist, who was at the head of the commission appointed to compile the Theodosian Code. He was praefectus praetorio and consul. In the 33rd Novell of Theodosius the Younger (A.D. 444), he is spoken of as a person deceased, illustri memoriae Antiucus. He is mentioned by Marcellinus as living in the year 448, and Antiucus, the eunuch, who was praepositus sancti cabuci. This error was pointed out by Ritter in the 6th volume of his edition of the Theodosian Code, p. 614. [J. T. G.]

ANTIQUUS (Антинукс), or АНТОК (Antokas), a Syrian Philosopher, and a disciple of Aelius, mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius, (ix. 106,116.) [L.S.]

ANTIQUUS (Αντικυσ), a monk of the monastery of St. Saba, near Jerusalem, flourished at the time of the taking of Jerusalem by the Persians. (A.D. 614.) He wrote, besides other works of little importance, one entitled παρακλήσεις της ἀγίας γραφής, an epitome of the Christian faith, as contained in scripture, in 130 chapters. This work was first published in Latin by Tilman, Paris, 1643, 8vo, reprinted in the Bibliotheca Patrum, Paris, 1579; Colon. 1618; Lugd. 1677. The original Greek was first published by Pronto Duances, in his Auctorum Patrum. Paris, 1624, reprinted in Morel's Bibli. Patr., Paris, 1644. A fragment of it is printed in Fabricius' Bibl. Graec. x. p. 501. [P. S.]

ANTIQUUS PA'CCUUS. [Βασιλεύς Anti¬tνικούς]

ANTIQUUS PHILOMETOR (Φιλωμητήρ) is supposed by some persons to have been a physician, or druggist, who must have lived in or before the second century after Christ; he is the inventor of an antidote against poisonous reptiles, &c., of which the prescription is embodied in a short Greek elegiac poem. The poem is inserted as a supplement by Galen in one of his works (De Antid. ii. 14, 17, vol. xiv. pp. 165, 201), but nothing is known of the history of the author. Others suppose that a physician of this name is not the author either of the poem or the antidote, but that they are connected in some way with the Theriac which Antiucus the Great, king of Syria, was in the habit of using, and the prescription for which he dedicated in verse to Aesculapius (Plin. H. N. xx. ap. ult.) or Apollo. (Plin. Valer. De Re Med. iv. 18.) (See Cagnati Variae Observation. ii. 25, p. 174, d. Rom. 1597.) [W. A. G.]

ANTIQUUS (Αντικυσ). 1. A PHYSICIAN, who appears to have lived at Rome in the second century after Christ. Galen gives a precise account of De Sanit. Tuenda 332, p. 140, &c. The fragments of Antiucus are contained in scripture, in 130 chapters. This work was first published by Fronto Ducaeus, in his Auctorum Patrum, Paris, 1579; Colon. 1618; Lugd. 1677. The original Greek was first published by Pronto Duances, in his Auctorum Patrum. Paris, 1624, reprinted in Morel's Bibli. Patr., Paris, 1644. A fragment of it is printed in Fabricius' Bibl. Graec. x. p. 501. [P. S.]

ANTIQUUS (Αντικυσ), an Athenian sculptor, whose name is inscribed on his statue of Athena in the Villa Ludovisi at Rome. (Winkelmann's Werke, iv. 375, vi. 292, ed. 1629.) [P. S.]

ANTIQUUS (Αντικυσ), the father of S. LUCRÉCE, NOCTH, the eunuch in the imperial court. The name of Antiucus Soter, was one of Philip's generals. (Justin. xiv. 4.) A genealogical table of his descendants is given under Seleucidae.

ANTIQUUS (Αντικυσ), of SYRACUSE, a son of Xenophanes, is called by Dionysius of Halicarnassus (Ant. Rom. i. 12) a very ancient historian. He lived about the year n. c. 423, and was thus a contemporary of Thucydides and the Peloponnesian war. (Joseph. c. Apro. i. 3.) Respecting his life nothing is known, but his historical works were held in very high esteem by the ancients on account of their accuracy. (Dionys. l. 75.) His two works were: 1. A history of Sicily, in nine books, from the reign of king Cocalus, a.d. 790, to the earliest times down to the year n. c. 424 or 425. (Diod. xii. 71.) It is referred to by Pausanias (x. 11. § 3), Clemens of Alexandria (Protrept. p. 22), and Theodoret. (P. 115.)—2. A history of Italy, which is very frequently referred to by Strabo (p. 424, vi. 252, 254, 255, 257, 262, 264, 265, 278), by Dionysius (ll. cc., and i. 22, 35; comp. Steph. Byz. s. v. Πέπτων; Hesych. s. v. Χωρά; Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, i. p. 14, &c. The fragments of Antiucus are con-

ANTIQUUS.

Literature, he finally embraced the medical profession, not for the sake of gain, but merely that he might be useful to mankind. He spent some time in Asia Minor, where he exercised his profession gratuitously, and used to endeavour to convert his patients to Christianity. He then went to Sardinia during the persecution against the Christians under Hadrian, about A. D. 120, where he is said to have been cruelly tortured, and at last miraculously delivered by being taken up into heaven. His memory is celebrated by the Romish church on the 13th of December.

3. The other was born at Sebastos in Armenia, and was put to death during the persecution under Diocletian, A. D. 303—311. He is said to have been tormented, and thrown to the wild beasts, and, when these refused to touch him, at last beheaded; it is added that milk, instead of blood, issued from his neck, upon which the executioner immediately professed himself to be a Christian, and accordingly suffered martyrdom with him. His memory is celebrated by the Greek and Romish churches on the 15th of July. (Mariologium Romanum; Beovius, Nomenclator Sacrorum Professionis Medicorum; Acta Sanctorum, Jul. 15, vol. iv. p. 25; Clementia, Monagorum Graecorum, vol. iii. p. 168; Fabricius, Biblioth. Graec. vol. xiii. p. 64, ed. vel.) [W. A. G.]

ANTIQUUS (Αντικυσ), bishop of Palaestina, was a Syrian by birth. He lived about the beginning of the 6th century after Christ, he went to Constantinople, where his eloquent preaching attracted such attention, that he was called by some another Chrysostom. He afterwards took part warmly with the enemies of Chrysostom, and died not later than 408 A. D. Besides many sermons, he left a large work "against Avarice," which is lost. (Gennad. 29; Theodoret. Dial. ii.; Phot. Cod. 268; Act. Concil. Ephes. iii. p. 118, Labbe; Catal. Cod. Vindobon. pt. i. p. 116, No. 55.) [P. S.]

ANTIQUUS (Αντικυσ), the father of S. LUCRÉCE, NOCTH, the eunuch in the imperial court. The name of Antiucus Soter, was one of Philip's generals. (Justin, xiv. 4.) A genealogical table of his descendants is given under Seleucidae.

ANTIQUUS (Αντικυσ), of SYRACUSE, a son of Xenophanes, is called by Dionysius of Halicarnassus (Ant. Rom. i. 12) a very ancient historian. He lived about the year n. c. 423, and was thus a contemporary of Thucydides and the Peloponnesian war. (Joseph. c. Apro. i. 3.) Respecting his life nothing is known, but his historical works were held in very high esteem by the ancients on account of their accuracy. (Dionys. l. 75.) His two works were: 1. A history of Sicily, in nine books, from the reign of king Cocalus, a.d. 790, to the earliest times down to the year n. c. 424 or 425. (Diod. xii. 71.) It is referred to by Pausanias (x. 11. § 3), Clemens of Alexandria (Protrept. p. 22), and Theodoret. (P. 115.)—2. A history of Italy, which is very frequently referred to by Strabo (p. 424, vi. 252, 254, 255, 257, 262, 264, 265, 278), by Dionysius (ll. cc., and i. 22, 35; comp. Steph. Byz. s. v. Antiochus I. (Antiochos), king of Syria, surnamed Soter (Soter), was the son of Seleucus Nicator and a Persian lady, Apana. The marriage of his father with Apana was one of those marriages which Alexander celebrated at Susa in B. C. 325, when he gave Persian wives to his generals. This would fix the birth of Antiochus about B. C. 324. He was present with his father at the battle of Ipsus in B. C. 301, which secured for Seleucus the government of Asia. It is related of Antiochus, that he fell sick through love of Stratonicc, the young wife of his father, and the daughter of Demetrius Poliorcetes, and that when his father learnt the cause of his illness through his physician Erastistratus, he resigned Stratonicc to him, and gave him the government of Upper Asia with the title of king. On the murder of his father in Macedonia in B. C. 290, Antiochus succeeded to the whole of his dominions, and prosecuted his claims to the throne of Macedonia against Antigonus Gonatas, but eventually allowed the latter to retain possession of Macedonia on his marrying Phila, the daughter of Seleucus and Stratonicc. The rest of Antiochus' reign was chiefly occupied in wars with the Gauls, who had invaded Asia Minor. In one campaign he recovered the provinces in dispute. He was the more anxiously anxious to make peace with Ptolemy, as he wished to give the insult that had been shown her, and, still mistrusting Antiochus, caused him to be murdered as well as Berenice and her son. Antiochus was killed in B. C. 246, after a reign of fifteen years. By Laodice he had four children, Seleucus Callinicus, who succeeded him, Antiochus Hierax, a daughter, Stratonicc, married to Mithridates, and another daughter married to Arranathus. Philiparchus relates (Athen. x. p. 438), that Antiochus was much given to wine. (Appian, Syr. 65 ; Athen. ii. p. 45 ; Justin, xxvi. i. ; Polyaen. viii. 50 ; Val. Max. ix. 14. § 1, extern.; Hieronym. ad Dan. c. 11.) On the reverse of the coin annexed, Heracles is represented with his club in his hand. (Eckhel, iii. p. 218.)

COIN OF ANTIOCHUS I.

Antiochus II. (Antiochos), king of Syria, surnamed Theos (Theos), a surname which he derived from the Milesians whom he delivered from their tyrant, Timarchus, succeeded his father in B. C. 261. Soon after his accession he became involved in war with Ptolemy Philadephus, king of Egypt, which lasted for many years and greatly weakened the Syrian kingdom. Taking advantage of this weakness, Arsaces was able to establish the Parthian empire in B. C. 250; and his example was shortly afterwards followed by the Bactrians, who revolted from Antiochus and made Bactria an independent kingdom. The loss of these provinces induced Antiochus to sue for peace, which was granted (B. C. 250) on condition of his putting away his former wife Laodice and marrying Berenice, a daughter of Ptolemy. This connexion between Syria and Egypt is referred to in the book of Daniel (xi. 6), where by the king of the south we are to understand Egypt, and by the king of the north, Syria. On the death of Ptolemy two years afterwards Antiochus recalled Laodice, but she could not forgive the insult that had been shown her, and, still mistrusting Antiochus, caused him to be murdered as well as Berenice and her son. Antiochus was killed in B. C. 246, after a reign of fifteen years. By Laodice he had four children, Seleucus Callinicus, who succeeded him, Antiochus Hierax, a daughter, Stratonicc, married to Mithridates, and another daughter married to Arranathus. Max. ix. 14. § 1, extern.; Hieronym. ad Dan. c. 11.) On the reverse of the coin annexed, Heracles is represented with his club in his hand. (Eckhel, iii. p. 218.)

COIN OF ANTIOCHUS II.

Antiochus III. (Antiochos), king of Syria, surnamed the Great (Megas), was the son of Seleucus Callinicus, and succeeded to the throne on the death of his brother Seleucus Ceanus, B. C. 223, when he was only in his fifteenth year. His first cousin Achaeanus, who might easily have assumed the royal power, was of great use to Antiochus at the commencement of his reign, and recovered for the Syrian monarchy all the provinces in Asia Minor, which Attalus, king of Pergamus, had appropriated to himself. But Antiochus was not so fortunate in his eastern dominions. Molo and Alexander, two brothers, who had been appointed to the government of Media and Persis respectively, revolted and defeated the armies sent against them. They were, however, put down in a second campaign, conducted by Antiochus in person, who also added to his dominions the province of Media Atropatene. (B. C. 220.)

On his return from his eastern provinces, Antiochus commenced war against Ptolemy Philadephus, king of Egypt, in order to obtain Coelo-Syria, Phoenicia, and Palestine, which he maintained he could not fortify in his eastern dominions. Molo and Alexander, two brothers, who had been appointed to the government of Media and Persis respectively, revolted and defeated the armies sent against them. They were, however, put down in a second campaign, conducted by Antiochus in person, who also added to his dominions the province of Media Atropatene. (B. C. 220.)

Antiochus seems now to have formed the design of regaining the eastern provinces of Asia, which had revolted during the reign of Antiochus II. He accordingly declared war against Armenia, and, with King Tigranes and Euthydemus, king of Bactria, took upon him the conduct of the war for some years. Although Antiochus met with the whole with great success, he found it hopeless to effect the subjugation of these kingdoms, and accordingly concluded a peace with them on the most advantageous terms on condition of his ceding all his dominions west of the Euphrates to the Romans. At the commencement of his war with Antiochus, the Romans had going on in Asia a war with the Gauls, and the fleet of Scipio had just been defeated at the battle of Marseilles. Hannibal was despatched to Asia to take command of the Roman fleet, which was then engaged in a war with the Gauls. Hannibal immediately set to work to raise money for the purposes of the war, and the Roman fleet was soon in a fit state to set sail. Antiochus was now at a loss for the best means of opposing Hannibal, and decided on taking advantage of the ignorance of the Romans concerning the coast of Asia Minor, and the want of means to raise money for the purpose of carrying on the war. 675, ed. Wess.; Strab. xvi. p. 744; Fröhlich, Annales, p. 39; Eckhel, iii. p. 220, &c.) Apollo is represented on the reverse of the coin.

ANTIOCHUS IV. (Ἀντιώχος), king of SYRIA, surnamed EPIPHAINES (Ἐπιφανὴς), and on coins Θεός (Oéos) also, was the son of Antiochus III., and was given as a hostage to the Romans in b. c.
188. He was released from captivity in b. c. 175 through his brother Seleucus Philopator, who gave his own son Demetrius in his stead. While Antiochus was at Athens on his return to Syria in this year, Seleucus was murdered by Heliodo-rus, who seized upon the crown. Antiochus, however, with the assistance of Attalus easily expelled the usurper, and ascended the throne in the same year. (b. c. 175.) Demetrius remained at Rome.

Cleopatra, the sister of Antiochus, who had been betrothed to Ptolemy Epiphanes, was now dead, and Antiochus therefore claimed the provinces of Coele-Syria and Palestine, which had been given as her dowry. As the Romans were at this time engaged in a war with Perseus, king of Macedonia, Antiochus thought it a favourable opportunity to prosecute his claims, and accordingly declared war against Egypt. In four cam-paigins (b. c. 171—168), he not only obtained possession of the countries to which he laid claim, but almost completed the conquest of Egypt, and was preparing to lay siege to Alexandria, when a Roman embassy commanded him to retire from the country. This command he thought it most prudent to obey, but he still retained possession of Coele-Syria and Palestine. The cruelties which Antiochus perpetrated against the Jews during this war, are recorded in the books of the Maccacbœces, and have rendered his name infamous. He took Jerusalem on his return from his second campaign into Egypt (b. c. 170), and again at the end of the fourth campaign (b. c. 169), and endeavoured to root out the Jewish religion and introduce the worship of the Greek divinities; but this attempt led to a rising of the Jewish people, under Mattathias and his heroic sons the Macca-bœces, which Antiochus was unable to put down.
Lysias, who was sent against them with a large army, was defeated; and Antiochus, who was in the eastern provinces at the time, hastened his return in order to avenge the disgrace which had befallen his arms. On his return he attempted to plunder a temple in Elymais, probably the same as his father had attacked, but was repulsed, and shortly afterwards died at Tabae in Persia, in a state of raving madness, which the Jews and Greeks equally attributed to his sacrilegious crimes.
His subjects gave him the name of Epiphanes (Ἐπιφανὴς) in parody of Epiphanes (Ἐπιφανῆς).

ANTIOCHUS.

He died in b. c. 164, after a reign of 11 years.
He left a son, Antiochus Eupator, who succeeded him, and a daughter, Laodice. (Liv. lib. xlii.—
xlv.; Polyb. lib. xxxv.—xxxvii.; Justin, xiviv. 3; Diod. Esc. pp. 579, 533, &c., ed. Wess.; Appian, Syrl. 45, 66; Maccab. lib. i. ii.; Joseph. Ant. xii.
5; Hieronym. ad Dan. c. 11; Eckhel, iii. p. 222,
&c.) On the reverse of the foregoing coin Jupiter is represented, holding a small figure of Victory in his right hand, and a spear in his left.

ANTIOCHUS V. (Ἀντιώχος), king of SYRIA, surnamed EUPATOR (Εὑπατώρ), was nine years old at his father's death, and reigned nominally for two years. (b. c. 164—162.) Lysias assumed the guardianship of the young king, though An-tiochus IV. had appointed Philip to this office.
Lysias, accompanied by the young king, continued
the war against the Jews, and laid siege to Jerusalem; but hearing that Philip was marching against him from Persia, he concluded a peace with the Jews. He then proceeded against Philip, whom he conquered and put to death. The Romans, availing themselves of the distracted state of Syria, sent an embassy to enforce the terms of the peace which had been concluded with Antiochus
the Great; but an insurrection was excited in consequence of these commands, in which Octavine, the chief of the embassy, was slain. About the same time Demetrius Soter, the son of Seleucus Philopator, who had remained in Rome up to this time [see ANTIOCHUS IV.], appeared in Syria and laied claim to the throne. Lysias and the young king fell into his hands, and were immediately put to death by him, b. c. 162. (Polyb. xxxxi. 12, 19; Appian, Syr. 46, 66; Joseph. Ant. xii. 10; 1 Mac-cab. vi. &c.; 2 Maccab. xiii., &c.; Gies. Phil. ix. 2.) Apollo is represented on the reverse of the annexed coin, as in those of Antiochus I. and III. The inscription at the foot, ETYIATOPOZ, is partly cut off.
verse of the annexed coin represents the Dioscuri riding on horseback, and has upon it the year OP, that is, the 170th year of the Seleucidæ. (Eckhel, iii. p. 231, &c.)

COIN OF ANTIOCHUS VII.

ANTIOCHUS VII. (Ἀντίοχος), king of Syria, surnamed SIDETES (Σιδητῆς), from Side in Pamphylia, where he was brought up, (and not from a Syriac word signifying a hunter,) and on coins Euergetes (Εὐεργήτης), was the younger son of Demetrius Soter, and obtained possession of the throne in B.C. 137, after conquering Tryphon, who had held the sovereignty since the murder of Antiochus VI. He married Cleopatra, the wife of his older brother Demetrius Nicator, who was a prisoner in the hand of the Parthians. He carried on war against the Jews, and took Jerusalem after almost a year's siege, in B.C. 135. He then granted them a peace on favourable terms, and next directed his arms against the Parthians. At first he met with success, but was afterwards defeated by the Parthian king, and lost his life in the battle, after a reign of nine years. (B.C. 128.) His son Seleucus was taken prisoner in the same battle. Antiochus, like many of his predecessors, was passionately devoted to the pleasures of the table. He had three sons and two daughters, the latter of whom both bore the name of Laodice. His sons were Antiochus, Seleucus, and Antiochus (Cyzicus), the last of whom subsequently succeeded to the throne. (Joseph. Ant. xiii. 8; 1 Mac. xv. &c.; Justin, xxxvi. 1, xxxvii. 10; Diod. xxxiv. Ed. 1; Athen. x. p. 439, xii. p. 540.) The reverse of the annexed coin represents Athena holding a small figure of Victory in her right hand. (Eckhel, iii. p. 235, &c.)

COIN OF ANTIOCHUS VIII.

ANTIOCHUS VIII. (Ἀντίοχος), king of Syria, surnamed GLYPUS (Γρύπος), or Hook-nosed, from γρύς, a vulture, and on coins Epiphanes (Ἐπιφανῆς), was the second son of Demetrius Nicator and Cleopatra. His eldest brother Seleucus was put to death by their mother Cleopatra, because he wished to have the power, and not merely the title, of king; and Antiochus was after his brother's death recalled from Athens, where he was studying, by his mother Cleopatra, that he might ear the title of king, while the real sovereignty remained in her hands. (B.C. 125.) At this time the greater part of Syria was in the power of the usurper Alexander Zebina [see p. 127, b.]; but Antiochus, with the assistance of Ptolemy Physcon, the king of Egypt, whose daughter he married, conquered Alexander and became master of the whole of Syria. Cleopatra then became jealous of him and plotted against his life; but her son compelled her to drink the poison she had prepared for him. (B.C. 120.) For the next eight years Antiochus reigned in peace; but at the end of that time his half-brother, Antiochus Cyzicus, the son of Antiochus Sidetes and their common mother Cleopatra, laid claim to the crown, and a civil war ensued. (B.C. 112.) The remaining history of the Seleucidæ till Syria became a Roman province, is hardly anything else but a series of civil wars between the princes of the royal family. In the first year of the struggle (B.C. 112), Antiochus Cyzicus became master of almost the whole of Syria, but in the next year (B.C. 111), A. Grypus regained a considerable part of his dominions; and it was then agreed that the kingdom should be shared between them, A. Cyzicus having Coele-Syria and Phoenicia, and A. Grypus the remainder of the provinces. This arrangement lasted, though with frequent wars between the two kings, till the death of Antiochus Grypus, who was assassinated by Heracious in B.C. 96, after a reign of twenty-nine years. He left five sons, Seleucus, Philip, Antiochus Epiphanes, Demetrius Eucercus, and Antiochus Dionysus. (Justin, xxxix. 1—3; Liv. Epit. 60; Appian, Syr. 69; Joseph. Antiq. xii. 15; Athen. xii. p. 540.) Many of the coins of Antiochus Grypus have the head of Antiochus on one side, and that of his mother Cleopatra on the other. The one annexed must have been struck after his mother's death. (Eckhel, iii. p. 238, &c.)

COIN OF ANTIOCHUS IX.

ANTIOCHUS IX. (Ἀντίοχος), king of Syria, surnamed CYZICENUS (Κυζικινός), from Cyzicus, where he was brought up, and on coins Philopator (Φιλοπάτωρ), reigned over Coele-Syria and Phoenicia from B.C. 111 to 96, as is stated in the preceding article. On the death of his brother, Antiochus VIII., he attempted to obtain possession of the whole of Syria; but his claims were resisted by Seleucus, the eldest son of Antiochus VIII., whom he was killed in battle, b. c. 95. He left behind him a son, Antiochus Eusebes, who succeeded to the throne. (Justin, Appian, Joseph. ii. cc.; Eckhel, iii. p. 241, &c.) The reverse of the foregoing coin is the same as that of Antiochus VII.

ANTIOCHUS X. (Ἀντίοχος), king of Syria, surnamed EUSEBES (Εὐσέβης), and on coins. Philopator Callinicus (Φιλόπατρος Καλλινικος) also, succeeded to the throne on the death of his father Antiochus IX. b. c. 95. He defeated Seleucus, who conquered his father, and compelled him to fly into Cilicia, where he perished; but he then had to contend with the next two brothers of Seleucus, Philip and Antiochus Epiphanes, the latter of whom assumed the title of king, and is known as the eleventh king of Syria of this name. In a battle fought near the Orontes, Antiochus X. defeated Philip and Antiochus XI., and the latter was drowned in the river. The crown was now assumed by Philip, who continued to prosecute the war assisted by his brother, Demetrius Eucerus. The Syrians, worn out with these civil broils, offered the kingdom to Tigranes, king of Armenia, who accordingly took possession of Syria in b. c. 83, and ruled over it till he was defeated by Lucullus in b. c. 69. The time of the death of Antiochus X. is uncertain. He appears, however, to have fallen in battle against the Parthians, before Tigranes obtained possession of Syria. (Joseph. Antip. xiii. 18, § 4.) According to some accounts he survived the reign of Tigranes, and returned to his kingdom after the conquest of the latter by Lucullus (Euseb. p. 192; Justin. x. 2); but these accounts ascribe to Antiochus X. what belongs to his son Antiochus XIII. (See Clinton, P. H. vol. iii. pp. 338, 340.) Jupiter is represented on the reverse of the annexed coin as in that of Antiochus IV.

COIN OF ANTIOCHUS X.

ANTIOCHUS XI. (Ἀντίοχος), king of Syria, surnamed EPIPHANES (Ἐπιφανής), was the son of Antiochus VIII., and is spoken of under Antiochus X.

COIN OF ANTIOCHUS XI.

ANTIOCHUS XII. (Ἀντίοχος), king of Syria, surnamed DIONYSUS (Διονύσος), and on coins Philopator Callinicus (Φιλόπατρος Καλλινικος) also, the youngest son of Antiochus VIII., assumed the title of king after his brother Demetrius had been taken prisoner by the Parthians. He fell in battle against Aretas, king of the Arabians. (Joseph. Ant. xiii. 15. § 1; Eckhel, iii. p. 246, &c.)

COIN OF ANTIOCHUS XII.

ANTIOCHUS XIII., king of Syria, surnamed ASIATICUS (Ἀσιατικός), and on coins Dionysus Philopator Callinicus (Διονύσος Φιλόπατρος Καλλινικος), was the son of Antiochus X. and Selene, an Egyptian princess. He required to Rome during the time that Tigranes had possession of Syria, and passed through Syria on his return during the government of Verres, (b. c. 73-71.) On the defeat of Tigranes in b. c. 69, Lucullus allowed Antiochus Asiaticus to take possession of the kingdom; but he was deprived of it in b. c. 65 by Pompey, who reduced Sicily to a Roman province. In this year the Seleucidae ceased to reign. (Appian, Syr. 49, 70; Cic. in Porr. iv. 27, 28, 30; Justin. xli. 2.) Some writers suppose, that Antiochus Asiaticus afterwards reigned as king of Commagene, but there are not sufficient reasons to support this opinion. (Antiochus I., king of Commagene.)

For the history and chronology of the Syrian kings in general, see Fröhlich, Annales Syriae, &c.; Vaillant, Seleucidarum Imperium, &c.; Niebuhr, Kleine Schriften, Historischer Gewinn aus der armenischen Übersetzung der Chronik des Eusebii; Clinton, F. H. vol. iii. Appendix, c. 3.

ANTION (Ἀντιόν), a son of Periphas and Astyages, and husband of Perimela, by whom he became the father of Ixion. (Diod. iv. 69; Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. ii. 39.)

ANTIOPE (Ἀντιόπη). 1. A daughter of Nycteus and Polyxo (Apollod. iii. 5, § 5, 10, § 1), or of the river god Asopus in Boeotia. (Odys. xi. 260; Apollon. Rhod. i. 735.) She became by Zeus the mother of Amphion and Zethus. [Amphion.] Dionysus threw her into a state of madness on account of the vengeance which her sons had taken on Dirce. In this condition she wandered about through Greece, until Phoecus, the grandson of Sisyphus, cured and married her. She was buried with Phoecus in one common tomb (Paus. iv. 17, § 4.)

2. An Amazon, a sister of Hippolyte, who married Theseus (Paus. iv. 2, § 1, 41, § 7.) According to Servius (ad Aen. xi. 661.) she was a daughter of Hippolyte. Diodorus (iv. 16) states, that Theseus received her as a present from Heracles.
ANTIPATER.

When subsequently Attica was invaded by the Amazons, Antiope fought with Theseus against them, and died the death of a heroine by his side. (Comp. Dion. iv. 28; Plut. Thes. 26, 27.) According to Hyginus (Fab. 241) Antiope was a daughter of Ares, and was killed by Theseus himself in consequence of an oracle.

3. A daughter of Pylon or Phylon, was married to Eurytus, by whom she became the mother of the Argonauts Iphitus and Clytius. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 86; Hygin. Fab. 14, with Muncker's note.)

4. A daughter of Aeolus, by whom Poseidon begot Boeotus and Hellen. (Hygin. Fab. 157; Dion. i. 37, where she is called mother of these two heroes Arms.)

Two other mythical personages of this name occur in Apollod. ii. 7, § 8, and in Serv. ad Aen. vi. 46, though Servius seems to confound Antiope with Antene, the wife of Proetus. [L. S.]

ANTIPATER, a celebrated chaser of silver. (Plin. xxxiii. 55.)

ANTIPATER (Ἀντίπατρος), a writer on the interpretation of dreams (Onierocritia), mentioned by Artemidorus. (Oneir. iv. 64.)

ANTIPATER (Ἀντίπατρος), of Acanthus, a Greek grammarian of uncertain date. (Ptolem. Heph. op. Phot. Cod. 190; Eustath. ad Hom. Od. xi. p. 453), who is probably the same as the latter mentioned by the Scholiast on Aristophanes. (Av. 1403.) [L. S.]

ANTIPATER (Ἀντίπατρος), an astrologer or mathematician, who wrote a work upon genethliogia, in which he endeavoured to explain man's fate, not from the circumstances under which he was born, but from those under which he had been conceived. (Vitruv. ix. 7.) [L. S.]

ANTIPATER (Ἀντίπατρος), bishop of Bostrian Arabia, flourished about 460 B.C. His chief work was Ἀντίφης, a reply to Phalanthus's Apology for Origen, some fragments of which are contained in the Acts of the 2nd council of Nice. He also wrote a homily on John the Baptist, and some other discourses. (Fabric. Biblioth. Græc. x. p. 519; eave. Hist. litt. sub anno. 460.) [P. S.]

ANTIPATER (Ἀντίπατρος), the father of Alexander, was an officer in high favour with Philip of Macedon (Just. ix. 4), who after his victory at Chaeronea, B.C. 338, selected him to conduct to Athens the bones of the Athenians who had fallen in the battle. (Just. l.c.; Polyb. v. 10.) He joined Parmenion in the ineffectual advice to Alexander the Great not to set out on his Asiatic expedition till he had provided for marriage to the succession to the throne (Diod. xvii. 16); and, on the king's departure, B.C. 334, he was left in command of Macedonia. (Diod. xvii. 17; Arr. Anth. i. 73, 12.) In B.C. 331 Antipater suppressed the Thracian rebellion under Menmon (Diod. xvii. 3), and also brought the war with the Spartans under Agis III. to a successful termination. (See 72, b.) It is with reference to this event that the first find any intimation of Alexander's jealousy of Antipater—a feeling which was not improbably excited or fostered by the representations of pharsas, and perhaps by the known sentiments of Antipater himself. (Curt. vi. 1 § 17, c. x. 10. 14; Plut. Ages. p. 604, b.; Alex. pp. 688, c., 18, f.; Perizon. ad Ael. V. H. xii. 16; Thirlw. Hist. vol. vii. p. 89; but see Plut. Phoc. p. 9, c.; Ael. V. H. i. 25.) Whether, however, from jealousy or from the necessity of guarding against the evil consequences of the dissensions between Olympias and Antipater, the latter was ordered to lead into Asia the fresh troops required by the king, B.C. 324, while Craterus, under whom the discharged veterans were sent home, was appointed to the regency in Macedonia. (Arr. vii. p. 155; Pseudo-Curt. x. 4, § 9, &c.; Just. xii. 12.) The story which ascribes the death of Alexander, B.C. 323, to poison, and implicates Antipater and even Aristotle in the plot, is perhaps sufficiently refuted by its own intrinsic absurdity, and is set aside as false by Arrian and Plutarch. (Diod. xvii. 117; Paus. xii. 12; Curt. x. 14; Plut. Alex. ad fin.; Liv. vii. 3; Diod. xix. 11; Athen. x. p. 434, c.) On Alexander's death, the regency of Macedonia was assigned to Antipater, and he forthwith found himself engaged in a war with a strong confederacy of Greek states with Athens at their head. At first he was defeated by Leosthenes, and besieged in Lamia, whence he even sent an embassy to Athens with an unsuccessful application for peace. (Diod. xviii. 3, 12, 13; Paus. i. 25; Just. xii. 5; Plut. Phoc. p. 752, b., Demost. p. 850, d.) The approach of Leonnatus obliged the Athenians to raise the siege, and the death of that general, who was defeated by Antipater (the elder), of which the latter was accused, and who was in league against the regent with Olympias, was far more an advantage than a loss to Antipater. (Diod. xviii. 14, 15; Just. xii. 5; Plut. Eum. p. 584, d. e.) Being joined by Craterus, he defeated the confederates at Cronum, and succeeded in dissolving the league by the prudence and moderation with which he at first used his victory. Athens herself was obliged to purchase peace by the abolition of democracy and the admission of a garrison into Mysyeia, the latter of which conditions might surely have enabled Antipater to dispense with the destruction of Demosthenes and the chiefs of his party. (Diod. xviii. 16-18; Plut. Phoc. pp. 753, 754, Demosth. p. 856; Paus. vii. 10; Thir. Gr. Hist. vol. vii. p. 167, note 1; Boeckh. Pauly. Econ. of Athens, i. 7, 11.) Returning now to Macedonia, he gave his daughter Phila in marriage to Craterus, with whom, at the end of the year B.C. 293, he joined the Aetolians, the only party in the Lamian war who had not yet submitted. (Diod. xviii. 24.) But the intelligence brought him by Antigonus of the treachery of Perdiccas, and of his intention of putting away Nicaea, Antipater's daughter, to marry Cleopatra, compelled him to pass over to Asia; where, leaving Craterus to act against Eumenes, he himself hastened after Perdiccas, who was marching towards Egypt against Ptolemy. (Diod. xviii. 23, 25, 29-33; Plut. Eum. pp. 585, 586; Just. xiii. 6.) On the murder of Perdiccas, the supreme regency devolved on Antipater, who, at Triamalades in Syria, successfully maintained his power against Eurydice, the queen. Marching into Lydia, he avoided a battle with Eumenes, and when his side was dissuaded from attacking Antipater by Cleopatra, who wished to give the regent no cause of complaint. Towards the close of the year 321, he returned into Europe, taking with him the king and queen, and leaving Antigonus to prosecute the war with Eumenes. (Diod. xviii. 39, 40; Plut. Eum. p. 588, a.) It was during the mortal illness of Antipater, B.C. 320, that Demades was sent to him from Athens to endeavour to ob-

ANTIPATER (Ἀντίπατρος), second son of CASSANDER, king of Macedonia, by Theassiloneia, sister of Alexander the Great. Soon after the death of Cassander (b. c. 296), his eldest son Philip also died of consumption (Paus. ix. 7; Plut.
Demetr. 905, c.), and great dissensions ensued between Antipater and his younger brother Alexander for the government. Antipater, believing that Alexandcr was favoured by his mother, put her to death. The people, however, reconciled themself to this murder on the report which they had aid at once to Pyrrhus of Epirus and Demetrius Poliorectes. Pyrrhus arrived first and, exactly from Alexander a considerable portion of Macedonia
as his reward, obliged Antipater to fly before him.

According to Ptolemeus, Lysmachus, king of Thrace, Antipater's father-in-law, attempted to dismiss Pyrrhus from further hostilities by a forged letter purporting to come from Ptolemy Soter. The forgery was detected, but Pyrrhus seems notwithstanding to have withdrawn after settling matters between the brothers; soon after which Demetrius arrived. Justin, who says nothing of Pyrrthus, tells us, that Lysmachus, fearing the interference of Demetrius, advised a reconciliation between Antipater and Alexander. On the murder of Alexander by Demetrius, the latter appears, according to Plutarch, to have been made king of all Macedonia, to the exclusion at once of Antipater.

According to Justin, Lysmachus conciliated Demetrius by putting him in possession of Antipater's portion of the kingdom, and murdered Antipater, who appears to have fled to him for refuge. The murder seems, from Diodorus, to have been owing to the instigation of Demetrius. (Plut. Pyrr. p. 386, Demetr. pp. 905, 906; Just. xvi. 1, 2; Diod. Sie.
xxi. Exc. 7.) [E. E.]

ANTIPATER, L. COELIUS, a Roman jurist and historian. Pomponius (Dig. 1. tit. 2. s. 2, § 40) considers him more an orator than a jurist; Cicero, on the other hand, prizes him more as a jurist than as an orator or historian. (De Orat. 11, de Legg. 1, 2; Bruc. 2, 246.) He was of the comtemporaries of C. Gracchus (n. c. 123); L.
Crassus, the orator, was his pupil. He was the first who endeavoured to impart to Roman history
the ornaments of style, and to make it more than a mere chronicle of events, but his diction was rather vehement and high-sounding than elegant and polished. He is not to be confounded with Coelius Sabinus, the Ccelius of the Digest.

None of his juridical writings have been preserved.
He wrote a history of the second Punic war, and composed Annales, which were epitomized by Brutus. (Cic. ad Att. xiii. 8.) The history of the second Punic war was perhaps only a part of the Annables. Antipater followed the Greek history of Silenus Callistus (Cic. de Div. i. 24, 49), and occasionally borrowed from the Origines of Cato Censorinus (Gell. x. 24, 49; Macrob. Saturn. i. 4, exc.) The emperor Hadrian is reported to have preferred him as an historian to Sallust (Spartanius, Hadrian. c. 16); by Valerius Maximus (i. 7) he is designated certus Romanae historiae auctor; and he is occasionally quoted by Livy, who sometimes, with respectful consideration, dissent from his authority. It is manifest, however, from Cicero and Val. Maximus, that he was fond of relating dreams and portents. Orelli (Onomast. Cie.) refers to the dissertations on Antipater by Bavius Ant.
Nanta and G. Groen van Prinsterer, inserted in the Annals of the Academy of Leyden for 1821.
His fragments, several of which are preserved in Novius, are to be found appended to the editions of Sallust by Wesse, Corte, and Havercamp; and also in Krause's Vita et Fragmenta vet. Hist. Rom.
p. 192, &c. [J. T. G.]

made him his private secretary. The emperor had such a high opinion of him, that he raised him to the consular dignity, and afterwards made him praefect of Bithynia. But as Antipater used his sword too freely, he was deprived of his office, and retired to his native place, where he died at the age of 88, it is said of voluntary starvation. Philosor., Vit. Soph. ii. 24, § 26, § 36; Galen, De Thermar. ad Pison. ii. p. 458; Endoc. p. 57.

ANTIPATER, the name of at least two physicians. 1. The author of a work Περὶ Βοαγγέλων, “On the Soul,” of which the second book is quoted by the Scholast on Homer (II. Ἀ. 115, p. 366, ed. Bekker; Cramer, Awed. Graeca Paris. vol. iii. p. 14), in which he said that the soul increased, diminished, and at last perished with the body; and which may very possibly be the work quoted by Digenes Laërtius (vii. 157), and commonly attributed to Antipater of Tarsus. If he be the physician who is said by Galen (De Med. Med. i. 7, vol. x. p. 33; Jos. M. A. i. 4, vol. xiv. p. 694) to have belonged to the sect of the Methodists, he must have lived in or after the first century A.D.; and this date will agree very well with the fact of his being quoted by Andromachus (ap. Gal. De Compo. Medecin. loc. loco. i. i, x. ii, vol. xii. p. 630, vol. xiii. p. 220), Scribonius Largus (De Compo. Med. c. 167, p. 221), and Caelius Aurelianus. (De Morb. Chron. ii. 13, p. 404.) His prescriptions are frequently quoted with approbation by Galen and Aetius, and the second book of his “Epistles” is mentioned by Caelius Aurelianus. (l.c.)

2. A contemporary of Galen at Rome in the second century after Christ, of whose death and the morbid symptoms that preceded it, a very interesting account is given by that physician. (De Loc. Affec. iv. 1, vol. viii. p. 299.) [W. A. G.]

ANTIPATER (Ἀντιπατής), of Sidon, the author of several epigrams in the Greek Anthology, appears, from a passage of Cicero (de Orat. iii. 50), to have been contemporary with Q. Catullus (con- sul c. 102), and with Crassus (quaestor in Macedonia c. 106). The many minute references made to him by Meleager, who also wrote his epitaph, would seem to shew that Antipater was an elder contemporary of this poet, who is known to have flourished in the 170th Olympiad. From these circumstances he may be placed at n. c. 108-100. He lived to a great age. (Plin. viii. 52; Cic. de Patr.; Vol. Max. i. 8, § 16, ext.; Jacobs, Anecd. xiii. p. 86.) Antipater (Ἀντιπατής), of Tarsus, a Stoic philosopher, was the disciple and successor of Digenes and the teacher of Panaceus, n. c. 144 nearly. (Cic. de Divin. i. 8, de Off. iii. 12.) Plutarch speaks of him with Zeno, Cleanthes, and Chrysippus, as one of the principal Stoic philosophers (de Stoic. Repugnat. p. 144), and Cicero mentions him as remarkable for contentiousness. (De Off. iii. 12.) Of his personal history nothing is known, nor would the few exact notices of his philosophical opinions be a sufficient ground for any great reputation, if it were not for the testimony of ancient authors to his merit. He seems to have taken the lead during his lifetime in the disputes constantly recurring between his own school and the Academy, although he is said to have felt himself so unequal in argument to his contemporary Carneades, in public dis-philosophy nothing remains but a few scattered no¬ ever, he took higher ground in solving th¬m than

ANTIPHILUS.

Phyt. Cod. 166, p. 112, Beckler), as the author of marvellous stories respecting distant countries: he is spoken of in the preceding article.

Suidas mentions "another Antiphanes, an Athenian comic poet, later than Panasseus," who is mentioned by no other writer, unless he be the Antiphanes who wrote a work Ἱππ. Ἐρασίων. (Suidas, s. v. Νάυκρατ; Athen. xiii. p. 886.)

Antiphanes Caryustus, who is called by Eudocia (p. 61) a comic poet, was really a tragedian, contemporaneous with Thespis. (Suidas, s. v.) [P. S.]

ANTIPHILUS (Ἀντιφιλος), an Architect, built, in connection with Pothenus and Megacles, the treasury the Cethargismenast Olympia. (Paus. vi. 19. § 4.) His age and country are unknown. [P. S.]

ANTIPHILUS (Ἀντιφίλος), an Athenian meal, was appointed as the successor of Leocenes in the Lamanian war, b. c. 323, and gained a victory over Leonnatus. (Diod. xviii. 12—15; Plut. Pausan. 24.) [C. P. M.]

ANTIPHILUS (Ἀντιφίλος), of Byzantium, a writer of epigrams, who lived about the time of the emperor Nero, as appears from one of his epigrams in which he mentions the favour conferred by that emperor upon the island of Rhodes. (Antut. Gr. ix. n. 178; comp. Tacit. Annul. xii. 58.) The number of his epigrams still extant is upwards of forty, and most of them are superior in conception and style to the majority of these compositions. Reiske, in his notes on the Anthology of Cephalas (p. 191), was led, by the difference of style in some of the poems bearing the name of Antiphilus, to suppose that there were two or three poets of this name, and that their productions were all by mistake ascribed to the one poet of Byzantium. But there is not sufficient ground for such an hypothesis. (Jacobs, ad Antut. Gr. xiii. p. 851, &c.) [L. S.]

ANTIPHILUS, of Egypt, a very distinguished painter, was the pupil of Ctesidemus, and the contemporary and rival of Apelles. (Lucian, de Cal. n. 1—5.) Having been born in Egypt, he went when young to the court of Macedon, where he painted portraits of Philip and Alexander. The latter part of his life was spent in Egypt, under the patronage of Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, whom he painted hunting. He flourished, therefore, during the latter half of the 4th century b. c. Concerning his false accusation against Apelles before Ptolemy, see APPELLES.

The quality in which he most excelled is thus described by Quintilian, who mentions him among the three poets of this name, and is said to have been educated partly by his father and partly by Pythodorus, while according to others he owed his education to none but himself. When he was a young man, the fame of Gorgias was at its height. The object of Gorgias' sophistical school of oratory was more to dazzle and captivate the hearer by brilliancy of diction and rhetorical artifices than to produce a solid conviction based upon sound arguments; it was, in short, a school for show-speeches, and the practical purposes of oratory in the courts of justice and the popular assembly lay beyond its sphere. Antiphon perceived this deficiency, and formed a higher and more practical view of the art to which he devoted himself; that is, he wished to produce conviction in the minds of the hearers by means of a therapeutical painter of the art of rhetoric, and this not with a view to the narrow limits of the school, but to the courts and the assembly. Hence the ancients call Antiphon the inventor of public oratory, or state that he raised it to a higher position. (Philost. Vit. Soph. i. 15, § 2; Hermog. de Form. Orat. ii. p. 498; comp. Quintil. iii. 1, § 1; Diod. ap. Clem. Alex. Stron. i. p. 385.) Antiphon was thus the first who regulated practical eloquence by certain theoretical laws, and he opened a school in which he taught rhetoric. Thucydides, the historian, a pupil of Antiphon, speaks of his master with the highest esteem, and many of the excellences of his style are ascribed by the ancients to the influence of Antiphon. (Schol. ad Thuc. iv. p. 312, ed. Beckker; comp. Dionys. Hal. de Comp. Verb. 19.) At the same time, Antiphon occupied himself with writing speeches for others, who delivered them in the courts of justice; and as he was the first who received money for such orations—a practice which subsequently became quite general—he was severely attacked and ridiculed, especially by the comic writers, Plato and Pelsander. (Philost. l. c.; Plat. Vit. X. Orat. p. 833, c.) These attacks, however, may also have been owing to his political opinions, for he belonged to the oligarchical party. This unpopularity, together with his own reserved character, prevented his ever appearing as a speaker either in the courts or the assembly; and the only time he spoke in public was in B. c. 411, when he defended himself against the charge of treachery. (Thuc. viii. 68; Lys. s. Eroichos, p. 427; Cie. Brat. 12.)

The history of Antiphon's career as a politician is for the most part involved in great obscurity, which is in a great measure owing to the fact that Antiphon the orator is frequently confounded by ancient writers with Antiphon the interpreter of signs, and Antiphon the tragic poet. Plutarch (l. c.) and Philostratus (Vit. Soph. 1. 18. § 1) mention some events in which he was engaged, but Thucydides seems to have known nothing about them. The only part of his public life of which the detail is known, is that connected with the oligarchical government of the Four Hundred. The person chiefly instrumental in bringing it about was Pelsander; but, according to the express testimony of Thucydides, Antiphon was the man who had done everything to prepare the change, and had drawn up the plan of it. (Comp. Philost. l. c.; Plat. Vit. X. Orat. p. 832, f.) On the overthrow of the oligarchical government six months after its establishment, Antiphon was brought to trial for having attempted to negotiate peace with Sparta, and was condemned to death. His speech in defence of himself is stated by Thucydides (viii. 69; comp. Cie. Brat. 12) to have been the ablest that was ever made by any man in similar circumstances. It was composed with the highest degree of respect for his masters, and is referred to by Harpocration (s. v. στατιστής), who calls it Αδένα τεϊς μεταστάσεως. His property was confiscated, his house razed to the ground, and on the site of it a tablet was erected with the inscription "Antiphon the traitor." His remains were not allowed to be buried in Attic ground, his children, as well as any one who should adopt them, were punished with atimia. (Plut. l. c.)

As an orator, Antiphon was highly esteemed by the ancients. Hermogenes (de Form. Orat. p. 497) says of his orations, that they were clear, true in the expression of feeling, and faithful to nature, and consequently convincing. Others say, that their orations were beautiful but not graceful, or that they had something austere or antique about them. (Dionys. de Verb. Comp. 10, de Isso, 20.) The want of freshness and gracefulness is very obvious in the orations still extant, but more especially in those actually spoken by Antiphon's clients. (No. 1, 14, and 18.) His language is pure and correct, and in the three orations mentioned above, of remarkable clearness. The treatment and solutions of the point at issue are always striking and interesting. (Dionys. Jud. de Thucyd. 51, Demosth. 8; Phot. p. 483.)

The ancients possessed sixty orations of different kinds which went by the name of Antiphon, but Caecilius, a rhetorician of the Augustan age, declared twenty-five to be spurious. (Plut. Vit. X. Orat. p. 833, b.; Phot. l. c.) We now possess only fifteen orations of Antiphon, three of which were written by him for others, viz. No. 1. Κατεγορία φαρμακείας κατά τῆς μετατροπῆς; No. 14. Περί τοῦ Ἡραδού φάνων, and No. 15. Περί τοῦ χρυσοῦτος. The remaining twelve were written as specimens for his school or exercises on fictitious cases. They are a peculiar phenomenon in the history of ancient oratory, for they are divided into three tetralogies, each of which consists of four orations, two accusations and two defences on the same subject. The subject of the first tetralogy is a murder, the perpetrator of which is yet unknown; that of the second an unpromised murder; and that of the third a murder committed in self-defence. The clearness which distinguishes his other three orations is not perceptible in these tetralogies, which arise in part from the corrupt and mutilated state in which they have come down to us. A great number of the orations of Antiphon, and in fact all those which are extant, have for their subject the commission of a murder, whence they are sometimes referred to under the name of Αδένα φονείας. (Hermog. de Form. Orat. p. 496, &c.; Ammon. s. v. άθανάσια.) The genericness of the extant orations has been the subject of much discussion, but the best critics are at present pretty nearly agreed that all are really the works of Antiphon. As to the historical or antiquarian value of the three real speeches—the tetralogies must be left out of the question here—it must be remarked, that they contain more information than any other ancient work respecting the mode of proceeding in the criminal courts of Athens. All the orations of Antiphon are printed in the collections of the Attic orators edited by Aldus, H. Stephens, Reiske, Bekker, Dobson, and others. The best separate editions are those of Baiter and Sappo, Zürich, 1638, 16mo, and of E. Münzer, Berlin, 1838, 8vo.

Besides these orations, the ancients ascribe to Antiphon, 1. A Rhetoric (τάχυα λογομαχία) in three books;12 and 2. a Book of Laws (τάχυα νόμου), 3. a Book of Laws (τάχυα νόμου), and 4. a Book of Laws (τάχυα νόμου). (Dionys. de Verb. Comp. 10, de Isso, 20.) ANTIPHON.

ANTISTHENES.

7. A Greek author, who wrote an account of men distinguished for virtue (πεπληρωμένοι τιμής προσωπικών), one of whom was Pythagoras. (Diog. Laërt. viii. 3; Porphyry de Vit. Pythag. p. 9.)

8. A writer on agriculture, mentioned by Athenaeus. (xiv. p. 630.)

ANTIPHIUS ('Αντίπθηος). 1. A son of Prinn and Hecuba. (Hom. Il. ix. 460; Apollod. i. 12. § 5.) While he was tending the flocks on mount Ida with his brother Iasus, he was made prisoner by Achilles, but was restored to freedom after a ransom was given for him. He afterwards fell by the hands of Ajax. (Hom. Il. ix. 101, &c.)

2. A son of Theseus, and one of the Greek heroes at Troy. He and his brother Phileippus joined the Greeks with thirty ships, and commanded the men of Carpathos, Casos, Cos, and other islands. (Hom. Il. ii. 675, &c.) According to Hyginus (Fab. 97) he was a son of Meaclus and Chalciope. Four other mythical personages of this name are mentioned in Hom. Il. ii. 846. Od. ii. 19. xvii. 68; Apollod. i. 7. § 3. [L. S.]

ANTISTATES, CALLAESCHRUS, ANTI-MA'CHIDES, and PORFUND, were the architects who held the foundations of the temple of Zeus Olympia at Athens, under Pelastratus. (Vitruv. vi. Pract. § 15.)

ANTISTHENES (Ἀντίσθένης), an AGRIGENTINE, is mentioned by Diodorus (xii. 84) as an instance of the immense wealth which private citizens possessed at Agrigentum. When his daughter was married, more than 800 carriages went in the nuptial procession.

ANTISTHENES (Ἀντισθένης), a CYNIC philosopher, the son of Antisthenes, an Athenian, was the founder of the sect of the Cynics, which of all the Greek schools of philosophy was perhaps the most devoid of any scientific purpose. He flourished n. c. 366 (Diod. xv. 76), and his mother was a Thracian (Suidas, s. v.; Diog. Laërt. vi. 1.), though some say a Phrygian, an opinion probably derived from his replying to a man who reviled him as not being a genuine Athenian citizen, that the mother of the gods was a Thracian. In the year 361 he fought at Tanagra (n. c. 456), and was a disciple first of Gorgias, and then of Socrates, whom he never quitted, and at whose death he was present. (Plat. Phaed. § 59.) He never forgave his master's persecutors, and is even said to have been instrumental in procuring their punishment. (Diog. Laërt. vi. 10.)

He survived the battle of Leuctra (n. c. 371), as he is reported to have compared the victory of the Thebans to a set of schoolboys beating their master (Plut. Lycurg. 30), and died at Athens, at the age of 70. (Eudoca, Vacarium. p. 56.) He taught in the Gymnarsos, a gymnasium for the use of Athenians born of foreign mothers, near the temple of Hercules. Hence probably his followers, whom the Scholiast on Aristotle (p. 232, Brandis) denominates the name from the habitations of the school, either their dog-like neglect of all forms and usages of society, sleeping in tubs and in the streets, and eating whatever they could find, or from their shameless insolence, or else their pertinacious adherence to their own opinions, or lastly from their habit of driving from them all whom they thought unfit for a philosophical life. His writings were very numerous, and chiefly dialogues, some of them being vehement attacks on his contemporaries, as on Alcidamas in the second of his two works entitled Cyrus, on Gorgias in his Archelaus and a most furious one on Plato in his Satir. ( Athen. v. p. 220, b) His style was pure and elegant, and Theopompus even said that Plato stole from him many of his thoughts. (Athen. xi. p. 506, c) Cicero, however, calls him "homo acutissima curiosa," (Att. xii. 288), and it is impossible that his writings could have deserved any higher praise. He possessed considerable powers of wit and sarcasm, and was fond of playing upon words; saying, for instance, that he would rather fall among κοκάδες than κοκάδες, for the one devour the dead, but the other the living; and that one of his pupils stood in need βήθαιρου καινόν, καὶ γραφεῖν καινόν (i. e. καλ. νόι). Two declarations of his are preserved, named Ajax and Ulysses, which are purely rhetorical, and an epistle to Aristippus is attributed to him.

His philosophical system was almost confined to ethics. In all that the wise man does, he says, he conforms to perfect virtue, and pleasure is not only unnecessary to man, but a positive evil. He is reported to have held pain and having epilepsy (δαιμόνια) to be blessings, and that madness is preferable to pleasure, though Ritter thinks that some of these extravagances must have been advanced not as his own opinions, but those of the interlocutors in his dialogues. According to Schleiermacher (Anmerkungen zum Philos. S. 204), the passage in the Philebus (p. 44), which mentions the theory, that pleasure is a mere negation, and consists only in the absence of pain, refers to the opinions of Antisthenes; and the statement in Aristotle (Eth. Nic. x. 1), that some persons considered pleasure wholly worthless (κοκάδυ φαύλας) is certainly an allusion to the Cyndical doctrine. It is, however, probable that he did not consider all pleasure worthless, but only that which results from the gratification of sensual or artificial desires, for we find him praising the pleasures which spring from τῆς ψυχῆς (Xen. Mem. iv. 41), and the enjoyments of a wisely chosen friendship. (Diog. Laert. vi. 11.) The summum bonum he placed in a life according to virtue,—virtue consisting in action, and being such, that when once obtained it is never lost, and exempts the wise man from the chance of error. That is, it is closely connected with reason, but to enable it to develop itself in action, and to be sufficient for happiness, it requires the aid of energy (Σθερησία ἡψύς); so that we may represent him as teaching, that the summum bonum, ἄρετα, is attainable by teaching (θεότριτον), and made up of φιλάρσης and ἱρψις. But here he becomes involved in a vicious circle, for when asked what φιλάρσης is, he could only call it an insight into good and evil, and thus made the good to consist in φιλάρσης. (Plat. Rep. vi. p. 505.) The negative character of his ethics, which are a mere denial of the Cyrenean doctrine, is further shewn in his apothegm, that the most necessary piece of knowledge is το κακό ἀφομοιεῖται, while in his wish to isolate and withdraw the sage from all connexion with others, rendering his superior even to natural affection and the political institutions of his country, he really founds a system as purely selfish as that of Aristippus.

The Physica of Antisthenes contained a theory of the nature of the gods (Cic. de Nat. Deor. i. 15), in which he contended for the Unity of the Deity, and that man is unable to know him by any sensible representation, since he is unlike any being on earth. (Clem. Alex. Strom. v. p. 601.) He probably held just views of providence, shewing the sufficiency of virtue for happiness by the fact, that outward events are regulated by God so as to benefit the wise. Such, at least, was the view of his pupil Diogenes of Sinope, and less involved in his own statement, that all which belongs to others is truly the property of the wise man. Of his logic we hear that he held definitions to be impossible, since we can only say that every individual is what it is, and can give no more than a description of its qualities, e. g. that silver is like tin in colour. (Arist. Met. viii. 3.) Thus he, of course, disbelieved the Platonic system of ideas, since each particular object of thought has its own separate essence. This also is in conformity with the practical and unschientific character of his doctrine, and its tendency to isolate noticed above. He never had many disciples, which annoyed him so much that he drove away those who did attend his teaching, except Diogenes, who remained with him till his death. His staff and wallet, when his clothing were only proofs of his vanity, which Socrates told him he saw through the holes of his coat. The same quality appears in his contempt for the Athenian constitution and social institutions generally, resulting from his being him self debared from exercising the rights of a citizen by the foreign extraction of his mother. His philosophy was evidently thought worthless by Plato and Aristotle, to the former of whom he was personally hostile. His school is classed by Ritter among the imperfect Socratists; after his death his disciples wandered further and further from all scientific objects, and plunged more deeply into fanciful extravagances. Perhaps some of their exaggerated statements have been attributed to their master. The fragments which remain of his writings have been collected by Winckelmann (Antisthenes, Fragmenta, Turici, 1842), and the small work, with the account of him by Ritter (Gesch. der Philosophie, vii. 4) will supply all the information which can be desired. Most of the ancient authorities have been given in the course of this article. We may add to them Arist. Epit. iii. 22, iv. 8, 11; Lucian, Cynic. iii. 541; Julian, Orat. vii. [G. E. L. C.]

ANTISTHENES (Ἀντισθένης), a disciple of HERACLITUS, wrote a commentary on the war of his master. (Diog. Laërt. ix. 15, vi. 19.) It is not improbable that this Antisthenes may be the same as the one who wrote a work on the succession of the Greek philosophers (το κακόν τον τάδιον), which is so often referred by Diogenes Laërtius (i. 40, ii. 39, 98, vi. 77, 80), and is certainly an allusion to the Cyndical doctrine. (Antisthenes, Fragmenta, Turici, 1842), and the small work, with the account of him by Ritter (Gesch. der Philosophie, vii. 4) will supply all the information which can be desired. Most of the ancient authorities have been given in the course of this article. We may add to them Arist. Epit. iii. 22, iv. 8, 11; Lucian, Cynic. iii. 541; Julian, Orat. vii. [G. E. L. C.]

ANTISTHENES (Ἀντισθένης), of Rhodos, a Greek historian who lived about the year 200. He took an active part in the political affairs of his country, and wrote a history of his own time, which, notwithstanding its partiality towards his native island, is spoken of in terms of high praise by Polybius. (xvi. 14, &c.; con Diog. Laërt. vi. 19.) Pintarch (de Flor. 22) mentions an Antisthenes who wrote a work called Meleagris, of which the third book is quoted; a Pliny (H. N. xxxvi. 12) speaks of a person of the same name, who wrote on the pyramids; l whether they are the same person as the Rhodian, or two distinct writers, or the Ephesian Antisthenes mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius (vi. 19), cannot be decided.

ANTISTHENES ('A不只是nes), a Spartan admiral in the Peloponnesian war, was sent out in B. C. 412, in command of a squadron, to the coast of Asia Minor, and was to have succeeded Astyochus, in case the Spartan commissioners thought it necessary to deprive that officer of his command. (Thuc. viii. 39.) We hear of him again in B. C. 399, when, with two other commissioners, he was sent out to inspect the state of affairs in Asia, and none of the sons of this name are of great historical importance. No Antistius.

Antistius. 1. Sex. Antistius, tribune of the plebs, B. C. 422. (Liv. iv. 42.)
2. L. Antistius, consul, B. C. 379. (Liv. vi. 30.)
3. M. Antistius, tribune of the plebs, about B. C. 320. (Liv. xxvi. 33, ix. 12.)
4. M. Antistius, was sent in B. C. 218 to the north of Italy to recall C. Flamininus, the consul, to Rome. (Liv. xxii. 33.)
5. Sex. Antistius, was sent in B. C. 208 into Italy to watch the movements of Hasdrubal. (Liv. xxxvi. 35.)
6. P. Antistius, tribune of the plebs, B. C. 86, supposed in his tribuneship C. Caesar Strabo, who was a candidate for the consulship without having seen a prator. The speech he made upon this occasion brought him into public notice, and afterwards he frequently had important causes entrusted to him, though he was already advanced in years. Icero speaks favourably of his eloquence. In consequence of the marriage of his daughter to Pompeius Magnus, he supported the party of Sulla, the elder. (Compare Dion Cass. i. 37.)
When Pompey came into the province in the following year, Antistius had received no successor; and according to Cicero, he did only as much for Pompey as circumstances compelled him to do, and after the battle of Pharsalia went to Bithynia, where he saw Caesar and was pardoned by him. He died at Corcyra on his return, leaving behind him considerable property. (Cic. ad Fam. xiii. 29.)

ANTISTIUS, the name of the physician who examined the body of Julius Caesar after his murder, B. C. 44; and who is said by Suetonius (Jul. Cos. 82) to have declared, that out of all his wounds only one was mortal, namely, that which he had received in the breast. [W. A. G.]

ANTISTIUS (Ἀντίστιος), a writer of Greek epigrams, though, as his name seems to indicate, a Roman by birth. Respecting his life and his age nothing is known, but he possesses through his epigrams the Greek Anthology. (Jacobs, Antikl. Gr. iii. p. 552.)

ANTISTIUS SOSIA'NUS. [Sosianus.]
SP. Antius, a Roman ambassador, was sent with three others to Lar Tolumnius, the king of the Veientes, in B. C. 438, by whom he was killed. Statues of all four were placed on the Rostra. (Liv. iv. 16; Cic. Phil. ix. 2.) In Piny (H. N. xxxiv. 6. s. 11) the reading is Sp. Nautius, which ought, however, to be changed into Antius. (Comp. Drakenborch, ad Liv. i. c.)

ANTONIA. 1. A daughter of Antonius the orator, Cos. B. C. 80, was seized in Italy itself by the pirates over whom her father triumphed, and obtained her liberation only on payment of a large sum. (Plut. Pomp. 24.)
2. The two daughters of C. Antonius, Cos. B. C. 63, of whom one was married to C. Caninius Gallus (Val. Max. iv. 2 § 6), and the other to her first cousin, M. Antonius, the triumvir. The latter was divorced by her husband in 47, on the ground of an alleged intrigue between her and Dolabella. (Cic. Phil. ii. 38; Plut. Ant. 9.)
3. Daughter of M. Antonius, the triumvir, and his second wife Antonia, was betrothed to the son of M. Lepidus in B. C. 44, and married to him in 36. (Dion Cass. xlv. 53; Appian, B. C. v. 93.) She must have died soon after; for her husband Lepidus, who died in 30, was at that time married to a second wife, Servilia. (Vell. Pat. ii. 88; Dru mann, Gesch. Romes, i. p. 518.)
4. The elder of the two daughters of M. Antonius by Octavia, the sister of Augustus, was born B. C. 39, and was married to L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, Cos. B. C. 16. Her son by this marriage, Cn. Domitius, was the father of the emperor Nero. [See the Stemma, p. 84.] According to Tacitus (Ann. iv. 44, xii. 64), this Antonia was the younger daughter; but we have followed Suetonius (Ner. 5) and Plutarch (Ant. 87) in calling her the elder. (Compare Dion Cass. B. C. 15.)
5. The elder of the two daughters of M. Antonius by Octavia, the sister of Augustus, was born about B. C. 36, and was married to Drusus, the brother of the emperor Tiberius, by whom she had three children: 1. Germanicus, the father of the emperor Caligula; 2. Livia or Livia; and 3. the emperor Claudius. She lived to see the coronation of her grandson Caligula to the throne, A. D. 37, who at first conferred upon her the greatest honours, but afterwards treated her with so much contempt, that her death was hastened by his conduct; according to some accounts, he administered poison to her. The emperor Claudius paid the highest honours to her memory. Pliny (H. N. xxxv. 36 § 16) speaks of a temple of Antonia, which was probably built at the command of Claudius. Antonia was celebrated for her beauty, ANTONIUS.

Caesar, Antonius Augustus, Antonius Augustalis, and Antonius Augustus. It is a very valuable itinerary of the whole Roman empire, in which both the principal and the cross-roads are described by a list of all the places and stations upon them, the distances from place to place being given in Roman miles.

We are informed by Aethicus, a Greek geographer whose Cosmographia was translated by St. Jerome, that in the consulship of Julius Caesar and M. Antonius (b. c. 44), a general survey of the empire was undertaken, at the command of Caesar and by a decree of the senate, by three persons, who severally completed their labours in 30, 24, and 19 b. c., and that Augustus sanctioned the work by a decree of the senate. The probable inference from this statement, compared with the MS. titles of the Itinerary, is, that that work embodied the results of the survey mentioned by Aethicus. In fact, the circumstance of the Itinerary and the Cosmographia of Aethicus being found in the same MS. has led some writers to suppose that it was Aethicus himself who reduced the survey into the form in which we have it. The time of Julius Caesar and Augustus, when the Roman empire had reached its extent, was that at which we should expect such a work to be undertaken; and no one was more likely to undertake it than the great reformer of the Roman calendar. The honour of the work, therefore, seems to belong to Julius Caesar, who began it; to M. Antonius, who, from his position in the state, must have shared in its commencement and prosecution; and to Augustus, under whom it was completed. Nevertheless, it is highly probable that it received important additions and revision under one or both of the Antonines, who, in their labours to consolidate the empire, would not neglect such a work. The names included in it, moreover, prove that it was altered to suit the existing state of the empire down to the time of Diocletian (a. d. 285-305), after which we have no evidence of any alteration, for the passages in which the name "Constantinopolis" occurs are probably spurious. Whoever may have been its author, we have abundant evidence that the work was an official one. In several passages the numbers are doubtful. The name is put down without any specific rule as to the case. It was first printed by H. Stephens, Paris (1512). The best edition is that of Wesseling Amst. 1735, 4to. (The Preface to Wesseling's edition of the Itinerary; The Article 'Antonius the Itinerary of,' in the Penny Cyclopædia.) [P. S.]

ANTONIUS, M. AURELIUS. [M. Aurelius Fulvus; Consul A. D. 38 and 80, and Præfectus urbi.]

Antoninus himself was born near Lanuvium on the 15th of September, A.D. 86, in the reign of Domitian; was brought up at Lorium, a villa on the Aurolian way, about twelve miles from Rome; passed his boyhood under the superintendence of his two grandfathers, and from a very early age gave promise of his future worth. After having filled the offices of quaestor and praetor with great distinction, he was elevated to the consulship in the 40th year of his age, and from this circumstance, therefore, from the absolute silence of history with regard to these youths, and from the positive assertion of Dion Cassius (lxx. 21), that Antoninus had no male issue when adopted by Hadrian, we may conclude that both his sons died before this epoch; and hence the magnanimity ascribed to him by Gibbon (c. 3) in preferring the welfare of Rome to the interests of his family, and sacrificing the claims of his own children to the talents and virtues of young Marcus, is probably altogether visionary.

The whole period of the reign of Antoninus, which lasted for upwards of twenty-two years, is almost a blank in history—a blank caused by the suspension for a time of war, and violence, and crime. Never before and never after did the Roman world enjoy for an equal space so large a measure of prosperous tranquillity. All the thoughts and energies of a most sagacious and able prince were steadfastly dedicated to the attainment of one object—the happiness of his people. And assuredly never were noble exertions crowned with more ample success.

At home the affections of all classes were won by his simple habits, by the courtesy of his manners, by the ready access granted to his presence, by the patient attention with which he listened to representations upon all manner of subjects, by his impartial distribution of favours, and his prompt administration of justice. Common informers were discouraged, and almost disappeared; never had confiscations been so rare; during a long succession of years no senator was punished with death; one man only was impeached of treason, and he, when convicted, was forbidden to betray his accomplices.

Abroad, the subject states participated largely in the blessings diffused by such an example. The best governors were permitted to retain their power for a series of years, and the collectives of the revenue were compelled to abandon their extortions. Moreover, the general condition of the provincials was improved, their fidelity secured, and the sources and stability of the whole empire increased by the communication, on a large scale, of the full rights and privileges of Roman citizens to the inhabitants of distant countries. In cases of national calamity and distress, such as the earthquakes which devastated Rhodes and Asia, and the great fires at Narbonne, Antioch, and Carthage, the sufferers were relieved, and compensation granted for their losses with the most unsparing liberality.

In foreign policy, the judicious system of his predecessor was steadily followed out. No attempt was made to achieve new conquests, but all rebellions from within and all aggressions from without were promptly crushed. Various movements among the Germans, the Dacians, the Jews, the Moors, the Greeks, and the Egyptians, were quelled by persuasion or by a mere demonstration of force; while a more formidable insurrection in northern Britain was speedily repressed by the imperial legate Lollius Urbicus, who advancing beyond the wall of Hadrian, connected the friths of the Clyde and the Forth by a rampart of turf, in order that the more peaceful districts might be better protected from the inroads of the Caledonians. The British war was concluded, as we learn from

dals, between the years 140-145, and on this occasion Antoninus received for a second time the title of imperator—a distinction which he did not again accept, and he never designed to celebrate a triumph. (Eckhel, vol. vii. p. 14.)

Even the nations which were not subject to Rome paid the utmost respect to the power of Antoninus. The Parthians, yielding to his remonstrances, abandoned an attempt upon Armenia. The Scythians submitted disputes with their neighbours to his arbitration; the barbarians of the Upper Danube received a king from his hands; a great chief of the clans of Caucasia repaired to Rome to tender his homage in person, and embassies flocked in from Hyrcania and Bactria, from the banks of the Indus and of the Ganges, to seek the alliance of the emperor.

In his reign various improvements were introduced in the law, by the advice of the most eminent jurists of the day; the health of the population was protected by salutary regulations with regard to the interment of the dead, and by the establishment of a certain number of licensed medical practitioners in the metropolis and all large towns. The interests of education and literature were promoted by honours and pensions bestowed on the most distinguished professors of philosophy and rhetoric throughout the world. Commercial intercourse was facilitated by the construction or repair of bridges, harbours, and lighthouses; and architecture and the fine arts were encouraged by the erection and decoration of numerous public buildings. Of these the temple of Panstina in the forum, and the mausoleum of Hadrian on the right bank of the Tiber, may still be seen, and many antiquaries are of opinion, that the magnificent amphitheatre at Nismes, and the stupendous aqueduct now termed the Pont du Gard, between that town and Avignon, are monuments of the interest which the descendant of the Aurelii Fulvi for the country of his fathers. It is certain that the former of these structures was completed under his immediate successors and dedicated to them.

In all the relations of private life Antoninus was equally distinguished. Even his wife's irregularities, which must to a certain extent have been known to him, he passed over, and after her death loaded her memory with honours. Among the most remarkable of these was the establishment of an hospital, after the plan of a similar institution by Trajan, for the reception and maintenance of boys and girls, the young females who enjoyed the advantages of the charity being termed puellae alimentariae Faustitanae. By fervent piety and scrupulous observance of sacred rites, he gained the reputation of being a second Numa; but he was a foe to intolerant fanaticism, as is proved by the protection and favour extended to the Christians. His natural taste seems to have had a strong bias towards the pleasures of country life, and accordingly we find him spending all his leisure hours upon his estate in the country. In person he was of commanding aspect, with a dignified countenance, and a deep toned melodious voice rendered his native eloquence more striking and impressive. His death took place at Lorium on the 7th of March, 161, in his 75th year. He was succeeded by M. Aurelius.

Some doubts existed amongst the ancients themselves with regard to the origin of the title Pius, and several different explanations, many of them very silly, are proposed by his biographer Capitolinus. The most probable account of the matter is this. Upon the death of Hadrian, the senate, incensed by his severity towards several members of their body, had resolved to withhold the honours usually conferred upon deceased emperors, but were induced to forego their purpose in consequence of the deep grief of Antoninus, and his earnest entreaties. Being, perhaps, after the first burst of indignation had passed away, somewhat alarmed by their own rashness, they determined to render the concession more gracious by paying a compliment to their new ruler which should mark their admiration of the feeling by which he had been influenced, and accordingly they hailed him by the name of Pius, or the dutifully affectionate. This view of the question receives support from medals, since the epithet appears for the first time upon those which were struck immediately after the death of Hadrian; while several belonging to the same year, but coined before that date, bear such addition. Had it been, as is commonly supposed, conferred in consequence of the general holiness of his life, it would in all probability have been introduced either when he first became Caesar, or after he had been seated for some time on the throne, and not exactly at the moment of his accession. Be that as it may, it found such favour in the eyes of his successors, that it was almost universally adopted, and is usually found united with the appellation of Augustus.

Our chief and almost only authority for the life of Antoninus Pius is the biography of Capitolinus, which, as may be gathered from what has been said above, is from beginning to end an uninterrupted panegyric. But the few facts which we can collect from medals, from the scanty fragments of Dion Cassius, and from incidental notices in later writers, all corroborate, as far as they go, the representations of Capitolinus; and therefore we cannot fairly refuse to receive his narrative merely because he paints a character of singular and almost unparalleled excellence. [W. R.]

ANTONINUS LIBERALIS (Avro. Διόκτονος), a Greek grammarian, concerning whose life nothing is known, but who is generally believed to have lived in the reign of the Antonines, about a. p. 147. We possess a work under his name entitled μεταμορφώσεως των σώματων, and consisting of forty-one tales about mythical metamorphoses. With the exception of nine tales, he always mentions the sources from which he took his account. Since most of the works referred to by him are lost, his book is of some importance for the study of Greek mythology, but in regard to composition and style it is of no value. There are in very few MSS. of this work, and the chief ones are that at Heidelberg and the one in Paris. The first edition from the Heidelberg MS. with a Latin translation, is by Xylander, Basel, 1568, 8vo. There is a good edition by Verheyk (Lugd. Bat. 1774, 8vo.), with notes by Manckert, Hemsterhuis, &c. The best is by Koch (Leipzig, 1832, 8vo.), who collated the Paris MS. and added valuable notes of his own. (Mallmann, Commentatio de casuis et autentobus narrationum de mutatis et transmissis, Leipzig, 1786, p. 89, &c.; Bast, Epistolari critico ad Boissoneaud super Antonium de Libero, Parthenio et Aristaeneto, Leipzig, 1809; Koch’s Preface to his edition.) 8. M. Antonius, the orator, was born b. c. 143. (Cic. Brut. 43.) He was quaestor in 113, and praetor in 104, and received the province of Cilicia with the title of proconsul in order to prosecute the war against the pirates. In consequence of his successes he obtained a triumph in 102. (Plut. Pomp. 24; Posth. Triumph.) He was consul in 99 with A. Atilius [see Albinus, No. 22]. He distinguished himself by resisting the attempt of Saturninus and his party, especially an agrarian law of the tribune Sex. Titius. He was censor in 97, and, while censor, was accused of bribery by M. Duronius, but was acquitted. He commanded in the Marsic war a part of the Roman army. Antonius belonged to the aristocratical party, and espoused Sulla’s side in the First civil war. He was quaestor in 99, &c.; Bast, Epistolari critico ad Boissoneaud super Antonium de Libero, Parthenio et Aristaeneto, Leipzig, 1809; Koch’s Preface to his edition.) [L. S.]

9. M. Antonius M. F. C. N. Creticus, son of the preceding and father of the Triumvir, was praetor in b. c. 75, and obtained in 74, through the influence of P. Cethegus and the consult Cotta, the command of the fleet and all the coasts of the Mediterranean, in order to clear the sea of pirates. But Antonius was avaricious and greedy, and misused his power to plunder the provinces, and especially Sicily. He did not succeed either in the object for which he had been appointed. An attack which he made upon Crete, although assisted by the Byzantines and the other allies, entirely failed; the greater part of his fleet was destroyed; and he probably saved himself only by an ignominious treaty. He shortly after died in Crete, and was called Creticus in decision. Salust (Hist. lib. iii.) described him as "perundae pecuniae genius, et vacuus a curia nisi instantibus," He was married twice; first, to Numitoria, whom he had no children (Cic. Philippi. iii. 6), and afterwards to Julia. (Plut. Anti. i. 2; Cic. Div. in Cæcili. 17, in Ferr. ii. 3, iii. 91; Pseudo-Ascon. in Div. p. 129, in Verr. pp. 170, 206, ed. Orelli; Vell. Patr. i. 31; Appian, Sic. 6; Lactant. Inst. i. 11. § 82; Gildon, pag. 78.)

10. C. Antonius M. F. C. N., surnamed Hydro (Plin. H. N. viii. 53, a. 79, according to Drummann, Gesch. Roms, i. p. 531, because he was a homon semiferus, the friend of Catiline and the plunderer of Macedonia), was the second son of Antonius, the orator [No. 8], and the uncle of the triumvir [No. 12]. He accompanied Sulla in his war against Mithridates, and on Sulla's return to Rome, b. c. 83, was left behind in Greece with part of the cavalry and plundered the country. He was subsequently accused for his oppression of Greece by Julius Caesar (76). Six years afterwards (70), he was expelled the senate by the censors for plundering the allies and wasting his property, but was soon after readmitted. He took part in the campaigns from thence to Syria, where he served under the consul A. Gabinius as commander of the cavalry. He was the father of Augustus, and on his return to Rome at the beginning of 44 (Cic. Philippi. ii. 38), he probably did not long survive Caesar. (For the ancient authorities, see Orelli's Onomasticon Tullianum and Drummann's Geschichte Roms, i. p. 81.)

11. Antonius. [Antonius, No. 1.] 12 M. Antonius M. F. M. N., the son of M. Antonius Creticus [No. 9] and Julia, the sister of L. Julius Caesar, consul in b. c. 64, was born, in all probability, in b. c. 63. His father died while he was still young, and he was brought up in the house of Cornelius Lentulus, who married his mother Julia, and who was subsequently put to death by Cicero in 63 as one of Catiline's conspirators. Antonius indulged in his very youth in every kind of dissipation, and became distinguished for his lavish expenditure and extravagance; and, as he does not appear to have received a large fortune from his father, his affairs soon became deeply involved. He was, however, released from his difficulties by his friend Curio, who was his companion in all his dissipation, and between whom and Antonius there existed, if report be true, a most dishonourable connexion. The desire of revenging the execution of his step-father, Lentulus, led Antonius to join Clodius in his opposition to Cicero and the aristocratical party. But their friendship was not of long continuance; and Antonius, pressed by his creditors, repaired to Greece in 58, and from thence to Syria, where he served under the proconsul A. Gabinius as commander of the cavalry. He soon became distinguished as a brave and enterprising officer. He took part in the campaigns against Aristobulus in Palestine (57, 56), and also in the restoration of Ptolemy Antelus to Egypt in 55. In the following year (54) he went to Caesar in Gaul, whose favour and influence he acquired, and was in consequence, on his return to Rome (53), elected quaestor for the following year. He was supported in his canvass for the quaestorship by Cicero, who became reconciled to him through the mediation of Caesar. As quaestor (52) he returned to Gaul, and served under Caesar for the next two years (52, 51).

Antony's energy and intrepidity pointed him out to Caesar as the most useful person to support his interests at Rome, where it was evident that the aristocratical party had made up their minds to crush Caesar, if it were possible. Antony accordingly left Gaul in 50 and came to Rome. Through the influence of Caesar, he was elected into the college of augurs, and was also chosen one of the tribunes of the plebs. He entered on his office on the 10th of December, and immediately commenced attacking the proceedings of Pompey and the aristocracy. On the 1st of January in the following year (49), the senate passed a decree depriving Caesar of his command. Antony and his collégis
Q. Cassius interposed their veto; but as the senate set this at nought, and threatened the lives of the two tribunes, Antony and his colleague fled from Rome on the 7th of January, and took refuge with Caesar in Gaul. Caesar now marched into Italy, and within a few weeks obtained complete possession of the peninsula.

Antony was one of his legates, and received in the same year the supreme command of Italy, when Caesar crossed into Spain to prosecute the war against the Pompeian party. In the following year (48), he conducted reinforcements to Caesar in Greece, and was present at the battle of Phar-salia, where he commanded the left wing. In 47, Caesar, who was then dictator, appointed Antony master of the horse; and, during the absence of the commander-in-chief in Africa, he was again left in the command of Italy. The quiet state of Italy gave Antony an opportunity of indulging his natural love of pleasure. Cicero in his second Philippic has given a minute account of the flagrant debaucheries and licentiousness of which Antony was guilty at this time, both in Rome and the various towns of Italy; and it is pretty certain that most of these accounts are substantially true, though they are no doubt exaggerated by the orator. It was during this time that Antony divorced his wife Antonia with an actress named Cytheris, with whom he appeared in public.

About the same time, a circumstance occurred which produced a coolness between Caesar and Antony. Antony had purchased a great part of Pompey's property, when it was conjectured, under the idea that the money would never be asked for.
But Caesar insisted that it should be paid, and Antony raised the sum with difficulty. It was perhaps owing to this circumstance that Antony did not accompany Caesar either to Africa or Spain in 46. During this year he married Fulvia, the widow of Clodius. In the next year (45) all trace of disagreement between Caesar and Antony disappears; he went to Narbon in Gaul to meet Caesar on his return from Spain, and shortly after offered him the diadem at the festival of the Imperial.
In 44 he was consul with Caesar, and during the time that Caesar was murdered (15th of March), was kept engaged in conversation by some of the conspirators outside the senate-house. The conspirators had wished to engage Antony as an accomplice, and he was sounded on the point the year before by Trebonius, while he was in Gaul;
but the proposition was rejected with indignation.

Antony had now a difficult part to play. The murder of Caesar had paralysed his friends and the people, and for a time placed the power of the state in the hands of the conspirators. Antony therefore thought it more prudent to come to terms with the senate; but meantime he obtained from Calpurnia the papers and private property of Caesar; and by his speech over the body of Caesar and the reading of his will, he so roused the feelings of the people against the murderers, that the latter were obliged to withdraw from the popular wrath. Antony, however, seemed to have considered himself strong enough yet to break with the senate entirely; he accordingly effected a reconciliation with them, and induced them to accept a number of laws, which he alleged were found among Caesar's papers. Antony was now the most powerful man in the state, and seemed likely to obtain the same position that Caesar had occupied. But a new and unexpected rival ap-ppeared in young Octavianus, the adopted son and great-nephew of the dictator, who came from Apollonia to Rome, assumed the name of Caesar, and managed to secure equally the good will of the senate and of his uncle's veteran troops. A struggle now ensued between Antony and Caesar. The former went to Brandusium, to take the command of the legions which had come from Macedonia;
the latter collected an army in Campania. Two of Antony's legions shortly afterwards deserted to Caesar; and Antony, towards the end of Novembcr, proceeded to Clastipine Gaul, which had been previously granted him by the senate, and laid sight to Mutina, into which Dec. Brutus had thrown himself. At Rome, meantime, Antony was declared a public enemy, and the conduct of the war against him committed to Caesar and the two consuls, C. Vibius Pansa and A. Hirtius, at the beginning of the next year, B. C. 43. Several battles were fought with various success, till at length, in the battle of Mutina (about the 27th of April), Antony was completely defeated, and obliged to cross the Alps. Both the consuls, however, had fallen, and the command now devolved upon Dec. Brutus. In Gaul Antony was joined by Lepidus with a powerful army, and was soon in a condition to prosecute the war with greater vigour than ever. Meantime, Caesar, who had been sought by the senate, and who had never heartily espoused its cause, became reconciled to Antony, through the mediation of Lepidus, and thus the celebrated triumvirate was formed in the autumn of this year (43). The reconciliation was made on the condition that the government of the state should be vested in Antony, Caesar, and Lepidus, who were to take the title of Trimviri Reipublicae Consstituendae for the next five years; and that Antony should receive Gaul as his province; Lepidus, Spain; and Caesar, Africa, Sardinia, and Sicily. The mutual friends of each were proscribed, and in the executions that followed, Cicero fell a victim to the revenge of Antony—an act of cruelty, for which even the plea of necessity could not be urged.

The war against Brutus and Cassius, who commanded the senatorial army, was entrusted to Caesar and Antony, and was decided by the battle of Philippi (42), which was mainly gained by the valour and military talents of Antony. Caesar returned to Italy; and Antony, after remaining some time in Greece, crossed over into Asia to collect the money which he had promised to the soldiers. In Cilicia he met with Cleopatra, and followed her to Egypt, where he forgot everything in dalliance with her. But he was roused from his inactivity by the Parthian invasion of Syria (40), and was at the same time summoned to support his brother Lucius [see No. 14] and his wife Ful-via, who were engaged in war with Caesar. But before Antony could reach Italy, Caesar had obtained possession of Perseus, in which Lucius had taken refuge; and the death of Fulvia in the same year removed the chief cause of the war, and led to a reconciliation between Caesar and Antony. To compel their union, Antony married Caesar's sister Octavia. A new division of the Roman world was made, in which Antony received as his share
all the provinces east of the Adriatic.

In the following year (39), the Trimvirs con-included a peace with Sext. Pompey, and Antony afterwards went to his provinces in the east. He entrusted the war against the Parthians to Ventidius, who gained a complete victory over them both in this and the following year (38). Sosius, another of his generals, conquered Antigonus, who claimed the throne of Judaea in opposition to Herod, and took Jerusalem (38). In 37 Antony crossed over to Italy; and a rupture, which had nearly taken place between him and Caesar, was averted by the mediation of Octavia. The triumvirate, which had terminated on the 31st of December, 38, was now renewed for five years, which were to be reckoned from the day on which the former had ceased. After concluding this arrangement, Antony returned to the east. He shortly afterwards sent Octavia back to her brother, and surrendered himself entirely to the charms of Cleopatra, on whom he conferred Coele-Syria, Phoenicia, and other provinces. From this time forward, Cleopatra appears as Antony's evil genius. He had collected a large army to invade the Parthian empire; but, unable to bear himself away from Cleopatra, he delayed his march till late in the year. The expedition was a failure; he lost a great number of his troops, and returned to Syria covered with disgrace (36). Antony now made preparations to attack Artavasdes, the king of Armenia, who had deserted him in his war against the Parthians; but he did not invade Armenia till the year 34. He obtained possession of the Armenian king, and carried him to Alexandria, where he celebrated his triumph with extraordinary splendour. Antony now laid aside entirely the character of a Roman citizen, and assumed the pomp and ceremony of an eastern despot. His conduct, and the unbounded influence which Cleopatra had acquired over him, alienated many of his friends and supporters; and Caesar, who had the wrongs of his sister Octavia to revenge, ns well as ambition to stimulate him, thought that the time had now come for crushing Antony. The years 33 and 32 passed away in preparations on both sides; and it was not till September in the next year (31) that the contest was decided in the sea-fight off Actium, in which Antony's fleet and cavalry deserted to the conqueror; his infantry was defeated; and upon a false report that Cleopatra had put an end to her life, he killed himself by falling on his sword. The death of Cleopatra followed; and Caesar thus became the undisputed master of the Roman world. (Plutarch's Life of Antony; Orelli's Onomast.; Drumann's Gesch. Roms, i. p. 528, &c.)

14. L. ANTONIUS M. f. M. n., the younger brother of the preceding and of the triumvir, was tribune of the plebs in 44, and upon Caesar's death took an active part in supporting his brother's interests, especially by introducing an agrarian law to conciliate the people and Caesar's veteran troops. He subsequently accompanied his brother into Gaul, and obtained the consulsiphip for 41, in which year he triumphed on account of some successes he had gained over the Alpine tribes. During his consulsiphip a dispute arose between him and Caesar about the division of the lands among the veterans, which finally led to a war between them, commonly called the Perusinian war. Lucius engaged in this war chiefly at the instigation of Fulvia, his brother's wife, who had great political influence at Rome. At first, Lucius obtained possession of Rome during the absence of Caesar; but on the approach of the latter, he retired northwards to Perusia, where he was straightway closely besieged. Famine compelled him to surrender the town to Caesar in the following year (40). His life was spared, and he was shortly afterwards appointed by Caesar to the command of Iberia, from which time we hear no more of him.

L. Antonia took the surname of Pictas (Dion Cass. xlviii. 5), because he pretended to attack Caesar in order to support his brother's interests. It is true, that when he obtained possession of Rome in his consulsiphip, he proposed the abolition of the triumvirate; but this does not prove, as some modern writers would have it, that he was opposed to his brother's interests. Cicero draws a frightful picture of Lucius' character. He calls him a gladiator and a robber, and heaps upon him every term of reproach and contempt. (Phil. iii. 12, v. 7, 11, xii. 8, &c.) Much of this is of course exaggeration. (Orelli's Onomast.; Drumann's Gesch Roms, i. p. 527, &c.) The annexed coin of L. An-

After the battle of Actium, when Antony despaired of success at Alexandria, he conferred upon his son Marcus the title of triumvir, and Antonia.

19. JULIUS ANTONIUS, M. P. M. N., the younger son of the triumvir by Fulvia, was brought up by his stepmother Octavia at Rome, and after his father's death (B.C. 30) received great marks of favour from Augustus, through the influence of Octavia. (Plut. Aut. 87; Dion Cass. lii. 15.) Augustus married him to Marcella, the daughter of Octavia by her first husband, Q. Marcellus, condescending upon him the praetorship in B.C. 13, and he consulship in B.C. 10. (Vell. Pat. ii. 100; Dion Cass. liv. 26, 36; Suet. Claud. iv. 4.) In consequence of his adulterous intercourse with Julia, daughter of Augustus, he was condemned to death by the emperor in B.C. 2, but seems to have anticipated his execution by a voluntary death. He was also accused of aiming at the empire. (Dion Cass. lv. 10; Senec. de Brevit. Vit. 5; Tac. Ann. iv. 44, iii. 18; Plin. H. N. vii. 46; Vell. Pat. i. c.)

2. Surnamed MELISSA (the Bee), a Greek monk, who is placed by some writers in the eighth and by others in the twelfth century of our era. He must, however, at any rate have lived after the time of Theophylact, whom he mentions. He made a collection of so-called hod comy, or sentences on virtues and vices, which is still extant. It resembles the Sermones of Stobaeus, and consists of two books in 176 titles. The extracts are taken from the early Christian fathers. The work is printed at the end of the editions of Stobaeus published at Frankfort, 1581, and Geneva, 1609, fol. It is also contained in the Biblioth. Patr. vol. v. p. 873, &c., ed. Paris. (Fahr, Bibli. Gr. ix. p. 744, &c.; Cave, Script. Ecles. Hist. Lit. ii. p. 566, ed. London.)

3. A Greek monk, and a disciple of Simeon Stylites, lived about A.D. 460. He wrote a life of his master Simeon, with whom he had lived on intimate terms. It was written in Greek, and L. Alattus (Diār. de Script. Sim. p. 8) attests, that he saw a Greek MS. of it; but the only edition which has been published is a Latin translation in Dolendo's Act. Sontonic. p. 264, &c. Cave.

4. ST., sometimes surnamed Abbas, because he is believed to have been the founder of the monastic life among the early Christians, was born in A.D. 251, at Coma, near Hermelia, in Middle Egypt. His earliest years were spent in seclusion, and the Greek language, which then every person of education used to acquire, remained unknown to him. He merely spoke and wrote the Egyptian language. At the age of nineteen, after having lost both his parents, he distributed his large property among his neighbours and the poor, and determined to live in solitary seclusion in the neighbourhood of his birthplace. The struggle before he fully overcame the desires of the flesh is said to have been immense; but at length he succeeded, and the simple diet which he adopted, combined with manual labour, strengthened his health so much, that he lived to the age of 103 years. In A.D. 285 he withdrew to the mountains of eastern Egypt, where he took up his abode in a decayed castle or tower. Here he spent twenty years in solitude, and in constant struggles with the evil spirit. It was not till A.D. 305, that his friends prevailed upon him to return to the world. He now began his active and public career. A number of disciples gathered around him, and his preaching, together with the many miraculous cures he was said to perform on the sick, spread his fame all over Egypt. The number of persons anxious to learn from him and to follow his mode of life increased every year. Of such persons he made two settlements, one in the mountains of eastern Egypt, and another near the town of Arsinoe, and he himself usually spent his time in one of these monasteries, if we may call them so. From the accounts of St. Athanasius in his life of Antonius, it is clear that most of the essential points of a monastic life were observed in these establishments. During the persecution of the Christians in the reign of the emperor Maximian, A.D. 311, Antonius, anxious to gain the palm of a martyr, went to Alexandria, but all his efforts and his opposition to the commands of the government were of no avail, and he...

ANUBIS.

ad Odyssey, p. 1821; Mich. Apoc. Centr. Proem. xvii. No. 7.) The fact that Scroeta used to swear by a dog is so well known, that we scarcely need mention it. (Athen. vii. p. 309; Porphyry. de Abst. iii. p. 283.) It is however a remarkable fact, that, notwithstanding this, the name of Anubis is not expressly mentioned by any writer previous to the age of Augustus; but after that time, it frequently occurs both in Greek and Roman authors. (Ov. Met. ix. 690, Amor. ii. 13. 11; Propert. iii. 9. 41; Virg. Aen. viii. 698; Juven. xv. 8; Lucian. Jup. trip. 8, Consol. Deor. 10, 11, Tacit. 28.) Several of the passages here referred to attest the importance of the worship which was diverted to the divinity, called by the Egyptians Anubis; that this dog was worshipped throughout Egypt (xvii. p. 812); but the principal and perhaps the original seat of the worship appears to have been in the nomes of Cynopolis in middle Egypt. (Strab. l.c.) In the stories about Anubis which have come down to us, as well as in the explanations of his nature, the original character—that of a fetish—is lost sight of, probably because the philosophical spirit of later times wanted to find something higher and loftier in the worship of Anubis than it originally was. According to his rationalistic view of Dieolcos (i. 18), Anubis was the son of king Osiris, who accompanied his father on his expéditions, and was called by him a dog. For this reason he was represented as a human being with the head of a dog. In another passage (i. 87) the same writer explains his monstrous figure by saying, that Anubis performed to Osiris and Isis the service of a guard, which is performed to men by dogs. He mentions third account, which has mere the appearance of genuine myths. When Isis, it is said, sought Osiris, she was preceded and guided by dogs, which defended and protected her, and expressed their desire to assist her by barking. For this reason he was represented as a human being with the head of a dog. An interpretation of this mythus, derived from the physical nature of Egypt, is given by the interpreters of the text, which by its inundation has fructified a distant part of the country. But this only explains the origin of the god, without giving any definite idea of his nature.

ANULIUS. P. CORNELIUS, one of the generals of Severus, gained a battle over Niger at Issus, a.d. 194. He afterwards commanded one of the divisions of the army which Severus sent against Adiabene, a.d. 197. He was consul in a. d. 198. (Dion Cass. lxxiv. 7, lxxv. 3.) Anulius, the son of Anulus, whom the Romans worshipped in a grove near Anxur (Turracina) together with Feronia. He was regarded as a youthful Jupiter, and Feronia as Juno. (Serv. ad Aen. vii. 799.) On coins his name appears as Axur or Anxur. (Drakenburch, ad Sid. Ital. viii. 392; Morell. Thesaur. Numa. ii. tab. 2.) [L. S.]

ANYSIS (Anarés), an ancient king of Egypt, who, according to Herodotus, succeeded Asyphis. He was blind, and in his reign Egypt was invaded by the Ethiopians under their king Sabaco, and remained in their possession for fifty years. Anyxis in the meanwhile took refuge in the marshes of Lower Egypt, where he formed an island which afterwards remained unknown for upward of seven centuries, until it was discovered by Amyrtaenos. When after the lapse of fifty years the Ethiopians withdrew from Egypt, Anyxis returned from the marshes and resumed the government. (Herod. ii. 137; iv. 9.)

ANYTE, of Tegea (Ἀνύτη Τηγαίας), the author of several epigrams in the Greek Anthology, is mentioned by Pollux (v. 5) and by Stephanus Byzantinus (s. v. Teyla). She is numbered among the lyric poets by Meleager (Jacobs, Anthol. i. 1, v. 5), in whose list she stands first, and by Antipater of Thessalonica (Ibid. ii. 101, no. 23), who names her with Praxilla, Myro, and Sappho, and calls her the female Homer (ἡ Θηβαίος Ὄμηρος), an epithet which might be used either with reference to the martial spirit of some of her epigrams, or to their antique character. From the above notices and from the epigrams themselves, which are for the most part in the style of the ancient Doric choral songs, like the poems of Alcmen, we should be disposed to place her much higher than the date usually assigned to her, on the authority of a passage in Tatian (adsc. Grecos, 52, p. 114, Worth.), who says, that the status of Anyte was made by Euthenastes and Cephisodotus, who are known to have flourished about 300 B.C. But even if the Anyte here mentioned were certainly the poetess, it would not follow that she was contemporary with these artists. On the other hand, one of ANYTUS.

ANYTUS (Ἀνυτός), a Titan who was believed to have brought up the goddess Despoena. In an Arcadian temple his statue stood in the side of Diotimus. (Paus. viii. 37. § 3.)

ANYTUS (Ἀνυτός), an Athenian, son of Anthemanthus, was the most influential and formidable of the accusers of Socrates. (Plat. Apol. p. 18, b.; Hor. Sat. ii. 4, 3.) His father is said to have made a large fortune as a tanner, and to have transmitted it, together with his trade, to his son. (Plat. Men. p. 90, a.; Xen. Apol. § 29; Schol. ad Plat. Apol. l.c.) Anytus seems to have been a man of loose principles and habits, and Plutarch alludes (Apol. § 29; SchoL) to his intimate and apparently disreputable connexion with Aleibades. In b.c. 409, he was sent with 30 ships to relieve Pylus, which the Lacedaemonians were besieging; but he was prevented by bad weather from doubling Malea, and was obliged to return to Athens. Here he was brought to trial on the charge of having acted treacherously, and, according to Diodorus and Plutarch, which see (Apol. § 29), he was the first instance of such corruption at Athens, escaped death only by bribing the judges. (Xen. Hell. i. 2. § 18; Diod. xiii. 64; Plat. Cor. p. 220, b.; Aristot. op. Harr poc. s. v. Δηνεκός. But see Thirlwall's Greece, vol. iv. p. 94.) He appears to have been, in politics, a leading and influential party, and to have attached himself to the democratic party, and to have been driven into banishment during the usurpation of the 30 tyrants, b.c. 404. Xenophon makes Tharmannes join his name with that of Thrasybulus; and Lysias mentions him as a leader of the exiles at Phylae, and records an instance of his prudence and moderation in that capacity. (Plat. Men. p. 90; Apol. p. 29, c.; Xen. Mem. § 29; Hell. ii. 3. §§ 42, 44; Lys. c. Apol. p. 137.) The grounds of his eminence to Socrates seem to have been partly professional and partly personal. (Plat. Apol. pp. 21—23; Xen. Mem. i. 2. §§ 37, 38; Apol. § 29; Plat. Men. p. 94, in fin.) The Athenians, according to Diogenes Laërtius (ii. 43), having repented of their condemnation of Socrates, put Meletus to death, and sent Anytus and Lycon into banishment. For the subject generally, see Stallbaum ad Plat. Apol. pp. 18, b., 23, c.; Schleierm. Introd. to the Menon, in fin.; Thirlwall's Greece, vol. iv. pp. 374—260. [E. R.]

AODE. [Muse.]

AON (Ἀών), a son of Poseidon, and an ancient Boeotian hero, from whom the Boeotian Aonians and the country of Boeotia (for Boeotia was anciently called Aonia) were believed to have derived their names. (Paus. ix. 5, § 1; Stat. Theb. i. 54; Steph. Byz. s. v. Βοιαία.)

APAMA (Ἀπάμα or Ἀπάμη). 1. The wife of Seleucus Nicator and the mother of Antiochus Soter, was married to Seleucus in b.c. 325, when Alexander gave to his general Asiatic wives. According to Arrian (vii. 4), she was the daughter of Spities, the Bactrian, but Strabo (xii. p. 579) calls her, erroneously, the sister of Artabanus. (Comp. Appian. Syr. 57; and Liv. xxxviii. 13, who also makes a mistake in calling her the sister, instead of the wife, of Seleucus; Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἀπάμη.)

2. The daughter of Antiochus Soter, married to Magas. (Paus. i. 7, § 3.)

3. The daughter of Alexander of Megalopolis, married to Amyntas, king of the Aetolians, about b.c. 206. (Appian, Syr. 13; Liv. xxxv. 47, who calls her Apamia.)

APANCIPLON (Ἀπαντιπλόν), the strangled (goddess), a surname of Artemis, the origin of which is thus related by Pausanias. (viii. 23, § 5.)

In the neighbourhood of the town of Caphyae in Arcadia, in a place called Condylea, there was a sacred grove of Artemis Condylea. On one occasion when some boys were playing in this grove they put a string round the goddess' statue, and said in their jokes they would strangle Artemis. Some of the inhabitants of Caphyae who found the boys thus engaged in their sport, stoned them to death. After this occurrence all the women of Caphyae had premature births, and all the children were brought dead into the world. This calamity did not cease until the boys were honourably buried, and an annual sacrifice to their names was instituted in accordance with the command of a oracle of Apollo. The surname of Condyleus who then changed into Apantiplon from the name of the place. (L. S. 1.)

APATURIA (Ἀπατοῦρια or Ἀπατονοῦρια), the is, the deceitful. 1. A surname of Athena, which was given to her by Acteth. (Paus. ii. 33, § 1.) [Aesch.]

2. A surname of Aphrodite at Phanagoria, an other place in the Taurian Chersonesus, where it originated, according to tradition, in this way. Aphrodite was attacked by giants, and called Hecales to her assistance. He concealed himself with her in a cavern, and as the giants approached her one by one, she surrendered them to Hecale to kill them. (Strab. xi. p. 495; Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἀδρόουρος.)

APATURIUS, of Achaia, a scene-painter whose mode of painting the scene of the little theatre at Tralles is described by Vitruvius, and the criticism made upon it by Licinius. (Vitruv. vii. 5, §§ 5, 6.)

APELLAS or APOLLAS (Ἀπελλάς, Ἀπόλλας). 1. The author of a work Περὶ τῶν Πελοποννησίων πόλεων (Athen. ix. p. 369, a.) at Delphi. (Clem. Alex. Protr. p. 31, a., Par. 1629.) He appears to be the same as Apellus, the geographer, of Cyrene. (Marc. Hercul. p. 6)
APELLES. 221

Hadas. Comp. Quintil. x. 2 § 14; Böckh, Prefat. ut Schol. Pind. p. xxiii., &c.

2. A sceptical philosopher. (Diog. Laërt. ix. 106.) APELLESA (Ἀπελλάς), a sculptor, who made, in bronze, statues of worshipping females (adorantes énaiastás. Plin. xxxiv. 19. § 26). He made the statue of Cynisca, who conquered in the chariot-race at Olympia. (Paus. vi. 1. § 2.) Cynisca was sister to Aegeus, king of Sparta, who died at the age of 84, in 362 b. c. Therefore the victory of Cynisca, and the time when Apelles flourished, may be placed about 400 b. c. His name indicates his Doric origin. (Tolken, Amathusis, iii. 128.)

APELLES (Ἀπελλάς). 1. One of the guardians of Philip V., king of Macedonia. (Phil. V.)

2. Perhaps a son of the preceding, was a friend of Philip V., and accompanied his son Demetrios to Rome, b. c. 183. (Polyb. xxiii. 14, &c., xxiv. 1.)

3. Of Ascalon, was the chief tragic poet in the time of Caligula, with whom he lived on the most intimate terms. (Phil. Logai. ad Carium, p. 750; Dion Cass. lxi. 5; Suet. Cal. 33.)

APELLES (Ἀπελλάς), the most celebrated of Attic painters, a born, most probably, at Colophon in Ionia (Suidas, s. v.), though Pliny xxxv. 36. § 10) and Ovid (Art. Am. iii. 401; Pont. iv. 1. 29) call him a Coan. The account (Strabo (xiv. p. 612) and Lucian (De Calamum. ix. §§ 2, 6), that he was an Ephesian, may be explained from the statements of Suidas, that he was made a citizen at Ephesus, and that he studied painting there under Ephorus. He afterwards studied under Pamphilus of Amphipolis, to whom he paid the fee of a talent for a ten-years' course of instruction. (Suidas, s. v.; Plin. xxxv. 36. § 8.)

At a later period, when he had already gained a high reputation, he went to Sicyon, and again paid a talent for admission into the school of Melanibius, whom he assisted in his portrait of the young Aristarhnes. (Plut. Arat. 13.) By this course of study he acquired the scientific accuracy of the Sicyonian school, as well as the elegance of the Ionic.

The best part of the life of Apelles was probably spent at the court of Philip and Alexander the great; for Pliny speaks of the great number of his portraits of both those princes (xxxv. 36. § 16), and states that he was the only person whom Alexander would permit to take his portrait. (vii. 8; see also Cic. ad Fam. v. 12, § 13; Hor. ep. ii. 239; Valer. Max. vii. 11. § 2, ext.; triumv. Amyt.lob. 16. § 7.) Apelles enjoyed the friendship of Alexander, who used to visit him in his studio. In one of these visits, when the king's conscience was exposing his ignorance of art, Apelles politely advised him to be silent, as the eyes who were grinding the colours were laughing at him. (Plin. xxxiv. 36. § 12.) Plutarch relates his speech as having been made to Megabyzus. De Trag. Anim. 12, p. 471, f.) Aelian tells the anecdote of Zeuxis and Megabyzus. (Var. Hist. ii. 12.)

Pliny (l. c.) also tells us that Apelles, having been commissioned by Alexander to paint his favourite concubine, Campaspe (Παράκειται, Aelian, Var. Hist. xii. 34), naked, fell in love with her, upon which Alexander gave her to him as a present; and according to some she was the model of the painter's best picture, the Venus Anadyomene. From all the information we have of the connexion of Apelles with Alexander, we may safely conclude that the former accompanied the latter into Asia. After Alexander's death he appears to have travelled through the western parts of Asia. To this period we may probably refer his visit to Rhodes and his intercourse with Protegenses. (See below.) Being driven by a storm to Alexandria, after the assumption of the regal title by Ptolemy, whose favour he had not gained while he was with Alexander, his rivals laid a plot to ruin him, which he defeated by an ingenious use of his skill in drawing. (Plin. xxxiv. 36. § 13.) Lucian relates that Apelles was accused by his rival Antiphilus of having had a share in the conspiracy of Theodotus at Tyre, and that when Ptolemy discovered the falsehood of the charge, he presented Apelles with a hundred talents, and gave Antiphilus to him as a slave: Apelles commemorated the event in an allegorical picture. (De Calamum. ix. §§ 2—6, vol. iii. pp. 127—132.) Lucian's words imply that he had seen this picture, but he may have been mistaken in ascribing it to Apelles. He seems also to speak of Apelles as if he had been living at Ptolemy's court before this event occurred. If, therefore, Pliny and Lucian are both to be believed, we may conclude, from comparing their tales, that Apelles, having been accidentally driven to Alexandria, overcame the dislike which Ptolemy bore to him, and remained in Egypt during the latter part of his life, enjoying the favour of that king, in spite of the schemes of his rivals to disgrace him. The account of his life cannot be carried further; we are not told when or where he died; but from the above facts his date can be fixed, since he practised his art before the death of Philip (b. c. 336), and after the assumption of the regal title by Ptolemy. (b. c. 306.) As the result of a minute examination of all the facts, Tolken (Amath. iii. pp. 117—119) places him between 352 and 306 b. c. According to Pliny, he flourished about the 113th Olympiad, b. c. 352.

Many anecdotes are preserved of Apelles and his contemporaries, which throw an interesting light both on his personal and his professional character. He was ready to acknowledge that in some points he was excelled by other artists, as by Amphin in grouping and by Asclepiodorus in perspective. (Plin. xxxiv. 36. § 10.) He first caused the merit of Protogenses to be understood. Coming to Rhodes, and finding that the works of Protogenses were scarcely valued at all by his countrymen, he offered him fifty talents for a single picture, and spread the report that he meant to sell the picture again as his own. (Plin. ib. § 13.) In speaking of the great artists who were his contemporaries, he declared himself to them only equal to excellence except one, namely, grace, which he claimed for himself alone. (ib. § 10.)

Throughout his whole life, Apelles laboured to improve himself, especially in drawing, which he never spent a day without practising. (Plin. ib. § 12; hence the proverb Nulla dies sine linea.)

The tale of his contest with Protegenses affords an example both of the skill to which Apelles attained in this portion of his art, and of the importance attached to it in all the great schools of Greece.

Apelles had sailed to Rhodes, eager to meet Protegenses. Upon landing, he went straight to that artist's studio. Protegenses was absent, but a large panel ready to be painted on hung in the studio. Apelles seized the pencil, and drew an APELLES.

A list of the works of Apelles is given by Pliny, (xxxv. 36.) They are for the most part single figures, or groups of a very few figures. Of his portraits the most celebrated was that of Alexander, yielding a thunderbolt, which was known as αἰχμαβόλος, and which gave occasion to the saying, that of two Alexanders, the one, the son of Philip, was invincible, the other, he of Apelles, inimitable. (Plut. Fort. Alex. 2, 3.) In this picture the thunderbolt and the hand which held it appeared to stand out of the panel; and, to aid this effect, the artist did not scruple to represent Alexander's complexion as dark, though it was really light. (Plut. Alex. 4.) The price of this picture was twenty talents. Another of his portraits, that of Antigonus, has been celebrated for its concealment of the loss of the king's eye, by representing his face in profile. He also painted a portrait of himself. Among his allegorical pictures was one representing Castor and Pollux, with Victory and Alexander the Great, how grouped we are not told. He also painted in the temple of Castor, in which the figure of War, with his hounds tied behind his back, followed the triumphant car of Alexander. "He also painted," says Pliny, "things which cannot be painted; thunder and lionings, which they call Bronte Astrapo, and Cernambolia." These were clear, allegorical figures. Several of his subjects were taken from the heroic mythology. But of all his pictures the most admired was the "Venus Anadyomene," (ἡ ἀναδύομενη Ἀφροδίτη,) or Venus rising out of the sea. The goddess was washing her hair, and the falling drops of water formed transparent silver veil around her form. This picture, which is said to have cost 100 talents, we painted for the temple of Aesculapius at Cos, an afterwards placed by Augustus in the temple where he dedicated to Julius Caesar. The lower part being injured, no one could be found to repair it. As it continued to decay, Nero had a copy of it made by Dorotheus. (Plin. l.c.; Strab. xiv. p. 657.) Apelles commenced another picture of Venus to the Coans, which he intended should surpass all Venus Anadyomene. At his death, he had finished only the head, the upper part of the breasts and the outline of the figure; but Pliny says, that it was more admired than his former finished picture. No one could be found to complete the work. (Plin. xxxv. l.c., and 40, § 4; Cic. ad Fam. i. 5, § 4, de Off. iii. 2.) By the general consent of ancient authors Apelles stands first among Greek painters. I the undiscriminating admiration of Pliny, who seems to have regarded a portrait of a horse, as true that other horses neighed at it, as an achievement of art as admirable as the Venus Anadyomene itself, we may add the unmeasured praise which Cicero, Varro, Columella, Ovid, and other writers give to the works of Apelles, and especially to the Venus Anadyomene. (Cic. Brut. 18, de Orat. iii. Varro, L. L. ix. 12, ed. Müller; Colum. R. Praef. § 31; Schm. Ovid. Art. Am. iii. 401; Prop. iv. 1. 29; Propert. iii. 7. 11; Anon. Ep. 10; Author. Panmod. iv. 178-182.) Statius (Silv. i. 100) and Martial (ci. 9) call painting by the name of "Ars Apollon." Sir Joshua Reynolds says the Greek painters, and evidently with an especial reference to Apelles, "if we had the good fortune to possess what the ancients themselves possessed in their masterpieces, I have no doubt but we should find their figures as correctly drawn as the L.

excessively thin coloured line on the panel, by which Protogenes, on his return, at once guessed who had been his visitor, and in his turn drew a still thinner line of a different colour upon or within the former (according to the reading of the recent editions of Pliny, in illa ipse.) When Apelles returned and saw the lines, ashamed to be defeated, says Pliny, "tertio colore lineas sequit, nullum relinquens amplius subtilitati locum." (76. § 11.) The most natural explanation of this difficult passage seems to be, that down the middle of the first line of Apelles, Protogenes drew another so as to divide it into two parallel halves, and that Apelles again divided the line of Protogenes in the same manner. Pliny speaks of the three lines as visum efficiéntes." The panel was preserved, and carried to Rome, where it remained, exciting more wonder than all the other works of art in the palace of the Caesars, till it was destroyed by fire with that building.

Of the means which Apelles took to ensure accuracy, the following example is given. He used to expound his finished pictures to view in a public place, while he hid himself behind the picture to hear the criticisms of the passers-by. A cobbler detected a fault in the shoes of a figure: the next day he found that the fault was corrected, and was proceeding to criticise the leg, when Apelles rushed from behind the picture, and commanded the cobbler to keep to the shoes. (Plin. l.c. § 12: hence the proverb, Ne supra erepídmum sutor: see also Val. Max. viii. 12, ext. § 5; Lucian tells the tale of Philidus, pro Imag. 14, vol. ii. p. 492.) Marvellous tales are told of the extreme accuracy of his likenesses of men and horses. (Plin. xxxv. 39, §§ 14, 17.; Lucian, de Colonn. l. c.; Aelian, V. H. ii. 3.) With all his diligence, however, Apelles knew when to cease correcting. He said that he excelled Protogenes in this one point, that the latter did not know when to leave a picture alone, and he laid down the maxim, Nocere saepe amplius subtilitati locum. (Silv. Anthol. Plamul. 1. 29; Ep. 10.)

Apelles is stated to have made great improvements in the mechanical part of his art. The assertion of Pliny, that he used only four colours, is incorrect. (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Colores.) He painted with the pencil, but we are not told whether he used the cestrum. His principal discovery was that of the undiscriminating admiration of Pliny, which, besides preserving the excellence of colouring which does not proceed from fine colours, but true colours; from the frequent mention of tabellae with reference to his pictures. Pliny expressly says, that he did not paint on walls. (xxxv. 37.)

* Does this refer only to the excessive thinness of the lines, or may it mean that the three lines were actually tapered away towards a common vanishing point?*
APELLES. 223

APELLES (Ἀπελλάς), a disciple of Marician, departed in some points from the teaching of his master. Instead of wholly rejecting the Old Testament, he looked upon its contents as coming partly from the good principle, partly from the evil principle. Instead of denying entirely the reality of Christ's human body, he held that in his descent from heaven he assumed to himself an aerial body, which he gave back to the air as he ascended to heaven, which was a modification of its kind, and considered differences of religious belief as unimportant, since, said he, "all who put their trust in the Crucified One will be saved, if they only prove their faith by good works."

Apelles flourished about A. D. 180, and lived to a very great age. Tertullian (Pros. script. Haeret. 30) says, that he was expelled from the school of Marcion for fornication with one Philumene, who fancied herself a prophetess, and whose fancies were recorded by Apelles in his book entitled Ἀφανεσίς. But since Rhodon, who was the personal opponent of Apelles, speaks of him as universally honoured for his course of life (Euseb. H. E. v. 15), we may conclude that the former part of Tertullian's story is one of those inventions which were so commonly made in order to damage the character of heretics. Besides the Ἀφανεσίς, the object of which Enesbius states (L. C.) to have been, to prove that the writings of Moses were false. It must have been a large work, since Ambrose (De Paradis. 5) quotes from the thirty-eighth volume of it. (See also Tertull. adv. Marcion. iv. 17; Augustin. de Haer. 23; Epiphanius, Haer. 44.)

APELLICON (Ἀπελλίκον), a native of Teos, was a Peripatetic philosopher and a great collector of books. In addition to the number which his immense wealth enabled him to purchase, he stole several out of the archives of different Greek cities. His practices having been discovered at Athens, he was obliged to fly from the city to save his life. He afterwards returned during the tyranny of Aristocles, who patronized him, as a member of the same philosophic sect with himself, and gave him the command of the expedition against Delos, which, though at first successful, was ruined by the carelessness of Apellicon, who was surprised by the Romans under Orbibus, and with difficulty escaped, having lost his whole army. (Athen. v. pp. 214, 215.) His library was carried to Rome by Sulla. (B. c. 84.) Apellicon had died just before. (Strab. xiii. p. 609.)

Aphareus's works, which had been given by that philosopher, on his death-bed, to Theophrastus, and by him to Neleus, who carried them to Scopas, in Troas, where they remained, having been hidden and much injured in a cave, till they were purchased by Apollonius, who published them a very faulty edition of them. Upon the arrival of the MSS. at Rome, they were examined by the grammarians, who furnished copies of them to Andronicus of Rhodes, upon which the latter founded the edition of Aristotle. APICATA.

Greek rhetorician who lived about A.D. 315, but of whose life nothing is known. He is the author of an elementary introduction to the study of rhetoric, and of a number of fables in the style of those of Aesop. The introduction to the study of rhetoric, which bears the title Progymnasmata (προγυμνάσματα), if considered from a right point of view, is of great interest, inasmuch as it shows us the method followed by the ancients in the instruction of boys, before they were sent to the regular schools of the rhetoricians. The book consists of rules and exercises. Previous to the time of Aphthonius the progymnasmata of Hermogenes were commonly used in schools; Aphthonius found it insufficient, and upon its basis he constructed his new work, which contained fourteen progymnasmata, while that of his predecessor contained only twelve. Soon after its appearance the work of Aphthonius superseded that of Hermogenes, and became the common school-book in this branch of education for several centuries. On the revival of letters the progymnasmata of Aphthonius recovered their ancient popularity, and during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries they were used everywhere, but more especially in Germany, in schools and universities, as the text-book for rhetoric. But by a singular mistake the work was during that period regarded as the canon of everything that was required to form a perfect orator, whereas the author and the ancients had intended and used it as a collection of elementary and preparatory exercises for children. The number of editions and translations which were published during that period is greater than that of any other ancient writer. (Fab. Bild. Graece, vi. p. 96, &c.; Hoffmann, Lex. Jibbolyr. i. p. 193, &c.) The edition is that in Aldus' collection of the "Auctorcs," Venice, 1508, fol. The most important among the subsequent editions are that of Guinias, Florence, 1513, 8vo., which contains also the progymnasmata of Hermogenes; that of Camerarius, with a Latin translation, Lips., 1567, 8vo.; of B. Hartag, 1591, 8vo., with a Latin translation and notes; of F. Schobarius, 1597, 8vo., and that of J. scheffer, Upsala, 1670, 8vo. The last and best edition is that in Walz's collection of the "Rhetores Graeci," Venice, 1781, fol. It contains the notes of cheffer, and an ancient abridgment of the work by S. Matthiuseus (ἐκατον ἐν τοῖς δε ῥητορικοῖς προ¬

Drusus, and was plotting against the life of the latter. His subsequent murder of Drusus was first disclosed by Apicata. (Tac. Ann. iv. 3, 11.) When Sejanus and his children were killed eight years afterwards, A.D. 31, Apicata put an end to her own life. (Dion Cass. lvi. 11.)

APICIUS. Ancient writers distinguish three Romans bearing this name, all of them indebted for celebrity to the same cause, their devotion to gluttony.

1. The first of these in chronological order, is said to have been instrumental in procuring the condemnation of Rutilius Rufus, who went into exile in the year B.C. 92. According to Posidonius, in the 49th book of his history, he transcended all men in luxury. (Athen. iv. p. 168, d.; compare Posidoniis Reliquiae, ed. Bade.)

2. The second and most renowned, M. Gellius Apicius, flourished under Tiberius, and many anecdotes have been preserved of the inventive genius, the skill and the prodigality which he displayed in discovering and creating new sources of culinary delight, arranging new combinations, and ransacking every quarter of the globe and every kingdom of nature for new objects to stimulate and gratify his appetite. At last, after having squandered upwards of eight hundred thousand pounds upon the indulgence of his all-engrossing passion, he balanced his books, and found that little more than eighty thousand remained; upon which, despairing of being able to satisfy the cravings of hunger from such a miserable pittance, he forthwith hanged himself. But he was not forgotten. Sundry cakes (Apicet) and sauces long kept alive his memory; Apician, the grammarian, composed a dialogue on his virtues; and his luxurious labours, his wanderings into a proverb in all matters connected with the pleasures of the table; he became the model of gastronomers, and schools of cookery arose which hailed him as their mighty master. (Tact. Ann. iv. 1; Dion Cass. lix. 19; Athen. i. p. 7, a.; Plin. H. N. viii. 51, ix. 17, x. 48, xix. 8; Sene. Consol. ad Hec. 10, Epp. xiv. 43, xxi. 20, De Vid. Beat. xi. 3; Juv. iv. 23, and Schol. xi. 2; Martial, ii. 69, iii. 22, x. 73; Lamprid. Haligb. 18, &c.; Sidon. Apollin. Epp. iv. 7; Suidas, s. v. Apcicos; Isidor. Origg. xx. 4; Tertullian. Apolog. 3.)

3. When the emperor Trajan was in Parthia, many days distant from the sea, a certain Apicus sent him fresh oysters, preserved by a skilful process of his own. (Athen. i. p. 7, 4.; Suidas, s. v. Bgrpa.)

The first and third of these are mentioned by Athenaeus alone, the second by very many writers, as may be seen from the authorities quoted above. Hence some scholars, startled not unnaturally by the singular coincidence of name and pursuit, have endeavoured to prove that there was in reality only one Apicus, namely the second, and that the multiplication arose from the tales with regard to his excesses having passed from mouth to mouth among persons ignorant of chronology, or from the stories current with regard to various gluttons having been all in the process of time referred to the most famous of all. It will be observed, however, that in so far as the first is concerned Athenaeus points directly to the source from whence his information was derived, and connects the individual with an important and well-known historical fact, nor is it probable that there is any confusion of names in the passage relating to the third, since it is confirmed by the text of Suidas, who evidently quotes from Athenaeus. (See, however, Vincent. Contoren. Var. Lect. c. xvii.; Lipsius on Tactis. Ann. iv. 1; Lister. Prefud. ad Apic.)

The treatise we now possess, bearing the title CARLI APICH de opusitdis et condimentis, sive de re culinaria, Libri decem, appears to have been first discovered by Enoch of Ascoli, about the year 1454, in the time of Pope Nicholas V., and the editio princeps was printed at Milan in 1498. It is a sort of Cook and Confectioner's Manual, containing a multitude of receipts for preparing and dressing all kinds of flesh, fish, and fowl, for compounding sauces, baking cakes, preserving sweetmeats, flavouring wines, and the like. From the inaccuracies and solecisms of the style, it is probable that it was compiled at a later period by some one who prefixed the name of Apicius, in order to attract attention and insure the circulation of his book. It is not without value, however, since it affords an insight into the details of a Roman kitchen which we seek for elsewhere in vain.

The best editions are those of Martin Lister, published at London, in 1705, reprinted with additions by Almoleon (Amstelod. 1709), and that of Bernhold (Marebrite. 1737, Barthn. 1791, and Ansbach. 1800). There is an illustrative work by Dierbach, entitled Flora Apiciana. (Heidelberg, 1831.) [W. R.]

API'NIUS TIRO. [Tiro.]

A'PION (Avlwv), a Greek grammarian. His name is sometimes incorrectly spelt Apion, and some writers, like Suidas, call him a son of Pleistoneias, while others more correctly state that Pleistoneias was only a surname, and that he was the son of Poseidonius. (Gell. vi. 3; Senec. Epist. 88; Euseb. Prag. Evang. x. 10.) He was a native of Asia, but used to say that he was born at Alexandria, where he studied under Apollonius, the son of Archibius, and Didymus, from whom he imbibed his love for the Homeric poems. (Suid. s. v. 'Avlwv; Joseph. c. Apion. ii. 3, &c.) He afterwards settled at Rome, where he taught rhetoric as the successor of the grammarian Theon in the reign of Tiberius and Claudius. He appears to have enjoyed an extraordinary reputation for his extensive knowledge and his versatility as an orator; but the ancients are unanimous in concerning his estimations vanity. (Gell. v. 14; Plin. H. N. Prag. xxi. 6; Joseph. c. Apion. i. 12.) He declared that every one whom he mentioned in his works would be immortalized; he placed himself by the side of the greatest philosophers of ancient Greece, and used to say, that Alexandria ought to be proud of having a man like himself among its citizens. It is not unlikely that the name "cymbalum mundi," by which Tiberius was accustomed to call him, was meant to express both his loquacity and his boastful character. He is spoken of as the most active of grammarians, and the surname poXos which he bore, according to Suidas, is usually explained as describing the zeal and labour with which he prosecuted his studies. In the reign of Caligula he travelled about in Egypt (Alf. casvad), consisting of five books, which was highly valued in antiquity, for it contained descriptions of nearly all the remarkable objects in Egypt. It also contained numerous attacks upon the Jews. (Euseb. Prag. Evang. x. 10; Gell. v. 14; Plin. H. N. xxxvii. 19.) A work against the Jews. (Euseb. l.c.) A reply to these attacks is made by Josephus, in the second book of his work usually called KaKo Avlwvov, and this reply is the only one from which we learn anything about the character of Apion's work. 4. A work in praise of Alexander the Great. (Gell. vi. 8.) A work against the Jews. (Euseb. l.c.) A reply to these attacks is made by Josephus, in the second book of his work usually called Kara Avlwvov, and this reply is the only source from which we learn anything about the character of Apion's work. 4. A work in praise of Alexander the Great. (Gell. vi. 8.) 5. Historic. of separate countries. (Iovsepi a AVT e[&heta;], Suid. s. v. 'Avlwv.) 6. In the celebrated glutton Apicius and, 7. Peri tis Paroikias dialektos. (Athens, vii. p. 294, xv. p. 650.) 8. De metallica discipline (Plin. Elocuc. lib. xxxv.) The greatest fragment of the works of Apion are the story about the dolphin nco, and his lion, and about the dolphin ne Dienecharis, both of which are preserved in Cellinus Suidas (s. n. "Apyyvpa, sivudde, oparagou, an vco -yvpa) refers to Apion as a writer of epigrams, but whether he is the same as the grammarian uncertain. (Villoison. l. c.; Burigny, in the Mémo de l'Acad. des Inscript. xxxviii. p. 171, &c.; Lehnt. Quest. Epicac. Dissert. i., who chiefly discuss what Apion did for Homer.) [L. S.]

A'PION, PTOLEMAEUS. [Pтолeмаев.]

APIS ('Avis). 1. A son of Phoronius by nymph Laodice, and brother of Niohe. He was king of Argos, established a tyrannical government and called Peloponesus after his own name Ap but he was killed in a conspiracy headed by Th xion and Telchis. (Apollod. i. 7. 6, i. 8.) In the former of these passages Apollodorus states that Apis, the son of Phoronius, was killed Aetolus; but this is a mistake arising from confusion of our Apis, with Apis the son of Jas

APIS.
who was killed by Actolus during the funeral games celebrated in honour of Azanus. (Paus. v. 1. § 8; Arrollus.)

Apis, the son of Phoroncus, is said, after his death, to have been worshipped as a god, under the name of Serapis (Σαραπις); and this statement shows that Egyptian mythologies are mixed up with the story of Apis. This confusion is still more manifest in the tradition, that Apis gave his kingdom of Argos to his brother, and went to Egypt, where he reigned for several years afterwards. (Euseb. Chron. n. 271; Augustin, De Civ. Dei, xviii. 5.) Apis is spoken of as one of the earliest lawgivers among the Greeks. (Theodoret. Grec. Affect. Cor. vol. iv. p. 927, ed. Schultz.)

2. A son of Telchis, and father of Thelxion. He was king at Sicyon, and is said to have been such a powerful prince, that previous to the arrival of Pelops, Peloponnesus was called after him Apia. Such a powerful prince, that previous to the arrival of Pelops, Peloponnesus was called after him Apia.

But some of those which he mentions have refer- ence to the later astronomical and physical specu- lations about the god. When all the signs were satisfactory in a newly born bull, the cere- mony towards the rising sun. In this house the god was tied with milk for the space of four months, and after this, about the time of the new moon, the scribes and prophets prepared a ship sacred to the god, in which he was conveyed to Memphis. Here he entered his splendid residence, containing extensive walks and courts for his amusement. A number of the choicest cows, forming as it were the harem of the god, were kept in his palace at Memphis. The account of Diodorus, though on the whole agreeing with that of Aelian, contains some additional particulars of interest. Pliny and Ammianus Marcellinus do not mention the god's harem, and state that Apis was only once in every year allowed to come in contact with a cow, and that this cow was, like the god himself, marked in a peculiar way. Apis, moreover, drank the water of only one particular well in his palace, since the water of the Nile was believed to be too fattening. The god had no other occupation at Memphis, besides the ceremonies during his own festival, his attendants and worshippers, and to give oracles, which he did in various ways. According to Pliny, his temple contained two thalami, and according as he entered the one or the other, it was regarded as a favourable or unfavourable sign.

As regards the mode in which Apis was worsh- shipped, we know, from Herodotus (ii. 38, 41), that oxen, whose purity was scrupulously examined before, were offered to him as sacrifices. His birthday, which was celebrated every year, was his most solemn festival; it was a day of rejoicing for all Egypt. The god was allowed to live only a certain number of years, probably twenty-five. (Lucan, Phars. vii. 477; Plut. de Is. et Os. 14.)

In regard to the birth of this divine animal Herodotus (iii. 28) says, that he was the offspring of a young cow which was fructified by a ray from heaven, and according to others it was by a ray of the moon that she conceived him. (Suid., Aelian, L. c.; Plut. de Is. et Os. 48.) The signs by which it was recognised that the newly born bull was really the god Apis, are described by several of the ancients. According to Herodotus (L. c.; comp. Strab. l. c.), it was requisite that the animal should be quite black, have a white square mark on the forehead, on its back a figure similar to that of an eagle, have two kinds of hair in its tail, and on its tongue a knot resembling an insect called κανθαρος. (Compare Ammian. Marcell. L. c.; Solidus, 32.) Pliny (H. N. viii. 71), who states, that the cantharus was under the tongue, adds, that the right side of the body was marked with a white spot resembling the horns of the new moon. Kellian says, that twenty-nine signs were required; but some of those which he mentions have reference to the later astronomical and physical specu- lations about the god. When all the signs were found satisfactory in a newly born bull, the cere- ony of his consecration began. This solemnity was described by Aelian, Pliny, Ammianus Marcell- nus, and Diodorus. (l. 53.) When it was made known, says Aelian, that the god was born, some of the sacred scribes, who possessed the secret knowledge of the signs of Apis, went to the place of his birth, and built a house there in the direc- tion towards the rising sun. In this house the god was tied with milk for the space of four months, and after this, about the time of the new moon, the scribes and prophets prepared a ship sacred to the god, in which he was conveyed to Memphis. Here he entered his splendid residence, containing extensive walks and courts for his amusement. A number of the choicest cows, forming as it were the harem of the god, were kept in his palace at Memphis. The account of Diodorus, though on the whole agreeing with that of Aelian, contains some additional particulars of interest. Pliny and Ammianus Marcellinus do not mention the god's harem, and state that Apis was only once in every year allowed to come in contact with a cow, and that this cow was, like the god himself, marked in a peculiar way. Apis, moreover, drank the water of only one particular well in his palace, since the water of the Nile was believed to be too fattening. The god had no other occupation at Memphis, besides the ceremonies during his own festival, his attendants and worshippers, and to give oracles, which he did in various ways. According to Pliny, his temple contained two thalami, and according as he entered the one or the other, it was regarded as a favourable or unfavourable sign.

As regards the mode in which Apis was worsh- shipped, we know, from Herodotus (ii. 38, 41), that oxen, whose purity was scrupulously examined before, were offered to him as sacrifices. His birthday, which was celebrated every year, was his most solemn festival; it was a day of rejoicing for all Egypt. The god was allowed to live only a certain number of years, probably twenty-five. (Lucan, Phars. vii. 477; Plut. de Is. et Os. 14.)

If he had not died before the expiration of that pe- riod, he was killed and buried in a sacred well, the place of which was unknown except to the initiated, and he who betrayed it was severely punished. (Arnob. adv. Gent. vi. p. 194.) If, however, Apis died a natural death, he was buried publicly and solemnly, and, as it would seem, in the temple of Serapis at Memphis, to which the entrance was left open at the time of Apis' burial. (Paus. i. p. 322; Plut. de Is. et Os. 29.) The name Serapis or Sarapis itself is said to signify "the tomb of Apis." Respecting the particular ceremonies and rites of the burial, it is expected to receive the seredical, which used to be censured, see Dion. i. 84, 96; Plut. c. 29, 35. As the birth of Apis filled all Egypt with joy and festivities, so his death threw the whole country into grief and mourning; and there was no one, as Lucian says, who valued his hair so much that he would not have shorn his head on that occasion. (Lucian, de Sacrific. 15, de Deo Syr. 6; Tibull, i. 8; Ammian. Marc., Solin. 11. c.) However, this time of mourning did not usually last long, as a new Apis was generally kept ready to fill the place of his predecessor; and as soon as he was found, the mourning was at an end, and the rejoicings began. (Diod. i. 85; Spartan. Hist. 12.)

The worship of Apis was, without doubt, origi- nally nothing but the simple worship of the bull, and formed a part of the fetish-worship of the Aphrodite was the goddess of love, beauty, and desire. She was represented as a beautiful and alluring woman, often depicted in art as the giver of love and beauty. According to the Homeric hymn on Aphrodite, she was the personification of the generative powers of nature, and the mother of all living beings.

Aphrodite possessed a magic girdle which enabled her to transform herself into any form she desired. This girdle was said to have been given to her by the god Uranus, and it was a symbol of her power over life and death. (Ov. Met. v. 318, &c.; Hygin. Poet. Astr. 30.)

As with other goddesses, Aphrodite was often associated with other gods and goddesses. She was often depicted as the mother of Adonis, a mortal who was loved by her and whom she declared to be the most beautiful of all the goddesses by a Trojan prince. (Pind. Nem. viii. 1, &c.)

Marriages were called by Zeus her work and the things about which she ought to busy herself. (Hom. Iliad vi. 429; Ov. Herod. xv. 213; comp. Paus. iii. 34, § 11.)

During the Trojan war, Aphrodite, the mother of Aeneas, had been declared the most beautiful of all the goddesses by a Trojan prince, naturally sided with the Trojans. She saved Paris from her contest with Menelaus (Ili. iii. 380), but when she endeavoured to rescue her darling Aeneas from the fight, she was pursued by Diomedes, who wounded her in her hand. In her fright she abandoned her son, and was carried by Iris in the chariot of Ares to Olympus, where she complained of her misfortune to her mother Dion, but was laughed at by Hera and Athena. (Ili. v. 311, &c.)

She also protected the body of Hector, and anointed it with ambrosia. (Ili. xxiii. 185.)

According to the most common accounts of the ancients, Aphrodite was married to Hephaestus (Odys. viii. 270), who, however, is said in the Iliad (vii. 383) to have married Charis. Her faithfulness to Hephaestus in her amours with Ares, and the manner in which she was caught by the ingenuity of her husband, are beautifully described in the Odyssey. (vii. 366, &c.)

By Ares she became the mother of Phobos, Deimos, Harmonia, and, according to later traditions, of Eros and Anteros also. (Hesiod. Theog. 934, &c.; Stat. Theb. 195; Hom. II. xii. 299, iv. 440; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. iii. 26; Cic. de Nat. Deor. iii. 23.)

But Ares was not the only god whom Aphrodite favoured; Dionysus, Hermes, and Poseidon likewise enjoyed her charms. By the first she was, according to some traditions, the mother of Priapus (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 933) and Bacchus (Iliad viii. 324, &c.), by the second of Harmaphidus (Ov. Met. iv. 289, &c.; Iliad vi. 4; Lucian. Dial. 6; Aristol. Eth. iii. 27), and by Poseidon she had two children, Rhodeus and Herophilus (Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. viii. 24). As Aphrodite was often kindled in the hearts of the gods a love for mortals, Zeus at last resolved to make her pay for her wanton sport by inspiring her too with love for a mortal man. This was accomplished, and Aphrodite conceived an invincible passion for Anchises, by whom she became the mother of Aeneas and Lucretia. (Pind. Pyth. iv. 390; Theocr. xi. 16.)

In the vegetable kingdom the myrtle, rose, apple, poppy, and other flowers were sacred to her. (Ov. Fast. iv. 15, 143; Bio. Jyl. i. 64; Schol. ad Aristoph. Nub. 998; Paus. ii. 10. § 4; Phoroni. 23.) The animals sacred her, which are often mentioned as drawing h chariot or serving as her messengers, are the spar¬ row, the dove, the swan, the swallow, and a bird called lynx. (Sappho, in Poes. 10; Athen. ix. p. 395; Horat. Carm. iv. 1. 10; Aelian, Hist. An. x. 34; Pind. Pyth. l.c.) As Aphrodite Urania the tortoise, the symbol of domestic modesty and chastity, and as Aphrodite Pandemos the ram was sacred to her. (Urania; Pandemos.) When she was represented as the victorious goddess, she had the attributes of Ares, a helmet, a shield; a sword; or a lance, and an image of Victory in one hand. The planet Venus and the spring-month of April were likewise sacred to her. (Cic. de Nat. Deor. iii. 20; Ov. Fast. iv. 90.) All the surnames and epithets given to Aphrodite are derived from places of her worship, from events connected with the legends about her, or have reference to her character and her influence upon man, or are descriptive of her extraordinary beauty and charms. All her surnames are explained in separate articles.

The principal places of her worship in Greece were the islands of Cyprus and Cythera. At Chidnus in Caria she had three temples, one of which contained her renowned statue by Praxiteles. Mount Idas in Troas was an ancient place of her worship, and among the other places we may mention particularly the island of Cos, the towns of Abydos, Athens, Thebes, Megas, Sparta, Sicyon, Corinth, and Eryx in Sicily. The sacrifices offered to her consisted mostly of incense and garlands of flowers (Virg. Aen. i. 416; Tact. Hist. ii. 3), but in some places animals, such as pigs, goats, young cows, hares, and others, were sacrificed to her. In some places, as at Corinth, great numbers of females belonged to her, who prostituted themselves in her service, and bore the name of ἱπποδιανα. (Dict. of Aut. s. v. Εὐρυτεία.) Respecting the festivals of Aphrodite see Dict. of Aut. s. v. Ἀδικία, Ἀναγέλης, Ἀφόδος, Καταγέλης.

The worship of Aphrodite was undoubtedly of oriental origin, and probably introduced from Syria to the islands of Cyprus, Cythera, and others, from thence it spread all over Greece. It is said to have been brought into Syria from Assyria. (Paus. iii. 28, § 6.) Two works remain which appear to have formed a part of the New Testament dialogue, after the manner of Plato. Only two works remain which appear to have formed a part of these sacred classics, namely, a tragedy entitled "Christ Suffering," which is found among the works of Gregory Nazianzen, and a poetic version of the Psalms, entitled "Metaphrasis Psal-morum," which was published at Paris, 1552, 1580, and 1613; by Sylburg at Heidelberg, 1586; and in the various collections of the Fathers. There is some difficulty in determining what shares the father and son had in these works. The Old Testament poems are generally ascribed to the father, who is spoken highly of as a poet, and the New Testament dialogues to the son, who was more distinguished as a philosopher and rhetorician. In accordance with this view, Vossius (de Hist. Graec. ii. 18, and de Post. Graec. 9) and Cave (sub ann. 392), attribute both the extant works to the son.

Apollinaris, who was bishop of Laodicea in 362 A.D., wrote several controversial works, the most celebrated of which was one in thirty books against Porphry. He became noted also as the founder of a sect. He was a warm opponent of the Argives, and a personal friend of Athena; and in arguing against the former, he maintained that the Divine Word (the Logos) supplied the place of a rational soul in the person of Christ. He died between 382 and 392 A.D. His doctrine was condemned by a synod at Rome, about 375 A.D., but it continued to be held by a considerable sect, who were called Apollinarists, down to the middle of the fifth century. (Hieronymus, de Vir. Illust. 104; Socrates, H. E. ii. 46, iii. 16; Sozomen, H. E. v. 18, vi. 25; Suidas, s. v.; Cave, Hist. Eccl.; Wernardin, Dés. de Apollin.)

3. The author of two epigrams in the Greek Anthology, is very probably the same person as the elder Apollinaris of Laodicea. (Jaccobus, Anthol. Graec. xiii. p. 853.)

APOLLINARIS, CLAUDIUS, the commander of Vitellius’ fleet at Misenus, when it revolted to Vespasian in A.D. 70. Apollinaris escaped with six galleys. (Tac. Hist. iii. 57, 76, 77.)

APOLLO (Ἀπόλλων), one of the great divinities of the Greeks, was, according to Homer (H. i. 21, 36), the son of Zeus and Leto. Hesiod (Theog. 918) states the same, and adds, that Apollo’s sister was Artemis. Neither of the two poets suggests anything in regard to the birth-place of the god, unless we take Αὐγορίστη (H. iv. 101) in the sense of “born in Lydia,” which, however, according to others, would only mean “born of or in light.” Several towns and places claimed the honour of his birth, as we see from various local traditions mentioned by late writers. Thus the Ephesians said that Apollo and Artemis were born in the grove of Orytgia near Ephesus (Tacitus, Aeload. iii. 61); the inhabitants of Tegyra in Bocotia and of Zoster in Attica claimed the same honour for themselves. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Τέγυρα.) In some of these local traditions Apollo is mentioned alone, and in others together with his sister Artemis. The account of Apollo’s parenthood, too, was not the same in all traditions (Cic, de Nat. Deor. iii. 29); and the Egyptians made out that he was a son of Dionysus and Isis. (Herod. ii. 156.) But the opinion most universally received was, that Apollo, the son of Zeus and Leto, was born in the island of Delos, together with his sister Artemis; and the circumstances of his birth there are detailed in the Homeric hymn on Apollo, and in that of C fades on Delos. (Comp. Apollod. i. 4. § 1; Hygin. Foh. 140.) Hera in her jealousy pursued Leto from land to land and from isle to isle, and endeavoured to prevent her finding a resting-place where to give birth. At last, however, she arrived in Delos, where she was kindly received, and after nine days’ labour she gave birth to Apollo under a palm or an olive tree at the foot of mount Cynthia. She was assisted by all the goddesses, except Hera and Eileithyia, but the latter too hastened to lend her aid, as soon as she heard what was taking place. The island of Delos, which previous to this event had been unpeopled and floating on or buried under the waves of the sea, now became stationary, and was transformed into one of the earth’s reefs. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Ortygia; Virg. Aen. iii. 75.) The day of Apollo’s birth was believed to have been the seventh of the month, whence it is called ἐβδομάδης. (Plut. Symp. 8.) According to some traditions, he was a seven months’ child (εὐστρατοὺς). The number seven was sacred to the god; on the seventh of every month sacrifices were offered to him (ἐβδομαδηρίς, Aeschyl. Sept. 802; comp. Callim. Hygin. in Del. 256, &c.), and his festivals usually fall on the seventh of a month. Immediately after his birth, Apollo was fed with ambrosia and nectar by Zeus and Leto, and declared, that henceforth he would declare to men the will of Zeus. Delos exulted with joy, and covered herself with golden flowers. (Comp. Theogonía, 5, &c.; Eurip. Hecub. 457, &c.)

Apollo, though one of the great gods of Olympus, is yet represented in some sort of dependence on Zeus, who is regarded as the source of the powers exercised by his son. The powers ascribed to Apollo are apparently of different kinds, but all are connected with one another, and may be said to be only ramifications of one and the same, as will be seen from the following classification.

Apollo is—1. the god who punishes and destroys (ὀλέος) the wicked and overthrowing, and as such he is described as the god with bow and arrows, the gift of Hephaestus. (Homer. H. i. 42, xxiv. 605, Od. xi. 318, xiv. 410; &c.; comp. Pind. Pyth. iii. 15, &c.)

Various epithets given to him in the Homeric poems, such as ἄκαρτος, ἄφεργος, ἀκεχόλος, ἀπεκτάνδος, κλαβώτας, and ἀργυρωτάς, refer to him as the god who drives away the plague from his heart, and does not miss its object at a distance and never misses it. All sudden deaths of men, whether they were regarded as a punishment or a reward, were believed to be the effect of the arrows of Apollo; and with the same arrows he sent the plague into the camp of the Greeks. Hyginus relates, that four days after his birth, Apollo went to mount Parmenus, and there killed the dragon Python, who had pursued his father during her wanderings, before she reached Delos. He is also said to have assisted Zeus in his contest with the giants. (Apollod. i. 6, § 2.)

The circumstances of Apollo being the destroyer of the wicked was believed by some of the ancients to have given rise to his name Apollo, which they connected with ἀπόλλωμι, “to destroy,” (Aeschyl. Agam. 1081.) Some modern writers, on the other hand, who consider the power of averting evil to have been the original and principal feature in his character, say that Ἀπόλλων, i. e. Ἀπόλλων, (from the root pollo), signifies the god who drives away evil, and is synonymous with ἀλεξακερ, ἀλεξακερός, ἀλεξακερον, ὁ ἀλεξακερός, and other names and epithets applied to Apollo.

2. The god who affords help and wards off evil. As he had the power of visiting men with plague and epidemics, so he was also able to deliver men from them, if duly propitiated, or at least by his oracles to suggest the means by which such calamities could be averted. Various names and epithets which are given to Apollo, especially by later writers, such as ἀλεξάκερ, ἀλεξάκερος, ἀλεξάκερον, ὑδάτωρ ἐρυθρός, ἐπικόρος, λαρταμάς, and others are descriptive of this power. (Paus. i. 3, § 8; vi. 24, § 5, viii. 41, § 5; Plut. de Exor. Delph. 21 de De Defect. Orac. 7; Aeschyl. Eum. 63; comp. Müller, Dor. ii. 6, § 3.) It seems to be the idea of his early worshipers, that made him the father of Asclepius, the god of the healing art, and that, at least in later times, identified him with Pasion, the god of the healing art in Homer (Paeon.)

3. The god of prophecy. Apollo exercised that power in his numerous oracles, and especially that of Delphi. (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Oracul.) As the source of all his prophetic powers was Zeus his self (Apollodorus states, that Apollo received the μαρτυρία from Pan), and Apollo is accordingly called "the prophet of his father Zeus." (AeschyL. Eum. 19); but he had nevertheless the power of communicating the gift of prophecy both to gods and men, and all the ancient seers and prophets are placed in some relationship to him. (Hom. Hymn. in Merc. 3, 471.) The manner in which Apollo came into the possession of the oracle of Delphi (Pytho) is related differently. According to Apollodorus, the oracle had previously been in the possession of Thamus, and the dragon Python guarded the mysterious chasm, and Apollo, after having slain the monster, took possession of the oracle. According to Hyginus, Python himself possessed the oracle; while Pausanias (x. 3, § 5) states, that Apollo belonged the Gymnasion in common. (Comp. Eurip. Iphig. Tour. 1246, &c.; Athen. xv. p. 701; Ov. Met. i. 439; Apollon. Rhod. ii. 706.)

4. The god of song and music. We find him in the Iliad (i. 603) delighting the immortal gods with his play on the phorminx during their repast; and the Homeric bards derived their art of song either from Apollo or the Muses. (Od. viii. 488, with Kustath.) Later traditions ascribed to Apollo even the invention of the flute and lyre (Callim. Hymn. in Del. 253; Plut. de Mus.), while the more common tradition was, that he received the lyre from Hermes. Ovid (Herod. xvi. 190) makes Apollo build the walls of Troy by playing on the lyre, as Amphion did the walls of Thebes. (Apollon. Rhod. ii. 766) says, that Apollo is the god of song and music. (Comp. Bockh, Krurrijs.)

5. The god who protects the flocks and cattle (τῶν θηρίων, from τρόποι or τρυφῶν, a meadow or pasture land). Homer (Il. ii. 766) says, that Apollo reared the swift steeds of Eumelus Pherecydes in Thessaly, and according to the Homeric hymn to Hermes (22, 70, &c.) the herd of the gods fed in Picria under the care of Apollo. At the command of Zeus, Apollo guarded the cattle of Laomedon in the valleys of mount Ida. (Il. xxi. 438.) There are in Homer only a few allusions to this feature in the character of Apollo, but in later writers it assumes a very prominent form (Pind. Pyth. ix. 114; Callim. Hymn. in Apoll. 59, &c.); and in the story of Apollo tending the flocks of Ameinias at Thessaly, on the banks of the river Amphythys, the idea reaches its height. (Apollod. i. 9, § 15; Eurip. Alcest. 8; Tibull. ii. 3, 11; Virg. Georg. iii. 2.)

6. The god who delights in the foundation of towns and the establishment of civil constitutions. His assistance in the building of Troy was mentioned above; respecting his aid in raising the walls of Megara, see Alcathous. Pindar (Pyth. v. 30) calls Apollo the δεικτής τῶν, or the leader of the Dorians in their migration to Peloponnesus; and this idea, as well as the one that he delighted in the foundation of cities, seems to be intimately connected with the circumstance, that a town or a colony was never founded by the Greeks without consulting an oracle of Apollo, so that in every case he became, as it were, their spiritual leader. The epithets καλοράχτης and ὑγιαρόχτης (see Böckh, ad Pind. i. c.) refer to this part in the character of Apollo.

These characteristics of Apollo necessarily appear in a peculiar light, if we adopt the view which was almost universal among the later poets, mythojustly remarks, that it would be a strange pheomenon if this identity should have fallen into oblivion for several centuries, and then have been revived. This objection is indeed strong, but not insurmountable if we recollect the tendency of the Greeks to change a peculiar attribute of a god into a separate divinity; and this process, in regard to Apollo, is one which had been very frequent, especially to the time of Homer. Muller’s view of the character of Apollo is that of “the averter of evil” (Ἄστρεάλων); he is originally a divinity peculiar to the Doric race; and the most ancient seats of his worship are the Thessalian Temple and Delphi.
From thence it was transplanted to Crete, the inhabitants of which spread it over the coasts of Asia Minor and parts of the continent of Greece, such as Doboon and Attica. In the latter country it was introduced during the immigration of the Ionians, whom the god became the Ἀστρέαλων Ἀρηνίδος of the Athenians. The conquest of Peloponnesus by the Dorians raised Apollo to the rank of the principal deity in the peninsula. The Ἀστρέαλων Ἀρηνίδος was originally a local divinity of the shepherds of Arcadia, who was transformed into and identified with the Doric Apollo during the process in which the latter became the national divinity of the Peloponnesians. In the same maner as in this instance the god assumed the character of a god of hords and flocks, his character changed and modified in other parts of Greece also: with the Hyperboreans he was the god of prophecy, and with the Cretans the god with bow and darts. In Egypt he was made to form a part of their astronomical system, which was afterwards introduced into Greece, where it became the prevalent opinion of the learned.
But whatever we may think of this and other modes of explaining the origin and nature of Apollo, one point is certain and attested by thousands of facts, that Apollo and his worship, his festivals and oracles, had more influence upon the Greeks than any other god. It may safely be asserted, that the Greeks would never have become what they were, without the worship of Apollo; in him
the brightest side of the Grecian mind is reflected.
Respecting his festivals, see Dict. of Ant. s. v.
Ἀπόλλων. Theog. and others.

In the religion of the early Romans there is no trace of the worship of Apollo. The Romans became acquainted with this divinity through the Greeks, and adopted all their notions and ideas about him from the latter people. There is no doubt that the Romans knew of his worship among the Greeks at a very early time, and tradition says that they consulted his oracle at Delphi even before the expulsion of the kings. But the first time that we hear of the worship of Apollo at Rome is in the year n. c. 430, when, for the purpose of averting a plague, a temple was raised to him, and soon after dedicated by the consul, C. Julius. (Liv.
i. 26, 20.) A second temple was built to him in the year n. c. 350. One of these two (it is not certain which) stood outside the port Capena.
During the second Punick war, in n. c. 212, the ludi Apollinares were instituted in honour of Apollo.
(Liv. xxv. 12; Macrob. Sat. i. 17; Dict. of Ant.
s. v. Ludi Apollinares; comp. Liv. xxxiv. 3.)
The worship of this divinity, however, did not form a very prominent part in the religion of the Romans till the time of Augustus, who, after the battle of Actium, not only dedicated to him a portion of the spoils, but built or embellished his temple at Actium, and founded a new one at Rome on the Palatine, and instituted quinquennial games at Actium. (Suet. Aug. 51, 52; Dict. of Ant. s. v.
Apollo; Haring, die Religion der Römer, ii. p.
205.)

Apollo, the national divinity of the Greeks, was of course represented in all the ways which the plastic arts were capable of. As the ideas of the god became gradually and more and more fully developed, so his representations in works of art rose from a rude wooden image to the perfect ideal of youthful manliness, so that he appeared to the Greeks in the light of a twin brother of Aphrodite.
(Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 4. § 10.) The most beautiful and celebrated among the extant representations of Apollo are the Apollo of Belvedere at Rome, which was discovered in 1803 at Retrutto (Mus. Pic-Clem.
i. 14, 15), and the Apollo at Florence. (Hirt.
Mythol. Bilderbueck, i. p. 22, &c.) In the Apollo of Belvedere, the god is represented as the god of youthful manliness, so that he appeared to the ancient Romans as a wonderful manner. The forehead is higher than in other ancient figures, and on it there is a pair of locks, while the rest of his hair flows freely
don his neck. The limbs are well proportioned and harmonious, the muscles are not worked out too strongly, and at the hips the figure is rather thin in proportion to the breast. (Buttmann, Mytholog. s. 1-22; G. Hermann, Dissertatio de Apollo et Diana, 2 parts, Leipzig, 1836 and 1837; Muller, Dierics, book ii.)

APOLLOCRATES (Ἀπόλλοκράτης), the elder son of Dionysius, the Younger, was left by his father in command of the island and citadel of Syracuse, but was compelled by famine to surrender them to Dion, about n. c. 354. He was allowed to sail away to join his father in Italy. (Plut.
Dion. 37. &c., 56; Strab. vi. p. 259; Nepos, Dion. 5; 435, f. 436, a.) of Apollocrates as the son of the elder Dionysius; but this must be a mistake, unless we suppose with Kühn (ad Aeth. l. c.), that there were two persons of this name, one a son of the elder and the other of the younger Dionysius.

APOLLODORUS (Ἀπόλλωνδόρος), 1. Of ACARchar in Attica, son of Pasion, the celebrated ban-er, who died b. c. 370, when his son Apollodorus was twenty-four years of age. (Dem. pro Phorm.
p. 951.) His mother, who married Phormion, a freedman of Pasion, after her husband’s death, lived ten years longer, and after her death in n. c.
360, Phormion became the guardian of her younger son, Pasicles. Several years later (n. c. 350), Apollodorus brought an action against Phormion, for whom Demosthenes wrote a defence, the occasion for Phormion, which is still extant. In this year, Apollodorus was archon eponymus at Athens.
(Diod. xvi. 46.) When Apollodorus afterwards attacked the witnesses who had supported Phormion, Demosthenes wrote for Apollodorus the two orations still extant κατὰ Προφόρου. (Aeschyl. de Fies. Leg.
p. 58; Plut. Demosth. 15.) Apollodorus had many and very important law-suits, in most of which Demosthenes wrote the speeches for him (Clinton.
PL. Dem. ii. p. 44; ed. Recent; comp. Herder.)
The latest of them is that against Neaera, in which Apollodorus is the pleader, and which may perh be referred to the year B.C. 340, when Apollodorus was fifty-four years of age. Apollodorus was a very wealthy man, and performed twice the liturgy of the trierarchy. (Dem. c. Polycl. p. 1208, c. Nicer. p. 1247.)

2. Of Amphipolis, one of the generals of Alexander the Great, was entrusted in B.C. 331, with the administration of Babylon and of all the satrapies as far as Cilicia. Alexander also gave them 1000 talents to collect as many troops as they could. (Diod. xvii. 54; Curtius, v. 1; comp. Arrian, Anab. vii. 18; Appian, De Bell. Civ. ii. 153.)

3. Of Artemisia, whence he is distinguished from others of the name of Apollodorus by the ethnic adjective Ἀρτεμίσιας or Ἀρτέμισιος. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἀρτέμισιος.) The time in which he lived is unknown. He wrote a work on the Parthians which is referred to by Strabo (ii. p. 118, xi. pp. 509, 519, xv. p. 685), and by Athenaeus (xxv. p. 682), who mentions the fourth book of his work. There are two passages in Strabo (xi. pp. 516 and 526), in which according to the common reading he speaks of an Apollodorus Adramyttianus; but as he is evidently speaking of the author of the Parthica, the word Ἀρτέμισιος has justly been changed into Ἀρτεμίσιας. Whether this Apollodorus of Armenia is the same as the one to whom a history of Caria is ascribed, cannot be decided. Stephanus Byzantius (s. v. Ἀρτέμισιας καὶ Αρτέμισιος) mentions the seventh and fourteenth books of this work.

4. An Athenian, commanded the Persian auxiliaries which the Athenians had solicited from the king of Persia against Philip of Macedonia in B.C. 340. Apollodorus was engaged with these troops in protecting the town of Perinthus while the Athenians had solicited from Philip its invasion. (Paus. i. 29, § 7; comp. Diod. xvi. 75; Arrian, Anab. ii. 14.)

5. A Borotian, who together with Epacenus came as ambassador from Boeotia to Messenia, in B.C. 183, just at the time when the Messenians, irritated by Lycortas, the general of the Achaean, were inclined to negotiate for peace. The influence of the Boeotian ambassadors decided the question, and the Messenians concluded peace with the Achaean. (Polyb. xiv. 12.)

6. Of Carystus. The ancients distinguish between two comic poets of the name of Apollodorus: one is called a native of Gela in Sicily, and the other of Carystus in Euboea. Suidas speaks of an Athenian comic poet Apollodorus, and this circumstance has led some critics to imagine that there were three comic poets of the name of Apollodorus, but the Athenian is not mentioned anywhere else, and as Suidas does not notice the Carystian, it is supposed that Suidas called the Carystian an Athenian either by mistake, or because he had the Athenian franchise. It should, however, be remembered that the plays of the Carystian were not performed at Athens, but at Alexandria. (Athen. v. p. 664.) Athenaeus calls him a contemporary of Machon; so that he probably lived between the years B.C. 300 and 260. Apollodorus of Carystus belonged to the school of the new Attic comedy, and was one of the most distinguished among its critics. (Athen. i. c.) This is not only stated by authorities, but may also be inferred from the fact that Terence took his Hecyra and Phormio from Apollodorus of Carystus. (A. Mai, Fragmenta latini et terentiani, p. 36.) According to Suidas Apollodorus wrote 47 comedies, and five times gained the prize. We know the titles and possess fragments of several of his plays; but ten comedies are mentioned by the ancients under the name of Apollodorus alone, and without any suggestion as to whether they belong to Apollodorus of Carystus or to Apollodorus of Gela. (A. Melincke, Hist. Crit. Comt. Graecor. p. 462, &c.)

7. Tyrant of Cassandria (formerly Potidaea) in the peninsula of Pallene. He at first pretended to be a friend of the people, but when he had gained their confidence, he formed a conspiracy for the purpose of making himself tyrant, and bound his accomplices by most barbarous ceremonies described in Diodorus. (xxii. Exc. p. 563.) When he had gained his object, about B.C. 279, he began his tyrannical reign, which in cruelty, rapaciousness, and debauchery, has seldom been equalled in any country. The ancients mention him along with the most detestable tyrants that ever lived. (Polyb. vii. 7; Seneca, De Ira, ii. 5, De Benef. vii. 19.) But notwithstanding the support which he derived from the Gauls, who were then plotting southward, he was unable to maintain himself, and was conquered and put to death by Antigonus Gonatas. (Polyb. vii. H. xiv. 41; Hist. An. v. 15; Plut. De Sera Num. Vint. 10, 11; Paus. iv. 5, § 1; Hein. ad Ocid. ex Pont. ii. 9, 43.)

8. Of Cumae, a Greek grammarian, who is said to have been the first person that was distinguished by the title of grammarian and critic. (Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 309.) According to Pliny (H. N. vii. 37) his fame was so great that he was honoured by the Amphiionic council of the Greeks.

9. Of Cyrène, a Greek grammarian, who is cither cited by other Greek grammarians, as by the Scho¬linist on Euphrates (Orest. 1483), in the Byzolo¬gium M. (s. v. βασιλελικός), and by Suidas (s. v. ἄρτεμισιος, βασιλελικός, Νάβων, and Βασιλελικός). From Athenaeus (xi. p. 497) it would seem that he wrote a work on drinking vessels in zinc, and we may believe that the author of Natural Con¬gresses (i. 16—ix. 5), who is frequently mentioned by Diogenes Laertius, is the same as the Apollodorus of Cynere, with the celebrated gram¬marians of Athens. (Heyne, ad Apollod. pp. 1174, &c., 1167.)

10. Of Cyclicus, lived previous to the time of Plato, who in his dialogue Ion (p. 541), mentions him as one of the foreigners whom the Athenians had frequently placed at the head of their armies. This statement is repeated by Aelian (V. H. xiv. 5), but in what campaigns Apollodorus served the Athenians is not known. Athenaeus (xi. p. 596), in censuring Plato for his malignity, mentions Apollodorus, and the other foreigners enumerated in the passage of the Ion, as instances of persons cultivated by the philosopher, although the passage does not contain a trace of anything derogatory to them.

11. Of Cyriacus, an unknown Greek writer, who is mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius (ix. 58), and is perhaps the same as the Apollodotus spoken of by Clemens of Alexandria. (Strom. ii. p. 417.)

12. Surnamed Ephimius, a Stoic philosopher, who is frequently mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius, who attributes to him two works, one called φανους, and the other φησι. (Diog. Laërt. vii. 39, 41, 54, 64, 84, 102, 121, 125, 129, 135, 140.) Theon of Alexandria wrote a commentary on the φησι (Suid. s. v. Θεόνω), and Stobaeus (Elog. Phys. i. 1230).

16. Of Cela in Sicily, was, according to Suidas and Eudocia (p. 61), a contemporary of Memnon, and accordingly lived between the years b. c. 340 and 290. Suidas and Eudocia attribute to him seven comedies, of which he gives the titles. But while Suidas (s. e. Ἀρσιλάνδαρος) ascribes them to Apollodorus of Cela, he assigns one of these same comedies in another passage (s. e. στροφής) to the Cretian. Other writers too frequently confound the two comic poets. (Meinecke, Hist. Crit. Comic. Græc. p. 459, &c.)

17. A Greek grammatist of Athens, was a son of Asclepiades, and a pupil of the grammarians Aristarchus, of Panaetius, and Diogenes the Babylonian. He flourished about the year B. C. 140, a few years after the fall of Corinth. Further particulars are not mentioned about him. We know that one of his historical works (the χρονικα) came down to the year B. C. 143, and that it was dedicated to Attalus II., surnamed Philadelphia, who died in B. C. 138; but how long Apollodorus lived after the year B. C. 143 is unknown. Apollodorus wrote a great number of works, and on a variety of subjects, which were much used in antiquity, but all of them have perished with the exception of one, and even this one has not come down to us complete. This work bears the title Βιβλιοθήκη; it consists of three books, and is by far the best among the extant works of the kind. It contains a well-arranged account of the numerous mythuses of the mythology and the heroic age of Greece. The materials are derived from the poets, especially the cyclic poets, the logographers, and the historians. It begins with the origin of the gods, and goes down to the time of Theseus, when the work suddenly breaks off. The part which is wanting at the end contained the stories of the families of Pelops and Atreus, and probably the whole of the Trojan cycle also. The first portion of the work (i. 1—7) contains the ancient theogonic and cosmogonic mythuses, which are followed by the Hellenic mythuses, and the latter are arranged according to the different tribes of the Greek nation. (Phot. Cod. 186.) The ancients valued this work very highly, as it formed a running mythological commentary to the Greek poets; to us it is of still greater value, as most of the works from which Apollodorus derived his information, as well as several other works which were akin to that of Apollodorus, are now lost. Apollodorus relates his mythical stories in a plain and unadorned style, and gives only that which he found in his sources, without interpolating or pervading the genuine forms of the legends by attempts to explain their meaning. This extreme simplicity of the Bibliotheca, more like a mere catalogue of events, than a history, has led some modern critics to consider the work in its present form either as an abridgement of some greater work of Apollodorus, or as made up out of several of his works. But this opinion is a mere hypothesis without any evidence. The first edition of the Bibliotheca of Apollodorus, in which the text is in a very bad condition, was edited by Benedictus Augius of Spoleto, at Rome, 1555, 8vo. A somewhat better edition is that of Heidelberg, 1599, 8vo. (Ap. Commelin.) After the editions of Tan. Faber (Salmar. 1601, 8vo.), and Th. Gale in his Script. Hist. poet. (Paris, 1676, 8vo.), there followed the critical edition of Christian Gottengin, 1782 and 83, 4 vol. 12mo., of which a second and improved edition appeared in 1803 2 vol. 8vo. The best among the subsequent editions is that of Clavier, Paris, 1806, 2 vol. 8vo, with a commentary and a French translation. The Bibliotheca is also printed in C. and Th. Müller, Fragment. Hist. Græc. Paris, 1841, and in A. Westermann's Mythographia, sive Scriptores Poetici Histor. Græci, 1843, 8vo.

Among the other works ascribed to Apollodorus which are lost, but of which a considerable number of fragments are still extant, which are contained in Heyne's edition of the Bibliotheca and in C. and Th. Müller's Fragm. Hist. Græc., the following must be noticed here: 1. Πεπὶ τῶν Ἀθηναῖαι ἐργασίαι̣, i. e. on the Athenian Courtesan. (Athen. xiii. pp. 567, 583, xiv. pp. 586, 591 Heyne, vol. iii. p. 1163, &c.; Müller, p. 467, &c.) 2. Στρογγυλα ἐκ τῶν Ἀριστοκρατίων ἐκτολη. (Athen. xiv. p. 626; Heyne, p. 1172, &c.) 3. Πεπὶ τῶν περιδώ, καμικῆς μέτρω, that is, a Universal Geography in iambic verses, such as was afterward written by Scymnus of Chios and by Dionysius (Strabo, xiv. p. 566; Steph. Byz. passim; Heyne p. 1126, &c.; Müller, p. 449, &c.) 4. Πεπὶ τῶν ἐπίσκοπων, either a commentary or a dissertation on the plays of the comic poet Epicharmus, which consisted of ten books. (Pophyr. Pli. Plot., Heyne, p. 1142, &c.; Müller, p. 462.) 5. Εὐγενολογία, or Epigologies, a work which frequently referred to, though not always under this title, but sometimes apparently under the head of a particular article. (Heyne, p. 114 &c.; Müller, p. 462, &c.) 6. Πεπὶ Σενε, twenty-four books. This work contained... mythology of the Greeks, as far as the gods themselves were concerned; the Bibliotheca, giving an account of the heroic ages, formed a kind of continuation to it. (Heyne, p. 1039, &c.; Müller, p. 428, &c.) 7. Περὶ νέων καταλόγου ο Περὶ νέων, was an historical and geographical explanation of the catalogue in the second book of the Iliad. It consisted of twelve books, and is frequently cited as a continuation to it. (Heyne, p. 1039, &c.; Müller, p. 428, &c.) 8. Περὶ Ζεύς, that is, a commentary on the Mimes of Sophron, of which the third book is quoted by Athenaeus (vii. p. 201), and is another scribe of the Asipoph. (Vest. 483; Heyne, p. 1130; Müller, p. 461, &c.) 9. Χριστιανοὶ or χριστιανοὶ ντυτες, was a chronicle in iambic verses, comprising the history of 1040 years, from the destruction of Troy (1184) down to his own time, B.C. 143. This work, which was again a sort of continuation of the Bibliotheca, thus completed the history from the origin of the gods and the world down to his own time. Of how many books it consisted is not quite certain. In Stephanus of Byzantium the fourth book is mentioned, but if Syncellus (Vesp. 89.) Strabo ascribes to him scientific works, Sueton. G 25; Seneca, Rev. 535.) Aelian (Comp. Quintill. ii. 38; Sueton. Adv. Math. ii. 75.) Lucian (Marcob. 25) states, that Apollodorus died at the age of eighty-two. (C. W. Piderit, de Apollodoro Pergamenio et Theodoro Gadarenensi, Rhetoribus, Marburg, 4to.)

23. Of Phaleron in Attica, a very ardent and zealous friend and follower of Socrates ( Xen. Apol. Sor. § 26, Mem. iii. 11 § 17), but unable with all his attachment to understand the real worth of his master. He was naturally inclined to dwell upon the dark side of human character, and morose, though he had not the courage to struggle manfully for what was good. This brought upon him the nickname of μαυρος, or the eccentric man. (Plat. Symposium, p. 175 d.) When Socrates was going to die, Apollodorus lost all control over himself, and gave himself up to tears and loud lamentations. (Plat. Phaedo. p. 117, d.) Aelian (V. H. i. 16) relates a droll anecdote, according to which Apollodorus offered to Socrates before his death a suit of fine clothes, that he might die respectably. Apollodorus occurs in several of Plato's dialogues, but the passage which gives the most lively picture of the man is in the Symposium, p. 173, &c. Compare T. A. Wolf, Praefatio ad Sympos. p. 41.

24. Surnamed Pyrrhus, one of the most influential citizens of the town of Aegyptum in Sicily, who gave his evidence against the praetor Verres. (Cic. in Verr. iii. 31, iv. 28.)

25. Governor of Susiana, was appointed to this office by Antiochus III. after the rebellion of Molo and his brother Alexander had been put down, in B.C. 220. (Polyb. vi. 54; comp. Alexander, brother of Molo.)

26. Of Tarsus, a tragic poet, of whom Suidas and Eudoca (p. 61) mention six tragedies; but nothing further is known about him. There is another Apollodorus of Tarsus, who was probably a grammarian, and wrote commentaries on the early dramatic writers of Greece. (Schol. ad Eurip. Med. 148, 159; Schol. ad Aristoph. Ros. 323, Plut. 533.)

27. Of Telmessus, is called by Artemidorus (Hist. of Dreams) Απολλωδωρος, and seems to have written a work on dreams.

There are a few more persons of the name of Apollodorus, who are mentioned in ancient writers, but nothing is known about them beyond their name. A list of nearly all of them is given by Fabricius. (Bibl. Gr. iv. p. 299, &c.)

APOLLODORUS, artists. 1. A painter, a native of Athens, flourished about 408, B.C. With him commences a new period in the history of the art. He gave a dramatic effect to the essential forms of Polygnotos, without actually departing from them as models, by adding to them a representation of persons and objects as they really exist, not, however, individually, but in classes: "primum species expressae instituit." (Plin. xxxvi. 36 § 1.) This feature in the works of Apollodorus is thus explained by Fuseli (Lect. i.): "— the neatness of his taste led him to discover that, as all men were connected by one general form, so they were separated, each by some predominant power, which fixed character and bound them to a class: that in proportion as this specific power partook of individual peculiarities, the farther it was removed from a share in that harmonious system which constitutes nature and exists in a due balance of all its parts.
Thence he drew his line of imitation, and personified the central form of the class to which his object belonged, and to which the rest of its qualities administered, without being absorbed: agility was not destroyed to secure firmness, solidity, or weight; nor strength and weight of agility; elegance did not degenerate to effeminacy, or grandeur swell to hugeness. For his death Apollodorus justly deduced these principles of style seem to have been exemplified in his two works of which Pliny has given us the titles, a worshipping priest, and Ajax struck by lightning, the former being the image of piety, the latter of impiety and blasphemy. A third picture by Apollodorus is mentioned by the Schoiast on the Phistus of Aristophanes. (v. 365.)

Apollodorus made a great advance in colouring. He invented chiaroscuro (φωτεινόν καὶ σκιώδος σχέδιον, Plut. de Gloria Alcn. 2). Earlier painters, Dionysius for example (Plut. Timol. 36), had attained to the quality which the Greeks called προφανεία τινος, that is, a proper gradation of light and shade, but Apollodorus was the first who heightened this effect by the gradation of tints, and thus attained to the quality which the Greeks called προφανεία τινος, that is, a proper gradation of light and shade which Apollodorus produced by the use of the pencil. In this state he delivered the art to Zeuxis (Ζεύξις), upon whom he is said to have written verses, complaining that he had robbed him of his art. Plutarch (l. c.) says, that Apollodorus inscribed upon his works the verse which Pliny attributes to Zeuxis, Μυθηστά τις μάλλον ἢ μυθηστά.

2. A sculptor, who made statues in bronze. He was so fastidious that he often broke his works in pieces after they were finished, and hence he obtained the surname of "the madman," in which character he was represented by the sculptor Silanion. (Plin. xxxiv. 19. § 21.) Assuming from this that the two artists were contemporary, Apollodorus flourished about 324 B.C.

A little further on (§ 26) Pliny names an Apollodorus among the artists who had made bronze statues of philosophers.

On the base of the "Venus di Medici," Apollodorus is mentioned as the father of Cleoroenes. (ibid. xiv. 9), though to which king of this name his precepts were addressed is not mentioned. A person of the same name wrote a work, Η Πέτρομεν αι στρατότεροι, On Ointments and Chocoltes, quoted by Athenaeus (xv. p. 675), and another, quoted by the same author, Η Πέτρομεν τα Θηραιοτάτα, On Venomous Animals (ibid. xv. p. 681), which is possibly the work that is several times referred to by Pliny. (H. N. xxii. 15, 29, &c.) [W. A. G.]

APOLLO'NIDES or A POLLO' NIDAS (Ἀπόλλωνίδας), I. Governor of ArgoS, who was raised to this office by Cassander. In the year B.C. 315, he invaded Arcadia, and got possession of the town of Styrmphalus. The majority of the Argives were hostile towards Cassander, and while Apollonides was engaged in Arcadia, they invited Alexander, the son of Polyperchon, and promised to surrender their town to him. But Alexander was not quick enough in his movements, and Apollonides, who seems to have been informed of the plan, suddenly returned to Argos. About 500 senators were at the time assembled in the Prytaneum: Apollonides had all the doors of the house well guarded, that none of them might escape, and then set fire to it, so that all perished in the flames. The other Argives who had taken part in the conspiracy were partly exiled and partly put to death. (Diod. xix. 63.)

2. A Boiotian, an officer in the Greek army which supported the claims of Cyrus the Younger. He was a man of no courage, and the difficulties which the Greeks had to encounter led him to oppose Xenophon, and to urge the necessity of entering into friendly relations with king Artaxerxes. He was rebuked by Xenophon, and deprived of his office for having said things unworthy of a Greek. (Xenoph. Anab. iii. 1. § 26, &c.) There seems to have been a Greek name that no such conclusion can be drawn from the mere mention of it.

3. Of Damascus, lived under Trajan and Hadrian. The former emperor employed him to build his Forum, Odeum, and Gymnasium, at Rome: the latter, on account of some indiscert words uttered by the architect, first banished him and afterwards put him to death. (Dion Cass. Ixxix. 4; Spartan. Hadrian. 19.) [P. St.]

APOLLODORUS, a Graeco-Roman jurist, and one of the commission appointed by Theodosius the Younger to compile the Theodosian Code. In A. D. 429 he appears as comes and magister memoriae (Cod. Th. i. tit. 1. s. 5), and he appears as comes sacri consistorii in the years 435 and 438. (Cod. Th. 1. tit. 1. s. 6; Nov. I. Theod. II., printed in the Bonn Corpus Juris Antiqui, as a second preface to the Theod. Cod.) There seems to be no reason, beyond sameness of name and nearness of date, to identify him with the Apollodorus who was comes sacrō privato under Arcadius and Honorius, A. D. 436, and annum comitatus Africae in the years 389 and 400. (Cod. Th. 11. tit. 36. s. 32; 16. tit. 11. s. 1.) To Apollodorus, procurator of Africa, are addressed some of the letters of Symmachus, who was connected with him by affinity. (viii. 4, ix. 14, 48.) [J. T. G.]

APOLLODOMORUS (Ἀπόλλοδομος), the name of two physicians mentioned by Pliny (H. N. xx. 13), one of whom was a native of Cirtium, in Cyprus, the other of Tarentum. Perhaps it was one of these who wrote to Polemy, king of Egypt, giving him directions as to what wines he should drink (vidit. xiv. 9), though to which king of this name his precepts were addressed is not mentioned. A person of the same name wrote a work, ΗΠΘΙΟΛΟΓΟΙ καὶ ΣΤΡΩΤΟΙΡΑΙ, On Ointments and Chocoltes, quoted by Athenaeus (xv. p. 675), and another, quoted by the same author, ΗΠΘΙΟΛΟΓΟΙ ΟΝ ΘΕΡΑΙΟΤΑΤΑ, On Venomous Animals (ibid. xv. p. 681), which is possibly the work that is several times referred to by Pliny. (H. N. xxii. 15, 29, &c.) [W. A. G.]

APOLLOVIDES or APOLLOVNDIAS (Ἀπόλλωνίδας), I. Governor of ArgoS, who was raised to this office by Cassander. In the year B.C. 315, he invaded Arcadia, and got possession of the town of Styrmphalus. The majority of the Argives were hostile towards Cassander, and while Apollonides was engaged in Arcadia, they invited Alexander, the son of Polyperchon, and promised to surrender their town to him. He was rebuked by Xenophon, and deprived of his office for having said things unworthy of a Greek. (Xenoph. Anab. iii. 1. § 26, &c.)

3. Of Carthage, to whom Philip of Macedon assigned for his private use the whole territory of the Chersonesus. (Demosth. de Holonos. p. 86. Apollonides was afterwards sent by Charidemus an ambassador to Philip. (Demosth. e Aristoc. p. 681.)

4. Of Chios, was during the eastern expedition of Alexander the Great one of the leaders of the Persian party in his native island; but while Alexander was in Egypt, Apollonides was conquered by the king’s admirals, Hegelochus and Amphoterus. He and several of his partizans were taken prisoners and sent to Elephanta in Egypt, where they were kept in close imprisonment. (Arrian. Anab. iii. 2; Curtius, iv. 5.)

5. Of Nicea, lived in the time of the emperor Titus, to whom he dedicated a commentary o.
3. A work on proverbs. (Steph. Byz. s. v. ScpAciv.)

2. On fiction stories (περὶ καταστροφῶν), of which the third and eighth books are mentioned. (Ammon. s. v. καταστροφή; Anonym. in Viti Araci.)

3. A work on oracles. (Ammon. s. v. διαφέλειν.)

4. The son of Charinus, appointed by Alexander the Great for some time by Chaeron, a low demagogue, to the office of the treasurers to check the system of squandering the public money which had been carried on for some time by Chaeron, a low demagogue.

5. Apollonides was given up by Artaxerxes into the hands of his mother, Aineas, who tortured him for two months, and at last, upon the death of her daughter, ordered him to be buried alive. (Cat., De Rob. Pers. §§ 30, 42, pp. 40, 50, ed. Litt.)

6. Another Greek physician, who must have lived in the first or second century after Christ, as he is said by Galen (De Cons. Puls. iii. 9, vol. vi. pp. 136, 137) to have differed from Artemidorus (Oeuvres. iv. 2), and Aëtius (tetrab. ii. sern. iv. 48, p. 403), in which last passage the name is spelled Apollonides. (Fabricius, Bibl. Gr. vol. xiii. p. 74, ed. vet.)

7. A Greek physician and surgeon, was born at Cos, and, like many other of his countrymen, went to the court of Persia, under Artaxerxes Longimanus, b.c. 465. He lived in the first or second century after Christ, as he is known. Two verses of one of his dramas are preserved in Clemens of Alexandria (Paedw. ixii. 8, 9) quotes some scanns from one of Apollonides.

8. A commentary on Demosthenes' oration Against Philip of Macedon. The king, with the assistance of his intriguing agents in that town, contrived to induce the people to send Apollonides into exile. (Demosth. c. Neaer. p. 1376.) Apollonides went to Athens, where he was honoured with the civic franchise; but being found unworthy, he was afterwards deprived of it. (Demost. c. Nearer. p. 1376.)

9. Of Clazomenae, was sent, together with Demetrius, and their two families, as ambassador to king Antiochus when he went to Rome as a hostage, n. c. 175, and supported him with his advice. Apollonides had been educated together with Demetrius, and their two families had been long connected by friendship. The father of Apollonides, who bore the same name, had possessed great influence with Sceletus. (Polyb. xxxi. 19, 21.)

10. The spokesman of an embassy sent by Antiochus IV. to Rome, in n. c. 173. He brought from his master tribute and rich presents, and requested that the senate would renew with Antiochus the alliance which had existed between his father and the Romans. (Liv. iii. 6.)

11. A friend of Demetrius, the son of Sceletus, who accompanied Demetrius when he went to Rome as a hostage, n. c. 175, and supported him with his advice. Apollonides had been educated together with Demetrius, and their two families had been long connected by friendship. The father of Apollonides, who bore the same name, had possessed great influence with Sceletus. (Polyb. xxxi. 19, 21.)

12. A tragic poet, concerning whom nothing is known. Two verses of one of his dramas are preserved in Clemens of Alexandria (Paedw. ixii. 8, 9) quotes some scanns from one of Apollonides. (Steph. Byz. s. v. ScpAciv.)

APOLLO'NIUS. 237

Punic war, as to whether they were to join the Carthaginians or the Romans, insisted upon the necessity of acting with decision either the one or the other way, as division on this point would lead to inevitable ruin. At the same time, he suggested that it would be advantageous to remain faithful to the Romans. (Liv. xxv. 28.)

1. A Greek physician and surgeon, was born at Cos, and, like many other of his countrymen, went to the court of Persia, under Artaxerxes Longimanus, b.c. 465. 5. The son of Archibius, Archibius, or Archibius, was like his father an eminent grammarian of Alexandria. He lived about the time of Augustus, and was the teacher of Apion, while he himself had been a pupil of the school of Didymus. This is the statement of Suidas, which Villoison has endeavoured to confirm. Other critics, as Ruhnken, believe that Apollonius lived after the time of Apion, and that our Apollonius in his Homeric Lexicon made use of a similar work written by Apion. This opinion seems indeed to be the more probable of the two; but, however this may be, the Homeric Lexicon of Apollonius to the Hind and the Odyssey, which is still extant, is to us a valuable and instructive relic of antiquity, if we consider the loss of so many other works of the same kind. It is unfortunately, however, very much interpolated, and must be used with great caution. The first edition of it was published by Villoison from a MS. of St. Germain belonging to the tenth century. (Paris, 1778, 2 vols. fol., with valuable prolegomena and a Latin translation. It was reprinted in the same year at Leipzig, in 2 vols. 4to.) H. Tollirs afterwards published a edition with some additional notes, but without Villoison's prolegomena and translation. (Lugd. Bat. 1768, 8vo.) Bekker's is a very useful edition, Dorlc. 1835, 8vo. This Apollonius is probably the same as the one who wrote explanations of expressions peculiar to Herodotus. (Etymol. M. s. v. κομφός and ψοφήτης.)

6. Of Ascalon, an historian. (Steph. Byz. s. v. 'Ασκαλών.)

7. Of Athens, a sophist and rhetorician, lived in the time of the emperor Severus, and was a pupil of Adrianus. He distinguished himself by his forensic eloquence, and taught rhetoric to Athens at the same time with Heracleides. He was appointed by the emperor to the chair of political eloquence, with a salary of one talent. He held several high offices in his native place, an distinguished himself no less as a statesman than as a rhetorician. His declama- tions are said to have exceeded those of many of his predecessors in dignity, beauty, and propriety; he was often employed in the service of the state. (Philostr. Vt. Sph. ii. 20; B. d. p. 57, &c.)

8. Of Athens, a son of Sotades, wrote a work on the obscene poetry of his father. (Athen. xi. p. 620; Sotades.)

9. Surnamed 'Απταλάς, the author of a work on dreams. (Artemid. Oen. i. 34, ii. 28.)

10. The son of Chares, a Greek writer, well referred to by the Scholast on Aristoph. (Vesp. 1231), and the Venetian Scholast on H. mer. (ii. iii. 448; comp. Fabric. Bibl. Græc. i. p. 275.)

11. Of Chalcidion or Chalcis, or, according Dion Cassius (lxxi. 33) of Nicomedian, was invited by the emperor Antoninus Pius to come to Rome for the purpose of instructing his son Marcus in philosophy. (Capitolin. Anton. Pius, 10; M. Antonia, de Rebus saev. i. 8; Lucian, Demos. 3 comp. Fabric. Bibl. Græc. iii. p. 529.)

12. A freedman of Crassus, to whom he was much attached. He afterwards became a close friend of Cicero's, and served in the army of J. C. sar in the Alexandrine war, and also followed him into Spain. He was a man of great diligence a learning, and anxious to write a history of the exploits of Caesar. For this reason Cicero gave h...
A very flattering letter of recommendation to Casar. (Cf. ad Famil. xiii. 6.)

13. A Christian writer, whose parents and country are unknown, but who is believed to have been bishop of Ephesus, and to have lived about the year A. D. 192. He wrote a work exposing the errors and the conduct of the Christian sect of Ephesus, and to have lived about been bishop the country are unknown, but who is believed to have been especially directed against this Apollonius, and the seventh book of his work ἐκκαθαρισμὸς was especially directed against Apollonius. (Auctror Freudenthali, cc. 26, 27, 68; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. p. 53; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. v. i. p. 163.)

14. A Christian, who suffered martyrdom at Rome in the reign of Commodus. He is said to have been a Roman senator. At his trial he made a beautiful defence of Christianity in the Roman senate, which was afterwards translated into Greek and inserted by Eusebius in his history of the Martyrs, but is now lost. (Hieronym. Epist. 84, Catalog. 42, 53; Euseb. Hist. Eccles. v. 21.) Niceta of Thessalonica (iv. 26) confounds the martyr Apollonius with Apollonius the writer against the Cataphryges. (Cave, Hist. Lit. i. p. 53; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vii. p. 163.)

15. Surnamed Cronos, a native of Issus in Caria, was a philosopher of the Megarian school, a pupil of Eubulides, and teacher of the celebrated Diophorus, who received from his master the surname Cronos. (Strab. xiv. p. 683; Diog. Laert. ii. 111.)

16. Surnamed Dyscolos, that is, the ill-tempered, was a son of Mnesichmus and Ariodane, and born at Alexandria, where he flourished in the reigns of Hadrian and Antoninus Pius. He was one of the most renowned grammarians of his time, partly on account of his numerous and excellent works, and partly on account of his son, Aeclius Herodian, who had been educated by him, and was as great a grammarians as himself. Apollonius is said to have been so poor, that he was obliged to write on shells, as he had no means of procuring the ordinary writing materials; and his poverty created that state of mind to which is owed the surname of Dyscolos. He lived and was buried in that part of Alexandria which was called Brachium or Proorxh. But, unless he was confounded with Apollonius of Chalcis, he also spent some time at Rome, where he attracted the attention of the emperor M. Antoninus. Apollonius and his son are called by Priscian in several passages the greatest of all grammarians, and de claims that it was only owing to the assistance which he derived from their works that he was enabled to undertake his task. (Priscian, Praef. llib. i. and viii. p. 833, ix. init. and p. 541.) He was the first who reduced grammar to anything like a system, and is therefore called Priscian grammaticorum princeps. A list of his works, most of which are lost, is given by Suidas, and a complete one in Fabricius. (Bibl. Graec. vi. 372 sqq.) We confine ourselves here to those which are still extant. 1. ἐπὶ συνελπίσεως, "de Conuestione Orationis," or de Ordinatione sive Constructione Dictionum," four books. The first edition of this work is the lido. (Venice, 1495, fol.) A much better one, with a Latin translation and notes, was published by Fr. Sylburg, Frankf. 1590, 4to. The last edition, which was greatly corrected by the assistance of four new MSS., is by I. Bekker's, Berlin, 1817, 8vo.

20. Of Myndus, lived at the time of Alexander the Great, and was particularly skilled in explaining nativities. He professed to have learned his art from the Chaldeans. (Seneç. Quaest. Nat. vii. 3 and 17.) His statements respecting the comets, which Seneca has preserved, are sufficient to show that his works were of great importance for astronomy. Whether he is the same as Apollonius, a grammarian of Myndus, who is mentioned by Stephanus Byzantius (s. v. Mūlos), is uncertain.

21. Of NAUCHARIS, a pupil of Adriannus and Chrestus, taught rhetoric at Athens. He was an opponent of Hecaleides, and with the assistance of his associates he succeeded in expelling him from his chair. He cultivated chiefly political oratory, and used to spend a great deal of time upon preparing his speeches in retirement. His moral conduct is approved, as he had a son Rufius. He died at Athens in the seventieth year of his age. (Philos. Vit. Scop. ii. 19, 26; 2; Eudoc. p. 66.)
22. PERGUS. See below.
23. RHODIUS, was, according to Suidas and his Greek anonymous biographers, the son of Silleus or Illeus and Rhoe, and born at Alexandria (comp. Strab. xiv. p. 655) in the phyle Potomaios, whereas Athenaeus (vii. p. 283) and Aelian (Hist. Anim. xv. 25) describe him as a native or, at least, as a citizen of Naucharis. He appears to have been born in the first half of the reign of Ptolemy Euergetes, that is, about n. c. 235, and his most active period falls in the reign of Ptolemy Philopater (n. c. 221-204) and of PtolemyPhones (n. c. 204-191.) In his youth he was instructed by Callimachus, but afterwards we find a bitter enmity existing between them. The cause of this hatred has been explained by various suppositions; the most probable of which seems to be, that Apollonius, in his love of the simplicity of the ancient poets of Greece and in his endeavour to imitate them, offended Callimachus, or perhaps even expressed contempt for his poetry. The love of Apollonius for the ancient epic poetry was indeed so great, and had such fascinations for him, that even when a youth (ηφυς) he began himself an epic poem on the expedition of the Argonauts. When at last the work was completed, he read it in public at Alexandria, but it did not meet with the approbation of the audience. The cause of this in part may have been the imperfect character of the poem itself, which was only a youthful attempt, but it was more especially the fault of the other Alexandrine poets, and above all of Callimachus, for Apollonius was in some degree opposed to the taste which then prevailed at Alexandria in regard to poetry. Apollonius was deeply hurt at this failure, and it is not improbable that the bitter epigram on Callimachus which is still extant (Anthol. Graec. xi. 275) was written at that time. Callimachus in return wrote an invective-poem called "Ibis," against Apollonius, of the nature of which we may form some idea from Ovid's imitation of it in a poem of the same name. Callimachus, moreover, expressed his enmity in other poems also, and in his hymn to Apollo there are several hostile allusions to Apollonius, especially in v. 105. Disheartened by these circumstances Apollonius left Alexandria and went to Rhodes, which was then one of the great seats of Greek literature and learning. Here he revised his poem, and read it to the Rhodians, who received it with great approbation. At the same time he delivered lectures on rhetoric, and his reputation soon rose to such a height, that the Rhodians honoured him with their franchise and other distinctions. Apollonius now regarded himself as a Rhodian, and the surname Rhodius has at all times been the name by which he has been distinguished from other persons of the same name. Notwithstanding these distinctions, however, he afterwards returned to Alexandria, but it is unknown whether he did so of his own accord, or in consequence of an invitation. He is said to have now read his revised poem to the Alexandrians, who were so delighted with it, that he at once rose to the highest degree of fame and popularity. According to Suidas, Apollonius succeeded Enatothnises as chief librarian of the museum at Alexandria, under Ptolemy Philopater, and was buried by the order of Ptolemy Euergetes. He died at n. c. 194. Further particulars about his life are not mentioned, but it is probable that he held his office in the museum until his death, and one of his biographers states, that he was buried in the same tomb with Callimachus.
As regards the poem on the expedition of the Argonauts (Argonautica), which consists of four books and is still extant, Apollonius collected his materials from the rich libraries of Alexandria, and his scholiasts are always anxious to point out the sources from which he derived this or that account. The poem gives a straightforward and simple description of the adventure, and in a tone which is equal throughout. The episodes, which are not numerous and conventional, particular mythuscs or descriptions of countries, are sometimes very beautiful, and give life and colour to the whole poem. The character of Jason, although he is the hero of the poem, is not sufficiently developed to win the interest of the reader. The character of Medea, on the other hand, is beautifully drawn, and the gradual growth of her love is described with a truly artistic moderation. The language is an imitation of that of Homer, but it is more brief and concise, and has all the symptoms of something which is studied and not natural to the poet. The Argonautica, in short, is a work of art and labour, and thus forms, notwithstanding its many resemblances, a contrast with the natural and easy flow of the Homeric poems. On its appearance the work seems to have made a great sensation, for even contemporaries such as Charon, wrote commentaries upon it. One Eirenacus is also mentioned as having written a critical and exegetical commentary of the Argonautica. (Scho/ Apollon. Rhod. i. 1299, ii. 127, 1015.) The common Scholia on Apollonius are called the Florentine Scholia, because they were first published at Florence, and distinguish them from the Paris Scholia, which were first published in Schaeffer's edition of the Argonautica, and consist chiefly of verbal explanations and criticisms. Among the Romans th Argonautica was much read, and P. Terentius Varro Atacinus acquired great reputation by his translation of it. (Quintil. x. 1. § 87.) The Argonautica of Valerius Flaccus is a free imitation of the poem of Apollonius. In the reign of Maxentius I, our Marius made a Greek paraphrase of Apollonius' poem in 5606 iambics. The first edition of the Argonautica is that of Florence 1496, 4to., by J. Lascaris, which contains 1 Scholia. The next is the Aldine (Venice, 158 8vo.), which is little more than a reprint of the Florentine edition. The first really critical ediis that of Brunck. (Argonaut. 1780, in 4to. and 8vo.) The edition of Beck (Leipzig, 1797, 8vo.) is incomplete, and the only volume which appeared of it contains the text, with a Latin translation and a few critical notes. G. Schaefer published an edition (Leipz. 1810—13, 2 vols. 8vo.), which is an improvement upon that of Brunck, and is the first in which the Paris Scholia are printed. The best edition is that of Wellauer, Leipzig, 1828, 2 vols. 8vo., which contains the various readings of 13 MSS., the Scholia, and short notes.

Besides the Argonautics and epigrams (Antonin, Lib. 25), of which we possess only the one on Callistus, there are other works of Apollonius, the authenticity of which are not lost. Two of them, Περὶ Αρχελωνοῦ (Athen. x. p. 451) and Πρὸς Σοφιστὰς (SchoL. Veneti. ad Hom. ii. xiii. 657), were probably grammatical works, and the latter may have had reference to the recension of the Homeric poems by Zonodotus, for the Scholia on Homer occasionally refer to Apollonius. A third class of Apollonius' writings were his κτίσεις, that is, poems on the origin or foundation of several towns. These poems were of an historico-epical character, and mostly refer to Apollonius. In the third class of works, Apollonius wrote several other works, of which only a few critical notes. G. Schaefer published an edition (Leipzig, 1828, 2 vols. 8vo.), which contains the various readings of 13 MSS., the Scholia, and short notes. The best edition is that of Wellauer, Leipzig, 1828, 2 vols. 8vo., which contains the various readings of 13 MSS., the Scholia, and short notes.

The following are known: 1. Πόσιος κτίσις, of which one line and a half are preserved in Athenaeus. (λόγ. p. 283, ed. 4to.) 2. Ναυκάρτες κτίσις, of which ix lines are preserved in Athenaeus. (vii. p. 283, ed. 4to.) 3. Αλεξάνδρεις κτίσις. (Schol. ad Nioand. Thcr. 11.) 4. Πασχάντος κτίσις. (Parthen. Erot. 1 and 11.) 5. Κωινές κτίσις. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Κωινεύς.) Whether he last three were like the first two in verse or prose is uncertain, as no fragments are extant. For, however, the authenticity of which are not lost. Two of them, Περὶ Αρχελωνοῦ (Athen. x. p. 451) and Πρὸς Σοφιστὰς (SchoL. Veneti. ad Hom. ii. xiii. 657), were probably grammatical works, and the latter may have had reference to the recension of the Homeric poems by Zonodotus, for the Scholia on Homer occasionally refer to Apollonius. A third class of Apollonius' writings were his κτίσεις, that is, poems on the origin or foundation of several towns. These poems were of an historico-epical character, and mostly refer to Apollonius. In the third class of works, Apollonius wrote several other works, of which only a few critical notes. G. Schaefer published an edition (Leipzig, 1828, 2 vols. 8vo.), which contains the various readings of 13 MSS., the Scholia, and short notes.

The following are known: 1. Πόσιος κτίσις, of which one line and a half are preserved in Athenaeus. (λόγ. p. 283, ed. 4to.) 2. Ναυκάρτες κτίσις, of which ix lines are preserved in Athenaeus. Prepared to discuss after giving an account of the controversial aim, are questions we shall be better able to answer when it were written wholly or partly with a conjectural restoration of the second. (Oxon. 1706.)

Περὶ Λοιπονετῶν Τομῆν. To find a point in a given straight line such, that the rectangle of its distances from two given points in the same should fulfil certain conditions. (See Pappus, l. c.) A solution of this problem was published by Robt. Simson. Περὶ Τῶν Ἐκτίμων, * A Treatise in two books on Plane Loci. Restored by Robt. Simson. (Lugd. 1740.) Περὶ Ἐκτίμων, in which it was proposed to draw a circle fulfilling any three of the three conditions of passing through one or more of three given points, and touching one or more of three given circles and three given straight lines. Or, which is the same thing, to draw a circle touching three given circles whose radii may have any magnitude, including zero and infinity. (Ap. de Tractionibus qua super., ed. J. G. Camerari.) Goth. et Amst. 1795, 8vo.)

Περὶ Νεκτῶν. To draw through a given point a right line so that a given portion of it should be intercepted between two given right lines. (Restored by S. Horsley, Oxon. 1770.)

Proculus, in his commentary on Euclid, mentions two treatises, De Cochlea and De Perparibus Rationibus.

Ptolemy (Magn. Const. lib. xii. init.) refers to Apollonius for the demonstration of certain propositions relative to the stations and retrogradations of the planets.

APOLLONIUS TYANAÉUS ('Ἀπολλωνίου Τιάναιος'), a Pythagorean philosopher, born at Tyana in Cappadocia about four years before the Christian era. Much of his reputation is to be attributed to the belief in his magical or supernatural powers, and the parallel which modern and ancient writers have attempted to draw between his character and supposed miracles, and those of the Author of our religion. His life by Philostratus is a mass of incongruities and fables: whether it have any groundwork of historical truth, and whether it were written wholly or partly with a controversial aim, are questions we shall be better prepared to discuss after giving an account of the contents of the work itself.

Apollonius, according to the narrative of his biographer, was of noble ancestry, and claimed kindred with the founders of the city of Tyana. We need not stop to dispute the other story of the incarnation of the god Proteus, or refer it, with Tillemon, to demoniacal agency. At the age of fourteen he was placed under the care of Euthymius, a rhetorician of Tarsus; but, being disgraced at the luxury of the inhabitants, he returned to the neighbouring town of Aegae. Here he is said to have studied the whole circle of the Platonic, Sceptic, Epicurean, and Peripatetic philosophy, and ended by giving his preference to the Pythagoreans, in which he had been trained by Exenus of Heraclea. (Phil. i. 7.) Immediately, as if the idea of treading in the footsteps of Pythagoras had seized him in his earliest youth, he began to exercise himself in the severe asceticism of the sect; abstained from animal food and woollen clothing, foreswore wine and the company of women, suffered his hair to grow, and betook himself to the temple of Aesculapius at Aegae, who was supposed to regard him with peculiar favour. He was recalled to Tyana, in the twentieth year of his age, by his father's death: after dividing his inheritance with a brother whom he is said to have claimed from dissolve living, and giving the greater part of what remained to his poorer relatives (Phil. i. 13), he returned to the discipline of Pythagoras, and for five years preserved the mystic silence, during which alone the secret truths of philosophy were disclosed. At the end of the five years, he travelled in Asia Minor, going from city to city and everywhere disputing, like Pythagorians, upon divine rites. There is a blank in his biography at this period of his life, of about twenty years during which we must suppose the same unemployment to have continued, unless indeed we have reason to suspect that the received date of his birth has been anticipated twenty years. He was between forty and fifty years old when he set out to travel to the east; and here Philostratus sends forth his hero on a voyage of discovery, in which we must be content rapidly to follow him. From Aegae he went to Nineveh, where he met Damis, the future chronicler of his actions, and proceeded on his route to India, he discoursed with Babylons, the Parthian king, an consulted the magi and Brahmins, who were supposed to have imparted to him some theurgic secrets. He next visited Taxila, the capital of Phraorhtes, an Indian prince, where he met Iarchis, the chief of the Brahmins, and disputed with Indian Gnostics or already versed in Alexandrian philosophy. (Phil. i. 31.) This eastern journey lasted five years: at its conclusion, he returned the Ionian cities, where we first hear of his pupil Theon, who had been anticipated twenty years. a later period of his life: the same cause excluded him at the cave of Trophonius (from whence he pretended to have obtained the sacred books of Pythagoras), and which he entered by force. (viii. 15.) After visiting Laconia, Corinth, and the other towns of Greece, he kept his course towards Rome, and arrived there just after an edict against magicians had been issued by Nero. He was immediately brought before Teleisinus the comul, and Tigellinus, the favourite of the emperor, the first of whom dismissed him, we are told, from the love of philosophy, and the latter from the fear of a magic power, which could make the letters vanish from the indictment. On his acquittal, he went to Spain, Africa, and Athens, where, on a second application, he was admitted to the mysteries; and from Athens proceeded to Alexandria, where Vespasian, who was maturing his revolt, soon saw the use which might be made of such an ally. The story of their meeting may be genuine, and is certainly curious as exhibiting Apollonius in the third of the three last characters assumed by Pythagoras,—philosopher, mystic, and politician. Vespasian was met at the entrance of the city by a body of magistrates, praefects and philosophers, and hastily asked whether the Tyanean was among the number. Being told that he was philosophizing in the Scœræum, he proceeded thither, and begged Apollonius to make him emperor: the philosopher replied that “he had already done so, in praying the gods for a just and venerable sovereign;” upon which Vespasian declared that he resigned himself entirely into his hands. A council of philosophers was forthwith held, including Dio and Euphrates, Stoics in the emperor’s train, in which the question was formally debated, Euphrates protesting against the ambition of Vespasian and the base subserviency of Apollonius, and advocating the restoration of a republic. (v. 31.) This dispute was formally debated, Euphrates protesting, he was admitted to the mysteries; and many notices of his visits and acts might be found in the public records of Asiatic cities, which would have at once disproved the indictment. On his acquittal, he went to Spain, Africa, and Athens, where, on a second appearance to Darius at Puteoli at the same period when there was a general belief in magical powers Apollonius did attain great influence by pretending to them, and that the history of Philostratus’s narrative in the main, with the exception of what is miraculous. And the parody, if it may be so termed, of the life of Pythagoras, may be rather traceable to the impostor himself than to the ingenuity of his biographer. Statues and temples still existed in his honour; his letters and supposed writings were extant; the manuscript of his life by Damis the Assyrian was the original work which was dressed out by the rhetoric of Philostratus; and many notices of his visits and acts might be found in the public records of Asiatic cities, which would have at once disproved the history, if inconsistent with it. Add to this, that another life of Apollonius of Tyana, by Macrægenes, is mentioned, which was professedly disregarded by Philostratus, because, he says, it omitted many important particulars, and which Origen, who had read it, records to have spoken of Apollonius as a magician whose imposture had deceived many celebrated philosophers. The conclusion we seem to come to on the whole is, that at a period when there was a general belief in magical powers Apollonius did attain great influence by pretending to them, and that the history of Philostratus gives a just idea of his character and reputation, however inconsistent in its facts and absurd in its marvels.

We now proceed to discuss very briefly three questions. I. The historical groundwork on which the narrative of Philostratus was founded. II. How far, if at all, it was designed as a rival to the Gospel history. III. The real character of Apollonius himself.

I. However impossible it may be to separate truth from falsehood in the narrative of Philostratus, we cannot conceive that a professed history, appealed to as such by contemporary authors, and written about a hundred years after the death of Apollonius himself, should be simply the invention of a writer of romance. It must be allowed, that all the absurd fables of Cæsarius, the confused falsehoods of all mythologies (which become more and more absurd as they are further distant), eastern fairy tales, and perhaps a parody of some of the Christian miracles, are all pressed into the service by Philostratus to adorn the life of his hero: it will be allowed further, that the history itself, stripped of the miracles, is probably as false as the miracles themselves. Still we cannot account for the reception of the narrative among the ancients, and even among the fathers themselves, unless there had been some independent tradition of the character of Apollonius on which it rested. Eusebiius of Caesarea, who answered the ἄγνωστος φιλαθλέως πρὸς Χριστιανὲς of Hierocles (in which a comparison was attempted between our Lord and Philostratus), seems (c. v.) to allow the truth of Philostratus’s narrative in the main, with the exception of what is miraculous. And the parody, if it may be so termed, of the life of Pythagoras, may be rather traceable to the impostor himself than to the ingenuity of his biographer. Statues and temples still existed in his honour; his letters and supposed writings were extant; the manuscript of his life by Damis the Assyrian was the original work which was dressed out by the rhetoric of Philostratus; and many notices of his visits and acts might be found in the public records of Asiatic cities, which would have at once disproved the history, if inconsistent with it. Add to this, that another life of Apollonius of Tyana, by Macrægenes, is mentioned, which was professedly disregarded by Philostratus, because, he says, it omitted many important particulars, and which Origen, who had read it, records to have spoken of Apollonius as a magician whose imposture had deceived many celebrated philosophers. The conclusion we seem to come to on the whole is, that at a period when there was a general belief in magical powers Apollonius did attain great influence by pretending to them, and that the history of Philostratus gives a just idea of his character and reputation, however inconsistent in its facts and absurd in its marvels.

II. We have purposely omitted the wonders with which Philostratus has garnished his narrative, of which they do not in general form an essential part. Many of these are curiously coincident with the Christian miracles. The pro¬phetic and miraculous signs which Apollonius shewed to his master by Proteus, and the incarnation of Proteus himself, the chorus of swans which sung for joy on the occasion, the casting out of devils, raising the dead, and healing the sick, the sudden disappearances and reappearances of Apollonius, his adventures in the cave of Trophonius, and the sacred voice which called him at his death, to which may be added his claim as a teacher having authority to reform the world — cannot fail to suggest the parallel passages in the Gospel history. We know, too, that Apollonius was one among many rivals set up by the Eclecites (as, for instance, by Hierocheles of Nicomedia in the time of Diocletian) to our Saviour — an attempt, it may be worth remarking, renewed by the English freethinkers, Blount and Lord Herbert. Still it must be allowed that the resemblances are very general, that where Philostratus has borrowed from his contemporary and model, it is only as he has borrowed from all other wonderful history, and that the idea of a controversial aim is inconsistent with the account which makes the life written by Damis the groundwork of the more recent story. Moreover, Philostratus wrote at the command of the empress Julia Domna, and was at the time living in the palace of Alexander Severus, who worshipped our Lord with Orpheus and Apollonius among his Patens: so that it seems improbable he should have felt any peculiar hostility to Christianity; while, on the other hand, he would be acquainted with the general story of our Lord's life, from which he might naturally draw many of his oases. His object, however, was not to write a history, but to write a life, and to set the life of the spirit apart from the life of the flesh in a systematic parallel. (Ritter, Geschichte der Phil. vol. iv. p. 492.)

III. The character of Apollonius as well as the facts of his life bear a remarkable resemblance to those of Pythagoras, whom he professedly followed. Travel, mysticism, and disputations were his chief virtues. As a philosopher, he is to be considered as one of the middle terms between the Greek and Oriental systems, which he endeavoured to harmonize in the symbolic lore of Pythagoras. The Pythagorean doctrine of the numbers, and their principles of music and astronomy, he looked upon as quite subordinate, while his main efforts were directed to re-establish the old religion on a Pythagorean basis. His aim was to purify the worship of Paganism from the corruptions which he said the fables of the poets had introduced, and restore the rites of the temples in all their power and meaning. In his works on divination by the stars, and on offerings, he rejects sacrifices as impure in the sight of God. All objects of sense, even fire, partook of a material and corruptible nature: prayer itself should be the untainted offering of the heart, and was polluted by passing through the lips. (Euseb. Prep. Ev. iv. 13.)

This objection to sacrifice was doubtless connected with the Pythagorean doctrine of the transmigration of souls. In the miracles attributed to him we see the same trace of a Pythagorean character: they are chiefly prophetic, and it is not the power of controlling the laws of nature which Apollonius lays claim to, but rather a wonder-working secret, which gives him a deeper insight into them than is possessed by ordinary men. Upon the whole, we may place Apollonius midway between the mystic philosopher and the mere impostor, between Pythagoras and Lucian's Alexander; and in this double character he was regarded by the ancients themselves.

The following list of Apollonius's works has come down to us: 1. τίμων εἰς Μυστηριανον. (Philost. Vit. Apoll. i. 14; Suidas, s. a. Apoll.) 2. Ποιευγράφου δόξα, and 3. Ποιευγράφου θυσία, mentioned by Suidas, and probably (see Ritter) one of the works which, according to Philostratus (vii. of his apologetic) he composed with him from the cave of Trophonius. 4. Διαφθών, written in Ionic Greek. (Phil. i. 3; vii. 39.) 5. Ἀπολλονία against a complaint of Euphrates the philosopher to Domitian. (viii. 7.) 6. Περὶ μαντείων δοκήρων. 7. Τελεστὶ ἣ̣ περὶ Ϊστασιν. (iii. 41; iv. 19; Euseb. Prep. Ev. iv. 13.) 8. Χρυσόλογον, quoted by Suidas. 9. Νυχθήμερον, a spurious work. 10. Ἐνικοτόλα LXXXV. Bp. Lloyd supposes those which are still extant to be a spurious work. On the other hand, it must be allowed that the Laconic brevity of their style suits well with the authoritative character of the philosopher. They were certainly not inventions of Philostratus, and are not original works of Apollonius, when we bear in mind that he is referred to in the apologetic. The Ἀπολλονία which is given by Philostratus (viii. 7) is the only other extant writing of Apollonius. (B. J.)

APOLLONIUS, artists. 1. APOLLONIUS and TAURISCUS of Tralles, were two brothers, and the sculptors of the group which is commonly known as the Farnese bull, representing the punishment of Dioces by Zethus and Amphion. [DIRCS.] It was taken from Rhodes to Rome by Asinius Pollio, and afterwards placed in the baths of Caracalla, where it was dug up in the sixteenth century, and deposited in the Farnese palace. It is now at Naples. After its discovery, it was restored, in a manner not at all in keeping with its style, by Battista Bianchi of Milan. There is some reason to believe that additions were made to it in the time of Caracalla. It was originally formed out of one block of marble. A full description of the group is given by Winckelmann, who distinguishes the old parts from the new.

From the style of the ancient portions of the group, Winckelmann and Müller refer its execution to the same period to which they imagine the Laocoon to belong, that is, the period after Alexander the Great. Both groups belong to the same school of art, the Rhodian, and both probably to the same period. If, therefore, we admit the force of the arguments of Lessing and Thielsch respecting the date of the Laocoon [AGELADAS], we may infer, that the Farnese bull was newly executed when Asinius Pollio took it to Rome, and consequently, that Apollonius and Tauriscus flourished at the beginning of the first century of the Christian era. It is worth while to notice, that we have no history of this work before its removal from Rhodes to Rome.

Pliny says of Apollonius and Tauriscus, "Parentum ii certamen de se fecere: Menecrates videri professi, sed esse naturalem Artemidorum," which is understood to mean, that they placed an inscription on their work, expressing a doubt whether their father, Artemidorus, or their teacher Menecrates, ought to be considered their true pa rent. The Farnese bull bears no such inscription, but there are the marks of an effaced inscription on a trunk of a tree which forms a support for the figure of Zethus. (Plin. xxxvi. 4 § 10; Winckelmann, Werke, vi. p. 52, vii. p. 203; Müller, Archäol. der Kunst, § 157.)

2. An Athenian sculptor, the son of Nestor, was the maker of the celebrated torse of Hercules in the Belvedere, which is engraved in the Mus. Pére-Clement, iii. pl. 10, and on which is inscribed ΑΠΟΛΛΟΝΙΟΣ ΝΕΣΤΩΡΟΣ ΘΕΟΙΟΣ. From the formation of the letters of the inscription, the age of the sculptor may be fixed at about the birth of Christ. The work itself is one of the most splendid remains of Grecian art. There is at Rome a statue of Ascelinus by the same artist. (Winkelmann, Werke, i. p. 226, iii. p. 39, vi. pp. 64, 94, 101, vii. p. 215; Thiess, Epochen, p. 332.)

3. An Athenian sculptor, the son of Archias, made the bronze head of the young hero, which was found at Heracleum and is engraved in the Mus. Hered. i. tab. 45. It bears the inscription, ΑΠΟΛΛΟΝΙΟΣ ΑΡΧΙΟΤΟΘΘΝΑΙΟΣ ΕΠΙΜΗΣ. It probably belongs to the period about the birth of Christ. (Winckelmann, Werke, ii. p. 158, iv. p. 234, v. p. 239, vii. p. 92.)

4. A sculptor, whose name is inscribed on the beautiful marble statue of a young satyr, in the possession of the Earl of Egremont, at Petworth, Sussex. [P. S.]

APOLLONIUS (Ἀπόλλωνιος), physicians.

1. APOLLONIUS ANTIUCHENUS (Ἀπόλλωνιος Ἀντιοχεύς), the name of two physicians, father and son, who were born at Antioch, and belonged to the sect of the Empirics. They lived after Serapion of Alexandria and before Menodotus [ΣΕΡΑΠΙΩΝ; ΜΕΝΟΔΟΤΟΟΣ], and therefore probably in the first or second century B.C. (Gal. Introd. c. 4, vol. xiv. p. 638.) One of them is very likely the person sometimes called "Apollonius Empiricus"; the other may perhaps be Apollonius Senior.

3. APOLLONIUS ARCHISTRATOR (Ἀρχιστράτωρ) is the author of a medical prescription quoted by Andromachus (ap. Gal. De Compos. Medicam, sec. Gen. v. 12, vol. xiii. p. 835), and must therefore have lived in or before the first century after Christ. Nothing is known of the events of his life.

4. APOLLONIUS BIBLAS (Βιβλᾶς), lived probably in the second century B.C. and wrote, after Zeno's death, a book in answer to a work which he had composed on the meaning of certain marks (χαρακτήρες) that are found at the end of some chapters in the third book of the Epidemics of Hippocrates. (Gal. Comm. II. in Hipp. "Επιμ. III.", § 5, vol. xvii. pt. i. p. 618.) It seems most likely that he is not the same person as Apollonius Empiricus. His name is supposed to be connected with the word βιβλαῖος, and seems to have been given him for being (as we say) a book-worm.

5. APOLLONIUS CITIZENUS (Κίτισειος), the oldest commentator on Hippocrates whose works are still extant. He was a native of Citium, in Cyprus. Strabo, xiv. p. 243, ed. Tausch., and studied medicine at Alexandria under Zopyrus (Apollon. Mt. p. 2, ed. Dietz); he is supposed to have lived in the first century B.C. The only work of his that remains is a short Commentary on Hippocrates, Πεπλεύρων, De Arcaithicis, in three books. It is dedicated to a king of the name of Ptolemy, who is conjectured to have been a younger brother of Ptolemy Auletes, king of Egypt, who was made king of Cyprus, and who is mentioned several times by Cicero. (Pro Dom. c. 8, 20, Pro Pute. c. 13, Pro Sest. c. 26.) Some portions of this work were published by Cochi in his Dissert. dell' Anatonia, Firenze, 1745, 4to., p. 8, and also in his Graecorum Chirurgiae Libri, Florent. 1754, fol. The whole work, however, appeared for the first time in the first volume of Dietz's Scholicon in Hippocratum et Galen. Regim. Pruss. 1834, 8vo.; and an improved edition with a Latin translation was published by Kühn, Lips. 1837, 4to., which, however, was not quite finished at the time of his death. (See Kühn, Additum ad Elenchum Medicorum Veterum a Jo. A. Fabricio, &c. exhibitur, Lips. 1826, 4to., fascic. iii. p. 5; Dietz, Schol. in Hipp. et Gal. vol. i. praef. p. v.; Littre, Oeuvres d' Hippocr. vol. i. Introd. p. 32; Choulant, Handb. der Bûcherkunde fûr die Altere Medizin.)

6. APOLLONIUS CYPRIUS (Ἀπόλλωνιος Κυπριος, must have lived in or before the second century after Christ, as one of his antidotes is quoted by Galen. (De Aestit. ii. 11, vol. xiv. p. 171.) Nothing is known of his life.

7. APOLLONIUS CYRHIUS (Κύρηος) was the pupil of Olympicus and the tutor to Julianus. He was a native of Cyprus, belonged to the sect of the Methodici, and lived probably in the first century after Christ. Nothing more is known of his history. (Gal. De Meth. Med. i. 7, vol. x. pp. 53, 54.)

8. APOLLONIUS EMPIRICUS (Ἐμπηρηκός), is supposed to be one of the persons called "Apollonius Antiochenus. He lived, according to Socratos (De Med. i. praef. p. 5), after Serapion of Alexandria, and before Heracleides of Tarentum, and therefore probably in the second century B.C. He belonged to the sect of the Empirics, and wrote a book in answer to Zeno's work on the χαρακτήρες in Hippocrates, mentioned above. This was answered by Zeno, and it was this second work that drew from Apollonius Biblas his treatise on the subject after Zeno's death. (Gal. Comm. II. in Hipp. "Επιμ. III.", § 5, vol. xvii. pt. i. p. 618.) He is mentioned also by Galen, De Meth. Med. i. 7, vol. x. p. 142.

9. APOLLONIUS GLAUDES must have lived in or before the second century after Christ, as his work "On Internal Diseases" is quoted by Caelius Aurelianus. (De Med. Comm. II. in Hipp. in Serapion, c. 13, p. 536.) Nothing is known of his life.

10. APOLLONIUS HEROPHILEUS (Ἡρόφιλος) is supposed to be the same person as Apollonius Mus. He wrote a pharmaceutical work entitled Πεπλεύρων, De Facie Parabiblinon (Gal. De Compos. Medicam, sec. Loc. vi. 9, vol. xii. p. 395), which is very frequently quoted by Galen, and which is probably the work referred to by Oribasius (Eupor. ad Eunap. i. proem. p. 574), and of which some fragments are quoted in Cramer's Asced. Graecos Paris. vol. i. p. 393, as still existing in MS. in the Royal Library at Paris. He lived before Andromachus, as that writer quotes him (ap. Gal. De Compos. Medicam, sec. Loc. vol. xiii. pp. 76, 114, 137, 306, 326, 381), and also before Archi-
APOLLONIUS.

17. APOLLONIUS PITANAEUS was born at Pitanae in Aecolia, and must have lived in or before the first century after Christ, as an absurd and superstitious remedy is attributed to him by Pliny. (H.N. xxxix. 18.)

18. APOLLONIUS SENIOR (ὁ Πρεσβύτερος) is quoted by Eriocles (Gloss. Hipp. p. 86), and must therefore have lived in or before the first century after Christ. Some persons suppose him to be one of the physicians called Apollonius Antiochenus.

APOLLONIANUS STRATONICUS (ὁ ἄριστος Ἀριστικός) was probably not the son, but the pupil, of Strato of Berytis: he is very likely the same person as Apollonius Memphites, and may be supposed to have lived about the third century B.C. He was a follower of Erasistratus, and wrote a work on the Pulse, which is quoted by Galen. (De Differ. Puls. iv. 17, vol. viii. p. 759.)

20. APOLLONIUS TARanksis (ὁ Ταράκης) was born at Tarsus in Cilicia, and lived perhaps in the first or second century after Christ. His prescrip-

21. APOLLONIUS THEK (ὁ Θηκ) is supposed by some persons to be the same as Apollonius Ophis, or Apollonius Pergamenus. As he is quoted by Eriocles (Gloss. Hipp. p. 86), he must have lived in or before the first century after Christ.

22. Another physician of this name, who is mentioned by Apuleius (Met. ix. init.) as having been bitten by a mad dog, must (if he ever really existed) have lived in the second century after Christ; and the name occurs in several ancient authors, belonging to one or more physicians, without any distinguishing epithet. [W. A. G.]

APOLLONIANUS (Ἀπολλόνιαν) 1. Of Antioch, a Stoic philosopher, was a friend of Aristoc of Chios, on whom he wrote a work called Απόλον. (Athen. vii. p. 261.) Diogenes Laertius (vii. 140, comp. 92) mentions a work of his called σωτρίκι. His name also occurs in Tertullian. (De Anim. 14.) Some writers have asserted, though without any good reason, that Apollonius the Stoic was the same as Apollonius the physician who lived at the court of Antiochus. A later Stoic philosopher of this name occurs in Socrates (Hist. Eccl. vi. 19) and in Suidas. (s. v. Ἀπολλόνιος; comp. Ruhnken, Dissert. de Vite et Script. Longinii, sect. viii.)

2. Of Athen., a poet of the old Attic comedy (Suid.), appears to have been a contemporary of Strattis, and to have consequently lived about Ol. 95. (Harpocr. s. v. Ἀπολλόνιος.) Suidas ascribes to him five comedies, viz. Δαίμ. Θηρίων, Κρίτης, Απόλλωνια and Κέρπατον. Of the former three we still possess a few fragments, but the last two are completely lost. (Athen. iii. pp. 75, 114, xi. pp. 407, 453.; Phot. Lec. s. v. μουσικάρις; Aelian, Hist. Anim. vii. 51; Phot. p. 624; Mnöck, Hist. Crit. Com. Græc. p. 266, &c.)

3. Of Cynicus, was connected by friendship with the Persian satrap Phanobazus, and afterwards formed a similar connexion with Agesilus. Soon after this, Phanobazus requested him to persuade Agesilus to meet him, which was done accordingly. (Xenoph. Helen. iv. 1 § 29; Plut. Agesil. 12.) This happened in B.C. 398, shortly before the withdrawal of Agesilus from the satrapy of Phanobazus in B.C. 397.

APOLLOPHANES (Ἀπολλόφανης), a native of Seleucia, and physician to Antiochus the Great king of Syria, B.C. 223-187, with whom, as ap pears from Polybius (v. 56, 58), he possessed considerable influence. Mead, in his Dissert. de Numm. Aut. Pianei, Vol. ii. p. 12, &c., ed. Niebuhr; but whether he had the management of the emperor's finances at Rome, or went to some province in this capacity, is quite uncertain.

Appian wrote a Roman history (Ῥωμαίος, or Ρωμαϊκή ἱστορία) in twenty-four books, on a plan different from that of most historians. He did not treat the history of the Roman empire as a whole in chronological order, following the series of events; but he gave a separate account of the affairs of each country from the time that it became connected with the Romans, till it was finally incorporated in the Roman empire. The first foreign people with whom the Romans came in contact were the Gauls; and consequently his history, according to his plan, would have begun with that people. But in order to make the work a complete history of Rome, he devoted the first three books to an account of the early times and of the various nations of Italy which Rome subdued. The subjects of the different books were: 1. The kingly period (Ῥωμαϊκός βασιλείας). 2. Italy (Ἰταλίας). 3. The Samnites (Σαμνίτων). 4. The Gauls or Celts (Καλτικῶν). 5. Sicily and the other islands (Σικελίκων καὶ Νησιωτῶν). 6. Spain (Σπανίων). 7. Hannibal's wars (Hαννίβαλες). 8. Libya, Carthage, and Numidia (Λιβύης, Καρθαγίνης καὶ Νομιδίας). 9. Macedonia (Μακεδονίας). 10. Greece and the Greek states in Asia Minor (Ἑλληνικῆς καὶ Μικραίων). 11. Syria and Parthia (Συρίας καὶ Παρθίων). 12. The war with Mithridates (Μιθριδάτου). 13—21. The civil wars (Ἑλληνικῶν). 22. The Parthian wars (Ἀρματαῖα, comprised the history of a hundred years, from the battle of Actium to the beginning of Vespasion's reign. 23. The wars with Illyria (Ἰλλυρίων ὢν Ιλλυρίων). 24. Those with Arabia (Ἀραβίων). We possess only eleven of these complete; namely, the sixth, seventh, eighth, eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth, fifteenth, sixteenth, seventeenth, and twenty-third. There are also fragments of several of the others. The Parthian history, which has come down to us as part of the eleventh book, has been proved by Schweighäuser to be no work of Appian, but merely a compilation from Plutarch's Lives of Antony and Crassus, probably made in the middle ages. (See Schweighäusser's Appiani, vol. iii. p. 905, &c.)

Appian's work is a mere compilation. In the early times he chiefly followed Dionysius, as far as the latter went, and his work makes up to a considerable extent for the books of Dionysius, which are lost. In the history of the second Punic war Fabius seems to have been his chief authority, and subsequently he made use of Polybius. His style is clear and simple; but he possesses few merits as an historian, and he frequently makes the most absurd blunders. Thus, for instance, he places Saguntum on the north of the Iberus (Ἰβερός), and states that it takes only half a day to sail from Spain to Britain (Ἰμβρία). A part of his history was first published in a barbarous Latin translation by Candidus, at Venice, in 1472. A part of the Greek text was first published by Carolus Stephanus, Paris, 1551; which was followed by an improved Latin version by Gelenius, which was published after the death of APPULEIUS.

APPULEIUS, a praefectus, mentioned by Cicero in two of his letters (ad Att. xii. 14, 17), must be distinguished from No. 3.

M. Appuleius, was elected augur in B.C. 45, and Cicero pleaded illness as an excuse for his absence from the inaugural festival, which seems to have lasted several days. (Cic. ad Att. xii. 13—15.) At the time of Caesar's death, B. C. 44, Appuleius seems to have been quaestor in Asia; and when Brutus crossed over into Greece and Asia, he assisted him with money and troops. (Cic. Phil. x. 11, xiii. 16; Appian, B. C. iii. 65, iv. 75.) He was proscribed by the triumvirs, B. C. 43, and fled to Brutus, who placed him over Bithynia. After the death of Brutus, B. C. 42, he surrendered the province to Antony, and was restored by him to his native country. (Appian, B. C. iv. 46.)

6. Appuleius, proscribed by the triumvirs in B. C. 43, escaped with his wife to Sicily. (Appian, B. C. iv. 40.) He must be distinguished from No. 5, who was proscribed at the same time.

This Appuleius is probably the same as the tribune of the plebs spoken of by Appian. (B. C. iii. 93.)

7. Sex. Appuleius Sex. f. Sex. n., consul in B. C. 29. He afterwards went to Spain as proconsul, and obtained a triumph in B. C. 26, for the victories he had gained in that country. (Dion Cass. ii. 20; Fest. Capitol.)

8. M. Appuleius Sex. f. Sex. n., consul in B. C. 20, may possibly be the same person as No. 5. (Dion Cass. liv. 7.)

9. Sex. Appuleius Sex. f. Sex. n., probably a son of No. 7, consul in A. D. 14, the year in which Augustus died. (Dion Cass. ixi. 29; Suet. Aug. 109; Tac. Ann. i. 7; Vell. Pat. ii. 129.) He is called in two passages of Dion Cassius (C. l. and liv. 30) a relation of Augustus. Tacitus (Ann. ii. 60) speaks of Appuleia Varilia, who was accused of adultery and treason in A. D. 17, as a granddaughter of a sister of Augustus. It is, therefore, not impossible that Sex. Appuleius may have married one of the Marcellae, the two daughters of Octavia, by her first husband Marcellus; but there is no authority for this marriage.

APPULEIUS or Appuleius (inscriptions and the oldest MSS. generally exhibit the double consonant, see Cren. Animad. Phil. P. xi. sub. init.; Oudendorp, ad Apol. Asin. n. p. 1), chiefly celebrated as the author of the Golden Ass, was born a. D. 17, as a grandson of a sister of Augustus. It is, therefore, not impossible that Sex. Appuleius may have married one of the Marcellae, the two daughters of Octavia, by her first husband Marcellus; but there is no authority for this marriage.

he became warmly attached to the tenets of the Platonic philosophy, and, prosecuting his researches in many different departments, laid the foundations of that copious stock of various and profound learning by which he was subsequently so distinguished. He next travelled extensively, visiting, it would appear, Italy, Greece, and Asia, acquiring a knowledge of a vast number of religious opinions and modes of worship, and becoming initiated in the greater number of the mysteries and secret fraternities so numerous in that age. (De Mundo, p. 720; Apol. p. 404.) Not long after his return home, although he had in some degree diminished the amount of his adoptions, he committed himself, for the course of study, by his protracted residence in foreign countries, and by various acts of generosity towards his friends and old instructors (Apol. p. 442), he set out upon a new journey to Alexandria. (Apol. p. 518.) On his way thither he was taken ill at the town of Oea, and was hospitably received into the house of a young man, Sicinius Pontianus, with whom he had lived upon terms of close intimacy, a few years previously, at Athens. (Apol. l. c.) The mother of Pontianus, Pudentilla by name, was a very rich widow whose fortune was at her own disposal. While in the full consent, or rather in compliance with the earnest solicitation of her son, the young philosopher agreed to marry her. (Apol. p. 518.) Meanwhile Pontianus himself was united to the daughter of a certain Herennius Rufinus, who being indignant that so much wealth should pass out of the family, instigated his son-in-law, Appuleius, to join him in impeaching Appuleius upon the charge, that he had gained the affections of Pudentilla by charms and magic spells. (Apol. p. 401, 451, 521, 522, &c.) The accusation seems to have been in itself sufficiently ridiculous. The alleged culprit was young, highly accomplished, eloquent, popular, and by no means careless in his matters of dress and personal adornment, although, according to his own account, he was worn and wan from intense application. (Apol. p. 506, seqq. 421, compare p. 547.) The lady was early old enough to be his mother; she had been widow for fourteen years, and owned to forty, while her enemies called her sixty; in addition to which she was by no means attractive in her appearance, and had, it was well known, been for some time desirous again to enter the married state. (Apol. pp. 450, 514, 520, 535, 546, 541, 47.) The cause was heard at Sabrata before Marcus Maximus, proconsul of Africa (Apol. p. 409, 445, 501), and the spirited and triumphant defence spoken by Appuleius is still extant. If his subsequent career we know little. Judging from the voluminous catalogue of works attributed to his pen, he must have devoted himself most sedulously to literature; he occasionally declaimed publicly with great applause; he had the charge of exhibiting gladiatorial shows and wild beast spectacles in the province, and statues were erected in his honour by the senate of Carthage and of other cities. (Apol. pp. 445, 494; Florid. iii. n. 16; Augustin. Ep. v.) Nearly the whole of the above particulars are rived from the statements contained in the writings of Appuleius, especially the Apologia; but in dition to these, we find a considerable number of circumstances recorded in almost all the biographies prefixed to his works. Thus we are told that his parent was Lucius; that the name of his father was Theseus; that his mother was called Salvia, was of Thessalian extraction, and a descendant of Theseus; that when he visited Rome he was entirely ignorant of the Latin language, which he acquired without the aid of an instructor, by his own efforts; and that, having dissipated his fortune, he was reduced at one time to such abject poverty, that he was compelled to sell the clothes which he wore, in order to pay the fees of admission into the mysteries of Orpheus. These and various other particulars, as well as the sometimes extravagant boasting of his person, depend upon the untenable supposition, that Appuleius is to be identified with Lucius the hero of his romances. That production being avowedly a work of fiction, it is difficult to comprehend upon what principle any portion of it could be held as supplying authentic materials for the life of its author, more especially when some of the facts so extracted are at variance with those deduced from more trustworthy sources; as, for example, the assertion that he was at one time reduced to beggary, which is directly contradicted by a passage in the Apologia referred to above, where he states that his fortune had been merely "modice imminutum" by various expenses. In one instance only does he appear to forget himself (Met. xi. p. 280), where Lucius is spoken of as a native of Madaura, but no valid conclusion can be drawn from this, which is probably an oversight, unless we are at the same time prepared to go as far as Saint Augustine, who hesitates whether we ought not to believe the account given of the transformation of Lucius, that is, Appuleius, into an ass to be a true narrative. It is to this fanciful identification, coupled with the charges preferred by the relations of Pudentilla, and his acknowledged predilection for mystical solemnities, that we must attribute the belief, which soon became current in the ancient world, that he really possessed the supernatural powers attributed to him by his enemies. The early pagan controversialists, as we learn from Lactantius, were wont to rank the marvels said to have been wrought by him along with those ascribed to Apollonius of Tyana, and to appeal to these as equal to, or more wonderful than, the miracles of Christ. (Lactant. Div. Inst. v. 3.) A generation later, the belief continued so prevalent, that St. Augustine was requested to draw up a serious refutation—a task which that renowned prelate executed in the most satisfactory manner, by simply referring to the oration of Appuleius himself. (Marcellin. Ep. iv. ad Augustin. and Augustin. Ep. v. ad Marcellin.) No one can peruse a few pages of Appuleius without being at once impressed with his conspicuous excellences and glaring defects. We find everywhere an exhalent play of fancy, liveliness, humour, wit, learning, acuteness, and not unfrequently, real eloquence. On the other hand, no style can be more vicious. It is in the highest degree unnatural, both in its general tone and also in the phraseology employed. The former is disfigured by the constant recurrence of ingenious but forced and t/amid conceits and studied prettinesses, while the latter is remarkable for the multitude of obsolete words ostentatiously padded in almost every sentence. The greater number of these are to be found in the extant compositions of the oldest dramatic writers, and in quotations preserved by the grammarians; and those for which no authority can be produced were in all probability drawn from the same source, and not arbitrarily coined to answer the purpose of the moment, as some critics have imagined. The least faulty, perhaps, of all his pieces is the Apologia. Here he speaks of his deep feeling, and although we may in many places detect the inveterate affection of the rhetorician, yet there is often a bold, manly, straightforward heartiness and truth which we seek in vain in those compositions where his feelings were less touched.

We do not know the year in which our author was born, nor that in which he died. But the names of Lollius Urbicus, Scipio Orfitus, Severianus, Lollianus Avitus, and others who are incidentally mentioned by him as his contemporaries, and who from other sources are known to have held high offices under the Antonines, enable us to determine the epoch when he flourished.

The extant works of Appuleius are: 1. Meta¬morphi¬ses,Fasciculus XXI. This celebrated romance, which, together with the Æstes of Lucian, is said to have been founded upon a work bearing the same title by a certain Lucius of Patras (Photius, Bibliotheca, cod. cxxxix. p. 165) belonged to the class of tales distinguished by the ancients under the title of Milesiae fabulae. It seems to have been intended simply as a satire upon the hypocrisy and debauchery of certain orders of priests, the frauds of juggling pretenders to supernatural powers, and the general profli¬gacy of public morals. There are some however who discover a more recondite meaning, and especially the author of the Divine Legation of Moses, who has at great length endeavoured to prove, that the Golden Ass was written with the view of recommending the Pagan religion in opposition to Christianity, which was at that time making rapid progress, and especially of inculcating the importance of initiation into the purer myster¬ies. (Diogenes Laertius, bk. ii. sect. iv.) The epithet Aureus is generally supposed to have been bestowed in consequence of the admiration in which the tale was held, for being considered as the most excellent composition of its kind, it was compared to the most excellent of metals, just as the apo¬thegms of Pythagoras were distinguished as χρυσά ἔργα. Warburton, however, ingeniously contends that aureus was the common epithet bestowed upon all Milesian tales, because they were such as story-tellers used to rehearse for a piece of money to the rabble in a circle, after the fashion of oriental story-tellers. He founds his conjecture upon an expression in one of Pliny’s Epistles (ii. 20), assem pare, et accipe auream fabulum, which seems, however, rather to mean “give me a piece of copper and receive in return a story worth a piece of gold, or, precious as gold,” which brings us back to the old explanation. The well-known and exquisitely beautiful episode of Cupid and Psyche is introduced in the 4th, 5th, and 6th books. This, whatever opinion we may form of the principal narrative, is evidently an allegory, and is generally understood to shadow forth the progress of the soul to perfection.

II. Floridorum Libri IV. An ἀθεολογία, containing select extracts from various orations and dissertations, collected probably by some admiral. It has, however, been imagined that we have here a sort of common-place-book, in which Appuleius registered, from time to time, such ideas and forms of expression as he thought worth preserving, with a view to their insertion in some continuous compos¬ition. This notion, although adopted by Ou¬ndendorp, has not found many supporters. It is wonderful that it should ever have been seriously propagated.

III. De Deo Socratis Liber. This treatise has been roughly attacked by St. Augustine.

IV. De Dogmate Platois Libri tres. The first book contains some account of the speculative doc¬trines of Plato, the second of his morales, the third of his logic.

V. De Mundo Liber. A translation of the work ὑπωκύκλου at one time ascribed to Aristotle.

VI. Apologia sive De Magia Liber. The ora¬tion described above, delivered before Claudius Maximus.

VII. Hermetis Trimogati De Natura Deorum Dialogus. Scholars are at variance with regard to the authenticity of this translation of the Ascle¬pian dialogue. As to the original, see Fabric. Biblioth. Graec. tom. iii. p. 8.

Besides these a number of works now lost are mentioned incidentally by Appuleius himself, and many others belonging to some Appuleius are cited by the grammarians. He professes to be the author of “poemata omne genus apta virgīae, lyricae, socco, colhurno, iam satiras ac grippos, iam historiae variis veris nec omnia artis lusus assis discertis nec non dialogos lusus philosophiae,” both in Greek and Latin (Florid. ii. 9, iii. 18, 20, iv. 24); and we find especial mention made of a collection of poems on playful and amatory themes, entitled Ludicia, from which a few fragments are quoted in the Apologia. (pp. 408, 409, 414; compare 136.)

The Editio Princps was printed at Rome, by Sweynheym and Pannartz, in the year 1469, edited by Andrew, bishop of Aleria. It is excessively rare, and is considered valuable in a critical point of view, because it contains a genuine text honestly copied from MSS, and free from the multitude of conjectural emendations by which nearly all the rest of the earlier editions are corrupted. It is moreover, the only old edition which escaped mu¬tilation by the Inquisition.

An excellent edition of the Asinus appeared a Leyden in the year 1736, printed in 4to., an edited by Oudendorp and Ruhnken. Two addi¬tional volumes, containing the remaining work appeared at Leyden in 1823, edited by Bosch. A new and very elaborate edition of the whole works of Appuleius has been published at Leipzig, 1842, by the Hilbergen.

A great number of translations of the Golden Ass are to be found in all the principal European languages. The last English version is that of Thomas Taylor, in one volume 8vo., London 1822, which contains also the tract De D Socratis. [W. R.]

L. APPULEIUS, commonly called APPULEI BARBARIUS, a botanical writer of whose life no paticulars are known, and whose date is rather uncer¬tain. He has sometimes been identified with Appuleius, the author of the “Golden Ass,” and some times with Appuleius Celso (Celsus, Appuleius) but his work is evidently written later than the ti of either of those persons, and probably cannot placed earlier than the fourth century after Chr. It is written in Latin, and entitled Herbarum, APRONIUS. APSINES. 251
de Medicamentibus Herbarum; it consists of one hundred and twenty-eight chapters, and is mostly taken from Dioscorides and Pliny. It was first published at Rome by Jo. Phil. de Lignamine, 4to., without date, but before 1484. It was reprinted a number of times in the sixteenth century, besides being included in two collections of medical writers, and in several editions of the works of Appuleius of Madaura. The last and best edition is that by Ackermann in his Paradisium Medicamentorum Scriptores Antiqui, Norimb. 1788, 8vo. A short work, "De Ponderibus et Mensuris," bearing the name of Appuleius, is to be found at the end of several editions of Meuse’s works. (Haller, Biblioth. Botan.; Choulant, Handbuch der Bücherei für die Ältere Medizin.) [W.A.G.] APPELILUS, I. CAECAIYICUS MINUTIANUS, the author of a work de Orthographia, of which considerable fragments were first published by A. Mai in "Juris Civilis Ante-Justinianei Reliquiae, &c.," Rome, 1823. They were republished by Osann, Darmstadt, 1826, with two other grammatical works of the same author, Aspirationes and de Dipthongis, which also bear the name of Appuleius. Madvig has shewn (de Apuleii Fragment. de Orthogr., Hafniae, 1829), that the treatise de Orthographia is the work of a literary impostor of the fifteenth century. The two other grammatical treatises above mentioned were probably written in the tenth century of our era.

APRIES (A’pris, ’Aplas), a king of Egypt, the 8th of the 26th (Saite) dynasty, the Pharaoh-Hophra of Scripture (lxxx. Osseput), the Vaphres of Mancho, succeeded his father Psammuthis, b.c. 196. The commencement of his reign was distinguished by great success in war. He conquered Palestine and Phoenicia, and for a short time re-established the Egyptian influence in Syria, which had been overthrown by Nebuchadnezzar. He ruled, however, to protect his ally Zedekiah, king of Jerusalem, from the renewed attack of Nebuchadnezzar, who took and destroyed Jerusalem. b.c. 586.) About the same time, in consequence of the failure of an expedition which Apries had sent against Cyrene, his army rebelled and elected a king Amasis, whom Apries had sent to reconcile them. The cruelty of Apries to Patarbmis, whom he had sent to bring back Amasis, and who had died in the attempt, exasperated the principal Egyptians to such a degree, that they deserted him, leaving him only to the protection of an auxiliary force of 30,000 Greeks. With these few the Egyptians who remained faithful to him, Apries encountered Amasis at Memphiis, but his army was overpowered by numbers, and he himself was taken alive. Amasis eated him for some time with kindness, but, length, in consequence of the continued mur- ders of the Egyptians, he suffered him to be put to death. 2. Q. APRONIUS, the chief of the deccemani in the fire during the great conflagration at Vesuvius (b.c. 73—)

3. L. APRONIUS, consul suffectus in A.D. 8 (Fast. Capit.), belonged to the military staff of Drusus (s操s Druss), when the latter was sent to quell the revolt of the army in Germany, A.D. 14. Apronius was sent to Rome with two others to carry the demands of the Germanic tribes against them. He was proconsul, in the government of Africa. He carried on the war against Tacfarinis, and enforced military discipline with great severity. (iii. 21.) He was subsequently the proconsul of lower Germany, when the Frisi revolted, and seems to have lost his life in the war against them. (iv. 73, compared with xi. 19.)

Apronius had two daughters: one of whom was married by her husband (iv. 22); the other was married to Plautius Silvanus, and was murdered otherwise unknown.

25. On account of his services in this war he obtained the honour of the triumphal ornaments. (Tac. Ann. i. 29, 56, 72.) He was in Rome in the following year, a.D. 16 (ii. 32); and four years afterwards (a.d. 20), he succeeded Camillus, as proconsul, in the government of Africa. He carried on the war against Tacfarinis, and enforced military discipline with great severity. (iii. 21.) He was subsequently the proconsul of lower Germany, when the Frisi revolted, and seems to have lost his life in the war against them. (iv. 73, compared with xi. 19.)

Apronius had two daughters: one of whom was married by her husband (iv. 22); the other was married to Plautius Silvanus, and was murdered otherwise unknown.
AQUILA.

Aquila is a name under which Nice (the goddess of victory) was usually represented with wings, and their absence had a sanctuary at Athens. This goddess was of little importance and very short. (Suidas, s. v.; Zonaras, vol. ii. p. 288; Otto, Fragm. hist. i. p. 35.)

AQUILA, L. PONTIUS, a Roman knight, stationed with a few cohorts, in A.D. 50, to protect Cottys, king of the Bosporus, who had received the severed head of the Agathodemos. In the same year, Aquila obtained the praetorian dignity. (Suidas, s. v.; Euseb. Præp. evon. vii. 1; Hieron. Ep. ad Flaminau, vol. iv. pt. 2, p. 255, Mart.)

He translated the Old Testament from Hebrew into Greek, with the purpose of furnishing the Jews who spoke Greek with a version better fitted than the Septuagint to sustain them in their opposition to Christianity. He did not, however, as some have supposed, falsify or pervert the sense of the original, but he translated every word, even the titles, such as Messiah, with the most literal accuracy. This principle was carried to the utmost extent in a second edition, which was named κατά λαβάνθαν. The version was very popular with the Jews in whose synagogues it was read. (Novell. 146.) It was generally disliked by the Christians; but Jerome, though sometimes showing this feeling, at other times speaks most highly of Aquila and his version. (Novell. 2, ad Dominus. i. p. 35; Epist. ad Marcell. iii. p. 96, i. p. 312; Quaest. Hebr. in Genesis. ii. p. 216; Comment. in Jom. c. 8; Comment. in Hos. c. 2.) The version is also praised by Origen. (Comment. in Joh. viii. p. 131; Respons. ad Africana. p. 234.)

Only a few fragments remain, which have been published in the editions of the Hexapla and Diehl's Aequatula, 1746. [P. S.]

AQUILA, JULIUS (GALLUS?), a Roman jurist, from whose liber responsorum two fragments concerning tutores are preserved in the Digest. In the Florentine Index he is named Gallus Aquila probably from an error of the scribe in reading Ἀκλαίων for Ἀκλαίων. This has occasioned Julius Aquila to be confounded with Aquillus Gallus. His date is uncertain, though he probably lived under or before the reign of Septimius Severus, a.d. 193-8; for in Dig. 26. tit. 7, s. 34 he gives an opinion upon a question which seems to have been first settled by Severus. (Dig. 27. tit. 3. s. 1 § 3.) By most of the historians of Roman law it is referred to a later period. He may possibly be the same person with Lucius Julius Aquilla, who wrote de Itrrrosa disciplinae, or with that Aquil whom, under Septimius Severus, was praefect of Egypt, and became remarkable by his persecution of the Christians. (Majanius, Comm. ad 30 Jorii. fragm. vol. ii. p. 289; Otto, in Proef. Theol. i. p. 13; Zimmerm. Röm. Rechts-Geschichte, vol. iii. p. 103.) [J. T. G.]

AQUILA, L. PONTIUS, tribune of the plebe probably in B.C. 45, was the only member of the college that did not rise to Caesar as he passed along the tribunes' seats in his triumph. (Suet. Jul. ced.
AQUILLIA.

78. He was one of Caesar's murderers, and afterwards served as a legate of Brutus at the beginning of B.C. 43 at Chalpine Gaul. He defeated T. Munatius Plancus, and drove him out of Pollentia, but was killed himself in the battle fought against Antony by Hirtius. He was honoured with a statue. (Appian, B.C. ii. 112; Dion Cass. xvi. 39, 40; Cic. Phil. xi. 6, xii. 12, ad Fam. x. 53.) Pontius Aquila was a friend of Cicero, and is frequently mentioned by him in his letters. (Ad Fam. v. 2—4, vii. 2, 3.)

AQUILA ROMANUS, a rhetorician, who lived after Alexander Numinus but before Julius Rufinus, probably in the third century after Christ, the author of a small work intitled, de Patriarca, Scnitentiarum et Elocutionum, which is usually printed with Rutillus Lupus. The best edition is by Ruhnken, Lugd. Bat. 1768, reprinted with additional notes by Frotcher, Lips. 1831. Rufinus states, that Aquila took the materials of this work from one of Alexander Numinus on the same subject. [See p. 128, a.]

AQUILA, VUDIUS, commander of the thirteenth legion, one of Otho's generals, was present in the battle in which Otho's troops were defeated by those of Vitellius, A.D. 70. He subsequently espoused Vespasion's party. (Tac. Hist. ii. 44, iii. 7.)

Aquila Seve'rus, R. Julia, the wife of the Emperor Elagabalus, whom he married after divorcing his former wife, Paula. This marriage gave great offence at Rome, since Aquila was a bastard virgin; but Elagabalus said that he had contrived it in order that divine children might be born from himself, the pontifex maximus, and a bastard virgin. Dion Cassius says, that he did not live with her long; but that after marrying three others successively, he again returned to her. It appears from coins that he could not have married her before A.D. 221. (Dion Cass. Ixxxix. 9; Herodian. v. 6; Eckhel, vii. p. 259.)

ARACHNE.

B. C. 44, and says, in another, that young Quintus would not endure her as a step-mother. (Ad Att. xiv. 13, 17.)

AQUILLIA GENS, patrician and plebeian. On coins and inscriptions the name is almost always written Aquiliius, but in manuscripts generally with a single l. This gens was of great antiquity. Two of the Aquilii are mentioned among the Roman nobles who conspired to bring back the Tarquins (Liv. ii. 4); and a member of the house, C. Aquiliius Tuscus, is mentioned as consul as early as B.C. 487. The cognomens of the Aquilii under the republic are Corvus, Cassius, Florus, Galus, Mithridates: for those who bear no surname, see Aquilius.

AQUILIUS. 1. M. Aquilius, M. F., M. N. Consul b. C. 129, put an end to the war which had been carried on against Antonius, the son of Eumenes of Pergamus, and which had been almost terminated by his predecessor, Perperna. On his return to Rome, he was accused by P. Lentulus of maladministration in his province, but was acquitted by bribing the judges. (Florus, ii. 29; Justin. xxxvi. 4; Vell. Pat. ii. 4; Cic. de Nat. Deor. ii. 5, Div. in Casoul. 21; Appian, B.C. i. 22.) He obtained a triumph on account of his successes in Asia, but not till n. c. 126. (Past. Capitol.)

2. M. Aquilius M. F. M. N., probably a son of the preceding, consul in n. c. 101, conducted the war against the slaves in Sicily, who had a second time revolted under Athenian. Aquilius completely subdued the insurgents, and triumphed on his return to Rome in 100. (Florus, iii. 19; Liv. Epit. 69; Dio. xxxvi. Ed. i; Cic. in Verr. iii. 54, v. 2; Past. Capitol.) In 98, he was accused by L. Fufius of maladministration in Sicily; he was defended by the orator M. Antonius, and, though there were strong proofs of his guilt, was acquitted on account of his bravery in the war. (Cic. Brut. 52, de Off. ii. 14, pro Flacc. 39, de Orat. ii. 28, 47.) In n. c. 86, he went into Asia as one of the consular legates to prosecute the war against Mithridates and his allies. He was defeated near Protostachium, and was afterwards delivered up to Mithridates and his allies, who treated him in the most barbarous manner, and eventually put him to death by pouring molten gold down his throat. (Appian, Mith. 7, 19, 21; Liv. Epit. 77; Vell. Pat. ii. 18; Cic. pro Leg. Man. 5; Athen. v. p. 213, b.)

M. Aquilius Julia'Nus. [Julianus]

AQUILLIUS RE'GULUS. [Regulus]

AQUILLIUS SEVE'RUS. [Severus]

AQUINIUS, a very inferior poet, a contemporary of Catullus and Cicero. (Catull. xiv. 18; Cie. Tusc. v. 22.)

M. Aquinius, a Pompeian, who took part in the African war against Caesar. After the defeat of the Pompeians, he was pardoned by Caesar, n. c. 47. (De Bell. Afric. 57, 39.)

ARABIA'NUS (Apa'cios), an eminent Christian writer, about 196 A.D., composed some books on Christian doctrine, which are lost. (Buech. H. E. v. 27; Hieron. de Vitr. Hist. c. 51.) [P. S.]

ARABIU'SIUS SCHOLASTICIUS (Apodios Zya'la'rturos), the author of seven epigrams in the Greek Anthology, most of which are upon works of art, lived probably in the reign of Justinian. (Jacobs, xiii. p. 856.) [P. S.]

ARACHNE, a Lydian maiden, daughter of Idmon of Colophon, who was a famous dyer in purple. His daughter was greatly skilled in the art of weaving, and, proud of her talent, she even ventured to challenge Athena to compete with her. Arachne produced a piece of cloth in which the amours of the gods were woven, and as Athena could find no fault with it, she tore the work to pieces, and Arachne in despair hung herself. The goddess loosed the rope and saved her life, but the rope was changed into a cobweb and Arachne herself into a spider (παράγον), the animal most odious to Athena. (Ov. Met. vi. 1—145; Virg. Georg. iv. 546.) This fable seems to suggest the idea that mans learnt the art of weaving from the spider, and that it was invented in Lydia. [L. S.]

ARAETHYREA (Ἀραθυρέα), a daughter of Aras, an autochthon who was believed to have built Arantes, the most ancient town in Phliasia. She had a brother called Aoris, and is said to have been fond of the chase and warlike pursuits. When she died, her brother called the country of Phliasia after her Amethyra. (Hom. II. ii. 571; Strab. viii. p. 382.) She was the mother of Phlas. The monuments of Arachthrea and her brother, consisting of round pillars, were still extant in the time of Pausanias; and before the mysteries of Demeter were commenced at Phlias, the people always invoked Aras and his two children with their female train towards their monuments. (Paus. ii. 12. §§ 4—6.)

ARACUS (Ἀρακός), Ephor, b. c. 409, (Hill. ii. 3. § 10,), was appointed admiral of the Laeacedoeman fleet in b. c. 405, with Lysander for vice-admiral (στεφαλέας), who was to have the real power, but who had not the title of admirals (ναυάρχων), because the laws of Sparta did not allow the same person to hold this office twice. (Plut. Lyce. 7; Xen. Hell. ii. 1. § 7; Diod. xiii. 100; Paus. x. 9. § 4.) In 398 he was sent into Asia as one of the commissioners to inspect the state of things there, and to prolong the command of Dercyllidas (iii. 2. § 6); and in 386 he was one of the ambassadors sent to Athens. (vii. 5. § 33, where ‘Ἀρακος should be read instead of ‘Ἀρακος.)

ARACYNTHIAS (Ἀρακύνθια), a surname of Aphrodite, derived from mount Arachynthus, the position of which is a matter of uncertainty, and on which she had a temple. (Rhihian, ap. Steph. Byz. s. v. ‘Ἀράκυθος.)

ARAROS. [Araethyrea.]

ARAS. (Ἀράς.)

ARAS (Ἀρᾶς), a Mede, and a friend of the elder Cyrus from his youth, contends with Cyrus that love has no power over him, but shortly afterwards refutes himself by falling in love with Panthica, whom Cyrus had committed to his charge. [Ἀράδατας.] He is afterwards sent to Creousa as a deserter, to inspect the condition of the enemy, and subsequently commands the right wing of Cyrus' army in the battle with Creousa. (Xen. Cyr. v. i. § 1, 8, &c., vi. 1. § 38, &c., 3. § 14, 21.)

ARATUS (Ἀράτος), of Sicyon, lived from b. c. 271 to 213. The life of this remarkable man, as afterwards of Philemon and Lycurgus, was devoted to an attempt to unite the several Greek states together, and by this union to assert the national independence against the dangers with which it was threatened by Macedonia and Rome.

Aratus was the son of Oeniades, and was born at Sicyon, b. c. 271. On the murder of his father by Abantidas [Ἀμάντιδας. Aratus was saved from the general extermination of the family by Soso, his uncle's widow, who conveyed him to Argos, where he was brought up. When he had reached the age of twenty, he gained possession of his native city by the help of some Argians, and the cooperation of the remainder of his party in Sicyon itself, without loss of life, and deprived the usurper Nicocles of his power, b. c. 251. (Comp. Polyb. ii. 43.) Through the influence of Aratus, Sicyon now joined the Achaean league, and Aratus himself sailed to Egypt to obtain Ptolemy's alliance, in which he succeeded. In b. c. 245 he was elected general (στρατηγὸς) of the league, and a second time in 243. In the latter of these years he took the citadel of Corinth from the Macedonian garrison, and induced the Corinthian people to join the league. It was chiefly through his intravenous mentality that Megara, Troezen, Epidaurus, Argos Cleonea, and Megalopolis, were soon afterward added to it. It was about this time that the Aetolians, who had made a pondering expedition into Peloponnesus, were stopped by Aratus a Pollene (Polyb. iv. 8), being surprised at the end of that town, and 700 of their number put to the sword. But at this very time, at which the power of the league seemed most secure, the seeds of it ruin were laid. The very prospect, which to the people, who passed a public censure on his conduct, and Sparta was placed at the head of a c federacy, fully able to dictate to the whole of Greece.

—I. TROZEN, Epidaurus, Argos, Hermion, Pellene, Caphyae, Phlius, Pheneus, and Corinth, in which the Achaean garrison kept only the citadel.—It was now necessary to call on Antigonus for the promised aid. Permission to pass through Aetolia having been refused, he embarked his army in transports, and, sailing by Cephisus, landed his army near the isthmus, when Aratus was occupied with the siege of Sicyon. (Polyb. ii. 52.) The latter immediately raised the siege, and hastened to defend Corinth; but no sooner was he engaged there, than Aratus, by a master-stroke of policy, gained the assistance of a party in Argos to place the Laconian garrison in a state of siege. Cleomenes hastened thither, leaving Corinth in the hands of Antigonus; but arriving too late to take effectual measures against Aratus, while Antigonus was in his rear, he retreated to Mantinea and thence home. Antigonus meanwhile was by Aratus' influence elected general of the league, and made Corinth and Sicyon his winter quarters. The materials are said to be taken almost wholly from Aristotle's "Meteorologica," from the work of Theophrustus, "De Signis Ventorum," and from Hesiod. (Buhle, vol. ii. p. 471.) Nothing is said in either poem about Astronomy in the proper sense of the word.

The style of these two poems is distinguished by the elegance and accuracy resulting from a study of ancient models; but it wants originality and poetic elevation; and variety of matter is excluded by the nature of the subjects. (See Quintil. x. 1.)

That they became very popular both in the Graecian and Roman world (comp. Or. Am. i. 15. 16) is proved by the number of commentaries and Latin translations. The introduction to the latter is given by Achilles Tatius, the Commentary of Hipparchus in three books, and another attributed to Petavius to Achilles Tatius, are printed in the Umlamogium, with a list of other Commentators (p. 267), which includes the names of Aristarchus, Generalissimus, and Enatosthenes. Parts of three poetical Latin translations are preserved. One written by Cicero when very young (Cic. de Nat. Deor. ii. 41), one by Caesar Germanicus, the grandson of Augustus, and one by Festus Avienus. The earliest edition of Aratus is that of Aldus. (Ven. 1459, fol.) The principal later ones are by Grosius (Lugd. Bat. 1600, 4to.), Buhle (Lips. 1793, 8vo., in the three Latin versions), Matthiae (Francof. 1817, 8vo.), Voss (Heidel. 1824, 8vo., with a German poetical version), Buttmann (Berol. 1826, 8vo.), and Bekker. (Berol. 1828, 8vo.)

(Arboles), of Cnidas, the author of a history of Egypt. (Anonym. Vit. Aedul.)

ARBACES (Aphidēs). 1. The founder of the Median empire, according to the account of Ctesias (p. 303), Buhle (Lips. 1793, 8vo.), Voss (Heidel. 1824, 8vo., with a German poetical version), Buttmann (Berol. 1826, 8vo.), and Bekker. (Berol. 1828, 8vo.)

(Arboricus). 2. A commander in the army of Artaxerxes which fought against his brother Cyrus, n. c. 401 (Fabric. Hist. de l'Astron. Ancien.)

Arborius, Aemilius Magnus, the author of a poem in ninety-two lines in elegiac verse, entitled "Ad Nympnum nimis cultum," occasioned a great many expressions taken from the older poets, and bears all the traces of artificial labour which characterizes the later Latin poetry. It is printed in the Anthology of Beumann (iii. 275) and Meyer (Ep. 262), and Wernsdorff's Poet. Lat. Minor. (iii. p. 217.)

The style and elegance of these two poems are such as to show that the author was a rhetorician at Tolosa in Gaul, and the manner of life of the poet describes the maternal uncle of Ausonius, who speaks of him with great praise, and mentions that he enjoy

Arborius.
ARCA'DIUS, bishop of Constantia in Cyprus, wrote a life of Simeon Stylita the younger, sur-sooner was Tribigildus informed of it, than he demanded the head of Eutropins before he would enter into negotiations; and the emperor, persuaded by Eudoxia, gave up his minister. St. Chrysostom, afraid of Arianism, pleaded the cause of Eutropins, but in vain; the minister was banished to Cyprus, and soon afterwards beheaded. (399.) Upon this, the Goths left Phrygia and returned to Europe, where they stayed partly in the neighbourhood of Constantinople, and partly within the walls of the city. Gainas, after having ordered the Roman troops to leave the capital, demanded liberty of divine service for the Goths, who were Arians; and as St. Chrysostom energetically opposed such a concession to heresy, Gainas tried to set fire to the imperial palace. But the people of Constantinople took up arms, and Gainas was forced to evacuate the city with those of the Goths who had not been slain by the inhabitants. Crossing the Bosporus, he suffered a severe defeat by the imperial fleet, and fled to the banks of the Danube, where he was killed by the Huns, who sent his head to Constantinople.

After his fall the incompetent emperor became entirely dependent upon his wife Eudoxia, who assumed the title of "Augusta," the empress hitherto having only been styled "Nobilissima." Through her influence St. Chrysostom was exiled in 404, and popular troubles preceded and followed his fall. As to Arcadius, he was a sincere adherent of the orthodox church. He confirmed the laws of his father, which were intended for its protection; he interdicted the public meetings of the heretics; he purged his palace from heretical officers and servants; and in 396 he ordered that all the buildings in which the heretics used to hold their meetings should be confiscated. During his reign great numbers of pagans adopted the Christian religion. But his reign is stigmatized by a cruel and unjust law concerning high treason, the work of Eutropius, which was issued in 397. By this law, which was a most tyrannical extension of the Lex Julia Majestatis, the principal civil and military officers of the emperor were identified with his sacred person, and offences against them, either by deeds or by thoughts, were punished as crimes of high treason. (Cod. i. tit. 5. s. 5; Cod. Theod. i. tit. 14. s. 3.) Arcadius died on the 1st of May, 408, leaving the empire to his son Theodosius II., who was a minor. (Cedrenus, vol. i. pp. 574—586, ed. Bonn, pp. 327—334, ed. Paris; Socrates, Hist. Eccles. v. 10, vi. pp. 272, 305—344, ed. Reading; Sozomenos, viii. pp. 323—363; Theophanes, pp. 63—68, ed. Paris; Theodoret. v. 32, &c., p. 205, ed. COIN OF ARCA'DIUS.

ARCA'DIUS, bishop of Constantin in Cyprus, wrote a life of Simeon Stylita the younger, surnamed Thaumastorita, several passages from which are quoted in the Acts of the second council of Nice. A few other works, which exist in MS., are attributed to him. (Fabric, Bib. Graec. xi. pp. 576, 579, xii. p. 179.) Cave (Diss. de Sosp. Incert. Ant. p. 4) places him before the eighth century. [P. S.]

ARCADIUS (Ἀρκαίας), an Armenian, a Greek grammarian of uncertain date, but who did not live before 200 A.D., was the author of several grammatical works, of which Suidas mentions περὶ ὁμονοματικίας, περὶ συντάξεων τῶν τῶν μερῶν, and ὑπονοματικίας. A work of his on the accents (περὶ τῶν) has come down to us, and was first published by Barker from a manuscript at Paris. (Leipsic, 1820.) It is also included in the first volume of Diodorus’s Graumat. Graec. Lips. 1823.

ARCA (Ἀρκα). 1. The ancestor and eponymic hero of the Arcadians, from whom the country and its inhabitants derived their name. He was a son of Zeus by Callisto, a companion of Artemis. Among the tales told of the children of his mother [CALLISTO], Zeus gave the child to Maia, and called him Arcas. (Apollod. iii. 8, § 2.) Arcas became afterwards by Leaneira or Meganeira the father of Elatus and Aphixeas. (Apollod. iii. 9, § 3.) According to Higginus (Fab. 176, Post. Astr. ii. 4) Arcas was the son of Lycaon, whose flesh the father set before Zeus, to try his divine character. Zeus upset the table (παγετήριον) which bore the dish, and destroyed the house of Lycaon by lightning, but restored Arcas to life. When Arcas had grown up, he built on the site of his father’s house the town of Tripaeus. When Arcas once during the chase pursued his mother, who was metamorphosed into a she-bear, as far as the sanctuary of the Lycean Zeus, which no mortal was allowed to enter, Zeus placed both of them among the stars. (Ov. Met. xii. 410, &c.) According to Pausanias (ix. 39, § 2) his remains were brought back to Arcadia, where a monument was erected to his name at Mantineia, whither he was shewn at Mantineia, whither he divided his kingdom. He had one illegitimate son, Autolycus, whose mother is not mentioned. The tomb of Arcas was shewn at Mantineia, whither his remains had been carried from mount Maenius at the command of the Delphic oracle. (Paus. viii. 9, § 2.) Statues of Arcas and his family were dedicated at Delphi by the inhabitants of Tegea. (x. 9, § 3.)

2. A surname of Hermes. (Lucan, Phars. ix. 601; Martial, x. 34, 6; Hesmer.) [L. S.]

ARCHIAEAS (Ἀρχιαῖας), a son of Mithridates, joined Neoptolemus and Archelaus, the generals of his father, with 10,000 horse, which he brought from the lesser Armenia, at the commencement of the war with the Romans, b.c. 88. He took an active part in the great battle fought near the river Anemius or Amnias (see Strab. xii. p. 562) in Paphlagonia, in which Nicomedes, the king of Bithynia, was defeated. Two years afterwards, b.c. 86, he invaded Macedon with a separate army, and completely conquered the country. He then proceeded to march against Sulla, but died on the way at Tissaem (Ptol. i. 41.) (Appian, Mithr. 17, 18, 35, 41.)

ARCHIAS (Ἀρχιαῖος), a daughter of Thamnus and sister of Iris, who in the contest of the gods with the Titans sided with the latter. Zeus afterwards punished her for this by throwing her into Tartarus and depriving her of her wings, which were given to Thetis at her marriage with Peleus. Thetis afterwards fixed these wings to the feet of her son Achilles, who was therefore called παραπτώμα. (Ptolem, Hecat. 6.) [L. S.]

ARCIERIADES (Ἀρκείριάδης), a patricymic from Arcadia, the father of Laerius, who as well as his son Odysseus are designated by the name of Arcisiades. (Hom. Od. xxiv. 270, iv. 755.) [L. S.]

ARCESIUS (Ἀρκεσίους), a son of Zeus and Euryodia, husband of Chalcimedes and father of Laerius. (Hom. Od. xxiv. 182, xxi. 118; Apollod. i. 9, § 16; Ov. Met. xii. 143; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1796.) According to Hyginus (Fab. 169), he was a son of Cephalus and Prorid, and according to others, of Cephalus and a she-bear. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1961, comp. p. 1756.) [L. S.]

ARCESILAUS (Ἀρκεσίλαος), a son of Mnymerces, son of Manynride of Salamis in Cyprus. Antoninus Libenius (39) relates of him and Arisonoe precisely the same story which Ovid (Met. xiv. 695, &c.) relates of Anaxarete and Iphes. [ANAXARETE]. [L. S.]

ARCESILATUS (Ἀρκεσίλαους), 1. The name of four kings of Cyprus. [BATTS and BATTHIALAE.] 2. The murderer of Archagathus, the son of Agathocles, when the latter left Africa, b.c. 307. Arcesilas had formerly been a friend of Agathocles. (Justin, xxii. 8; AGATHOCLES, p. 64.)

3. One of the ambassadors sent to Rome by the Lacedaemonian exiles about b.c. 183, who was intercepted by pirates and killed. (Polyb. xxxiv. 11.)

4. Of Megalopolis, was one of those who dissuaded the Achaean league from assisting Perseus in the war against the Romans in b.c. 170. In the following years he was one of the ambassadors sent by the league to attempt the reconciliation of Antiochus Epiphanes and Ptolemy. (Polyb. xxxviii. 6, xiii. 10.)

ARCESILATUS (Ἀρκεσίλαος) or ARCESILAS, the founder of the new Academy, flourished towards the close of the third century before Christ. (Comp. Strab. i. p. 150.) He was the son of Seuthes or Skythius (Diog. Laërt. iv. 18), and born at Pitane in Acolis. His early education was entrusted to Autolycus, a mathematician, with whom he migrated to Sardis. Afterwards, at the wish of his elder brother and guardian, Moircas, he came to Athens to study rhetoric; but becoming the disciple first of Theophrastus and afterwards of Crantor, he found his inclination led to philosophical pursuits. Not content, however, with any single school, he left his early masters and studied under sceptical and dialectic philosophers; and the line of Aristotle upon him. Pseudo-Eudem, Euseb. Nicom. et al. Sophokles, described the course of his early education, as well as the discordant character of some of his later views. He was not without reputation as a poet, and Diogenes Laertius (iv. 30) has preserved two epigrams of his, one of which is addressed to Attas-lius, king of Pergamum, and records his admiration of Homer and Pindar, of whose works he was an enthusiastic reader. Several of his puns and witicisms have been preserved in his life by the same writer, which give the idea of an accomplished man of the world rather than a grave philosopher.
Many traits of character are also recorded of him, some of them of a pleasing nature. The greatness of his personal character is shewn by the imitation of his peculiarities, into which his admirers are said insensibly to have fallen. His oratory is described as of an attractive and persuasive kind, the effect of it being enhanced by the frankness of his demeanour. Although his means were not large, his resources being chiefly derived from king Euse-menes, many tales were told of his unassuming generosity. But it must be admitted, that there was another side to the picture, and his enemies accused him of the grossest profligacy—a charge which he only answered by citing the example of Aristippus—and it must be confessed, that the accusation is slightly confirmed by the circumstance that he died in the 76th year of his age from a fit of excessive drunkenness; on which event an epigram has been preserved by Diogenes.

It was on the death of Cruiser that Arcesilaus succeeded to the chair of the Academy, in the history of which he makes so important an era. As, however, he committed nothing to writing, his opinions were imperfectly known to his contemporaries, and can now only be gathered from the confused statements of his opponents. There seems to have been a gradual decline of philosophy since the time of Plato and Aristotle: the same subjects were a statue of Venus Genetrix in the forum of Plato and their own views. (Cic. Acad. ii. 24.)

The Stoics were the chief opponents of Arceslaus; he attacked their doctrine of a convincing conception (καταληηγητική φωστραία) as understood to be a mean between science and opinion—a mean which he asserted could not exist, and was merely the interpolation of a name. (Cic. Acad. ii. 24.)

It involved in fact a contradiction in terms, as the idea of φωστραία implied the possibility of false as well as true conceptions of the same object.

It is a question of some importance, in what the scepticism of the New Academy was distinguished from that of the followers of Pyrrhon. Admitting the formula of Arcesilaus, "that he knew nothing, not even his own ignorance," to be an exposition of his real sentiments, it was impossible in one sense that scepticism could proceed further: but the New Academy does not seem to have doubted
the existence of truth in itself, only our capacities for obtaining it. It differed also from the principles of the pure sceptic in the practical tendency of disciplines: while the object of the one was the attainment of perfect equanimity (σωφρόνησι), the other seems rather to have retired from the barren field of speculation to practical life, and to have acknowledged some vestiges of a moral law within, at least but a probable guide, the possession of which, however, formed the real distinction between the sage and the fool. Slight as the difference may appear between the speculative statements of the two schools, a comparison of the lives of their founders and their respective successors leads us to the conclusion, that a practical moderation was the characteristic of the New Academy, to which the Scep-tics were wholly strangers. (Sext. Empiricus, ad Math. ii. 158, Pyrrh. Hypotyp. i. 3, 226.) [B.J.]

ARCESILAUS, artists. 1. A sculptor who made a statue of Diana, celebrated by an ode of Simpides. (Diod. Laerit. iv. 45.) He may, therefore, have flourished about 460 B. C.

2. Of Paros, was, according to Pliny (xxxv. 39), one of the first encaustic painters, and a contemporary of Polygnotus (about 460 B. c.).

3. A painter, the son of the sculptor Tissareus, flourished about 280 or 270 B. C. (Plin. xxxv. 40.
§ 43.) Pausanias (i. 1. § 3) mentions a painter of the same name, whose picture of Leosthenes and his sons was to be seen in the Peiraeus.

Though Leosthenes was killed in the war of Athens against Lamia, n. c. 323, Silig argues, that the fact of his sons being included in the picture fa-lourished about 500 B. c. (Diod. Laerit. iv. 45.)

4. A sculptor in the first century B. c., who,
according to Pliny, was held in high esteem at Rome, was especially celebrated by M. Varro, and was intimate with L. Lentulus. Among his works were a statue of Venus Genetrix in the forum of Cicero, and a marble statue surrounded by winged Cupids, who were sporting with her. Of the latter

work the mosaics in the Mus. Borb. vii. 61, and the Mus. Capit. iv. 19, are supposed to be copies. There were some statues by him of centaurs carrying nymphs, in the collection of Asinius Pollio. He received a talent from Octavius, a Roman knight, for the model of a bowl ( crater ), and was engaged by Lucullus to make a statue of Felicissimus for 60 sesteria; but the deaths both of the artist and of his patron prevented the completion of the work. (Plin. xxxv. 45, xxxvi. 4 §§ 10, 13: the reading Archæites, in § 10, ought, almost undoubtedly, to be Aræides or Aræisai.)

ARCHAÎANA'CTIDAE ('Aρχαῖανακτίδαι). The name of a race of kings who reigned in the Cimmerian Bosporus forty-two years, b. c. 450—438. (Diod. xii. 31, with Wesseleins note.)

ARCH'AGATHUS ('Αρχαγαθός). 1. The son of Agathocles, accompanied his father in his expedition into Africa, b. c. 310. While there he narrowly escaped being put to death in a tumult of the soldiers, occasioned by his having murdered Lycicus, who reproached him with committing incest with his step-mother Alcina. When Agathocles was summoned from Africa by the state of affairs in Sicily, he left Archagathus behind in command of the army. He met at first with some success, but was afterwards defeated three times, and obliged to take refuge in Tunis. Agathocles returned to his assistance; but a mutiny of the soldiers soon compelled him to leave Africa again, and Archagathus and his brother were put to death by the troops in revenge, b. c. 307. (Diod. xx. 33, 37—61; Justin, xxii. 8.)

2. The son of the preceding, described as a youth of great bravery and daring, murdered Agathocles, the son of Agathocles, that he might succeed his grandfather. He was himself killed by Menon. (Diod. xxi. 16.)

ARCHAGATHUS ('Αρχαγαθός), a Peloponnesian, the son of Lysanias, who settled at Rome as a practitioner of medicine, b. c. 219, and, according to Cassius Hemia (as quoted by Pliny, Hist. Nat. xxix. 6), was the first person who made it a distinct profession in that city. He was received in the first instance with great respect, but his practice was observed to be so severe, that he soon excited the dislike of the people at large, and produced a complete disgust to the profession generally. The practice of Archagathus seems to have been almost exclusively surgical, and to have consisted, in a great measure, in the use of the knife and powerful caustic applications. (Bostock, Hist. of Med.)

ARCH'EBULUS ('Αρχέβουλος). Of Thbes, a lyric poet, who appears to have lived about the year b. c. 289, as Euphrasius is said to have been instructed by him in poetry. (Suid. s. v. Εὔφρασιος.) A particular kind of verse which was frequently used by other lyric poets, was called after him. (Hephaest. Enchir. p. 27.) Not a fragment of his poetry is extant. (L. S.)

ARCH'EDEMUS or ARCHÉDAMUS ('Αρχηδάμως or Αρχηδάμως). 1. A popular leader at Athens, took the first step against the generals who had gained the battle of Arginusae, b. c. 406, by imposing a fine on Erasinides, and calling him to account in a court of justice for some public money which he had received in the Hellepont. (Xen. Hell. vii. 1 § 2.) This seems to be the same Archedemus of whom Xenophon speaks in the Memorabilia (ii. 9), as originally poor, but of considerable talents both for speaking and public business, and who was employed by Criton to protect him and his friends from the attacks of scyphophants. It appears that Archedemus was a foreigner, and obtained the franchise by fraud, for which he was attacked by Aristophanes (Ran. 419) and by Eupolis in the Baptau. (Schol. ad Aristoph. l. c.) Both Aristophanes (Rum. 588) and Lysias (c. Alcib. p. 536, ed. Reiske) call him bleary-eyed (γαλαξίων). 2. Ο Παλαθριανος, mentioned by Aeschines (c. Cleon. p. 531, ed. Reiske), should be distinguished from the preceding.

3. An Aetolian (called Archidamus by Livy), who commanded the Aetolian troops which assisted the Romans in their war with Philip. In b. c. 199 he compelled Philip to raise the siege of Thaumaci (Liv. xxxii. 4), and took an active part in the battle of Cynoscephalae, b. c. 197, in which Philip was defeated. (Polyb. xvii. 4.)

4. Of Tarsus, a Stoic philosopher (Strab. xiv. 741; Diog. Laert. vii. 40, 68, 84, 88), one of whose works, Περί Φυσικάς καὶ Περί Τραγωδιών, are mentioned by Diogenes Laertius. (vii. 55, 134.) He is probably the same person as the Archedemus, whom Plutarch (de Euxilo, p. 605) calls an Athenian, and who, he states, went into the country of the Parthians and left behind him the Stoic succession at Babylon. Archedemus is also mentioned by Cicero (Acad. Quaest. ii. 47), Seneca (Epist. 121), and other ancient writers.

ARCHÉDE'NICES (Άρχεδενίκες), daughter of Hippias the Pelissartid, and given in marriage to him after her father's death by Acharnaeus to Acastides, son of Hippocles, the tyrant of Lamassae. She is famous for the epitaph given in Thucydides, and ascribed by Aristotle to Simonides, which told that, with husband, and sons in sovereign power, still she retained her meekness. (Thuc. vi. 59; Arist. Rhet. i. 9.)

ARCHÉDICUS (Άρχεδίκος), an Athenian comic poet of the new comedy, who wrote, at the instigation of Timaeus, against Demochares, the nephew of Demosthenes, and supported Antipater and the Macedonian party. The titles of two of his plays are preserved, Διαμαρτύρων and Σωκράτων. He flourished about 302 b. c. (Suidas, s. v.; Athen. xi. p. 252 f., viii. pp. 293 e, 294 a, b. x. p. 467 c, vii. p. 610 f.; Polyb. xii. 13.)

ARCHEGETES (Άρχηγετη). 1. A surname of Apollo, under which he was worshipped in several places, as at Naxos in Sicily (Thuc. iii. 8 Pind. Pyth. v. 80), and at Megara. (Paus. i. 42 § 5.) The name has reference either to Apollo as the leader and protector of colonies, or as the founder of towns in general, in which case the impor of the name is nearly the same as Βοίων πατρός.
ARCHELAUS.

2. A surname of Asclepius, under which he was worshipped at Tithorea in Phocis. (Plut. x. 32. § 8.) [L. S.]

ARCHELAUS (Ἀρχελάος), a son of Temeon, a Heracleid, who, when expelled by his brothers, fled to king Cisseus in Macedonia. Cisseus promised him the succession to his throne and the hand of his daughter, if he would assist him against his neighbouring enemies. Archelaus performed what was asked of him; but when, after the defeat of the enemy, he claimed the fulfilment of the promise, Cisseus had a hole dug in the earth, filled it with burning coals, and covered it over with branches, that Archelaus might fall into it. The plan was discovered, and Cisseus himself was thrown into the pit by Archelaus, who then fled, but at the command of Apollo built the town of Agaeus on a spot to which he was led by a goat. According to some accounts, Alexander the Great was a descendant of Archelaus. (Hygin. Fab. 219.) Two other mythical personages of this name occur in Apollodorus. (ii. § 5, 4. § 5, &c.) [L. S.]

ARCHELAUS (Ἀρχελάος), the author of a poem consisting of upwards of three hundred barous Greek iambics, entitled Ἀρχελάος, Deserca Arte (sc. Chrysopoeia). (Var. Hist. 2. 4.) This contains a plan of a journey from Greece to Italy and Africa; and its publication appears to have been occasioned by the vanity of Archelaus, and a promise of that of king should he be found to deserve it. This work was translated both in its main points by Augustus, and in the division of the kingdom Archelaus received Judaea, Samaria, and Idumaea, with the title of Ethnarch, and a promise of that of king should he be found to deserve it. (Ant. xvii. 9, 11; Bell. Jud. i. 23.)

ARCHELAUS, bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia, wrote a work against the heresy of the Messalians, which is referred to by Photius. (Cod. 52.)

ARCHELAUS, bishop of Cappadocia. [Archelaus, general of Mithridates, No. 4, p. 265.]

ARCHELAUS, bishop of Carrhae in Mesopotamia, A. D. 278, held a public dispute with the heretic Manes, an account of which he published in Syrian. The work was soon translated both into Greek and into Latin. (Socrates, H. E. i. 22; Hieron. de Vir. Illustri. 73.) A large fragment of the Latin version was published by Valerius, in his edition of Socrates and Sozomen. The same version, most entire, was again printed, with the fragments of the Greek version, by Zacagninus, in his Collect. Monument. Vet. Rom. 1698, and by Fabricius in his edition of Hippolytus. [P. S.]

ARCHELAUS (Ἀρχελάος), a Greek geographer, who wrote a work in which he described all the countries which Alexander the Great had traversed. (Diog. Laert. ii. 17.) This statement would lead us to conjecture, that Archelaus was a contemporary of Alexander, and perhaps accompanied him on his expeditions. But as the work is completely lost, nothing certain can be said about the matter. In like manner, it must remain uncertain whether this Archelaus is the same as the one whose “Euboei” are quoted by Harpocrates (s. v. Ἔβοβεις), where however Manucius reads Archaeoeides, and whose works on rivers and stones are mentioned by Plutarch (de Plac. i. 9) and Stobaeus. (Florileg. i. 15.) [L. S.]

ARCHELAUS (Ἀρχελάος), son of Herod the Great by Malthace, a Samaritan woman, is called by Dion Cassius Πρῶτος Παλαιογνύς, and was whole brother to Herod Antipas. (Dion Cass. lvi. 27; Joseph. Ant. xvii. 1. § 9, 10. § 1; Bell. Jud. i. 28. § 4.) The will of Herod, which had at first been so drawn up as to exclude Archelaus in consequence of the false representations of his eldest brother Antipater, was afterward altered in his favour on the discovery of the latter's treachery [see p. 203]; and, on the death of Herod, he was saluted as king by the army. This title, however, he declined till it should be ratified by Augustus; and, in a speech to the people after his father's funeral, he made large professions of his moderation and his willingness to redress all grievances. (Joseph. Ant. xvii. 4. § 3, 6. § 1, 8. §§ 2—4; Bell. Jud. i. 31. § 32. § 7, 33. §§ 7—9.) Immediately after this a serious sedition occurred, which Archelaus quenched in blood (Ant. xviii. 9. §§ 1—3; Bell. Jud. i. 33); and he then proceeded to Rome to obtain the confirmation of his father's will. Here he was opposed by Antipas, who was supported by Herod's sister Salome and her son Antipater, and ambassadors also came from the Jews to complain of the cruelty of Archelaus, and to entreat that their country might be annexed to Syria and ruled by Roman governors. The will of Herod was, however, ratified in its main points by Augustus, and in the division of the kingdom Archelaus received Judaea, Samaria, and Idumaea, with the title of Ethnarch, and a promise of that of king should he be found to deserve it. (Ant. xvii. 9, 11; Bell. Jud. ii. 2, 6; Euseb. Hist. Ecc. i. 9; comp. Ant. xvii. 6—27.) On his return from Rome he set the Jewish law at defiance by his marriage with Haphyra (daughter of Archelaus, king of Cappadocia), the widow of his brother Alexander, by whom she had children living (Levit. xviii. 16, xx. 21; Deut. xxv. 5); and, his general government being most tyrannical, he was again accused before Augustus by the Jews in the 10th year of his reign (A.D. 7), and, as he was unable to clear himself from their charges, he was banished to Vienna in Gaul, where he died. (Ant. xvii. 13; Bell. Jud. ii. 7. § 3; Strab. viii. p. 765; Dion Cass. iv. 27; Euseb. Hist. Ecc. i. 9.) [E. E.]

ARCHELAUS (Ἀρχελάος), king of Macedonia from B. C. 418, 599. According to Plato, he was on one of his perdicellae when, according to his large professions of his readiness to endure the throne by the murder of his uncle Alex¬ tus, his cousin, and his half-brother (Plat. Gorg. p. 471; Athen. v. p. 217, d.; Ael. V. H. xii. 43), further strengthening himself by marriage with Cleopatra, his father's widow. (Plat. Gorg. p. 471, c.; Aristot. Polit. v. 10, ed. Bekk.) Nor does there appear to be any valid reason for rejecting this story, in spite of the silence of Thucydides, who... had no occasion to refer to it, and of the remarks of Athenaeus, who ascribes it to Plato's love of scandal. (Thuc. ii. 109; Athen. xi. p. 506, a; mitford, Gr. Hist. ch. 94, sec. 1; Thirlwall, Gr. Hist. vol. v. p. 157.) In b. c. 410 Pydna revolted from Archelaus, but he reduced it with the aid of an Athenian squadron under Theramenes, and the better to retain it, in subjection, rebuilt it at a distance of about two miles from the coast. (Diod. xiii. 49; Wess. ad loc.) In another war, in which he was involved with Sisyrrhus and Arrhabaeus, he purchased peace by giving his daughter in marriage to the former. (Aristot. Polit. l. c.; comp. Thirlwall, Gr. Hist. vol. v. p. 156.) For the internal improvement and security of his kingdom, as well as for its future greatness, he effectually provided by building fortresses, forming roads, and increasing the army to a stronger force than had been known under any of the former kings. (Thuc. ii. 100.) He established also at Aegae (Arr. Anob. i. p. 11, f.) or at Dium (Diod. xiiii. 16; Wess. ad Diod. xvi. 55), public games, and a festival which he dedicated to the Muses and called "Olympian." His love of literature, science, and the fine arts is well known. His palace was adorned with magnificent paintings by Zeuxis (Ael. V. H. xiv. 17); and Euripides, Agathon, and other men of eminence, were among his guests. (Ael. V. H. ii. 21, xiiit. 4; Kuhn, ad Ael. V. H. xiv. 17; Schol. ad Aristoph. Ran. 85.) But the tastes and the (so-called) refinement thus introduced failed at least to prevent, even if they did not foster, the great moral corruption of the court. (Ael. ii. c.) Socrates himself received an invitation from Archelaus, accompanied with a promise of respect for his authority in matters of religion, according to Aristotle (Rhet. ii. 23, § 8), that he would not subject himself to the degradation of receiving favours which he could not return. Possibly, too, he was influenced by disgust at the corruption above alluded to, and contempt for the king's character. (Ael. V. H. xiv. 17.) We read in Diodorus, that Archelaus was accidentally slain on a hunting party by his favourite, Craterus or Cratesus (Diod. xiv. 37; Wess. ad loc.); but according to other accounts of apparently better authority, Craterus murdered him, either from ambition, or from disgust at his odious vices, or from revenge for his having broken his promise of giving him one of his daughters in marriage. (Aristot. Polit. v. 16, ed. Bekk; Ael. V. H. viii. 9; Paed.-Plat. Ath. ii. p. 141.) [E.E.] ARCHELAUS'US (Ἀρχέλαος), a general of Mithridates, and the greatest that he had. He was a native of Cappadocia, and the first time that his name occurs is in b. c. 88, when he and his brother Neoptolemus had the command against Nicomedes III. of Bithynia, whom they defeated near the river Ammnus in Paphlagonia. In the next year he was sent by Mithridates with a large fleet and army into Greece, where he reduced several islands, and after persuading the Athenians to abandon the cause of the Romans, he soon gained for Mithridates nearly the whole of Greece south of Thessaly. In B. c. 84, he left his brother Surius, the legate of Sextius, the governor of Macedonia, whom he had during three days a hard struggle in the neighbourhood of Chaeronea, until at last, on the arrival of Lucaelasemonian and Achaean auxiliaries for Archelaus, the Roman general withdrew to Peiraeeus, which however was blockaded and taken possession of by Archelaus. In the meantime, Sulla, to whom the command of the war against Mithridates had been given, had ar- rived in Greece, and immediately marched towards Attica. As he was passing through Boeotia, Thebes deserted the cause of Archelaus, and joined the Romans. On his arrival in Attica, he sent a part of his army to besiege Aristion in Athens, while he himself with his main force went straight on to Peiraeeus, where Archelaus had retreated within the walls. Archelaus maintained himself during a long-protracted siege, until in the end, Sulla, despairing of success in Peiraeeus, turned against Athens itself. The city was soon taken, and then fresh attacks made upon Peiraeeus, with such success, that Archelaus was obliged to withdraw to the most impregnable part of the place. In the meanwhile, Mithridates sent fresh reinforcements to Archelaus, and on their arrival he withdrew with them into Boeotia, b. c. 88, and there assembled all his forces. Sulla followed him, and in the neighbourhood of Chaeronea a battle ensued, in which the Romans gained such a complete victory, that of the 120,000 men with whom Archelaus had opened the campaign no more than 10,000 assembled at Chalcis in Euboea, where Archelaus had taken refuge. Sulla pursued his enemy as far as the coast of the Euphrus, but having no fleet, he was obliged to allow him to make his predatory excursions among the islands, from which, however, he afterwards was obliged to return to Chalcis. Mithridates had in the meantime collected a fresh army of 60,000 men, which Dorylaus or Dorylas led to Archelaus. With these increased forces, Archelaus again crossed over into Boeotia, and in the neighbourhood of Orchomenus was completely defeated by Sulla and his army, which lasted for two days. Archelaus himself was concealed for three days after in the marshes, until he got a vessel which carried him over to Chalcis, where he collected the few remnant of his forces. When Mithridates, who was himself hard pressed in Asia by C. Fimbria, was informed of this defeat, he commissioned Archelaus to negotiate for peace on honourable terms, b. c. 85. Archelaus accordingly had an interview with Sulla at Delium in Boeotia. Sulla's attempt to make Archelaus betray his master was rejected with indignation, and Archelaus confined himself to concluding a preliminary treaty which was to be binding if it received the sanction of Mithridates. While waiting for the king's answer, Sulla made an expedition against the barbarous tribes which at the time infested Macedonia, and was accompanied by Archelaus, for whom he had conceived great esteem. In his answer, Mithridates refused to surrender his fleet, which Archelaus, in his interview with Sulla, had likewise refused to do; and when Sulla would not conclude peace on any other terms, Archelaus himself, who was exceedingly anxious that peace should be concluded, set out for Asia, and brought about a meeting of Sulla and his king at Dardanus in Tras, at which peace was agreed upon, on condition that each party should remain in possession of what had belonged to them at the battle which lasted for two days. This peace was in fact far from favourable to the Romans, for Mithridates, who had made all his enormous sacrifices for nothing; and when Mithridates began to feel that he had made greater concessions than he ought, he also began to suspect Archelaus of treachery, and the latter, fearing for his life, deserted to the Romans just before the outbreak of the second Mithridatic war, b. c. 81. He stimulated Murena not to wait for the attack of the king, but to begin hostilities.

at once. From this moment Archelaus is no more mentioned in history, but several writers state incidentally, that he was honoured by the Roman senate. (Appian, de Bell. Mithr. 17—64; Plut. Sull. 11—24; Liv. Epit. 31 and 82; Vell. Pat. ii. 25; Florus, iii. 5; Oros. vi. 2; Pan. i. 30. § 3; &c.; Aurel. Vict. de Vit. Illustr. 75, 76; Dion Cass. Frugam. n. 173, ed. Reimar; Sallust. Frugam. Hist. lib. iv.)

2. A son of the preceding. (Strab. xvii. p. 796; Dion Cass. xxxix. 57.) In the year n. c. 56, Pompey mixed him to the dignity of priest of the goddess (Enyo or Bellona) at Comana, which was, according to Strabo in Cappadocia, and according to Hirtius (de Bell. Alex. 66), in Cappadocia. The dignity of priest of the goddess at Comana conferred upon the person who held it the power of a king over the place and its immediate vicinity. (Appian, de Bell. Mithr. 114; Strab. l. c., xii. p. 558.) In n. c. 56, when A. Gabinius, the proconsul of Syria, was making preparations for a war against the Parthics, Archelaus went to Syria and offered to take part in the war; but this plan was soon abandoned, as other prospects opened before him. Berenice, the daughter of Ptolemy Auleti, who after the expulsion of her father had become queen of Egypt, wished to marry a prince of royal blood, and Archelaus, pretending to be a son of Mithridates Emperor, sued for her hand, and succeeded. (Strab. l. c.; Dion Cass. l. c.) According to Strabo, the Roman senate would not permit Archelaus to take part in the war against Parthia, and Archelaus left Gabinius in secret; whereas, according to Dion Cassius, Gabinius was induced by bribes to assist Archelaus in his suit for the hand of Berenice, while at the same time he received bribes from Ptolemy Auleti on the understanding that he would restore him to his throne. Archelaus enjoyed the honour of king of Egypt only for six months, for Gabinius kept his promise to Ptolemy, and in n. c. 55 he marched with an army into Egypt, and in the battle which ensued, Archelaus lost his crown and his life. His daughter too was put to death. (Strab. l. c.; Dion Cass. xxxix. 58; Liv. Epit. lib. 105; Cic. pro Rub. Post. 2; Val. Max. x. 1., extern. 6.) M. Antonius, who had been the first to teach at Athens the physical doctrines of that philosophy. This statement, which is that of Laertius (ii. 16), is contradicted by the assertion of Clemens Alexandrinus (Strom. i. p. 30), that Anaxagoras mentis ignavum et vita Leonis Athenaei diebus de vituperatione, but the two may be reconciled by supposing with Clinton (F. H. ii. p. 51), that Archelaus was the first Athenian who did so. For the fact that he was a native of Athens, is considered by Ritter as nearly established on the authority of Simplicius (in Phys. Aristot. fol. 6, b.), as it was probably obtained by him from Theophrastus; and we therefore reject the statement of other writers, that Archelaus was a Milesian. He was the son of Apollodorus, or as some say, of Mydon, Miletus, (Suid.) or Myson, and is said to have taught at Lampsacus before he established himself at Athens. He is commonly reported to have numbered Socrates and Empirides among his pupils. If he was the instructor of the former, it is strange that he is never mentioned by Xenophon, Plato, or Aristotle; and the tradition which connects him with Empirides may have arisen from a confusion with his namesake Archelaus, king of Macedon, the well-known patron of that poet. The doctrine of Archelaus is remarkable, as form a point of transition from the older to the newer form of philosophy in Greece. In the mental history of all nations it is to be observed that the impurities are first confined to natural objects, and afterwards pass into moral speculations; and so, among the Greeks, the Ionians were occupied with physics, the Sophistic schools chiefly with ethics. Archelaus is the union of the two: he was the last recognized leader of the former (succeeding Diogenes of Apollonia in that character), and added to the physical system of his teacher, Anaxagoras, some attempts at moral speculation. He held that air and infinity (τὸ ἄξιόν) are the principle of all things, by which Plutarch (Plac. Phil. 1. 3) supposes that he meant infinite air; and we are told, that by this statement he intended to exclude the operations of mind from the creation of the world. (Stob. Ed. Phys. 1. 1, 2.) If so, he abandoned the doctrine of Anaxagoras in its most important point; and it therefore seems safer to conclude with Ritter, that while he wished to inculcate the materialist notion that the mind is formed of air, he still held infinite mind to be the cause of all things. This explanation has the advantage of agreeing very fairly with that of Simplicius (l. c.); and as Anaxagoras himself did not accurately distinguish between mind and the animal soul, this confusion may have given rise to his pupil's doctrine. Archelaus deduced motion from the opposition of heat and cold, caused of course, if we adopt the above hypothesis, by the will of the material mind. This opposition separated fire and water, and produced a slimy mass of earth. While the earth was hardening, the action of heat upon its moisture gave birth to animals, which at first were nourished by the mud from which they sprang, and gradually acquired the power of propagating their species. All these animals were endowed with mind, but man separated from the others, and established laws and societies. It was just from this point of his physical theory that he seems to have passed into ethical speculation, by the proposition, that right and wrong are of φόρος and νόμος—a dogma probably suggested to him, in its form at least, by the contemporary Sophists. But when we consider the purely mechanical and materialistic character of his physics, which make every thing arise from the separation or distribution of the primary elements, we shall see that nothing except the original chaotic mass, is strictly by nature (φύσις), and that Archelaus assigns the same origin to right and wrong that he does to man. Now a contemporaneous origin with that of the human race is not very different from what a sound system of philosophy would demand for these ideas, though of course such a system would maintain quite another origin of man; and therefore, assuming the Archelaic physical system, it does not necessarily follow, that his ethical principles are so destructive of all goodness as they appear. This view is made almost certain by the fact that Democritus taught, that the ideas of sweet and bitter, warm and cold, &c., are by νόµος, which can be accounted for by this same supposition.

Of the other doctrines of Archelaus we need only mention, that he asserted the earth to have the form of an egg, the sun being the largest of the stars; and that he correctly accounted for speech by the motion of the air. For this, according to Plutarch (Plac. Phil. iv. 19), he was indebted to Anaxagoras.

ARCHELAUS.

Archelaus flourished b. c. 450. In that year Anaxagoras withdrew from Athens, and during his absence Archelaus abolished the archonship of the Athenians (laoret. l. c.). To the authorities given above add Brucker, Hist. Crit. Phil. ii. 2, 1; Ritter, Geschichte der Phil. iii. 9; Tennemann, Grundriss der Gesch. der Phil. § 107. [G. E. L. C.]

ARCHELAUS (Ἀρχέλαος), a Greek poet, is called an Egyptian, and is believed to have been a native of a town in Egypt called Chersonesus, as he is also called Chersonesios. (Antig. Caryst. 19; Athen. xii. p. 554.) He wrote epigrams, some of which are still extant in the Greek Anthology, and Jacobs seems to infer from an epigram of his which is still extant in the Greek Anthology, and Jacobs seems to infer from an epigram of his on Alexander the Great (Anthol. Phaed. 120) that Archelaus lived in the time of Alexander and Ptolemy Soter. (Lobeck (Ἀχροποιχ.), p. 743), on the other hand, places him in the reign of Ptolemy Euergetes II. But both of these opinions are connected with chronological difficulties, and Westermann has shown that Archelaus in all probability flourished under Ptolemy Philadelphia, to whom, according to Antigonus Carystius (l. c., comp. 89), he narrated wonderful stories (τοποδοτίμος) in epigrams. Besides this peculiar kind of epigrams, Archelaus wrote a work called Bispyριν, i. e. strange or peculiar animals (Athen. xii. p. 409; Diog. Laërt. ii. 17), which seems to have likewise been written in verse, and to have treated on strange and paradoxical subjects, like his epigrams. (Plin. (Εἰμικρ. lib. xxviii.; Schol. ad Niciat. Theor. 822; Arat. miracle. iv. 22. Compare Westermann, Scriptor. Rer. mirabil. Græci, p. xxii., &c., who has also collected the extant fragments of Archelaus, p. 158, &c.)

ARCHELAUS (Ἀρχέλαος), a Greek rhetorician of uncertain date, who wrote on his profession; whence he is called τεχνογράφος ἤτοραφ. (Diog. Laërt. ii. 17.) [L. S.]

ARCHELAUS, a sculptor of Priene, the son of Apollonius, made the marble bas-relief representing the Apotheosis of Homer, which formerly belonged to the Colonna family at Rome, and is now in the Townley Gallery of the British Museum (Inscription on the work). The style of the bas-relief, which is little, if at all, inferior to the best remains of Grecian art, confirms the supposition that Archelaus was the son of Apollonius of Rhodes (Arriar. miliq. in Susinna, 300. Lobeck, Opyouh. p. 743), and that he flourished in the first century of the Christian era. From the circumstance of the "Apotheosis" having been found in the palace of Claudius at Bovillae (now Frattechi), coupled with the known admiration of that emperor for Homer (Suet. Claud. 42), it is generally supposed that the work was executed in his reign. A description of the bas-relief, and a list of the works in which it is referred to, is given in The Townley Gallery, in the Library of Entertaining Knowledge, ii. p. 120. [P. S.]

ARCHELAUS (Ἀρχέλαος), king of Sparta. 7th of the Agis, son of Agesilas I., contemporary with Charleus, with whom he took Aegy, a town on the Arcadian border, said to have revolted, and but probably their first taken. (Plut. Phoc. i. 3; Euseb. Porph. v. 323.)

ARCHELAUS (Ἀρχέλαος), son of Thedra- nus, was appointed by Alexander the Great the military commander in Susiana, b. c. 300. (Ariar. iii. 16; Curt. v. 2.) In the division of the province in 323, Archelaus obtained Mesopotamia. (Dexiq op. Phot. Cod. 82, p. 64, b., ed. Bekker.)
ARCHESTRATUS.

ARCHEMACHUS (Ἀρχέμαχος). There are two mythical personages of this name, concerning whom nothing of interest is known, the one a son of Hercules and the other a son of Parnion. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 8, iii. 12. § 5.)

ARCHEMACHUS (Ἀρχέμαχος), of Enobos, wrote a work on his native country, which consisted at least of three books. (Strab. x. p. 465; Athen. vi. p. 264, a.; Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 327, a. ed. Paris, 1629; Harpocrat. s. v. Κόρελος δεσμός; Plut. de Is. et Osir. c. 27.) Whether this Archelaus was the author of the grammatical work Αἴτημα των Ἑλλήνων (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. iv. 292), is uncertain.

ARCHEMONIDUS (Ἀρχέμωνιδος), a son of the Nemean king Lycurgus, and Eurydice. His real name was Opheltes, which was said to have been changed into Archcmauros, that is, “the Forerunner of death,” on the following occasion. When the Seven heroes on their expedition against Thebes stopped at Nemea to take in water, the nurse of the child Opheltes, while shewing the way to the Seven, left the child alone. In the meantime, the child was killed by a dragon, and buried by the Seven. But as Amphiaras saw in this accident an omen boding destruction to him and his companions, they called the child Archemorus, and instituted the Nemean games in honour of him. (Apollod. iii. 6. § 4.)

ARCHEMONIDUS (Ἀρχέμωνιδος), one of the Niobids (Hygm. Fab. 11), and perhaps the same who is called by Ovid (Met. vi. 248) Alphenor. The name was Opheltes, which was said to have been changed into Archcmauros, that is, “the Forerunner of death,” on the following occasion. When the Seven heroes on their expedition against Thebes stopped at Nemea to take in water, the nurse of the child Opheltes, while shewing the way to the Seven, left the child alone. In the meantime, the child was killed by a dragon, and buried by the Seven. But as Amphiaras saw in this accident an omen boding destruction to him and his companions, they called the child Archemorus, and instituted the Nemean games in honour of him. (Apollod. iii. 6. § 4.)

ARCHESITA. [Ἀρχεσίτας, Artiustes, No. 3.]

ARCHESTRATUS (Ἀρχέστρατος). 1. One of the ten στραγγητοί who were appointed to supercede Alcibiades in the command of the Athenian fleet after the battle of Notium, n. c. 407. Xenophon and Diodorus, who give us his name in this list, say no more of him; but we learn from Lysias that he died at Mytilene, and he appears therefore to have been with Coton when Callicratidas chased the Athenian fleet thither from Ἐφραίδιον (Xen. Hell. i. 5. § 16; Diod. xiii. 74, 77, 78; Lys. ΑΠΟΛ. δορ. p. 192; Scin. ad Xen. Hell. i. 6. § 16; Thirlwall’s Greece, vol. iv. p. 119, note 8.)

2. A member of the σωφρονισταὶ at Athens, who, during the siege of the city by the Aegopontini, n. c. 405, was thrown into prison for advising capitulation on the terms required by the Spartans. (Xen. Hell. ii. 2. § 15.)

3. The mover of the decree passed by the Athenians at the instigation of Agrimedes, that an embassy should be sent to the Macedonian king Archadius Philipus, and the regent Polyperchon, to accuse Phocion of treason, n. c. 318. (Plut. Phoc. c. 33.) Schneider (ad Xen. Hell. ii. 2. § 15), by a strange anachronism, identifies this Archestratus with the one mentioned immediately above. [E. E.]

ARCHESTRATUS (Ἀρχέστρατος). 1. Of Gela or Syracuse (Athen. i. p. 4, d.), and more usually described as a native of Gela, appears to have lived about the time of the younger Diogenes. He travelled through various countries in order to become accurately acquainted with every thing which could be used for the table; and gave the results of his researches in an Epic poem on the Art of Cookery, which was celebrated in antiquity, and is constantly referred to by Athenaeus. In no part of the Hellenic world was the art of good living carried to such an extent as in Sicily (the Siculos lapses, Hor. Carm. iii. 1. 18, became proverbial); and Terpsion, who is described as a teacher of Archestratus, had already written a work on the Art of Cookery. (Athen. viii. p. 337, b.) The work of Archestratus is cited by the ancients under five different titles—Σπαραγωγα, Γαστρονομια, Οικονομια, Διανομια, and Υπηκοονια. Ennius wrote an imitation or translation of this poem under the title of Καρμίνα Ηεδροπηθατικα or Ηεδροπηθατικα. (Apul. Apol. p. 484, Oudend. Archestratus delivered his precepts in the style and with the gravity of the old gnostic poets, whence he is called in joke the Herod or Theognis of gluttons, and his work is referred to as the “Golden Verses,” like those of Pythagoras. (Athen. vii. pp. 310, a. 320, c.) His description of the various natural objects used for the table was so accurate, that Aristotle made use of his work in giving an account of the natural history of fishes. The extant fragments have been collected and explained by Schneider, in his edition of Aristotle’s Natural History (vol. i. pp. Iv.—lxxv.), and also by Domineco Scina, under the title of “I frammenti della Gastronomia di Archestrate raccolti e volgarizzati,” Palermo, 1823, 6vo.

The author of a work Περὶ Ἀδριανὸς (Athen. xiv. p. 654, d.) seems to be a different person from the one mentioned above.

ARCHETEMUS (Ἀρχητέμος), of Syracuse, wrote an account of the interview of Thales and the other wise men of Greece with Cypselus of Corinth, at which Archetemus was present. (Dido. Laist. i. 40.)

ARCHIAS (Ἀρχιας), of Corinth, the founder of Syracusen, n. c. 734. He was a Heracleid, either of the Bacchid or the Temenid line, and of high account at Corinth. In consequence of the death of Actaeon (Actaeon, No. 2) he resolved to leave his country. He consulted the Delphic Oracle, which directed him, says Pausanias, who gives the three hexameters, “to an Ortigia in Trinacria, where Arethusa and Alpheus reappeared.” According to an account given in Strabo, Steph. Byz., and at greater length, with the four verses of the Oracle, by the Scholiast to Aristophanes, he and Myscellus, the founder of Croton, were inquiring together, and when the Pythomachus asked which they would choose, health or wealth, Myscellus chose health, and Archias wealth; a decision with which, it was thought, the fortunes of their colonies were connected. Archias sailed in company, we are told by Strabo, with Chersicrates, his countryman, and left him at Corcyra: as also Myscellus at Croton, in the founding of which he assisted. Thence he proceeded to his destination. (Thuc. vi. 3; Plut. Aemil. Nerv. p. 772; Diod. Exc. ii. p. 208; Paus. v. 7. § 2; Strabo, vi. pp. 262, 269; Steph. Byz. s. v. Σύρακος; Schol. ad Arist. Eq. 1689.) See also Lys. Α’ρτ. 73, and vii. 264, 265; Muller’s Dor. i. 6. § 7.) [A. H. C.]

ARCHIAS (Ἀρχιας). 1. A Spartan, who fell bravely in the Lacedaemonian attack upon Samos in n. c. 525. Herodotus saw at Pitana in Laconia his grandson Archias. (Herod. iii. 55.)

2. Of Thurii, originally an actor, was sent in n. c. 322, after the battle of Crannon, to apprehend the orators whom Antipater had demanded of the ARCHIAS.

Athenians, and who had fled from Athens. He seized Hyperides and others in the sanctuary of Aesculapius in Aegina, and transported them to Cleoneas in Argolis, where they were executed. He also apprehended Demosthenes in the temple of Poseidon in Calauria. Archias, who was nick-named ὑπαρχιάς, the hunter of the exiles, ended his life in great poverty and disgrace. (Plut. Dem. 28, 29, Vit. X. Ora. p. 949; Arist. op. Phot. p. 69, b. 41, ed. Bekker.)

3. The governor of Cyprus under Ptolemy, received a bribe in order to betray the island to Demetrius, b. c. 155, but being detected he hanged himself. (Polyb. xxxiii. 3.)

4. An Alexandrine grammarian, probably lived about the time of Augustus, as he was the teacher of Epephroditus. (Suidas, s. v. Ἐπεφρόδιτος; Villalob, Proef. ad Apoll. Lex. Hom. p. xx.)

ARCHIAS, A. LICYNIUS, a Greek poet, born at Antioch in Syria, about b. c. 120. His name is known chiefly from the speech of Cicero in his defence, which is the only source of information about him, and must therefore be very questionable evidence of his talent, considering that the verses of Archias had been employed in celebrating the part which that orator played in the conspiracy of Catiline. He was on intimate terms with many of the first families in Rome, particularly with the Licinii, whose name he adopted. His reception during a journey through Asia Minor and Greece (pro Arch. c. 3), and afterwards in Greece, Italy, where Tarentum, Rhegium, Naples, and Locri enrolled him on their registers, shews that his reputation was, at least at that time, considerable. In x. 192 he came to Rome, still young (though not so young as the expression "practextatus" (c. 3) literally explained would lead us to suppose; comp. Clinton, F. H. iii. p. 542), and was received in the most friendly way by Lucullus (ad Att. i. 16, 9), Marius, then consul, Hortensius the father, Metellus Pius, Q. Catulus, and Cicero. After a short stay, he accompanied Lucullus to Sicily, and followed him, in the banishment to which he was sentenced for his management of the slave war in that island, to Heraclea in Lucania, in which town, as being a confederate town and having more privileges than Tarentum, he was enrolled as a citizen. He was in the suite of L. Lucullus,—in Asia under Sulla, again in x. 76 in Africa, and again in the third Mithridatic war. As he had sung the Cimbric war in honour of Marius, so now he wrote a poem on this war, which he had published (c. 9), in honour of Lucullus. We do not hear whether he finished his poem in honour of Cicero's consulship (c. 11); in x. 61, when he was already old, he had not begun it (ad Att. i. 16); or whether he ever published his intended Caeciliana, in honour of Metellus Pius. He wrote many epigrams: it is still disputed, whether any of those preserved under his name in the Anthologia were really his writings. (Comp. Igen, Oppesca, ii. p. 40; Clinton, iii. p. 432, note K.) These are all of little merit. In x. 61, a charge was brought against him, probably at the instigation of a party opposed to his patrons, of assuming the citizenship illegally, and the trial came on before Q. Cicero, who was proctor this year. (Schol. Boh. p. 354; ed. Orelli.) Cicero pleaded his case in the speech by which the name of Archias has been preserved.

If he had no legal right, yet the man who stood so high as an author, whose talent had been employed in celebrating Lucullus, Marius, and himself, might well deserve to be a Roman citizen. The register certainly, of Heraclea, in which his name was enrolled, had been destroyed by fire in the Marsian war; but their ambassadors and L. Lucullus bore witness that he was enrolled there. He had settled in Rome many years before he became citizen, had given the usual notice before Q. Metellus Pius, and if his property had never been enrolled in the censor's register, it was because of his absence with Lucullus—and that was after all no proof of citizenship. He had made wills, had been an heir (comp. Dict. of Ant. s. v. Testamenta, Heres), and his name was on the civil list. But, after all, his chief claim was his talent, and the cause to which he had applied it.

If we may believe Cicero (c. 8) and Quintilian (x. 7, § 19), Archias had the gift of making good extempore verses in great numbers, and was remarkable for the richness of his language and his varied range of thought. [C. T. A.]

ARCHII'BIUS (Ἀρχιῆβιος). 1. An Alexandrine grammarian, the son or father of the grammarians Apollonius (APOLLONIUS, No. 5, p. 236), wrote an interpretation of the Epigrams of Callimachus. (Suidas, s. v.)

2. Of Leucis or Alexandria, a grammarian, who taught at Rome in the time of Trajan. (Suid. s. v.)

ARCHI'BIUS (Ἀρχιῆβιος). 1. A Greek surgeon, of whose name selters are known, but who must have lived in the first century after Christ, as he is quoted by Heliodorus (in Cocchi's Grecorum, Chirurg. Libri, &c.: Flor. 1754, fol. p. 96) and Galen. (De Anstd. ii. 10, vol. xiv. p. 159; De Compos. Medicam. see. Gen. v. 14, vol. xii. p. 849.)

Pliny mentions (H. N. xvii. 70) a person of the same name who wrote a foolish and superstitious letter to Antiochus, king of Syria; but it is uncertain which king is meant, nor is it known that this Archibus was a physician. [W. A. G.]

ARCHIDAMEIA (Ἀρχιδαμεία). 1. The priestess of Demeter, who, through love of Aristomenes, set him at liberty when he had been taken prisoner. (Paus. iv. 17. § 1.)

2. The grandmother of Agis IV., was put to death, together with her grandson, in b. c. 240. (Plut. Agis. 4, 20.)

3. A Spartan woman, who distinguished herself by her heroic spirit when Sparta was nearly taken by Pyrrhus in b. c. 272, and opposed the plan which had been entertained of sending the women to Crete. Plutarch (Pyrrh. 37) calls her Ἀρχιδαμία, but Polyenus (viii. 49) Ἀρχιδαμία. The latter writer calls her the daughter of king Cleandus (Cleandemus?).

ARCHIDAMUS I. (Ἀρχιδαμος), king of Sparta, 12th of the Eurypontids, son of Anaxibamus, contemporary with the Tegestaen war, which followed soon after the end of the second Messenian war, in b. c. 696. (Paus. iii. 7, § 6, comp. ii. 5.)

ARCHIDAMUS II. (Ἀρχιδαμος), king of Sparta, 17th of the Eurypontids, son of Zeuscidamus, succeeded to the throne on the banishment of his grandfather Leotychides, b. c. 499. In the 4th or perhaps the 5th year of his reign, his kingdom was visited by the tremendous calamity of the great earthquake, by which all Lecea was shaken, and Sparta made a heap of ruins. On this occasion his presence of mind is said to have saved his people. Foreseeing the danger from the Helots, he summoned, by sounding an alarm, the scattered surviving Spartans, and collected them around him, apparently at a distance from the ruins, in a body sufficient to deter the assailants. To him, too, rather than to Nicomedes, the guardian of his colleagues, Pleistomax, (Pleistarchus was probably dead,) would be committed the conduct of the contest with the revolted Messenians, which occupies this and the following fifteen years. The weight of his expeditions to Delphi and to Doris, and the hostilities with Athens down to the 30 years' truce, his name is not mentioned; though in the discussion at Sparta before the final dissolution of that truce he comes forward as one who has had experience of many wars. Of the Peloponnesian war itself we find the first 10 years sometimes styled the Archidamian war; the share, however, taken in it by Archidamus was no more than the common one of all the allies, and in the Archidamian war; the share, however, taken in it by him by Archidamus was no more than the common one of all the allies, and in the Archidamian war, as represented by Thucydides seem to breathe his just and temperate spirit. He may at any rate be safely excluded from all responsibility for the cruel treatment of the Greeks besieged, on their surrender in the year of his reign, 437, by Archidamus, meeting his countrymen on their return at Aegosthena in Megara, dismissed the allies, and led the Spartans home. (Xen. Hell. vi. 4 §§ 17—20; Diod. xvi. 5 § 35; Paus. iii. 10; loc. Thirlwall's Grec. Hist. vol. iv. p. 78, note.) In 367, with the aid of the auxiliaries furnished by Dorynus I. of Syracusca, he defeated the Arcadiens and Argives in what has been called the "Tearless Battle," from the statement in his despatches, that he had won it without losing a man (Xen. Hell. vii. 1 §§ 28; Plut. Ages. c. 33; Polyænus i. 45; Diod. xv. 73); and to the next year, 366, must be assigned the "Archidamus" of Isocrates, written perhaps to be delivered by the prince in the Spartan senate, to encourage his country in her resolution of maintaining her claim to Messenia, when Cornith had made, with Sparta's consent, a separate peace with Thebes. (Xen. Hell. vii. 4 § 39.) In 364, he was again sent against Arcadia, then at war with Elis (Xen. Hell. vii. 4 §§ 20, &c.; Just. vi. 5); and in 363, having been left at home to protect Sparta while Agesilaus went to join the allies at Mantinea, he baffled the attempt of Epaminondas on the city. (Xen. Hell. vii. 5, § 9, &c.; Diod. xvii. 82, 83; Plut. Ages. c. 34; Isocr. Ep. ad Arch. § 5.) He succeeded his father on the throne in 361. In 356, we find him privately furnishing Philoxenus, the Phociot, with fifteen talents, to aid him in his resistance to the Amphictyonic decree and his seizure of Delphi, whence arose the sacred war. (Diod. xvi. 24; Just. viii. 1; comp. Paus. iv. 4; Theopomp. ap. Paus. iii. 16.) In 352, occurred the war of Sparta against Megalopolis with a view to the dissolution (Diwrardwv) of that community; and Archidamus was appointed to the command, and gained some successes, though the enterprise did not ultimately succeed. (Diod. xvi. 39; Paus. viii. 27; Demosth. pro Megal., comp. Aristot. Pol. vit. 10, ed. Bekk.) In the last year of the sacred war, 346, we find Archidamus marching into Phocis at the head of 1000 men. According to Diodorus (xvi. 59), the Phocians had applied for aid to Sparta, but this seems questionable from what Aeschines (de Polis. Leg. p. 43) reports as the advice of the Phocians leader to Archidamus, "to alarm himself about the dangers of Sparta rather than those of Thebes." The nær of the Phocians in passing through Arcadia is alluded to by Aeschines; and it seems to have resulted in hints at a private understanding between Philip and the Spartans, and at some treachery of his towards them. Whether however on this account, or as being distrusted by Phalaeocles (Aesch. de Polis. Leg. p. 46), or as finding it impossible to effect anything on behalf of the Phocians, Archidamus, on the arrival of Philip, withdrew his forces and returned home. In 338, he went to Italy to aid the Tarentines against the Lucanians, and there he fell in battle on the very day, according to Diodorus, of Philip's victory at Chaeroneia. (Diod. xvi. 63, 88; Paus. iii. 16; Strab. vi. p. 283; Theopomp. ap. Athen. xii. p. 536, c. d.; Plut. Ages. c. 2.) The Spartans erected a statue of him at Olympia, which was assigned to the "Archidamus" of Isocrates, written perhaps to be delivered by the prince in the Spartan senate, to encourage his country in her resolution of maintaining her claim to Messenia, when Cornith had made, with Sparta's consent, a separate peace with Thebes. (Xen. Hell. vii. 4 § 39.) In 364, he was again sent against Arcadia, then at war with Elis (Xen. Hell. vii. 4 §§ 20, &c.; Just. vi. 5); and in 363, having been left at home to protect Sparta while Agesilaus went to join the allies at Mantinea, he baffled the attempt of Epaminondas on the city. (Xen. Hell. vii. 5, § 9, &c.; Diod. xvii. 82, 83; Plut. Ages. c. 34; Isocr. Ep. ad Arch. § 5.) He succeeded his father on the throne in 361. In 356, we find him privately furnishing Philoxenus, the Phociot, with fifteen talents, to aid him in his resistance to the Amphictyonic decree and his seizure of Delphi, whence arose the sacred war. (Diod. xvi. 24; Just. viii. 1; comp. Paus. iv. 4; Theopomp. ap. Paus. iii. 16.) In 352, occurred the war of Sparta against Megalopolis with a view to the dissolution (Diwrardwv) of that community; and Archidamus was appointed to the command, and gained some successes, though the enterprise did not ultimately succeed. (Diod. xvi. 39; Paus. viii. 27; Demosth. pro Megal., comp. Aristot. Pol. vit. 10, ed. Bekk.) In the last year of the sacred war, 346, we find Archidamus marching into Phocis at the head of 1000 men. According to Diodorus (xvi. 59), the Phocians had applied for aid to Sparta, but this seems questionable from what Aeschines (de Polis. Leg. p. 43) reports as the advice of the Phocians leader to Archidamus, "to alarm himself about the dangers of Sparta rather than those of Thebes." The nær of the Phocians in passing through Arcadia is alluded to by Aeschines; and it seems to have resulted in hints at a private understanding between Philip and the Spartans, and at some treachery of his towards them. Whether however on this account, or as being distrusted by Phalaeocles (Aesch. de Polis. Leg. p. 46), or as finding it impossible to effect anything on behalf of the Phocians, Archidamus, on the arrival of Philip, withdrew his forces and returned home. In 338, he went to Italy to aid the Tarentines against the Lucanians, and there he fell in battle on the very day, according to Diodorus, of Philip's victory at Chaeroneia. (Diod. xvi. 63, 88; Paus. iii. 16; Strab. vi. p. 283; Theopomp. ap. Athen. xii. p. 536, c. d.; Plut. Ages. c. 2.) The Spartans erected a statue of him at Olympia, which is mentioned by Pausanias. (vi. ch. 4, 15.) [E. K.] ARCHIDAMUS IV., king of Sparta, 23rd of the Euryptontids, was the son of Eumelus I. and the grandson of Archidamus III. (Plut. A. 3.) He was king in B.C. 240, when he was defeated by the Corinthians and Poliorcetes. (Plut. Demost. 35.)

ARCHIDAMUS V., king of Sparta, 27th of the Euryptontidas, was the son of Eumelus II., and the brother of Agis IV. On the murder of his brother Agis, in B.C. 240, Archidamus fled some time after the accession of Cleomenes. (Herod. ii. 194.) Archidamus was, however, slain almost immediately after his return to Sparta, by those who had killed his brother and who dreaded his vengeance. It is doubtful whether Cleomenes was a party to the murder. (Plut. C. 5; comp. Polyb. v. 37, vii. 1.) Archidamus was the last king of the Eurypontid race. He left sons, who were alive at the death of Cleomenes, c. 296; when he was defeated and having attempted to give to medical writings a dialectic form, which produced rather the appearance than of actual observation; and the same remark may be applied to an arrangement which he recorded it in his verse. Plutarch (De SimpL 12. p. 604; Strabo, xi. 63; Aelian, vii. 30.) seems to have arisen in part also from the love of novelty which is often characteristic of a political change. (Inst. Lao Plan. 5.) The title of several of his works are preserved, of which, however, nothing but a few fragments remain; some of these have been preserved by other ancient authors, and some are still in MS. in the King's Library at Paris. (Crümer's Anec. Gr. Paris. vol. i. pp. 394, 395.) By some writers he is considered to have belonged to the sect of the Pneumatici. (Galen, Introduct. c. 9. vol. xiv. p. 699.) For further particulars respecting Archigenes see Le Clerc, Hist. de la Méd. ; Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. xiii. p. 80, ed. vet.; Sprengel, Hist. de la Méd.; Halber, Bibl. [ARCHILOCHUS] ARCHILOCHUS (Ἀρχιλόχος), of Paros, was one of the earliest Ionian lyric poets, and the first Greek poet whom composed Iambic verses according to fixed rules. He flourished about 714-676 B.C. (Bode, Geschichte der Lyr. Dichtk. i. pp. 38, 47.) He was descended from a noble family, who held the priesthood in Paros. His grandfather was Tellis, who brought the worship of Demeter into Thasos, and whose portrait was introduced by Polygnotus into his painting of the infernal region at Delphi. His father was Telesidus, and his mother a slave, named Enipo. In the flower of his age (between 710 and 700 B.C.), and probably after he had already gained a prize for his hymn to Demeter (Schol. in Aristoph. Ar. 1762), Archilochus went from Paros to Thasos with a colony, of which one account makes him the leader. The motive for this emigration can only be conjectured. I was most probably the result of a political change to which cause was added, in the case of Archilochus, a sense of personal wrongs. He had been suitor to Neobule, one of the daughters of Lycambes, who first promised and afterwards refused to give his daughter to the poet. Enraged at this treatment, Archilochus attacked the whole family in an iambic poem, accusing Lycambes of perjury and his daughters of the most abandoned life. The verses were recited at the festival of Demeter and produced such an effect, that the daughters of Lycambes are said to have hung themselves from shame. The bitterness which he expresses in his poems towards his native island (Athen. iii. p. 7 b.) seems to have arisen in part also from the love in which he was held, as being the son of a slave. Neither was he more happy at Thasos. He draws the most melancholy picture of his adopted country, which he at length quitted with disgust. (Plut. de Exil. 12. p. 604; Strabo, xi. p. 648, viii. p. 370; Eustath. in Odyss. i. p. 22) Archilochus, V. H. xii. 50.) While at Thasos, he incurred the disgrace of losing his shield in an engagement with the Thracians of the opposite continent; but, like Alcaeus under similar circumstances, instead of being ashamed of the disaster which befell him in his verse, Plutarch, in the 98, 117, where he enjoy'd in the time of Trajan, A. D. 98-117, he therefore, he had written in his poems, the man had better throw away his arms than lose his life. But Valerius Maximus (vi. 3, ext. 1) says, that the poems of Archilochus were forbidden at Sparta because of their licentiousness, and especially on account of the attack on the daughters of Lycaemus. It must remain doubtful whether a confusion has been made between the personal history of the poet and the fate of his works, both in this instance and in the story that he won the prize at Olympia with his hymn to Hercules (Tzetzes, Chid. i. 685), of which thus much is certain, that the Olympic victors used to sing a hymn by Archilochus in their triumphal procession. (Pindar, Olymp. ix. 1.) These traditions, and the certain fact that the name of Archilochus was spread, in his lifetime, over the whole of Greece, together with his unsettled character, render it probable that he made many journeys of which we have no account. It seems, that he visited Siris in Lower Italy, the only city of which he speaks well. (Athen. xii. p. 523, d.) At length he returned to Paros, and, in a war between the Parians and the people of Naxos, he fell by the hand of a Naxian named Calondas or Corax. The Delphian oracle, which, before the birth of Archilochus, had promised to his father an immortal son, now pronounced a curse upon the man who had killed him, because "he had slain the servant of the Muses." (Dion Chrysost. Orat. 35, vol. ii. p. 5.)

Archilochus shared with his contemporaries, Thaletas and Terpander, in the honour of estabishing lyric poetry throughout Greece. The invention of the elegy is ascribed to him, as well as to Callinus; and though Callinus was somewhat older than Archilochus (Callinus), there is no doubt that the latter was one of the earliest poets who excelled in this species of composition. Meleager enumerates him among the poets in his Corona. (38.)

But it was on his satiric iambic poetry that the fame of Archilochus was founded. The first place in this style of poetry was awarded to him by the consent of the ancient writers, who did not hesitate to compare him with Sophocles, Pindar, and even Homer,—menning, doubtless, that as they stood at the head of tragic, lyric, and epic poetry, so was Archilochus the first of iambic satirical writers; while some place him, next to Homer, above all other poets. (Dion Chrysost. L. c.; Longin. iii. 3; Vellius, i. 5; Cicero, Orat. 2; Herodotus, ap. Diog. Laert. ix. 1.) The statues of Archilochus and of Homer were dedicated on the same day (Antip. Thessal. Epigr. 45), and two aces, which are thought to be their likenesses, are found placed together in a Janus-like bust. (Visconti, Icon. Grec. i. p. 62.) The emperor Hadrian ordered that the Muses had shown a special mark of favour to Homer in leading Archilochus into a different department of poetry. (Epigr. 5.) Other testimonies are collected by Liebel (p. 49).

The iambics of Archilochus expressed the strongest feelings in the most unmeasured language. The licence of Ionian democracy and the license of a disappointed man were united with his highest genius, and his poetic talent, on the one hand, and the time and place of the verse gained, in the former case, strength, in the latter, speed and lightness, which are the charac-tories respectively of the iambus and of the trochee. These short feet he formed into continued systems, by uniting every two of them into a pair (a metre or diconclus), in which one arsis was more strongly accentuated than the other, and one of the two these was left doubtful as to quantity, so that, considered with reference to musical rhythm, each dipod formed a bar.* Hence arose the great kindred dramatic metres, the iambic trimeter and the trochaic tetrameter, as well as the shorter forms of iambic and trochaic verse. Archilochus was the inventor also of the epode, which was formed by subjoining to one or more verses a shorter one. One form of the epode, in which it consists of three trochees, was called the ithyphallic verse (Rhipheus). He used also a kind of verse compounded of two different metrical structures, which was called asyndrite. Some writers ascribe to him the invention of the Saturnian verse. (Bentley's Dissertation on Platina.) Archilochus introduced several improvements in music, which began about his time to be applied to the public recitations of poetry.

The best opportunity we have of judging of the structure of Archilochus' poetry, though not of its satiric character, is furnished by the Epodes of Horace, as we learn from that poet himself (Epist. i. 19, 20):

"Parios ego primum iambo
Oustendi Latino, numeros animosque secutus Archilochi, non res et agentia verba Lycamben."

Some manifest translations of Archilochus may be traced in the Epodes. The fragments of Archilochus which remain are collected in Jacobs' Poet. Lyrici Graeci, Gaisford's Poet. Lyrici Graeci, Min., Bergk's Poet. Lyrici Graeci, and by Liebel, Archilochi Rhetorique, Lips. 1812, 8vo.

Fabricius (ii. pp. 107—110) discusses fully the passages in which other writers of the name are supposed to be mentioned. [P.S.]

ARCHIMEDES ('Apx^fe), of Syracuse, was born b. c. 287, if the statement of Tzetzes, which makes him 75 years old at his death, be correct.

Of his family little is known. Plutarch calls him a relation of Hiero; but Cicero (Tusc. Disp. v. 23), contrasting him apparently not with Dionysius (as Torelli suggests in order to avoid the contradiction), but with Plato and Archytas, says, "humilium homunculum a pulvere et radio excitum." At any rate, his actual condition in life does not seem to have been elevated (Silius Italicus, xiv. 343), though he was certainly a friend, if not a kinsman, of Hiero. A modern tradition makes him an ancestor of the Syracusan virgin martyr St. Lucy. (Rivalius, in vit. Archim. Mazuchelli, p. 6.) In the early part of his life he travelled into Egypt, where he is said, on the authority of Proclus, to have studied under Conon the Sphialike, a mathematician and astronomer (mentioned by Virg. Aen. iii. 40), who lived under the Ptolemies, Philodemus and Euenetes, and for whom he testifies his respect and esteem in

After visiting other countries, he returned to Syracuse. (Diod. v. 37.) Livy (xxiv. 34) calls him a distinguished astronomer, "unius speciator coeli siderumque;" a description of which the truth is made sufficiently probable by his treatment of the astronomical questions occurring in the Aeneid. (See also Macrobi. Saturn. Seip. ii. 3.) He was popularly best known as the inventor of several ingenious machines; but Plutarch (Marcell. c. 14), who, it should be observed, confounds the application of geometry to mechanics with the solution of geometrical problems by mechanical means, represents him as despising these contrivances, and only condescending to withdraw himself from the abstractions of pure geometry at the request of Hiero. Certain it is, however, that Archimedes did cultivate not only pure geometry, but also the mathematical theory of several branches of physics, in a truly scientific spirit, and with a success which placed him very far in advance of the age in which he lived. His theory of the lever was the foundation of statics till the discovery of the composition of forces in the time of Newton, and no essential addition was made to the principles of the equilibrium of fluids and floating bodies, established by him in his treatise De InsDemocrats, till the publication of Stevin's treatises on the pressure of fluids in 1608. (Lagrange, Méca. Anal., vol. i. pp. 11, 176.)

He constructed for Hiero various engines of war, which, many years afterwards, were so far effectual in the defence of Syracuse against Marcellus, as to convert the siege into a blockade, and delay the taking of the city for a considerable time. (Plut. Marcell. 15-18; Livy, xxiv, 34; Polyb. viii. 5-9.) The accounts of the performances of these engines are evidently exaggerated; and the story of the burning of the Roman ships by the reflected rays of the sun, though very current in later times, is probably a fiction, since neither Polybius, Livy, nor Plutarch gives the least hint of it. The earliest writers who speak of it are Galen (De Temper. iii. 2) and his contemporary Lucian (Hippiae, c. 2), who (in the second century) merely allude to it as a thing well known. Zonaras (about a. d. 1100) mentions it in relating the use of a similar apparatus, contrived by a certain Procles, when Byzantium was besieged in the reign of Anastasius; and gives Dion as his authority, without referring to the particular passage. The extant works of Dion contain no allusion to it. Tzetzes (about 1150) gives an account of the principal inventions of Archimedes (Chil. ii. 103—150), and amongst them of this burning machine, which, he says, set the Roman ships on fire when they came within a bow-shot of the walls; and consisted of a large hexagonal mirror with smaller ones disposed round it, each of the latter being a polygon of 24 sides. The subject has been a good deal discussed in modern times, particularly by Cavalieri (in cap. 28 of a tract entitled "Del Specchio Usurio," Bologna 1650), and by Buffon, who has left an elaborate dissertation upon it in his introduction to the history of minerals. (Oeuvres, tom. v. p. 301, &c.) The latter author actually succeeded in igniting wood at a distance of 150 feet, by means of a combination of 148 plane mirrors. The question is also examined in vol. ii. of Peyrard's Archimedes; and a prize essay upon it by Capelle i translated from the Dutch in Gilbert's "Annalen der Physik," vol. lili. p. 242. The most probable conclusion seems to be, that Archimedes had on some occasion set fire to a ship or ships by means of a burning mirror, and that later writers falsely connected the circumstance with the siege of Syracuse. (See Ersch and Gruber's Cyclop. art. Archim. note, and Gibbon, chap. 40.)

The following additional instances of Archimedes' skill in the application of science have been collected from various authors by Rivaltus (who edited his works in 1615) and others.

He detected the mixture of silver in a crown which Hiero had ordered to be made of gold, and demonstrated in his hydrostatical treatise concerning the loss of weight of bodies immersed in water, since he would hardly have evinced such lively gratification at the obvious discovery that they might be applied to the problem of the crown; his delight must rather have arisen from his now first catching sight of a line of investigation which led immediately to the solution of the problem. Question, and ultimately to the important theorems referred to. (Vitruv. i. 3.; Proclus. Comm. in lib. i. Decl. ii. 3.)

He superintended the building of a ship of extraordinary size for Hiero, of which a description given in Athenaeus (v. p. 206, d), where he is so said to have moved it to the sea by the help of a screw. According to Proclus, this ship was likewise by Hiero as a present to Ptolemy; it may possibly have been the occasion of Archimedes' visit to Egypt. He invented a machine called, from its form, a sphere, and now known as the water-screw of Archimedes, for pumping the water out of the hold of this vessel; it is said to have been also used in Egypt by the inhabitants of the Delta in irrigating their lands. (Diod. i. 34; Vitruv. x. 11.) An investigation of the mathematical theory of the water-screw is given in Ersch and Gruber. The abian historian Abulpharagius attributes to Archimedes the raising of the dykes and bridges as defences against the overflowing of the Nile. (Pope-Blount, Censoria, p. 32.) Tzetzes (de Mach. xxvi.) speaks of his Trias, a machine for moving large weights; probably combination of pulleys, or wheels and axles. A hydromedusa (a musical instrument) is mentioned by Tertullian (de Anim. cap. 14), but Pliny (i. 37) attributes it to Ctesibius. (See also Pappus. Math. Coll. lib. 8, introd.) An apparatus called locastus, apparently somewhat resembling the vesica gauda, is also attributed to Archimedes. Oribasius, de Arte Metrica, p. 2634. His celebrated performance was the construction of a sphere; a kind of orrery, representing the movements of the heavenly bodies, of which we have no particular description. (Clavius, Epigr. xxi in Sphaerarum Archimedes; Cic. Nat. Deor. ii. 35; Tusc. Disp. i. 25; Sext. Empir. adv. Math. i. 115; Lactant. Div. Inst. ii. 5; Or. Past. vi. 277.)

When Syracuse was taken, Archimedes was killed by the Roman soldiers, ignorant or careless who he might be. The accounts of his death vary in some particulars, but mostly agree in describing him as intent upon a mathematical problem at the time. He was deeply regretted by Marcellus, who directed his burial, and he was buried with the following relations. (Liv. xxv. 31; Valer. Max. vili. 7. § 7; Plutarch, in his life of Hiero, says that his body was buried in a cylinder, in accordance with his known wish, and in commemoration of the discovery which he most valued. When Cicero was quaestor in Sicily (a.c. 75) he found this tomb near one of the gates of the city, almost hid amongst briars, and forgotten by the Syracusans. (Tusc. Disp. v. 22.)

Of the general character of Archimedes we have no direct account. But his apparently disinterested devotion to his friend and admiral Hiero, in whose service he was ever ready to exercise his ingenuity upon objects which his own taste would not have led him to choose (for there is doubtless some truth in what Plutarch says on this point); the affectionate regret which he expresses for his deceased master Conon, in writing to his surviving friend Dositheus (to whom most of his works are addressed); and the unaffected simplicity with which he announces his own discoveries, seem to afford probable grounds for a favourable estimate of it. That his intellect was of the very highest order is unquestionable. He possessed, in a degree never exceeded unless by Newton, the inventive genius which discovers new provinces of inquiry, and finds new points of view for old and familiar objects; the clearness of conception which is essential to the resolution of complex phenomena into their constituent elements; and the power and habit of intense and persevering thought, without which other intellectual gifts are comparatively fruitless. (See the introd. to the treatise "De Con. ut Sphera."). It may be noticed that he resembled other great thinkers, in his habit of complete abstraction from outward things, when reflecting on subjects which made considerable demands on his mental powers. At such times he would forget to eat his meals, and require compulsion to take him to the bath. (Plut. i. 1.) Compare the stories of Newton sitting great part of the day half dressed on his bed, while composing the Principia; and of Socrates standing a whole day and night, thinking, on the same spot. (Plat. Symph. p. 220, c. d.) The success of Archimedes in conquering difficulties seems to have made the expression προθυμησι, ἀρχιγενεσίων proverbial. (See Cic. ad Att. xii. 28, pro Cluent. 32.)

The following works of Archimedes have come down to us:

1. A treatise on Equiponderants and Centres of Gravity, in which the theory of the equilibrium of the straight lever is demonstrated, both for commensurable and incommensurable weights; and various properties of the centres of gravity of plane surfaces bounded by three or four straight lines, or by a straight line and a parabola, are established.

2. The Quadrature of the Parabola, in which it is proved, that the area cut off from a parabola by any chord is equal to two-thirds of the parallelogram of which one side is the chord in question, and the opposite side a tangent to the parabola. This was the first real example of the quadrature of a curvilinear space; that is, of the discovery of a rectilinear figure equal to an area not bounded entirely by straight lines.

A treatise on the Sphere and Cylinder, in which various propositions relative to the surfaces and volumes of the sphere, cylinder, and cone, were demonstrated for the first time. Many of them are now familiarly known; for example, those which establish the ratio (⅔) between the volumes and the opposite side a tangent to the parabola. This was the first real example of the quadrature of a curvilinear space; that is, of the discovery of a rectilinear figure equal to an area not bounded entirely by straight lines.

The book on the Dimension of the Circle consists of 15 propositions. 1st. Every circle is equal to the area of a great circle and the surface of the sphere, and also between the surfaces, of the sphere and circumscribing cylinder; and the ratio (⅔) between the area of a great circle and the surface of the sphere. They are easily demonstrable by the modern analytical methods; but the original discovery and geometrical proof of them required the genius of Archimedes. Moreover, the legitimacy of the modern applications of analysis to questions concerning curved lines and surfaces, can only be proved by a kind of geometrical reasoning, of which Archimedes gave the first example. (See Lacroix, Diff. Cal. vol. i. pp. 63 and 431; and compare De Morgan, Diff. Cal. p. 32.)

The books On Floating Bodies (Περὶ τῶν ὅχοντων) contain demonstrations of the laws which determine the position of bodies immersed in water; and particularly of segments of spheres and parabolic cones. They are extant only in the Latin version of Commandino, with the exceptions of a fragment Περὶ τῶν Ῥυθομήνων in Ang. Mai's Collection, vol. i. p. 427.

The treatise entitled Laemmata is a collection of 15 propositions in plane geometry. It is derived from an Arabic MS. and its genuineness has been doubted. (See Torelli's preface.)

Eutocius of Ascalon, about A.D. 600, wrote a commentary on the Treatises on the Sphere and Cylinder, on the Dimension of the Circle, and on Centres of Gravity. All the works above mentioned, together with this Commentary, were found on the taking of Constantinople, and brought first into Italy and then into Germany. They were printed at Basle in 1544, in Greek and Latin, by Hervagius. Of the subsequent editions by far the best is that of Torelli, "Archim. quae super omnia, cum Eutocii Ascalonitae commentariis ex recens. Joseph. Torelli, Veronensi," Oxon 1792. It was founded upon the Basle edition except in the case of the Arearinaris, the text of which is taken from that of Dr. Wallis, who published this treatise and the Dimensio Circuli, with a translation and notes, at Oxford, in 1679. (The are reprinted in vol. iii. of his works.)

ARCHIMEDES, of Tralles, wrote commentaries upon Homer and Plato, and also a work upon mechanics. (Suidas, s. v.; Eudocia, p. 74.)

ARCHIMEDES (Ἀρχιμήδης), the author of an epitome on the great ship of Hippo, which appears to have been built about 220 B.C. (Athen. v. p. 209.) This epitome Brunck (Anecdot. ii. p. 64) added another, on an imitator of Euripides, the title of which, however, in the Vatican MS. is Ἀρχιμήδης, which there is no good reason for altering, although we have no other mention of a poet named Archimedes. [P. S.]

ARCHITNUS (Ἀρχίτνος). 1. An Athenian statesman and orator. He was a native of Cœle, and one of the leading Athenian patriots, who together with Thrasybulus and Anytus occupied Phyle, led the Athenian exiles back, and overthrew the government of the Thirty tyrants, B.C. 403. (Dumosth. c. Timoecrat. p. 742.) It was on the advice of Archinus that Thrasybulus proclaimed the general amnesty (Aeschin. c. 7; Juv. 743). Archinus, moreover, carried a law which afforded protection to those included in the amnesty against persecution. (Ioseot. in Callim. p. 618.) Although the name of Archinus is obscured in history by that of Thrasybulus, yet we have every reason for believing that he was a better and a greater man. Demosthenes says, that he was often accompanied Andronidas to Diacus, the commander of the Achaean, who expelled the garrison of Nabis from Argos, B.C. 194. (Liv. xxxiv. 40.)

2. A son of Achænus and Automate, and brother of Archavder, together with whom he carried on a war against Lacedaemon. (Paus. ii. 6 § 2.) He married Automate, the daughter of Danaus. (vii. 1 § 3.)

ARCHITNUS (Ἀρχίτνος), the author of a work on Areopag. (Pute. Quest. Græc. c. 39.)

ARCHON, the daughter of Heroicus, a Thessalian chief, whose children met with the tragic death mentioned by Livy. (xii. 4.)

ARCHON (Ἀρχών). 1. The Peloponnesian, appointed satrap of Babylonia after the death of Alexander, B.C. 323 (Justin, xiii. 4; Dion. xvi. 3), who calls the boy Euryonymus; Athen. ix. p. 410, &c.)

2. Of Asia Minor, one of those who defended the conduct of the Achæan league with reference to Sparta before Cecullus Mætius, B.C. 165. He was one of the Achæan ambassadors sent to Egypt in B.C. 168 (Polyb. xxiii. 10, xxix. 10), and is perhaps the same as the Archon, the brother of Xenarchus, mentioned by Livy. (xii. 29.)

ARCHYTAS (Ἀρχιτάς), of Athenia, a Greek poet, who was probably a contemporary of Ephorion, about B.C. 300, since it was a matter of doubt with the ancients themselves whether the epic poet Diogenes was the work of Archytas or Ephorion. (Athen. iii. p. 82.) Plutarch (Quast. Gr. 15) quotes from him an hexameter verse concerning the country of the Oolcani, and towards which he is said to have given up to be devoured by the fishes. The wit of the piece appears to have consisted chiefly in playing upon words, which Archytas was noted for carrying to great excess. (Schol. in Aristed. Vesp. 481, Bekker.) The other plays of Archytas, mentioned by the grammarians, are Ἀμφιρρώην, Ἡρακλῆς σαλαίον, Ὀνομ σαλιόν, Πλοῦσιτας, and Ποίμνος. Four of the lost plays which are assigned to Aristophanes, were by some ascribed to Archytas, namely, Πείρατος, Ναυαγός, Νικός, Νικός or Νικός. (Meinecke, i. 207—210.) Two Pythagorean philosophers of this name are mentioned in the list of Fabricius. (Bibl. Graec. i. p. 831.) [P. S.]

ARCHY'TAS (Ἀρχύτας), a Greek poet, who composed Andromeda to Diacus, the commander of the Achaean, to offer peace from the Romans, B.C. 146. He was slain by Diacus, but released upon the payment of forty minae. (Polyb. ix. 5, iii. 11, init.) There was another Archytas, an Athenian, who expelled the garrison of Nabis from Sparta before Caccilius Metellus, B.C. 194. (Quast. Gr. 15.)

ARCHY'TAS (Ἀρχύτας), an Athenian comic poet of the old comedy, gained a single prize at the Dionys. Lycian Vilus, p. xlii.; Taylor, v. p. 209.) To this epigram Branc (Analect., c. 103.) There was another Archippus, a son of Aclmcus and Automate, and brother of Archavder, together with whom he carried on a war against Lacedaemon. (Paus. ii. 6 § 2.) He married Automate, the daughter of Danaus. (vii. 1 § 3.)

ARCHY'TAS (Ἀρχύτας). 1. Father of the boy Euryonymus, whom Hercules killed by accident on his visit to Architeles. The father forgave Hercules, but Heracles nevertheless went into voluntary exile. (Apollod. ii. 7 § 6; Dion. xv. 36.)

ARCHY'TAS (Ἀρχύτας), a Greek poet, who may perhaps have been the author of the work Ἡρακλῆς σαλαίον, which is ascribed to Archytas of Tarentum. (Diog. Laert. viii. 82; Euseb. vii. 11.)

ARCHY'TAS (Ἀρχύτας), of Tarentum, who was distinguished as a philosopher, mathematician, general, and statesman, and was...
ARCHYTAS.

no less admired for his integrity and virtue, both in public and in private life. Little is known of his history, since the lives of him by Aristoxenus and Aristotle (Athen. xii. p. 545) are lost. A brief account of him is given by Diogenes Laërtius. (vii. 79—83.) His father's name was Mnesarchus, Mnesagoras, or Histiaeus. The time when he lived is disputed, but it was probably about 400 B.C., and onwards, so that he was contemporary with Plato, whose life is said to have saved by his influence with the tyrant Dionysius (Tzetzes, Chil. x. 339, xi. 362; Snidas, s. v. "Arýktas"); and with whom he kept up a familiar intercourse. (Cic. de Senec. 12.) Two letters which were supposed to have been addressed by him to Plato, and which are preserved by Diogenes (i. e.; Plato, Ep. 9). He was seven times the general of his city, though it was the custom for the office to be held for no more than a year, and he commanded in several campaigns, in all of which he was victorious. Civil affairs of the greatest consequence were entrusted to him by his fellow-citizens. After a life which secured to him a place among the very greatest men of antiquity, he was drowned while upon a voyage on the Adriatic. (Hor. Carm. i. 26.) He was greatly admired for his domestic virtues. He paid particular attention to the comfort and education of his slaves. The interest which he took in the education of children is proved by the mention of a child's rattle (παιδαφη) among his mechanical inventions. (Aelian, V. H. xiv. 19; Aristot. Pol. viii. 6. § 1.)

As a philosopher, he belonged to the Pythagorean school, and he appears to have been himself the founder of a new sect. Like the Pythagoreans in general, he paid much attention to mathematics. Horace (loc.) calls him "maris et terrae numersequarantem carentem annus Mensem." He solved the problem of the doubling of the cube, (Vitrav. ix. praef.) and invented the method of analytical geometry. He was the first who applied the principles of mathematics to mechanics. To his theoretical science he added the skill of a practical mechanician, and constructed various machines and automatons, among which his wooden flying dove in particular was the wonder of antiquity. (Gell. x. 12.) He also applied mathematics with success to musical science, and even to metaphysical philosophy. His influence as a philosopher was so great, that Plato was undoubtedly indebted to him for some of his views; and Aristotle is thought by some writers to have borrowed the idea of his categories, as well as some of his ethical principles, from Archytas.

The fragments and titles of works ascribed to Archytas are very numerous, but the genuineness of many of them is greatly doubted. Most of them are found in Stobaeus. They relate to physics, metaphysics, logic, and ethics. A catalogue of them is given by Fabricius. (Bib. Graec. p. 933.) Several of the fragments of Archytas are published in Gale, Opusc. Mythol. Cantab. 1671, Amst. 1668. A work ascribed to him "on the 10 Categories," was published by Camerarius, in Greek, under the title 'Αρχιτας εις τα τέχνην είδος λόγου καθαλοκοή Λίπα 1664; and in Greek and Latin, Ven. 1751. A full collection of his fragments is promised in the Tentamen de Archytas Tarcentini vita a qua operibus, a Jos. Navarro, of which only one part has yet appeared, Hafn. 1820.

From the statement of Iamblichus (Vit. Pyth. 23), that Archytas was a hearer of Pythagoras, some writers have thought that there were two Pythagorean philosophers of this name. But Iamblichus was undoubtedly mistaken. (Bentley's Plataris.) The writers of this name on agriculture (Diog. Laërt. l.c.; Varro, R. R. i. 1; Columella, R. R. i. 1, on cookery (διαπρωτρόνας, Iamblich, Vit. Pyth. 28, 34; Athen. xii. p. 516, c.), and on architecture (Diog. l.c. Vitr. v. praef.), are most probably identical with the philosopher, to whom the most various attainments are ascribed.

Busts of Archytas are engraved on Gronovius' Theorar. Antiq. Graec. ii. tab. 49, and in the Antich. d' Erocléus, v. tab. 29, 30.

APXOULOY ("Aρχιτας), of Miletus, is called by Dionysius of Halicarnassus (A. R. i. 68, &c.) the most ancient Greek poet, whence some writers have placed him even before the time of Homer; but the ancients who assign to him any certain date, agree in placing him about the commencement of the Olympiads. We know from good authority that his father's name was Teles, and that he was a descendant of Nautes. (Suid. s. v. "Aρχιτας;" Tzetzes, Chil. xiii. 641.) He is called a disciple of Homer, and from all we know about him, there was scarcely a poet in his time who deserved this title more than Archytas. He was the most distinguished among the so-called cyclic poets. There were in antiquity two epic poems belonging to the cycle, which are unanimously attributed to him. 1. The Αἰθέρία (Αἰθόρις), in five books. It was a kind of continuation of Homer's Iliad, and its chief heroes were Memnon, king of the Ethiopians, and Achilles, who slew him. The substance of it has been preserved by Proclus. 2. The Destruction of Troy ("Ιλίου περίοις), in two books, contained a description of the taking and destruction of Troy, and the subsequent events until the departure of the Greeks. The substance of this poem has likewise been preserved by Proclus. A portion of the Little Iliad was likewise called "Ιλίου περίοις, but the account which it gave differed materially from that of Archytas. (Lissaeus.) A third epic poem, called Τραχυώμαξις, that is, the fight of the gods with the Titans, and which was probably the first poem in the epic cycle, was ascribed by some to Eumelus of Corinth, and by others to Archytas. (Athen. i. p. 22, vii. p. 277.) The fragments of Archytas have been collected by Dintzer (Die Fragm. der ep. Poes, bis auf Alex. pp. 2, &c., 16, &c., 21, &c., Nucktroy, p. 16) and Dibner. (Nom. Carr. cit. et Cyci Epici Reliquiae, Paris, 1837.) Compare C. W. Müller, De Cyclo Graccorum Epico &c., 21, &c., p. 276, &c. (On the taking of Troy, &c. [L. S.]) and Tclephanes, who first added the inner lines of the temple of Artemis Alphcionia at the mouth of the Alpheus in Elis. He painted Artemis riding in outline with an indication also of the parts external to the external outline, but without colour, as in the designs of Fluxman and Retzsch. Pliny, after stating that the invention of the earliest form of drawing, namely, the external outline, as marked by the edge of the shadow (omnes hominè latise circumductae, or pictura liminius), was claimed by the Egyptians, the Corinthians, and the Sicyoniads, adds, that it was said to have been invented by Philodex, an Egyptian, or by Cleanthes, a Corinthian, and that the next step was made by Aricles and Telephanes, who first added the inner lines of the figure (spargentes tineas intus).

ARDEAS (Ἀρδέας), a son of Odysseus and Circe, the mythical founder of the town of Ardea in the country of the Rutuli. ( Dionys. i. 72; Steph. Byz. s. v. Ardeia.) [L. S.]

ARIDES of Corinth and TELEPHANES of Sicyon, were, according to Pliny (xxxv. 5), the first artists who practised the monogram, or drawing in outline with an indication also of the parts within the external outline, but without colour, as in the designs of Fluxman and Retzsch. Pliny, after stating that the invention of the earliest form of drawing, namely, the external outline, as marked by the edge of the shadow (omnes hominè latise circumductae, or pictura liminius), was claimed by the Egyptians, the Corinthians, and the Sicyoniads, adds, that it was said to have been invented by Philodex, an Egyptian, or by Cleanthes, a Corinthian, and that the next step was made by Aricles and Telephanes, who first added the inner lines of the figure (spargentes tineas intus). [P. S.]

ARYDS (Ἀρης). 1. King of Lydia, succeeded his father Gyges, and reigned from b.c. 630 to 631. He took Priene and made war against Miletus. During his reign the Cimmerians, who had been driven out of their abodes by the Nomad Scythians, took Sardis, with the exception of the citadel. (Herod. i. 15, 16; Paus. iv. 24. § 1.)

2. An experienced general, commanded the right wing of the army of Antiochus the Great in his siege of Seleucia. (Polyb. v. 53, 60.)

ARIGONIS (Ἀριγόνις), according to the Orphic Argonautica (127), the wife of Ampycus and mother of Mopsus. Hyginus (Fab. 14.) and other Chaldean writers give different names.

ARIEIA (Ἀριήα), the warlike. 1. A surname of Aphrodite, when represented in full armour like Ares, as was the case at Sparta. (Paus. iii. 17. § 5.)

2. A surname of Athena, under which she was worshipped at Athens. Her statue, together with those of Ares, Aphrodite, and Enyo, stood in the temple of Athene at Athens. (Paus. i. 8. § 4.) Her worship under this name was instituted by Orestes after he had been acquitted by the Areopagus of the murder of his mother. (I. c. § 6.) It was Athena Areia who gave her casting vote in cases of frequent mention by Themistius, who says that Augustus valued him not less than Asippus. (Themist. Orat. v. p. 63, d. vii. p. 108, b. x. p. 130, b. xii. p. 175, c. ed. Petav. 1684.) From Quintilian (ii. 15. § 36, iii. 1. § 16) it appears, that Areius also taught or wrote on rhetoric. (Comp. Sene. consol. ad Marc. 4; Aelian, V. H. xii. 25; Suid. s. v. Echew.) [L. S.]

AREIUS, LECA'NIUS (Ἀρείος, Ῥκανίου), a Greek physician, one of whose medical formulae is quoted by Andromachus (ap. Gal. De Compog. Medicam. sec. Gen. v. 13, vol. xiii. p. 840), and who must therefore have lived in or before the first century after Christ. He may perhaps be the same person who is several times quoted by Galen, and who is sometimes called a follower of Asclepiades, Ἀσκλεπιάδηκος (De Compog. Medicam. sec. Gen. x. 2. vol. xii. p. 182; De Compog. Medicam. sec. Gen. xiv. 15, vol. xiii. p. 857), sometimes a native of Tarsus in Cilicia (De Compog. Medicam. sec. Lecos. iii. 1. vol. xii. p. 636; ibid. ix. 2. vol. xiii. p. 247), and sometimes mentioned without any distinguishing epithet. (De Compog. Medicam. sec. Lecos. x. 2. vol. xiii. p. 347; De Compog. Medicam. sec. Gen. x. 11, vol. xiii. p. 327, 329, 332.) He may perhaps be the person who is said by Sonnus (Vita Hippocr. init., in Hipp. Opera, vol. iii. p. 850) to have written on the life of Hippocrates, and to whom Dioscorides addresses his work on Materia Medica. (vol. i. p. 1.) Whether all these passages refer to the same individual it is impossible to say for certain, but the writer is not aware of any chronological or other difficulties in the supposition. [W. A. G.]

ARELLIUS, a painter who was celebrated at Rome a little before the reign of Augustus, but degraded the art by painting goddesses after the likeness of his own mistresses. (Plin. xxxvi. 37.)

AREL'THIOUS ('Αρελθιος), king of Arne in the country of the Rutuli. (Dionys. i. 72; Steph. Byz. s. v. Ardeia.) [L. S.]

ARELYCUS (Ἀρέλυκος), king of Arne in the country of the Rutuli. (Dionys. i. 72; Steph. Byz. s. v. Ardeia.) [L. S.]

ARELYLUS (Ἀρελύλος), a native of Athens, who was claimed by Dionysius and Nicamor, are said to have instructed Augustus in philosophy. (Suet. Aug. 89.)

Areius or ARIUS (Ἀρείος), a citizen of Alexandria, a Pythagorean or Stoic philosopher in the time of Augustus, who esteemed him so highly, that after the conquest of Alexandria, he declared that he spared the city chiefly for the sake of Areius. (Plat. Aut. 80, Appolit. p. 207; Dion Cass. ii. 16; Julian. Epist. 51; comp. Strab. iv. p. 670.) Areius as well as his two sons, Dionysius and Nicamor, are said to have instructed Augustus in philosophy. (Suet. Aug. 89.)

He is frequently mentioned by Themistius, who says that Augustus valued him not less than Asippus. (Themist. Orat. v. p. 63, d. viii. p. 108, b. x. p. 130, b. xii. p. 175, c. ed. Petav. 1684.) From Quintilian (ii. 15. § 36, iii. 1. § 16) it appears, that Areius also taught or wrote on rhetoric. (Comp. Sene. consol. ad Marc. 4; Aelian, V. H. xii. 25; Suid. s. v. Echew.) [L. S.]

[W. A. G.]

AREL I L IUS, a painter who was celebrated at Rome a little before the reign of Augustus, but degraded the art by painting goddesses after the likeness of his own mistresses. (Plin. xxxvi. 37.)

AREL'IUS FUSCUS. (Fuscus.)

ARENE. (Aphareus.)

* In this latter passage, instead of Ἀρείος Ἀσκλεπιάδηκος we should read Ἀρείος Ἀσκλεπιάδηκας. (Asclepiades Areius.)
C. ARENNIUS and L. ARENNIUS, were tribunes of the plebs in B.C. 210. L. Arennius was praefect of the allies two years afterwards, B.C. 208, and was taken prisoner in the battle in which Marcellus was defeated by Hannibal. (Liv. xxvii. 6, 26, 27.)

ARES (Ἀρες), the god of war and one of the great Olympian gods of the Greeks. He is represented as the son of Zeus and Hera. (Hom. H. v. 898, &c.; Hes. Theog. 921; Apollod. i. 3. § 1.) A later tradition, according to which Hera conceived Ares by touching a certain flower, appears to be an imitation of the legend about the birth of Aphrodite. (Ovid. Met. viii. 361; Stat. Theb. vii. 42; Herod. iv. 59, 62.) In Scythia he was worshipped in the form of a sword, to which not only horses and other cattle, but men also were sacrificed. Respecting the worship of an Egyptian divinity called Ares, see Herodotus, ii. 64. He was further worshipped in Colchis, where the golden fleece was suspended on an oak-tree in a grove sacred to him. (Apollod. i. 9. § 16.) From thence the Dioscuri were believed to have brought to Laconia the ancient statue of Ares which was preserved in the temple of Ares Tharthos, on the road from Sparta to Thermopylae. (Paus. iii. 19. § 7, &c.) The island near the coast of Colchis, in which the Spartan cultus of Ares was believed to have its seat, and which is called the island of Ares, Arethus, Arias, or Chalcritis, was likewise sacred to him. (Steph. Byz. s. v. "Ἀρες ἵριος"; Apollon. Rhod. ii. 1047; Plin. H.N. vi. 12; Pomp. Mela, ii. 7. § 15.)

In Greece itself the worship of Ares was not very general. At Athens he had a temple containing a statue made by Alcamenes (Paus. i. 8. § 5); at Geronthrae in Laconia he had a temple with a grove, where an annual festival was celebrated, during which no woman was allowed to approach the temple. (iii. 22. § 5.) He was also worshipped near Tegae, and in the town (viii. 44. § 6, 45. § 3), at Olympia (v. 15. § 4), near Thbes (Apollod. iii. 4. § 1), and at Sparta, where there was an ancient statue, representing the god in conflagration. Ares, however, also indicates that the martial spirit and victory were never to leave the city of Sparta. (Paus. iii. 15. § 5.) At Sparta human sacrifices were offered to Ares. (Apollod. Fragm. p. 1056, ed. Heyne.) The temples of this god were usually built outside the towns, probably to suggest the idea that he was to prevent enemies from approaching them.

All the stories about Ares and his worship in the countries north of Greece seem to indicate that his worship was introduced in the latter country from Thrace; and the whole character of the god, as described by the most ancient poets of Greece, seems to have been thought little suited to be represented in works of art; in fact, we hear of no artistic representation of Ares previous to the time of Alcamenes, who appears to have created the ideal of Ares. There are few Greek monuments now extant with representations of the god; he appears principally on coins, reliefs, and gems. (Hirt. Mythol. Bilderb. i. p. 51.) The Romans identified their god Mars with the Greek Ares. [MARS.] (L. 8.)

A'RESAS (Ἀρέσας), of Lucania, and probably of Creton, was at the head of the Pythogean school, and the sixth in succession from Pythagoras. Some attribute to him a work "about Human Nature," of which a fragment is preserved by Stobaeus:
Should this text be marked as suitable for translation into other languages?
remained behind in Syria, invaded Arabia Petraea, but was unable to reach Petra. He laid waste, however, the surrounding country, and withdrew his army on Aretas' paying 300 talents. (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 5. § 1.) This expedition of Scaurus is commemorated on a coin, which is given under Scaurus. The successors of Scaurus in Syria also prosecuted the war with the Arabs. (Appiam, Syr. 50.)

3. The father-in-law of Herod Antipas of Judea. Herod dismissed his wife, the daughter of Aretas, in consequence of having formed an incestuous connexion with Herodias, his brother Philip's wife, as we learn from the Evangelists. To revenge the wrongs of his daughter, Aretas made war upon Herod, and defeated him in a great battle. Herod applied for assistance to the Romans; and Vitellius, the governor of Syria, received an order to punish Aretas. He accordingly marched against Petra; but while he was on the road, he received intelligence of the death of Tiberius (A. D. 37), and gave up the expedition in consequence. (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 5. §§ 1, 3.) This expedition of Scaurus is commemorated on a coin, which is given under Scaurus, 278 Aretes.

COIN OF ARETAS.

ARETAS ('Aretas), king of Damascus, but whether it belongs to No. 2 or No. 3 is doubtful. (Eckhel, iii. p. 330.) Perhaps it is a coin of No. 2, and may have been struck when he took possession of Syria at the invitation of the inhabitants of Damascus; in that case there would have been good reason for the inscription ΦΙΛΑΔΕΛΦΟΝ upon it.

ARETA (Aretha), the wife of Alcimus, king of the Phaeacians. In the Odyssey she appears as a noble and active superintendent of the household of her husband, and when Odysseus arrived in the island, he first applied to queen Arete to obtain hospitable reception and protection. (Hom. Od. vi. 310, vii. 65, &c. 142.) Respecting her connexion with the story of Jason and Medea, see Alcimus. [L. S.]

ARETE (Arete), daughter of Alcimus, king of the Phaeacians. She was first married to Theorides, and upon his death to her uncle Dion, the brother of her mother Aristomache. After Dion had fled from Syracuse during the reign of the younger Dionysius, Arete was compelled by her brother to marry Timocrates, one of his friends; but she was again received by Dion as his wife, when he had obtained possession of Syracuse and expelled the younger Dionysius. After Dion's assassination, c. c. 353, Arete was imprisoned together with her mother, and brought forth a son while in confinement. Arete and Aristomache were subsequently liberated and kindly received by Hierocles, one of Dion's friends, but he was afterwards murdered by the enemies of Dion to crown them. (Plut. Dion. 6, 21, 51, 57, 58; Aelian, V. H. xii. 47, who erroneously makes Arete the mother, and Aristomache the wife of Dion.)

ARETE (Arete), daughter of Aristippus, the founder of the Cyrenaic school of philosophy. She was instructed by him in the principles of his system, which she transmitted to her son, Aristippus ἀμφιβάλλων, to whom Ritter (Gesch. der Phil. vii. 1. 3) ascribes the formal completion of the earlier Cyrenaic doctrine. We are told by Diogenes Laërtius (ii. 72), that her father taught her contentment and moderation, both by precept and practice, and the same duties are insisted on in an epistle now extant, said to be addressed to her by him. This letter is certainly spurious, although Laërtius mentions among the writings of Aristippus an ἑκτονότητα πρὸς Ἀρητῆν τῷ ὕπαγοντα. Whether the letter to which he refers was the same as that which we possess, is uncertain; but the fact that it was extant in his time would not prove its authenticity. Aelian (H. A. i. 40) calls Arete the sister of Aristippus, but this assertion is opposed to the statement of all other writers; and, besides, the passage which contains it is corrupt. (Diog. Laer. ii. 72, 86; Brucker, Hist. Crit. Phil. ii. 2, 3.)

ARETES of Dyrrachium, an ancient chronicographer, some of whose calculations Censorinus (De Nat. 18, 21) mentions.

ARETHA or ARETHUSA. 1. Archbishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia at an uncertain time (a.d. 540, according to Coccius and Cave), appears to have succeeded ANDREAS. He wrote a commentary on the Apocalypse (συλλογὴ ἐξερήσεως ἐκ διαφόρων ἀγώνων εἰς τὴν ἔκδοσιν τοῦ ἐκατοντάκτου ἀποκάλυψης), which, as its title implies, was compiled from many previous works, and especially from that of Andreas. It is usually printed with the works of OECUMENIUS.

2. Presbyter of Caesarea in Cappadocia, wrote a work "on the translation of St. Euthymius, patriarch of Constantinople," who died A.D. 611. The date of Arethus is therefore fixed at 920. (Codinus, Comment. de Script. Eccles. ii. p. 426, who, without sufficient reason, identifies the former Arethusa with this writer.)

3. The author of an epigram "On his own Sister" (ἐπὶ τῇ Ἱδε ἀδελφῇ), which is found in the Vatican MS. under the title of Ἀρεθος τοῦ Σακκάνου. (Jacobs, Paradip, ex Cod. Vatic. No. 211, in Anthol. Graec. xiii. p. 744.) If the words added in the margin, γεγονότος δὲ κα ἀρχετοσακκάνος Κασσανίους Κατσανιάκος, may b taken as an authority, he was the same person a the Archbishop of Caesarea. [P. E.]
ARGAEUS.

Sicilian nymphs, and as the divinity who inspired pastoral poetry. The Syracusans represented on many of their coins the head of Arethusa surrounded by dolphins. (Rasche, Lec. Numism. i. 1, p. 107.) One of the Hesperides likewise bore the name of Arethusa. (Apollod. ii. § 11.) [L. S.]

M. ARETHUSIUS (Ἀρέθυσιος), the author of a confession of faith, promulgated in the third council of Sirmium, A. D. 359, and was subsequently a martyr under Julian. (Socrat. H. E. ii. 30, with Valerius' note; Nazian. Orat. 48; Tillemont, vii. p. 726.)

ARGATUS (Ἀργατός). Two mythical personages of this name are mentioned in Homer. (Od. xxvii. 494, 517, and Od. iii. 413.) [L. S.]

A'REUS I. (Ἀρέας), succeeded his grandfather, Cleomenes II., as king of Sparta, of the Eurystheid family, B. C. 309, his father, ACROTATUS, having died before him. He reigned 44 years. (Diod. xx. 29.)

In the year 280 B. C., a league of the Greek states was formed, at the instigation of Sparta, acting under the influence of its ally, Ptolemy. (Diod. xiv. 92. 14.)

ARGAEUS. 279

ARGAEUS, the son of Argus, the builder of the ship Argo. (Horn. ii. 103, and Apollod. ii. 7. § 2.) [L. S.]

ARGALUS (Ἀργὰλος), the eldest son of Amyclas, and his successor in the throne of Sparta. (Paus. iii. 1. § 3.)

ARGANTHONUS (Ἀργανθόνος), a fair maiden in Mycia, who used to hunt alone in the forests. (Diod. xiv. 92. 14.)

ARGAS (Ἀργάς), who is described as ἀυτοκράτωρ καὶ ἀργαλόντι τινος. (Plut. Dem. 4; Athen. xiv. p. 638, c. d., comp. iv. p. 131, b.)

ARGARIA (Ἀργαρία). 1. A surname of Hera derived from Argos, the principal seat of her worship. (Paus. iii. 13. § 6.)

2. Argaria also occurs as the name of several mythical personages, as—α. The wife of Imacus and mother of Io. (Hygin. Fab. 143; comp. Apoll. ii. 1. § 8.)
 β. The wife of Polybus and mother of Arges, the builder of the ship Argo. (Hygin. Fab. 14.) c. A daughter of Adrastus and Amphithene, and wife of Polycleites. (Apollod. i. 9. § 18, iii. 6. § 1; Hygin. Fab. 72.)
 γ. A daughter of Astion and wife of Aristodemus, the Hermeal, by whom she became the mother of Eurythennes and Procles. (Herod. vi. 52; Paus. iv. 3. § 3; Apollod. ii. 7. § 2.)

ARGEIPHONTES (Ἀργειφόντες), a surname of Hermes, by which he is designated as the murderer of Argus Panoptes. (Hom. H. ii. 108, and numerous other passages in the Greek and Latin poets.) [L. S.]

ARGEUS (Ἀργεύς), was one of the Elean deputies sent to Persia to co-operate with Pelopidas.
ARGONAUTAE.

ARGIUS, a sculptor, was the disciple of Polykleitos, and therefore flourished about 388 B.C. (Plin. xxxiv. 18.) Thiersch (A. H. C.) says that he lived about 367, as one of the leaders of the democratic party in Athens. (Plut. Lyce. 25, Argoph. Loc.)

ARGO. [Cyclopae.] ARGILEONIS ('Apyevis), mother of Brasidas. When the ambassadors from Amphipolis brought the news of his death, she asked if he had behaved bravely; and on their speaking of him in reply as the best of the Spartans, answered, that the sworriers were in error; Brasidas was a brave man, but there were many better in Sparta. The answer became famous, and Argileonis is said to have been rewarded for it by the epigram of Plut. Fab. 176. [L. S.]

ARGIUS, a sculptor, who was the disciple of Polykleitos, and therefore flourished about 388 B.C. (Plin. xxxiv. 15.) Thiersch (Epochen, p. 275) supposes that Pliny, in the words "Argius, Asopo- doros," alludes to his Greek authority, which had "Argius, Asopo- doros, "Asopo- dorus the Ar- give." But Argius is found as a Greek proper name in both the forms, "Argius and Argi- yon." (Apollod. ii. 1 & § 5; Aristoph. Eccles. 201.) [P. S.]

ARGO. [ARGONAUTAE.]

ARGONAUTAE [Argonovairos], the heroes and demigods who, according to the traditions of the Greeks, undertook the first bold maritime expedition to Colchis, a far distant country on the coast of the Euxine, for the purpose of fetching the golden fleece. They derived their name from the ship Argo, in which the voyage was made, and which was constructed by Argus at the command of Jason, the leader of the Argonauts. The time which the Greek traditions assign to this enterprise is about one generation before the Trojan war. The story of the expedition seems to have been known to the author of the Odyssey (xii. 69, &c.), who states, that the ship Argo was the only one that ever passed between the whirling rocks (ναύσαν πληξηταν). Jason is mentioned several times in the Iliad (vii. 467, &c., xxi. 40, xviii. 743, &c.), but not as the leader of the Argonauts. [Jason.]

ARGONAUTAE. [Ares.]

Ares, the god of war. The story of the expedition seems to have been the architect. He also wrote on the proportions of the Corinthian order (de Symm. Corinthi). His time is unknown. (Vitruv. vii. praef. § 12.) [P. S.]

ARGENNIS ('Apyevis), a surname of Apro- dite, which she derived from Argennus, a favourite of Agamemnon, after whose death, in the river Cephissus, Agamemnon built a sanctuary of Aphro- dite. (Steph. Byz. s. v. 'Apyevis; Athen. xvii. p. 608.) [L. E.]

M. ARGENTARIUS, the author of about thirty epigrams in the Greek Anthology, most of which are erotic, and some are plays on words. We may infer from his style that he did not live before the time of the Roman empire, but nothing more is known of his age. (Jacobs, Anthol. Graece. xiii. pp. 860, 861.) [P. S.]

ARGES. [Cyclopae.] ARGILEONIS ('Apyevis), mother of Bras- dias. When the ambassadors from Amphipolis brought the news of his death, she asked if he had behaved bravely; and on their speaking of him in reply as the best of the Spartans, answered, that the sworriers were in error; Brasidas was a brave man, but there were many better in Sparta. The answer became famous, and Argileonis is said to have been rewarded for it by the epigram of Plut. Lyce. 25, Argoph. Loc.)

ARGIOPE ('Apyevis), a nymph by whom Philammon begot the celebrated bard, Thamyris. She lived at first on mount Parnassus, but when Philammon refused to take her into his house as his wife, she left Parnassus and went to the coun- try of the Odrysians in Thrace. (Apollod. i. 3. § 3; Paus. iv. 33. § 4.) Two other mythical personages of this name occur in Diod. iv. 33, and Hygin. Fab. 176. [L. S.]

ARGIS, an artist, in whose time the Erythraean sea is difficult to understand. Pin¬ dor, in his account of his journeying a piece of land with his adamantine plough drawn by fire-breath¬ ing oxen, Jason undertook the task, and, following the advice of Medea, he remained unhurt by the fire of the oxen, and accomplished what had been demanded of him. The golden fleece, which Jason himself had to fetch, was hung up in a thicket, and guarded by a fearful dragon, thicker and longer than the ship of the Argonauts. Jason succeeded by a stratagem in slaying the dragon, and on his return he secretly carried away Medea with him. They sailed home by the Erythraean sea, and arrived in Lemnos. In this account of Pindar, all the Argonauts are thrown into the background, and Jason alone appears as the acting hero. The brief description of their return through the Erythraean sea is difficult to understand. Pindar, as the Scholar on Apollonius Rhodius (iv. 230) and like some other poets, makes the Argonauts return through the Hellespont, which he must be supposed that they en¬ tered through the river Phasis; so that they sailed from the Euxine through the river Phasis into the
The Erythraean sea in this account is the eastern coast of Libya. Here the Argonauts landed, and carried their ship through Libya on their shoulders. As it was in most cases the object of the poets to make them return through some unknown country, it was necessary, in later times, to shift their road, accordingly as geographical knowledge became more and more extended. While thus Pindar makes them return through the eastern coast, others, such as Apollonius Rhodius and Apollodorus, make them sail from the Euxine into the river Axios and Eridanus into the western ocean, or the Adriatic; and others, again, such as the Pseudo-Orpheus, Timaeus, and Scymnus of Chios, represent them as sailing through the river Tannis into the northern ocean, and round the northern countries of Europe. A fourth set of traditions, which was adopted by Herodotus, Callimachus, and Diodorus Siculus, made them return by the same way as they had sailed to Colchis.

All traditions, however, agree in stating, that the object of the Argonauts was to fetch the golden fleece which was kept in the country of Aetes. This fleece was regarded as golden as early as the time of Hesiod, and Pherecydes (Eratost. Cathet. 19), but in the exactt works of Hesiod there is no trace of this tradition, and Mimermerus only calls it "a large fleece in the town of Aetes, where the rays of Helios rest in a golden chamber.

"Simonides and Aeacius described it as of purple colour" (Schol. ad Eurip. Med. 5, ad Apollon. Rhod. iv. 1147). If, therefore, the tradition in this form had any historical foundation at all, it would seem to suggest, that a trade in furs with the countries north and east of the Euxine was carried on by the Minarys in and about Iolcus at a very early time, and that some bold mercantile enterprise to those countries gave rise to the story about the Argonauts. In later traditions, the fleece is universally called the golden fleece, and the tremendous man who wore it is designated by the name of Chrysomallus, and called a son of Poseidon and Theophane, the daughter of Brisaltus in the island of Crunissa. (Hygin. Fáb. 188.) Strabo (xi. p. 499; comp. Appian, de Bell. Mithrid. 103) endeavours to explain the story about the golden fleece from the Colchians' collecting by means of skins the gold sand which was carried down in the rivers from the mountains.

The ship Argo is described as a penteconters, that is, a ship with fifty oars, and is said to have conveyed the same number of heroes. The Scholiast on Lykophron (178) is the only writer who states the number of the heroes to have been one hundred, but the name of none of these heroes are not the same in all the lists of the Argonauts, and it is a useless task to attempt to reconcile them. (Apoll. l. 9. § 16; Hygin. Fab. 14, with the commentators; compare the catalogue of the Argonauts in Burmann's edition of Val. Flaccus.) An account of the writers who had made the expedition of the Argonauts the subject of poems or critical investigations, and whose works were used by Apollonius Rhodius, is given by the Scholiast on this poet. Besides the Argonautics of the Pseudo-Orpheus, we now possess only those of Apollonius Rhodius, and his Roman imitator, Valerius Flaccus. The account which is preserved in Apollodorus' Bibliotheca (i. 9. §§ 16—37) is derived from the best sources that were extant in his time, and chiefly from Pherecydes. We shall give his account here, partly because it is the plainest, and partly because it may fill up those parts which Pindar in his description has touched upon but slightly.

When Jason was commissioned by his uncle Pelias of Iolcus to fetch the golden fleece, which was suspended on an oak-tree in the grove of Argos in Colchis, and was guarded day and night by a dragon, he commanded Argus, the son of Phrixus, to build a ship with fifty oars, in the prow of which Athene inserted a piece of wood from the speaking oaks in the grove at Dodona, and he invited all the heroes of his time to take part in the expedition. Their first landing-place after leaving Iolcus was the island of Lemnos, where all the women had just before murdered their fathers and husbands, in consequence of the anger of Aphrodite. These alone had been saved by his daughters and his wife Hypsipyle. The Argonauts united themselves with the women of Lemnos, and Hypsipyle bore to Jason two sons, Euneus and Nebrophous. From Lemnos the Argonauts sailed to the country of the Doliones, where king Ceyxus received them hospitably. They left the country during the night, and being thrown back on the coast by a contrary wind, they were taken for Pelasgians, the enemies of the Doliones, and a struggle ensued, in which Ceyxus was slain; but being recognised by the Argonauts, they buried him and mourned over his fate. They next landed in Myssia, where they left behind Hecules and Polyphemus, who had gone into the country in search of Hylas, whom a nymph had carried off while he was fetching water for his companions. In the country of the Bebryces, king Amycus challenged the Argonauts to fight with him; and when Polydusces was killed by him, the Argonauts in revenge slew many of the Bebryces, and sailed to Salmydessus in Thrace. There they were kindly received by the Harpies. When the Argonauts consulted him about their voyage, he promised his advice on condition of their delivering him from the Harpies. This was done by Zetes and Calais, two sons of Boreas; and Phineus now advised them, before sailing through the Symplogades, to mark the flight of a dove, and to judge from its fate of what they themselves would have to do. When they approached the Symplogades, they sent out a dove, which in its rapid flight between the rocks lost only the end of its tail. The Argonauts now, with the assistance of Hera, followed the example of the dove, sailed quickly between the rocks, and succeeded in passing through without injuring their ship, with the exception of some pieces of copper which were lost at the stern. Hencesforth the Symplogades stood immoveable in the sea. On their arrival in the country of the Mariandyni, the Argonauts were kindly received by their king, Lycus. The seer Idmon and the helmsman Tiphys died here, and the place of the latter was supplied by Ancus. They now sailed along the Theronos and the Cauccus, until they arrived at the...

mouth of the river Phasis. The Colchian king Acestes promised to give up the golden fleece, if Jason alone would yoke to a plough two fire-breathing oxen with brazen feet, and sow the teeth of the dragon which had not been used by Cadmus at Thebes, and which he had received from Athena. The love of Medea furnished Jason with means to resist fire and steel, on condition of his taking her as his wife; and she taught him how he was to create feuds among and kill the warriors that were to spring up from the teeth of the dragon. While Jason was engaged upon his task, Acestes formed plans for burning the ship Argo and for killing all the Greek heroes. But Medea's magic powers sent to sleep the dragon who guarded the golden fleece; and after Jason had taken possession of the treasure, he and his Argonauts, together with Medea and her young brother Absyrtus, embarked by night and sailed away. Acestes pursued them, but before he overtook them, Medea murdered her brother, cut him into pieces, and threw his limbs overboard, that her father might be detained in his pursuit by collecting the limbs of his child. Acestes at last returned home, but sent out a great number of Colchians, threatening them with the punishment intended for Medea, if they returned without her. While the Colchians were dispersed in all directions, the Argonauts had already reached the mouth of the river Eridanus. But Zeus, in his anger at the murder of Absyrtus, raised a storm which cast the ship from its road. When driven on the Absyrtian islands, the ship began to speak, and declared that the anger of Zeus would not cease, unless they sailed towards Aeaean territory. They then sailed away along the coast of Tyrrhenia, they arrived in the island of Aeaea, where Circe purified them. When they had crossed the Ligyans and Celts, and through the sea of Sardinia, and continuing their course along the coast of Tyrrhenia, they arrived in the island of Aeaean, where Circe purified them. When they were passing by the Sirens, Orpheus sang to prevent the Argonauts being allured by them. But Acestes, however, swam to them, but Aphrodite carried him to Lilybaeum. Thetis and the Nereids con¬†empt the Argonauts being allured by them. But Acestes, however, swam to them, but Aphrodite carried him to Lilybaeum. Thetis and the Nereids consented to save the Argonauts, was according to Apollodorus (ii. 9 § 6, 16), a son of Phrixus. Apollonius Rhodius (i. 112) calls him a son of Aestes, and others a son of Hestor or Polybus. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 4, ad Lycoph. 489; Hygin. Fab. 14; Val. Place, i. 39, who calls him a Thespis.) Argus, the son of Phrixus, was sent by Acestes, his grandfather, after the death of Phrixus, to take possession of his inheritance in Greece. On his voyage thither he suffered shipwreck, which was caused by Jason in the island of Aetias, and carried back to Colchis. (Apollon. Rhod. ii. 1095, &c.; Hygin. Fab. 21.) Hyginus (Fab. 3) relates that after the death of Phrixus, Argus intended to flee with his brothers to Athens. [L. S.]

ARGUS ("Argys"). 1. The third king of Argos, was a son of Zeus and Niobe. (Apollod. ii. 1 § 1, &c.) A Scholiast (ad Hom. li. i. 115) calls him a son of Apis, whom he succeeded in the kingdom of Argos. It is from this Argus that the country afterwards called Argolis and all Pelopon¬esus derived the name of Argos. (Hygin. Fab. 145; Paus. ii. 16 § 1, 22 § 6, 34 § 5.) By Eury¬adne, or according to others, by Peitho, he became the father of Jason, Pelanthus or Peiras, Epi¬daurus, Criasus, and Tityra. (Schol. ad Eurip. Phoen. 115, 1147; ad Eurip. Orest. 1252, 1248, 230.)

2. Surnamed Panoptes. His parentage is stated differently, and his father is called Aegon, Arestor, Inachus, or Argus, whereas some accounts described him as an Autochthon. (Apollod. ii. 1 § 2, &c.; Or. Met. i. 264.) He derived his surname, Panoptes, the all-seeing, from his possessing a hundred eyes, some of which were always awake. He was of superhuman strength, and after he had slain a fierce bull which ravaged Arcadia, a Satyr who robbed and violated persons, the serpent Echidna, which rendered the roads unsafe, and the murderers of Apis, who was according to some ac¬counts his father, Hera appointed him guardian of the cow into which Io had been metamorphosed. (Comp. Schol. ad Eurip. Phoen. 1151, 1213.) Zeus commissioned Hermes to carry off the cow, and Hera established the task, according to some accounts, by stoning Argus to death, or ac¬cording to others, by sending him to sleep by the sweetness of his play on the flute and then cutting off his head. Hera transplanted his eyes to the tail of the peacock, her favourite bird. (Aeschyl. Prom.; Apoll. Od. ii. cc.)

3. The builder of the Argo, the ship of the Argo¬nants, was according to Apollodorus (ii. 9 § 6, 16), a son of Phrixus. Apollonius Rhodius (i. 112) calls him a son of Arestor, and others a son of Hestor or Polybus. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 4, ad Lycoph. 489; Hygin. Fab. 14; Val. Place, i. 39, who calls him a Thespian.) Argus, the son of Phrixus, was sent by Acestes, his grandfather, after the death of Phrixus, to take possession of his inheritance in Greece. On his voyage thither he suffered shipwreck, which was caused by Jason in the island of Aetias, and carried back to Colchis. (Apollon. Rhod. ii. 1095, &c.; Hygin. Fab. 21.) Hyginus (Fab. 3) relates that after the death of Phrixus, Argus intended to flee with his brothers to Athens. [L. S.]

ARGYRA ("Argeps"), the nymph of a well in Achaia, was in love with a beautiful shepherd-boy, Seleucus, and visited him frequently, but when his youthful beauty vanished, she forsook him. The boy now pined away with grief, and Aphro¬dite, moved to pity, changed him into the river Argeps, from which Seleucus derived the name of Argus. (Hygin. Fab. 21.) Hyginus (Fab. 3) relates that after the death of Phrixus, Argus intended to flee with his brothers to Athens. [L. S.]

ARGYRUS, ISAAC, a Greek monk, who lived about the year A. D. 1273. He is the author of a considerable number of works, but only one of them has yet been published, viz. a work...
Aenus in Thessaly. It was first edited, with a dedication to Andronicus, praefect of the town of upon the method of finding the time when Easter culls him (7 rcius, and one of the commanders of the fleet of ed. London.) [L. S.J xi. p. 126, &c.; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. Appendix. p. 63, ed. London.]

ARIABIGNES (Ἀριαβίγην), the son of Dareius, and one of the commanders of the fleet of his brother Xerxes, fell in the battle of Salamis, u. c. 480. (Herod. vii. 97, viii. 89.) Plutarch calls him (Them. c. 14) Ariameses, and speaks of him as a brave man and the justest of the brothers of Xerxes. The same writer relates (de Frateru, Am. p. 448; comp. Apoll. p. 173) that this Ariameses (called by Justin, ii. 10, Artemenes) had claim to the throne on the death of Dareius, as the eldest of his sons, but was opposed by Xerxes, who maintained that he had a right to the crown as the eldest of the sons born after Dareius had become king. The Persians appointed Artabazanes to decide the dispute; and upon his declaring in favour of Xerxes, who maintained his brother as king, and was treated by him with great respect. According to Herodotus (vii. 2), who calls the eldest son of Dareius, Artabazones, this dispute took place in the life-time of Dareius.

ARIADNE (Ἀριάδνη), a daughter of Minos and Pasiphae or Creta. (Apollod. iii. 1. § 2) When Theseus was sent by his father to convey the tribute of the Athenians to Minotaurus, Ariadne fell in love with him, and gave him the string by means of which he found his way out of the Labyrinth, and which she herself had received from Theseus. The heroines in turn promised to marry her (Plut. Thea. 19; Hygin. Fab. 49; Dicyum. de Odys. xi. 629), and she accordingly left Crete with him; but when they arrived in the island of Dia (Naxos), she was killed there by Artemis. (Horn. Od. xi. 324.) The words added in the Odyssey, Δωνεύον ματρόφιγρα, are difficult to understand, unless we interpret them with Pherecydes by " on the denunciation of Dionysus," because he was indignant at the profanation of his goat by the love of Theseus and Ariadne.

In this case Ariadne was probably killed by Artemis at the moment she gave birth to her twin children, for she is said to have had two sons by Theseus, Oenopion and Staphylus. The more common tradition, however, was, that Theseus left Ariadne in Naxos alive; but here the statements again differ, for some relate that he was forced by Dionysus to leave her (Diod. iv. 61, v. 51; Paus. i. 20. § 2, i. 49. § 2, x. 29, § 2), and that in his grief he forgot to take down the black sail, which occasioned the death of his father. According to others, Theseus faithlessly forsook her in the island, and different motives are given for this act of faithlessness.

(Plut. Thea. 20; Ov. Met. viii. 175, Heroid. 10; Hygin. Fab. 43.) According to this tradition, Ariadne put an end to her own life in despair, or was saved by Dionysus, who in amazement at her beauty made her his wife, raised her among the immortals, and placed the crown which he gave her at his marriage with her, among the stars. (Hesiod. Theog. 949; Ov. Met. i. c.; Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 5.) The Scholiast on Apollonius Rhodius (iii. 996) makes Ariadne become by Dionysus the mother of Oenopion, These, Staphylus, Latromis, Eutranthes, and Toutropolis. There are several circumstances in the story of Ariadne which offered the happiest subjects for works of art, and some of the finest ancient works, on gems as well as paintings, are still extant, of which Ariadne is the subject. (Lippert, Daed. t. i. 1, p. 383, 384; Maillet, Gen. Ant. iii. 33; Pict. d'Erodano, it. tab. 14; Bellori, Arch. Rom. Antiqu. tab. 40; Bottiger, Arch. Mus. part 5.)

ARIANUS (Ἀριάνος), of Tegen, the author of a work on the early history of Aretania. (Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 1; Dionys. i. 49, where 'Arián is the right reading.)

ARIANUS (Ἀριάνος), or ARIDAEUS (Ἀρίδαιος), the friend and lieutenant of Cyrus, commanded the barbarians in that prince's army at the battle of Cunaxa, n. c. 401. (Xen. Anab. i. 8. § 5; Diod. xiv. 22; comp. Plat. Arist. c. 11.) After the death of Cyrus, the Cyrean Greeks offered to place Arianus on the Persian throne; but he declined making the attempt, on the ground that there were many Persians superior to himself, who would never tolerate him as king. (Ariab. ii. 1. § 4, 2. § 1.) He exchanged oaths of fidelity, however, with the Greeks, and, at the commencement of their retreat, marched in company with them; but soon afterwards he purchased his pardon from Artaxerxes by deserting them, and aiding (possibly through the help of his friend Menon) the treachery of Tissaphernes, whereby the principal Greek generals fell into the hands of the Persians. (Anab. ii. 2. § 8, &c., 4. §§ 1, 2, 9, 5. §§ 28, 38, &c., comp. Plat. Arist. c. 18.) It was perhaps this Arianus who was employed by Tithraustes to put Tissaphernes to death in accordance with the king's order, n. c. 396. (Polyen. viii. 16; Diod. xiv. 60; Wess. and Palm. ad loc.; comp. Xen. Hell. ii. i. 7.) In the ensuing year, n. c. 395, we again hear of Arianus as having revolted from Artaxerxes, and receiving Spithridates and the Paphlagonians after their desertion of the Spartan service. (Xen. Hell. iv. 1. § 27; Plat. Agr. c. 11.)

ARIOINES. [ARIOINES.]

ARIOINES (Ἀριοῖνη, or ARIDAEUS (Ἀρίδαιος), i. King, or more properly satrap, of Cappadocia, the son of Datames, and father of Ariartes I., reigned 50 years. (Diod. xxx. Ed. 3.)

II. King of Cappadocia, succeeded his father Ariartes II. He was very fond of his children, and shared his crown with his son Ariartes III. in his life-time. (Diod. l. c.)

ARIOINES (Ἀριόνης, No. 1.)

ARIOINES (Ἀριόνης) (Ἀριάνος), a king of the Scy- thians, who, in order to learn the population of his people, commanded every Scythian to bring him an arrow-head. With these arrow-heads he made a bronz or copper vessel, which was set up in a place called Emapenus, between the rivers Borys- thenes and Hypanis. (Herod. iv. 81.)
ARIANUS (Ἀριανūs), a friend of Dositheus, was employed by him to betray Achaeus to Antiochus the Great, n. c. 214. (Polyb. viii. 18, &c.) [See p. 8, a.]

ARIAPÆTHEIS (Ἀριαπαίθης), a king of the Sythians, the father of Scylas, was treacherously killed by Spargapætheis, the king of the Agathyrsi. Ariapæthes was a contemporary of Herodotus, for he tells us that he had from Timæus, the guardian of Ariapæthes, an account of the family of Anacharsis. (Herod. iv. 76, 78.)

ARIARATHES (Ἀριαράθης). There are a great many Persian names beginning with Ar-, Arĩ-, and ἄρι-, which all contain the root ἄρι, which is seen in ἄριστος, the ancient national name of the Persians (Herod. vi. 61), and ἄριος or ἄριος, likewise an ancient designation of the inhabitants of the table land of Persia. (Herod. iii. 93, vii. 62.) Dr. Rosen, to whom we are indebted for these remarks, (in Quarterly Journal of Education, vol. ix. p. 336,) also observes that the name ἄρι is the same with the Sanscrit word Arga, by which in the writings of the Hindus the followers of the Brahmanical law are designated. He shows that Arga signifies in Sanscrit "honourable, entitled to respect," and ἄριαι, in all probability, "honoured, respected." In Arīa-rathes, the latter part of the word apparently is the same as the Zend word, a great, master" (Bopp, Vergleichende Grammatik, p. 190), and the name would therefore signify an "honourable master." (Comp. Pott, Erymylogische Forschungen, p. xxxvi, &c.)

Ariarathes was the name of several kings of Cappadocia, who traced their origin to Amphius, one of the seven Persian chiefs who slew the Magi. [ANAPHAS.] I. The son of Ariamnes I., was distinguished for his love of his brother Holophernes, whom he sent to assist Ochus in the recovery of Egypt, n. c. 350. After the death of Alexander, Perdiccas appointed Eumenes governor of Cappadocia; but upon Ariarathes refusing to submit to Eumenes, Perdiccas made war upon him. Ariarathes was defeated, taken prisoner, and crucified, together with many of his relations, n. c. 322. Eumenes then obtained possession of Cappadocia. Ariarathes was 82 years of age at the time of his death; he had adopted as his son, Ariarathes, the eldest son of his brother Holophernes. (Diod. xxxi. Ed. 3, where it is stated that he fell in battle; Diod. xviii. 16; Arrian, ap. Phot. Cod. 92, p. 69, b. 26, ed. Bekker; Appian, Mithr. 8; Lucian, Maecob. 13; Plut. Eumenes. 3; Justin, xiii. 6, whose account is quite erroneous.)

II. Son of Holophernes, fled into Armenia after the death of Ariarathes I. After the death of Eumenes, b. c. 315, he recovered Cappadocia with the assistance of Ardoates, the Armenian king, and killed Amyntas, the Macedonian governor. He was succeeded by Ariamnes II., the eldest of his three sons. (Diod. xxxi. Ed. 5.)

III. Son of Ariamnes II., and grandson of the preceding, married Statonice, a daughter of Antiochus II., king of Syria, and obtained a share in the government during the lifetime of his father. (Diod. l.c.)

IV. Son of the preceding, was a child at his accession, and reigned b. c. 220—163, about 57 years. (Diod. l.c.; Justin, xxi. 1; Polyb. iv. 2.) He married Antiochis, the daughter of Antiochus III., king of Syria, and, in consequence of this alliance, assisted Antiochus in his war against the Romans. After the defeat of Antiochus by the Romans, b. c. 190, Ariarathes sued for peace in 188, which he obtained on favourable terms, as his daughter was about that time betrothed to Eumenes, the ally of the Romans. In b. c. 183—179, he assisted Eumenes in his war against Pharnaces. Polybius mentions that a Roman embassy was sent to Ariarathes after the death of Antiochus IV., who died n. c. 164. Antiochis, the wife of Ariarathes, at first bore him no children, and accordingly introduced two supposititious ones, who were called Ariarathes and Holophernes. Subsequently, however, she bore her husband two daughters and a son, Mithridates, afterwards Ariarathes V., and then informed Ariarathes of the decease she had practised upon him. The other two were in consequence sent away from Cappadocia, one to Rome, the other to Ionia. (Livy. xxvii. 31, xxxvii. 38, 39; Polyb. xxii. 24, xxv. 2, 4, xxvi. 6, xxxii. 12, 13; Appian, Syr. 5, 32, 43; Diod. l. c.)

V. Son of the preceding, previously called Mithridates, reigned 33 years, n. c. 162—130. He was surmounted Philopator, and was distinguished by the excellence of his character and his cultivation of philosophy and the liberal arts. According to Livy (xlii. 19), he was educated at Rome; but this account may perhaps refer to the other Ariarathes, one of the supposititious sons of the late king. In consequence of rejecting, at the wish of the Romans, a marriage with the sister of Demetrius Soter, the latter made war upon him, and brought forward Holophernes, one of the supposititious sons of the late king, as a claimant of the thrones. Ariarathes was deprived of his kingdom, and fled to Rome about n. c. 158. He was restored by the Romans, who, however, appear to have allowed Holophernes to reign jointly with him, as is expressly stated by Appian (Syn. 47), and implied by Polybius (xxiii. 20). The joint government, however, did not last long; for we find Ariarathes shortly afterwards named sole king. In n. c. 154, Ariarathes assisted Attalus in his war against Prusias, and sent his son Demetrius in command of his forces. He fell in n. c. 130, in the war of the Romans against Aristonicus of Parium, in return for the succours which he had brought the Romans on that occasion, Lycodora and Cilicia were added to the dominions of his family. By his wife Laodice he had six children; but they were all, with the exception of the youngest, killed by their mother, that she might obtain the government of the kingdom. After she
VI. The youngest son of the preceding, reigned about 34 years, B.C. 180—56. He was a child at his succession. He married Laodice, the sister of Mithridates Eupator, king of Pontus, and was put to death by Mithridates by means of Gordius. (Justin, xxxvii. 1, xxxviii. 1; Menon, ap. Phot. Cod. 224, p. 230, a. 41, ed. Bekker.) On his death the kingdom was seized by Nicomedes, king of Bithynia, who married Laodice, the widow of the late king. But Nicomedes was soon expelled by Mithridates, who placed upon the throne, the widow of the late king. (Justin, xxxvii. 1, xxxviii. 1; Menon, ap. Phot. Cod. 224, p. 230, a. 41, ed. Bekker.)

VII. A son of Ariarathes VI. He was, however, also murdered by Mithridates in a short time, who now took possession of his kingdom. (Justin, xxxvii. 1.) The Cappadocians rebelled against Mithridates, and placed upon the throne,

VIII. A second son of Ariarathes VI.; but he was speedily driven out of the kingdom by Mithridates, and shortly afterwards died a natural death. By the death of these two sons of Ariarathes VI., the royal family was extinct. Mithridates placed upon the throne one of his own sons, who was only eight years old. Nicomedes sent an embassy to Rome to lay claim to the throne for a youth, who, he pretended, was a third descendant of Ariarathes V., who fell in the war against Artaxerxes. The senate, however, did not assign the kingdom to either, but granted liberty to the Cappadocians. (Justin, xxxviii. 1, 2; Strab. xii. p. 540.)

IX. A son of Ariobarzanes II., and brother of Ariobarzanes III. (Cic. ad Pompey, xxv. 2), reigned six years, B.C. 42—36. When Caesar had confirmed Ariobarzanes III. in this kingdom, he placed Ariobarzanes under his brother's government. Ariobarzanes succeeded to the crown after the battle of Philippi, but was deposed and put to death by Antony, who appointed Archelaus as his successor. (Appian, B. C. v. 7; Dion Cass. xlix. 32; Val. Max. ix. 15, ex. 2.)

Clinton makes this Ariarathes the son of Ariobarzanes III. (whom he calls the second); but as there were three kings of the name of Ariobarzanes, grandfather, son, and grandson [Ariobarzanes], and Strabo (xii. p. 540) says that the family became extinct in three generations, it seems most probable that this is the brother of Ariobarzanes III. Ciacero (ad Att. xii. 2) speaks of an Ariarathes, a son of Ariobarzanes, who came to Rome in B.C. 45; but there seems no reason to believe that he was a different person from the one mentioned above, the son of Ariobarzanes II.

Respecting the kings of Cappadocia, see Clinton, F. H. vol. iii. Appendix, c. 9.

The four coins that have been given above, have been placed under those kings to whom they are usually assigned; but it is quite uncertain to whom they really belong. The coins of these kings bear only three surnames, TETZEBOT, EIMANOT, and PHILOMHTOP, On the reverse of all, Pallas is represented. (Echel, iii. p. 108.)

ARISAPES (Āsēpánwos), called by Justin (x.1) Ariates, one of the three legitimate sons of Artaxerxes Mnemon, was, after the death of his eldest brother Danuqis, driven to commit suicide by the intrigues of his other brother, Oclius. (Plut. Artax. c. 30.)

ARIBAEUS (Āpeaías), the king of the Cappadocians, was slain by the Hyrcanians, in the time of the elder Cyrus, according to Xenophon's Cyropaedia. (i. 1. § 3, iv. 2. § 31.)

ARICINNA (Āpikynna), a surname of Artemis, derived from the town of Aria in Lydia, where she was worshipped. A tradition of that place relates that Hippolytus, after being restored to life by Asclepius, came to Italy, ruled over Aria, and dedicated a grove to Artemis. (Paus. ii. 27. § 4.)

This goddess was believed to be the Taureau Artemis, and her statue at Aria was considered to be the same as the one which Orestes had brought with him from Tauris. (Serv. ad Aen. ii. 116; Strab. v. p. 230; Hygin. Fab. 261.) According to Strabo, the priest of the Arian Artemis was always a run-away slave, who obtained his office in the following manner:—The sacred grove of Artemis contained one tree from which it was not allowed to break off a branch; but if a slave succeeded in effecting it, the priest was obliged to fight with him, and if he was conquered and killed, the victorious slave became his successor, and might in his turn be killed by another slave, who then succeeded him. Symtius (Cicily, 55) calls the priest rex nemorensis. Ovid (Fast. iii. 265, 268, &c.), Suetonius, and Pausanius, speak of contests of slaves in the grove at Aria, which seem to refer to the frequent fights between the priest and a slave who tried to obtain his office. [L. S.]

ARIDAUEUS. [Ariadas; Arrhidæus.]

ARIDOLIS (Āpidolís), tyrant of Alabanda in Caria, accompanied Xerxes in his expedition against Greece, and was taken by the Greeks off Artemision, B.C. 480, and sent to the isthmus of Corinth in chains. (Herod. vii. 195.)

ARIGNOTE (Āpirynýt), of Samos, a female Pythagorean philosopher, is sometimes described as a daughter, at other times merely as a disciple of Pythagoras and Thamyris. She wrote epigrams and several works upon the worship and mysteries of Dionysus. (Suidas, s. v. 'Apirynýt, Græca, 1067; Clem. Alex. Strom. iv. p. 522, d., Paris, 1629; Harpocrat. s. v. Æsop.)

ARIGNOTUS (Āpirynóus), a Pythagorean in the time of Lucian, was renowned for his wisdom.
and had the surname of ἰπός. (Lucian, Philopseudeus, c. 29, &c.)

ARIMAZES (Ἀρίμαζης) or ARIOMAZES (Ἀριομαζῆς), a chief who had possession, in b. c. 328, of a very strong fortress in Sogdiana, usually called the Rock, which Droyson identifies with a place called Kohiten, situate near the pass of Koulough or Derbend. Arimazes at first refused to surrender the place to Alexander, but afterwards yielded when some of the Macedonians had climbed to the summit. In this fortress Alexander found Roxana, the daughter of the Bactrian chief, Oxyartes, whom he made his wife. Curtius (vii. 11) relates, that Alexander crucified Arimazes and the leading men who were taken; but this is not mentioned by Arrian (iv. 19) or Polyænus (iv. 3. § 29), and is improbable. (Comp. Strab. xiii. p. 517.)

ARIMNESTUS (Ἀριμνέστος), the commander of the Plateans at the battles of Marathon and Plataea. (Paus. ix. 4, § 1; Herod. ix. 72; Plut. Arist. c. 11.) The Spartan who killed Mardonius is called by Plutarch Arimnestus, but by Herodotus Acimnestus. [ARIMNESTUS.]

ARIOBARZANES (Ἀριόβαρζανες). 1. The name of three kings or satraps of Pontus.

I. Was betrayed by his son Mithridates to the Persian king. (Xen. Cyr. viii. 8, § 4; Aristot. Pol. vit. 8, § 15, ed. Schmied.) It is doubtful whether this Ario-barzanes is the same who conducted the Athenian ambassadors, in b. c. 405, to the sea-coast of Mysia, after they had been detained three years by order of Cyrus (Xen. Hell. i. 4, § 7), or the same who assisted Anticleias in b. c. 385. (I. l. 1, § 28.)

II. Succeeded his father, Mithridates I., and reigned 26 years, b. c. 363—337. (Diod. xvi. 90.) He appears to have held some high office in the Persian court five years before the death of his father, as we find him, apparently on behalf of the king, sending an embassy to Greece in b. c. 368. (Xen. Hell. vii. 1, § 27.) Ario-barzanes, who is called by Diodorus (xv. 96) satrap of Phrygia, and by Nepos (Datam. c. 2) satrap of Lydia, Ionia, and Phrygia, revolted from Artaxerxes in b. c. 362, and may be regarded as the founder of the independent kingdom of Pontus. Demosthenes, in b. c. 352, speaks of Ario-barzanes and his three sons having been lately made Athenian citizens. (In Aristocrat. pp. 666, 667.) He mentions him again (pro Rhod. p. 193) in the following year, b. c. 351, and says, that the Athenians had sent Timotheus to his assistance; but that when the Athenian general saw that Ario-barzanes was in open revolt against the king, he refused to assist him.

III. The son of Mithridates III., began to reign b. c. 266 and died about b. c. 240. He obtained possession of the city of Amasries, which was surrendered to him. (Memnon, cc. 16, 24, ed. Orelli.) Ario-barzanes and his father, Mithridates, sought the assistance of the Gauls, who had come into Asia twelve years before the death of Mithridates, to expel the Egyptians sent by Ptolemy. (Apollon. ap. Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἀγαθόρα.) Ario-barzanes was succeeded by Mithridates IV.

2. The satrap of Persis, fled after the battle of Gaugamela, b. c. 331, to secure the Persian Gates, a pass which Alexander had to cross in his march to Persia. Alexander was at first unable to force the pass; but some prisoners, or, according to other accounts, a Lycian, having acquainted him with a way over the mountains, he was enabled to gain the heights above the Persian camp. The Persians then took to flight, and Ario-barzanes escaped with a few horsemen to the mountains. (Arrian, iii. 15; Diod. xvii. 68; Curt. v. 3, § 4.)

3. The name of three kings of Cappadocia. Clinton (P. F. H. iii. p. 456) makes only two of this name, but inscriptions and coins seem to prove that there were three.

I. Surnamed Philoromaios (φιλορομαίος) on coins (b. c. 93—63), was elected king by the Cappadocians, under the direction of the Romans, about b. c. 93. (Justin, xxxviii. 2; Strab. xii. p. 540; Appian, Mithr. 10.) He was several times expelled from his kingdom by Mithridates, and as often restored by the Romans. He seems to have been driven out of his kingdom immediately after his accession, as we find that he was restored by Sulla in b. c. 92. (Plut. Sulla, 55; Liv. Epit. 70; Appian, Mithr. 57.) He was a second time expelled about b. c. 90, and fled to Rome. He was then restored by M. Aquilius, about b. c. 89 (Appian, Mithr. 10, 11; Justin, xxxviii. 3), but was again expelled a third time in b. c. 88. It is doubtful whether this Ario-barzanes is the same who conducted the Athenian ambassadors to the Persian court five years before the death of his father. Cicero also mentions this Ario-barzanes in one of his orations.

II. Surnamed Philopator (φιλοπατόρ), according to coins, succeeded his father b. c. 63. The time of his death is not known; but it must have been previous to b. c. 51, in which year his son was reigning. He appears to have been assassinated, as Cicero (ad Fam. ix. 2) reminds the son of the fate of his father. Cicero also mentions this Ario-barzanes in one of his orations. (De Pron. Cons. 4.)

It appears, from an inscription, that his wife, as well as his father's, was named Athenais. It is probable. (Comp. Strab. xi. p. 517.)

III. Surnamed Eusebes and Philoromaios (Εὐσέβης καὶ φιλορομαίος), according to Cicero (ad Fam., ix. 2) and coins, succeeded his father not long before b. c. 51. (Cic. L.c.) While Cicero was in Cicilia, he protected Ario-barzanes from a conspired which was formed against him, and established him in his kingdom. (Ad Fam. ii. 17, xx. 2, 4, 5; ad Att. v. 20; Plut. Cis. 36.) It appears from Cicero that Ario-barzanus was very poor, and that he owed Pompey and M. Brutus large sums of money. (Ad Att. vi. 1—2.) In the war between Caesar and Pompey, he came to the assistance of the latter with five hundred horse-men. (Cass. B. C. ii. 4; Flor. iv. 2.) Caesare, however, forgave him, and enlarged his territories.
He also protected him against the attacks of Pharnaces, king of Pontus. (Dion Cass. xii. 65, xiii. 48; Hist. Bell. Alex. 34, &c.) He was slain in b.c. 42
by Cassius, because he was plotting against him in Asia. (Dion Cass. xivii. 52; Appian, B. C. iv. 63.)
On the annexed coin of Ario-barzanus the inscription is ΒΑΣΙΛΕΩΣ ΠΟΒΑΡΠΑΖΑΝΟΥ ΕΥΣΕΒΟΥΣ
ΚΑΙ ΦΑΟΡΜΑΝΟΥ. (Echhel, iii. p. 290.)

ARIONOMARDUS (Ἀριωνομάρδος), a Persian word, the latter part of which is the same as the Persian μαρδ (virilis, virtus). Arion-marudas would therefore signify "a man or hero honourable, or entitled to respect." (Pott, Etymologische Forschungen, p. xxxvi.) Respecting the meaning of Arion, see ARIARATHES.

1. The son of Dareius and Parmys, the daughter of Smerdis, commanded the Moschi and Tibareni in the army of Xerxes. (Herod. vii. 67.)

2. The brother of Artaphius, commanded the Caspi in the army of Xerxes. (Herod. vii. 67.)

3. The ruler of Thebes in Egypt, one of the commanders of the Egyptians in the army of Xerxes. (Aesch. Pers. 38, 313.)

ARION (Ἀρίων). 1. An ancient Greek bard and great master on the cithara, was a native of Methymna in Lesbos, and, according to some accounts, a son of Cycloon or of Poseidon and the nymph Oncnea. He is called the inventor of the dithyrambic poetry, and of the name dithyramb.
(Proc. v. 20; Plut. Cis. 120.) In the time of Herodotus and Pausanias there existed on Taenarus a brass monument, in the aid of the Germans, of whom at first about 15,000 crossed the Rhine, and their report of the wealth and fertility of Gaul soon attracted large numbers of foreign invaders. The number of the Germans in that country at length amounted to 120,000: a mixed multitude, consisting of members of the following tribes:—the Harudes, Marcomanni, Triboci, Vangiones, Nemetes, Sedusii, and Scuci, most of whom had lately occupied the country stretching from the right bank of the Rhine to the Danube, and northwards to the Riesengebirge and Erzgebirge, or even beyond them. At their head was Ariovistus, whose name is supposed to have been Latinized from Herio, "a host," and Furs; and who had been so powerful as to receive from the Roman senate the title of avarius. They entirely subdued the Aedui, and compelled them to give hostages to the Sequani, and swear never to seek help from Rome. But it fared worse with the conquerors than the conquered, for Ariovistus first seized a third part of the Sequanian territory, as the price of the triumph which he had won for them, and soon after demanded a second portion of equal extent. Divi-tius, the only noble Aeduan who had neither given hostages nor taken the oath, requested help from Caesar, and was accompanied by a numerous deputation of Gallic chiefs of all tribes, who had now forgotten their mutual quarrels in their terror of the common foe. They all expressed the greatest fear lest their request should be known to Ariovistus, and the Sequani regarded him with such awe, that they dared not utter a word to Caesar, but only shewed their misery by their downcast looks. Caesar, who was afraid that first Gaul and then Italy would be overrun by the barbarians, sent orders to Ariovistus to prevent the irruption of any more Germans, and to restore the hostages to the Aeduli. These demands were refused in the same haughty tone of defiance which Ariovistus had before used in declining an interview proposed by Caesar. Both parties then advanced with warlike intentions, and the Romans seized Vesontio (Besançon), the chief town of the Sequani. Here they were so terrified by the accounts which they heard of the gigantic bulk and fierce courage of the Germans, that they gave themselves up to despair, and the camp was filled with men making their wills. Caesar reanimated them by a brilliant speech, at the end of which he said that, if they refused to advance, he should himself proceed with his favourite tenth legion only. Upon this they repented of their despondency, and prepared for battle. Before this could take place, an interview between Caesar and Ariovistus was at last held by the request of the latter. They could come, however, to no agreement, but the battle was still delayed for some days; Ariovistus contriving means of postponing it, on account of a prophecy that the Germans would not succeed if they engaged before the new moon. The battle ended by the total defeat of Ariovistus, who immediately fled with his army to the Rhine, a distance of 50 miles from the field. Some crossed the river by swimming, others in small boats, and among the latter Ariovistus himself. His two wives perished in the retreat; one of his daughters was taken prisoner, the other killed. The fame of Ariovistus long survived in Gaul, so that in Tacitus (Hist. iv. 73) we find Cerralis telling the Treveri that the Romans had occupied the banks of the Rhine, "acquis alius Ariovistus regno Galliarum potivitur." This shows that the representation which Caesar gives of his power is not exaggerated. (Caes. B. G. i. 31–53; Dion Cass. xxxviii. 31, &c.; Plut. Cäs. 18; Liv. Epit. 104.) [G. E. L. C.]

3. Of Sicyon, a Greek poet, the author of a beautiful psalm to health (Ὑγεία), which has been preserved by Athenaeus. (xv. p. 702, a.) The beginning of the poem is quoted by Lucian (de Lopis inter Scit. c. 6.) and Maximus Tyrius (xiii. 1.) It is printed in Borg's Poetae Lyrici Graeci, p. 841.

ARISTAEBE (Ἀρίσταέβη). 1. A daughter of Merops and first wife of Priam, by whom she became the mother of Aescalus, but was afterwards resigned to Hyrcanus. (Apollod. i. 12. § 5.) According to some accounts, the Trojan town of Arise derived its name from her. (Steph. Byz. s. v.)

2. A daughter of Teneus and wife of Dardanus.
ARISTAEUS.

ARISTAEUS. [Aristaeus.]

ARISTAEUS (Ἀρίσταες), an ancient divinity worshipped in various parts of Greece, as in Thessaly, Creos, and Boeotia, but especially in the islands of the Aegean, Ionian, and Adriatic seas, which had once been inhabited by Pelasgians. The different accounts about Aristaeus, who once was a mortal, and ascended to the dignity of a god through the benefits he had conferred upon mankind, seem to have arisen in different places and independently of one another, so that they referred to several distinct beings, who were subsequently identified and united into one. He is described either as a son of Uranus and Ge, or according to a more general tradition, as the son of Apollo by a mortal. (Diod. i. 61, &c.; Apollon. Rhod. iii. 500, &c. with the Schol.; Pind. Pyth. ix. 48, &c.) The stories about his youth are very marvellous, and show him about Aristaeus, who was recognised as the favourite of the gods. His mother Cyrene had been carried off by Apollo from mount Pelion, where he found her boldly fighting with a lion, to Libya, where birth to Aristaeus. After he had grown up, Aristaeus went to Thebes in Boeotia, where he learned from Cheiron and the muses the arts of healing and prophecy. According to some statements he married Autonoî, the daughter of Cadmus, who bore him several sons, Charmus, Callicarpus, Actaeon, and Polydorus. (Hesiod. Theog. 975.)

After the unfortunate death of his son Actaeon, he left Thebes and went to Cees, whose inhabitants delivered him from a destructive drought, by erecting an altar to Zeus Icmacus. This gave rise to an identification of Aristaeus with Zeus in Ceos. From thence he returned to Libya, where his mother prepared for him a fleet, with which he sailed to Sicily, visited several islands of the Mediterranean, and for a time ruled over Sardinia. From these islands his worship spread over Magna Graecia and other Greek colonies. At last he went to Thrace, where he became initiated in the mysteries of Dionysus, and after having dwelled for some time near mount Haemus, where he founded the town of Aristaeon, he disappeared. (Comp. Paus. x. 17. § 3.) Aristaeus is one of the most beneficent divinities in ancient mythology: he was worshipped as the protector of flocks and shepherds, of vine and olive plantations; he taught men to hunt and keep bees, and averted from the fields the burning heat of the sun and other causes of destruction; he was the deity of shepherds, &c. among the Greeks. The benefits which he conferred upon man, differed in different places according to their special wants: Creos, which was rich exposed to heat and droughts, received through him rain and refreshing winds; in Thessaly and Arcadie he was the protector of the flocks and bees. (Virgil. Georg. i. 14, iv. 283, 317.)

Justin (xiii. 7) throws everything into confusion by describing Neomus and Agreus, which are only sumname of Aristaeus, as his brothers. Respecting the representations of this divinity on ancient coins, see Ruschen, Lex. Numorum. i. 1. p. 1100, and respecting his worship in general Brindsted, Reise, &c. in Griech. i. p. 40, &c. [L. S.]

ARISTAEUS, the original name according to Justin (xiii. 7) of Battus, the founder of Cyrene. [Battus.]

ARISTAEUS (Ἀρίσταες), the son of Damophon, of Croton, a Pythagorean philosopher, who succeeded Pythagoras as head of the school, and married his widow Theano. (Iamb. c. 36.) He was the author of several mathematical works, which Euclid used. (Pappus, lib. vii. Mathem. Collect. init.) Stobenus has given (Ecol. i. 6, p. 420, ed. Heeren) an extract from a work on Harmony (Ἡμεραίια), by Aristaeus, who may be the same as this Aristaeus. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. i. p. 836.)

ARISTAEUS. [Aristæus.]

ARISTA'GORAS (Ἀριστάγόρας). 1. An Athenian, the mistress of the orator Hyperides, against whom he afterwards delivered two orations. (Athen. xiii. pp. 590, d. 586, a. 587, d. 588, c.; Harpocrat. s. v. 'Αρισταγόρας).

2. A Corinthian hetaira, the mistress of Demetrius the grandson of Demetrius Phalerus. (Athen. iv. p. 167, d. c.)

ARISTA'GORAS (Ἀριστάγόρας), of Miletus, brother-in-law and cousin of Histiaeus, was left by him, on his occupation of Myrina and during his stay at the Persian court, in charge of the government of Miletus. His misconduct in this situation caused the first interruption of an interval of universal peace, and commenced the chain of events which raised Greece to the level of Persia. In 501 B.C., tempted by the prospect of making Myrina his dependency, he obtained a force for its reduction from the neighbouring satrap, Artaphernes. While leading it he quarrelled with its commander; the Persian in revenge sent warning to Myrina, and the project failed. Aristagoras finding his treasure wasted, and himself embarrassed through the failure of his promises to Artaphernes, began to entertain a general revolt of Ionia. A message from Histiaeus determined him. His first step was to seize the several tyrants who were still with the armament, deliver them up to their subjects, and proclaim democracy; himself too, professedly, surrendering his power. He then set sail for Greece, and applied for succours, first at Sparta; but, after using every engine in his power to win Cleomenes, the king, he was ordered to depart; at Athens he was better received; and with the troops from twenty galleys which he there obtained, and five added by the Eretrians, he sent, in 499, an army up the country, which captured and burnt Sardis, but was finally chased back to the coast. These allies now departed; the Persian commanders were reducing the maritime towns; Aristagoras, in trepidation and despondency, proposed to his friends to migrate to Sardis or Myrina. This course he was bent upon himself; and leaving the Asiatic Greeks to allay as they could, the storm he had raised, he fled with all who would join him to Myrina. Shortly after, probably in 497, while attacking a town of the neighbouring Eodians, he was cut off with his forces by a sally of the besieged. He seems to have been a supple and eloquent man, ready to venture on the boldest steps, as means for mere personal ends, but utterly lacking in address to use them at the right moment; and generally weak, incautious, and cowardly. (Hord. v. 39—38, 49, 51, 97—100, 124—126; Thuc. iv. 102.) [A. H. C.]

ARISTA'GORAS (Ἀρισταγόρας). 1. Tyrant of Cuma, son of Hermecides, one of the Ionian chiefs left by Dareius to guard the bridge over the Danube. On the revolt of the Ionians from Per-Aristarchus was taken by stratagem and delivered up to his fellow-citizens, who, however, dismissed him uninjured. (Herod. iv. 138, v. 37, 38.)

2. Tyrant of Cyzicus, one of the Ionian chiefs left by Dareius to guard the bridge over the Danube. (Herod. iv. 138.)

Aristagoras (Ἀρισταγόρας), a Greek writer on Egypt. (Steph. Byz. s. w. Ἐρώτουμενεῖς, Δάσκαλος, Νικοῦ κόμης, Ψεύδω, ἐκληροῦς; Aelian, H. A. xi. 10.) Stephanus Byz. (s. w. Περιπέρακιας) says, that Aristagoras was not much younger than Plato, and from the order in which he is mentioned by Pliny (H. N. xxvi. 12. s. 17) in the list of authors, who wrote upon Pyramids, he would appear to have lived between, or been a contemporary of, Duris of Samos and Artemidorus of Ephesus.

Aristagoras, comic poet. [Metagenes.]

Aristanax (Ἀριστανάξ), a Greek physician, of whose life nothing is known, and of whose date it can be positively determined only that, as he is mentioned by Soranus (De Arte Osteot. p. 201), he must have lived some time in or before the second century after Christ. [W. A. G.]

Aristander (Ἀριστάνδερος), the most celebrated soothsayer of Alexander the Great. He survived the king. (Arrian, Anab. iii. 2. iv. 4, &c.; Curt. iv. 2. 6. 13. 15. vii. 7; Plut. Alex. 25; Aelian, V. H. xii. 64; Artemid. i. 31, iv. 24.) The work of Aristander on prodigies, which is referred to by Pliny (H. N. xvii. 25. s. 38; Eulcnes, lib. viii. x. xiv. xv. xviii.) and Lucian (Philopat. c. 21), was probably written by the soothsayer of Alexander.

Aristander, of Paros, was the sculptor of one of the tripods which the Lacedaemonians made out of the spoils of the battle of Aegospotami (n. c. 405), and dedicated at Amyclae. The two tripods had statues beneath them, between the feet: that of Aristander had Sparta holding a lyre: that of Polycleitus had a figure of Aphrodite. (Paus. iii. 10. § 4.) [P. S.]

Aristarchus (Ἀρισταρχός). 1. Is named Alexandria experienced in the reign of Physcon, and afterwards founded himself a grammatical and critical school, which flourished for a long time at Alexandria, and subsequently at Rome also. Ptolemy Philopator entrusted to Aristarchus the education of his son, Ptolemy Epiphanes, and Ptolemy Physcon too was one of his pupils. (Athen. ii. p. 71.) Owing, however, to the bad treatment which the scholars and philosophers of Alexandria complained of at the hands of Ptolemy Physcon, Aristarchus, then at an advanced age, left Egypt and went to Cyprus, where he is said to have died at the age of seventy-two, of voluntary starvation, because he was suffering from incurable dropsy. He left behind him two sons, Aristagoras and Aristarchus, who are likewise called grammarians, but neither of them appears to have inherited anything of the spirit or talents of the father.

The numerous followers and disciples of Aristarchus were designated by the names of ἀρισταρχευόντως or ὁ ἀρισταρχεύς. Aristarchus, his master Aristophanes, and his opponent Crates of Mallus, the head of the grammatical school at Pergamos, were the most eminent grammarians of that period; but Aristarchus surpassed them all in knowledge and critical skill. His whole life was devoted to grammatical and critical pursuits, with the view to explain and constitute correct texts of the ancient poets of Greece, such as Homer, Pindar, Archilochus, Asclepius, Sappho, Aristophanes, Ion, and others. His grammatical studies embraced everything, which the term in its widest sense then comprised, and he together with his great contemporaries are regarded as the first who established fixed principles of grammar, though Aristarchus himself is often called the prince of grammarians "τῶν γραμματικῶν, οἱ δὲ γραμματικοὶ..."
and corruptions. He marked those verses which and carefully to clear it of all later interpolations. It was attacked by Critics of a kindred genius, who first shewed the editors of Homer, since the days of F. A. Wolf, a more or less the great object with nearly all the division of each poem into twenty-four rhapsodies, poems, such as it has come down to us, and the nn asterisk. It is now no longer a matter of doubt the Homeric poems are concerned, he above all preserved such extracts from his works on Homer, as, notwithstanding their fragmentary nature, show us the critic in his whole greatness. As far as the poems concerned, he above all things endeavoured to restore them and carefully to clear it of all later interpolations and corruptions. He marked those verses which he thought spurious with an ohelos, and those which he considered as particularly beautiful with an asterisk. It is now no longer a matter of doubt that, generally speaking, the text of the Homeric poems, such as it has come down to us, and the division of each poem into twenty-four rhapsodies, are the work of Aristarchus; that is to say, the edition which Aristarchus prepared of the Homeric poems became the basis of all subsequent editions. To restore this recension of Aristarchus has been more or less the great object with nearly all the editors of Homer, since the days of F. A. Wolf, a critic of a kindred genius, who first shewed the great importance to be attached to the edition of Aristarchus. Its general appreciation in antiquity is attested by the fact, that so many other grammarians, as Callistratus, Aristemon, Didymus, and Ptolemaeus of Ascalon, wrote separate works upon it. In explaining and interpreting the Homeric poems, for which nothing had been done before his time, his merits were as great as those he acquired by his critical labours. His explanations as well as his criticisms were not confined to the mere detail of words and phrases, but he entered also upon investigations of a higher order, concerning etymology, geography, and on the artistic composition and structure of the Homeric poems. He was a decided opponent of the allegorical interpretation of the poet which was then beginning, which some centuries later became very general, and was perhaps never carried to such extreme absurdities as we ourselves by the author of Aphorisms of Samuel, one of the earliest astronomers of the Alexandrian school. We know little of his history, except that he was living between B.C. 280 and 264. The first of these dates is inferred from a passage in the meγάλη ηλιαξία of Ptolemy (iii. 2, vol. i. p. 163, ed. Halma), in which Hipparchus is said to have referred, in his treatise on the length of the year, to an observation of the summer solstice made by Aristarchus in the 50th year of the 1st Calippic period; the second from the mention of him by Plutarch (de Fide in Orbe Lunae), which makes him contemporary with Cleanthus the Stoic, the successor of Zeno.

It seems that he employed himself in the determination of some of the most important elements of astronomy; but none of his works remain, except a treatise on the magnitudes and distances of the sun and moon (τον μεγαλον αριθμον και αντιμεταφρασ των ήλιων και σεληνίων). We do not know whether the method employed in this work was invented by Aristarchus (Suidas, s. v. φιλανθρωπα, mentions a treatise on the same subject by a disciple of Plato); it is, however, very ingenious, and correct in principle. It is founded on the consideration that at the instant when the enlightened part of the moon is apparently bounded by a straight line, the plane of the circle which separates the dark and light portions passes through the eye of the spectator, and is also perpendicular to the line joining the centres of the sun and moon; so that the distances of the sun and moon from the eye are at that instant respectively the hypotenuse and side of a right-angled triangle. The angle at the eye (which is the angular distance between the sun and moon) can be observed, and then it is an easy problem to find the ratio between the sides containing it. But this process could not, unless by means of the quadrant, be very accurate; it was possible, even with a telescope, to determine with much accuracy the instant at which the phaenomenon in question takes place; and in the time of Aristarchus there were no means of measuring angular distances with sufficient exactness. In fact, he takes the angle at the eye to be 82 degrees v 2 whereas its real value is less than a right angle by about half a minute only; and hence he infers that the distance of the sun is between eighteen and twenty times greater than that of the moon, whereas the true ratio is about twenty times as great, the distances being to one another nearly as 400 to 1. The ratio of the true diameters of the sun and moon would follow immediately from that of their distances, if their apparent (angular) diameters were known. Aristarchus assumes that their apparent diameters are equal, which is nearly true; but estimates their common value at two degrees, which is nearly four times too great. The theory of parallax was as yet unknown, and hence, in order to compare the diameter of the earth with the magnitudes already mentioned, he compares the diameter of the moon with that of the earth's shadow in its neighbourhood, and assumes the latter to be twice as great as the former. (Its mean value is about 34.') Of course all the numerical results deduced from these assumptions are, like the one first mentioned, very erroneous. The geometrical processes employed shew that nothing like trigonometry was known. No attempt is made to assign the absolute values of the magnitudes whose ratios are investigated; in fact, this could not be done without an actual measurement of the earth—an operation which seems to have been first attempted on scientific principles in the next generation. [ELATOSTHENES.] Aristarchus does not explain his method of determining the apparent diameters of the sun and of the earth's shadow; but the latter must have been deduced from observations of lunar eclipses, and the former may probably have been observed by means of the skopeum by a method described by Macrobius. (Somn. Scip. i. 20.) This instrument is said to have been invented by Aristarchus (Vitruv. ix. 9): it consisted of an improved gnomon [AXAXIMANTES]; the shadow being received not upon a horizontal plane, but upon a concave hemispherical surface having the extremity of the style at its centre, so that angles might be measured directly by arcs instead of by their tangents. The gross error in the value attributed to the sun's apparent diameter is remarkable; it appears, however, that Aristarchus must afterwards have adopted a much more correct estimate, since Archimedes in the \( \text{παραγωγή} \) (Wallis, Op. vol. iii. p. 515) refers to a treatise in which he made it only half a degree. Pappus, whose commentary on the book \( \text{περί} \) \( \text{μεγεθέων} \), &c. is extant, does not notice this emendation, whence it has been conjectured, that the other works of Aristarchus did not exist in his time, having perhaps perished with the Alexandrian library.

It has been the common opinion, at least in modern times, that Aristarchus agreed with Philolaus and other astronomers of the Pythagorean school in considering the sun to be fixed, and attributing a motion to the earth. Plutarch (\textit{de fac. in orb. lun.} p. 922) says, that Cleanthes thought that Aristarchus ought to be accused of impiety for supposing (\( \text{περίστερας} \)), that the heavens were at rest, and that the earth moved in an oblique circle, and also about its own axis (the true reading is evidently \( \text{κατάδυσι} \) \( \text{φεύ} \) \( \text{σε κατά Αριστοτέλους, κ. τ. λ.} \)) and Diogenes Laërtius, in his list of the works of Cle- anthes mentions one \( \text{περί} \) \( \text{Αριστοτέλους} \). (See also Sext. Empir. \textit{adv. Math.} p. 410, c; Stobaeus, i. 26.) Archimedes, in the \( \text{φαραγωγή} \) (i. a.), refers to the same theory. (\( \text{περίστερας} \) \( \text{γερ. κ. τ. λ.} \).) But the treatise \( \text{περί} \) \( \text{μεγεθέων} \) contains not a word upon the subject, nor does Polyaenus allude to it when he maintains the immobility of the earth. It seems therefore probable, that Aristarchus adopted it rather as a hypothesis for particular purposes than as a statement of the actual system of the universe. In fact, Plutarch, in another place (\textit{Plat. Quaest.} p. 1006) expressly says, that Aristarchus taught it only hypothetically. On this question, see Schaubach. (\textit{Gesch. d. Griech. Astronome}, p. 468, &c.) It appears from the passage in the \( \text{παραγωγή} \) alluded to above, that Aristarchus had much more juster views than his predecessors concerning the exact extent of the universe. He maintained, namely, that the sphere of the fixed stars was so large, that it bore to the orbit of the earth the relation of a sphere to its centre. What he meant by the expression, is not clear: it may be interpreted as an anticipation of modern discoveries, but in this sense it could express only a conjecture which the observations of the age were not accurate enough either to confirm or refute—a remark which is equally applicable to the theory of the earth's motion. Whatever may be the truth on these points, it is probable that even the opinion, that the sun was nearly twenty times as distant as the moon, indicates a great step in advance of the popular doctrines.

ARISTARCHUS (de Di Natali, c. 18) attributes to Aristarchus the invention of the \textit{magnus annus} of 2484 years. A Latin translation of the treatise \( \text{περί} \) \( \text{μεγεθέων} \) was published by Georg. Valla, Venet. 1498, and another by Commandine, Pisauri, 1572. The Greek text, with a Latin translation and the commentary of Pappus, was edited by Wallis, Oxon. 1688, and reprinted in vol. iii. of his works. There is also a French translation, and an edition of the text, Paris, 1810. (Delambre, \textit{Histoire de l'Astronomie Ancienne}, liv. i. chap. 5 and 9; Laplace, \textit{Syst. du Monde}, p. 361; Schaubach in Eras and Gruber's \textit{Encyclopædia}. [W. F. D.]

ARISTARCHUS (\textit{Αριστοτέλης}) of Thoea, a tragic poet at Athens, was contemporary with Euripides, and flourished about 454 b.C. He lived to the age of a hundred. Out of seventy tragedies which he exhibited, only two obtained the prize. (Suidas, s. v.; Euseb. \textit{Chron. Armen.}) Nothing remains of his works, except a few lines (Stobaeus, \textit{Liv.} 66. 9, \textit{Lyc.} 120. 2; Athen. xiii. p. 612, f.), and the titles of three of his plays namely, the \( \text{Αξιολογίας} \), which he is said to have written and named after the god in gratitude for his recovery from illness (Suidas), the \( \text{Χάλκεας} \) which Ennius translated into Latin (Festus, s. v. \textit{prosto aere}), and the \( \text{Tērōναος} \). (Stobaeus, ii. 1, § 1.)

ARISTARTE, a painter, the daughter and pupil of Nearchus, was celebrated for her picture of Aesculapius. (Plin. xxv. 40. 48.) [P. S.]

ARISTEAS, \( \text{Αρίστεας} \), of Proconnesus, a son of Caryatobius or Demochares, was an epic poet who flourished, according to Suidas, about the time of Croesus and Cyrus. The accounts of his life are as fabulous as those about Abaris the Elyte borean. According to a tradition, which Herodotus (iv. 15) heard at Metapontum, in Southern Italy, he reappeared there among the living 34 years after his death, and according to this tradition Aristaeus would belong to the eighth or ninth century before the Christian era; and there a other traditions which place him before the time of I

Homer, or describe him as a contemporary and teachers. He was, like Abaris, connected with the Pentateuch was made in the reign of Ptolemy

Soter, between the years 298 and 285 a. c. for the Jews who had been brought into Egypt by that king in 320 b. c. It may have obtained its name from its being adopted by the Sanhedrin (or council of seventy) of the Alexandrian Jews.

The other books of the Septuagint version were translated by different persons and at various times.

The letter ascribed to Aristeas was first printed in Greek and Latin, by Simen Schard, Basil 1561, 8vo., and reprinted at Oxford, 1692, 8vo.; the

771. (Fabric. Bib. Græca. iii. 660.)

The story about Aristeas and the seventy interpreters is told chiefly on the authority of the letter

but differing from it in some points, by Aristo-bulus, a Jewish philosopher (ap. Euseb. Præp.

Evan. xiii. 12), Philo Judææ (Vit. Mos. 2),

Josephus (Ant. Jud. xii. 2), Justin Martyr

(Cohort, i. p. 25), Chrysostom (Adv. Hacr.

vii. 2), Clements Alexanderinüs (Strom. i. p.

260), Tertullian (Apolog. 18), Eusebius

ARISTEAS and PAPIAS, sculptors, of Aphro-

disium in Cyprus, made the two statues of centaurs

in dark grey marble which were found at Hadrian's villa at Tivoli in 1746, and are now in the Capitoline museum. They bear the inscription APISTEAC

KAI PAPIAS AΦΡΟΔΙΕΙΚ. From the style of the statues, which is good, and from the place where they were discovered, Winckelmann supposed that they were made in the reign of Hadri-

an. Other statues of centaurs have been discovered, very much like those of Aristeas and Papias, but of better workmanship, from which some writers have inferred that the latter are only copies.

The two centaurs are fully described by Winckelmann

(Works, vi. 202, with Meyer's note, vi. 247),

who referred them (Raccomanda di Storia Antica, 27,

28) and Foggini (Miss. Capit. tav. 13, 14.) [P. S.]

ARISTEIDES (ΑΡΙΣΤΕΙΔΗΣ). 1. Son of Lysimachus, the Athenian statesman and general, makes his first certain appearance in history as archon eponym-us of the year 489 B.C. (Mar. Par. 50.) From Herodotus we hear of him as the best and justest

of his countrymen; as esteemed and at enmity with Themistocles; of his generosity and bravery at Salamis, in some detail (viii. 78, 82, and 95); and the fact, that he commanded the Athenians in the campaign of Plataea. (ix. 28.) Thucydides names him once as co-ambassador to Sparta with Themistocles, once in the words τὸν ὥς ἄρστειδον φέρον. (i. 91, v. 10.) In the Gorgias of Plato, he is the example of the virtuous, so rare among statesmen, of justice, and is said "to have become singularly famous for it, not only at home, but through the whole of Greece." (p. 526, a. b.) In Demosthenes he is styled the assessor of the ϕόρος (c. Aristocr. pp. 689, 690), and in Aeschines he has the title of "the Just." (c. Tim. p. 4. l. 23, c. Aeschin. pp. 79. 1. 38, 90. H. 18. 20, ed. Stephan.) Added to this, and by it to be corrected, we have, comprehending the sketch by Ctes. (c. 50. p. 790), and partly on that account, partly from personal character, opposed from the first to Themistocles. They fought together, Aristeides as the commander of his tribe, in the Athenian centre at Marathon; and when Miltiades hurried from the field to protect the city, he was left in charge of the spoil. Next year, 489, perhaps in consequence, he was archon. In 483 or 482 (according to Nepos, three years earlier) he suffered ostracism, whether from the enmities, merely, which he had incurred by his scrupulous honesty and integrity, though Theophrastus said, and it may be true, that he at times sacrificed it to his country's interest, no case whatever can be adduced in proof, and he certainly displays a sense, very unusual, of the duties of nation to nation.

His family, we are told, was ancient and noble (Callias the torch-bearer was his cousin); he was the political disciple of Cleisthenes (Plut. 2, An. Soni, p. 790), and partly on that account, partly from personal character, opposed from the first to Themistocles. They fought together, Aristeides as the commander of his tribe, in the Athenian centre at Marathon; and when Miltiades hurried from the field to protect the city, he was left in charge of the spoil. Next year, 489, perhaps in consequence, he was archon. In 483 or 482 (according to Nepos, three years earlier) he suffered ostracism, whether from the enmities, merely, which he had incurred by his scrupulous honesty and rigid opposition to corruption, or in connexion, further, with the triumph of the maritime and democratic policy of his rival. He wrote, it is said, his own name on the sherd, at the request of an ignorant countryman, who knew him not, but took it ill that any citizen should be called just beyond his neighbours. The sentence seems to have still been in force in 480 (Herod. vii. 79; Dem. c. Aristoiyi. l. p. 802. l. 16), when he made his way from Aegina with news of the Persian movements for Themistocles at Salamin, and called on him to be reconciled. In the battle itself he did good service by dislodging the enemy, with a band raised and armed by himself, from the islet of Psyttaleia. In 479 he was strategos, the chief, it would seem, but not the sole (Plut. Arist. 11, but comp. 16 and 20, and Herod. ix.), and to him no doubt belongs much of the glory due to the conduct of the Athenians, in war and policy, during this, the most perilous year of the contest. Their replies to the proffers of Persia and the fears of Sparta Plutarch ascribes to him expressly, and seems to speak of an extant ψηφερια 'Αριστείνου embracing them. (c. 16.) So, too, their treatment of the claims of Teges, and the arrangements of Pausanias with regard to their post in battle. He gives him further the suppression of a Persian plot among the aristocratical Athenians, and the settlement of a quarrel for the αμνος by conceding them to Plataea (comp. however on this second point Herod. ix. 71); finally, with better reason, the consecration of Plataea and establishment of the Bletheros, or Feast of Freedom. On the return

ARISTEIDES.

Plutarch in his Aristeides refers to the authority of Herodotus, Aeschines the Socratic, Callisthenes, Idomenes, Demetrius Philareus, who wrote an Αριστείδης (Diog. Laêrt. v. 80, 81), Aristot Chius, Pannuciis, and Craterus: he had also before him here, probably, as in his Themistocles (see c. 27), the standard historian, Ephorus, Charon Lampasaeus, a contemporary writer (501 to 481), Pseudo-Thucydides, Deinon, Homelides Pontues, and Neaouthes; perhaps also the Atthises of Hellanicus and Philochorus, and the Chia of Ion.

to Athens, Aristides seems to have acted in cheerful concert with Themistocles, as directing the restoration of the city (Heracl. Pont. 1); as his colleague in the embassy to Sparta, that secured for it its walls; as proposing, in accordance with his policy, perhaps also in consequence of changes in property produced by the war, the measure which threw open the archonschip and aristeioguos to all citizens alike. In 477, as joint-commander of the Athenian Paeonians, by his own conduct and that of his colleague and disciple, Cimon, he had the glory of obtaining for Athens the command of the maritime confederacy: and to him was by general consent entrusted the task of drawing up its laws and fixing its assessments. This first ϕόρος of 460 talents, paid into a common treasury at Delos, bore his name, and was regarded by the allies in after times, as marking their Saturnian age. It is, unless the change in the constitution followed it, his last recorded act. He lived, Theophrastus related, to see the treasury removed to Athens, and declared it (for the bearing of the words see Thirwall's Greece, iii. p. 47) a measure unjust and expedient. During most of this period he was, we may suppose, as Cimon's coadjutor at home, the chief political leader of Athens. He died, according to some, in Pontus, more probably, however, at home, certainly after 471, the year of the ostracism of Themistocles, and very likely, as Nepos states, in 468. (See Clinton, F. H. in the years 469, 468.)

A tomb was shown in Plutarch's time at Phalereum, as erected to him at the public expense. That he did not leave enough behind him to pay for his funeral, is perhaps a piece of rhetoric. We may believe, however, that his daughters were portioned by the state, as it appears certain (Plut. 27; comp. Dem. c. Zepht. 491, 28), that his son Lysimachus received lands and money by a decree of Alcibiades; and that assistance was given to his grand-daughter, and even to remote descendants, in the time of Demetrius Phalerus. He must, so far as we know, have been in 489, as archon eponymous, among the pentacosiomedimni: the wars may have destroyed his property; we can hardly question the story from Aeschines, the disciple of Socrates, that when his poverty was made a reproach in a court of justice to Callias, his cousin, he bore witness that he had received and declined offers of his assistance; that he died poor is certain. This of itself would prove him possessed of an honesty rare in those times; and in the higher points of integrity, though Theophrastus said, and it may be true, that he at times sacrificed it to his country's interest, no case whatever can be adduced in proof, and he certainly displays a sense, very unusual, of the duties of nation to nation.

2. Son of Lysimachus, grandson of the preceding, is in Plato's Laches represented as brought by his father to Socrates as a future pupil. In the Thetistateria, Socrates speaks of him as one of those who made rapid progress while in his society, but, after leaving him prematurely, lost all he had gained; an account which is unskillfully expanded and put in the mouth of the young man himself by the author of the Thetis. That of the Thetis to the main we may take to be true (Plat. Laches, p. 179, a, &c.; Thes. p. 131, a. Thugg. p. 131, a.)

3. Son of Archippus, an Athenian commander of the ships sent to collect money from the Greek states in B. C. 425 and 424. (Thuc. iv. 50, 75.)

4. An Eleus, conquered in the armed race at the Olympic, in the Diadous at the Pythian, and in the boys' horse-race at the Nemean games. (Paus. vi. 10, § 3.)

ARISTEIDES, P. AElius (Ἀριστείδης), surmounted THEODORUS, one of the most celebrated Greek rhetoricians of the second century after Christ, was the son of Eudacmon, a priest of celebrated Greek rhetoricians of the second century. He was educated by his father, and was the most unparalleled zeal to the study of rhetoric, which appeared to him the worthiest occupation of a man, and along with it he cultivated poetry as an amusement. Besides the rhetorician Herodes Atticus, whom he heard at Athens, he also received instructions from Aristotle at Pergamum, from Polemon at Smyrna, and from the grammarians Alexander of Cottymaum. (Philol. Vit. Soph. ii. 9; Suidas, s. v. Ἀριστείδης ; Aristead. Orat. fam. in Ates, p. 80, ed. Jebb.) After being sufficiently prepared for his profession, he travelled for some time, and visited various places in Asia, Africa, especially Egypt, Greece, and Italy. The fame of his talents and acquirements, which preceded him everywhere, was so great, that monuments were erected to his honour in several towns which he had honoured with his presence. (Aristead. Orat. Appoll. ii. p. 331, &c.; Philol. Vit. Soph. ii. 9, § 1.) Shortly before his return, and while yet in Italy, he was attacked by an illness which lasted for thirteen years. He had from his childhood been of a very weakly constitution, but neither this nor his protracted illness prevented his prosecuting his studies, for he was well at intervals; and in his "Sermones Sacri" (Ἰονία), and when in A. D. 178, Smyrna was to a certain divinities, others are panegyrics on towns, &c.) He had great influence with the emperor M. Aurelius, whose acquaintance he had formed in Pergamum, Phocaea, and other towns. (Serm. Sacr. ii. p. 304, iv. p. 324, &c.) He had great influence with the emperor M. Aurelius, whose acquaintance he had formed in Ionia, and when in A. D. 178, Smyrna was to a great extent destroyed by an earthquake, Aristotle represented the deplorable condition of the city and its inhabitants in such vivid colours to the emperor that he was moved to tears, and generously assisted the Smyrneans in rebuilding their town. The Smyrneans showed their gratitude to Aristotle by erecting to him a brazen statue in their agora, and by calling him the founder of their town. (Philol. Vit. Soph. ii. 9, § 2; Aristead. Epist. ad M. Aurel. et Commod. i. p. 512.) Various other honours and distinctions were offered to him at Smyrna, but he refused them, and accepted only the office of priest of Asclepius, which he held until his death, about A. D. 180, according to some, at the age of 60, and according to others of 70. The circumstance of his living for so many years at Smyrna, and enjoying such great honours there, is probably the reason that in an epitaph still extant (Andok. Planc. p. 376) he is regarded as a native of Smyrna. The memory of Aristotle was honoured in several ancient towns by statues. (Liban. Epist. 1551.) One of these representing the rhetorician in a sitting attitude, was discovered in the 16th century, and is at present in the Vatican museum. The museum of Verona contains an inscription to his honour. (Visconti, Iconograph. Graeci, i. plate xxxi, p. 373, &c.; Bartoli, Dissert. Sul. Musae Veronese, Verona, 1745, 4to.)

The works of Aristotle extant are, fifty-five orations and declamations (including those which were discovered by Morelli and Mai), and two treatises on rhetorical subjects of little value, viz. πρὸς σωτηρίαν λόγου καὶ πρὸς ἀφελεῖαν λόγου. Some of his orations are extant in modern times, on account of the various stories they contain respecting the cures of the sick in temples, and on account of the apparent resemblance between these cures and those said to be effected by Mesmerism. (Thorlacius, Opusc. ii. p. 129, &c.) A list of the orations extant as well as of the lost works of Aristotle, is given in Fabricius (Bibl. Gr. vi. p. 15, &c.), and more completely by Westermann. (Gesch. der Griech. Beredtsamh. p. 321, &c.) Aristotle as an orator is much superior to the majority of rhetoricians in his time, whose great and only ambition was to shine and make a momentary impression by extemporaneous speeches, and a brilliant and dazzling style. Aristotle, with whom thought was of far greater importance than the form in which it appeared, expressed the difference between himself and the other rhetoricians, at his first interview with the emperor, M. Aurelius, by saying, οὐκ ἑκάτερον τῶν ἱστοριῶν, ἀλλὰ τῶν ἐρωτολογίων. (Philol. Vit. Soph. ii. 9, § 2; Soph. Proleg. in Aristid. p. 738, ed. Dind.) He despised the silly puns, the shallow wit, and insignificant ornaments of his contemporaries, and sought nourishment for his mind in the study of the ancients. In his panegyric ondes, however, he often endeavours to display as much brilliancy of style as he can. On the whole his style is brief and concise, but too frequently deficient in ease and clearness. His sentiments are often trivial and spun out to an intolerable length, which leaves the reader nothing to think upon for himself. His orations remind us of a man who is fond of hearing himself talk. Notwithstanding these defects, Aristotle is still unmatched by any of his contemporaries. His admirers compared him to Demosthenes, and even Aristotle did not think himself much inferior. This vanity and self-sufficiency made him enemies and opponents, among whom are mentioned Palladius (Liban. Epist. 340), Sergius, and Phorpius. (Suid. s. v.) But the number of his admirers was far greater, and several learned grammarians wrote commentaries on his orations. Besides Athanasius, Meander, and others, whose works are lost, we must mention especially Sophater of Apamea, who is probably the author of the Greek Prolegomena to the orations of Aristotle, and also of some among the Scholia on Aristotle, which have been published by Trommel (Scholia in Aristeid. Orationes, Frankl. ARISTEIDES. 295

1826, 8vo.), and by Dindorf (vol. iii. of his edition of Aristides), and which contain a great many things of importance for mythology, history, and antiquities. They also contain numerous fragments of works now lost. The great part of these Scholia are probably compilations from the commentators of Arthes, Metrophanes, and other grammarians. Respecting the life of Aristides, compare J. Masson, Collectanea Historica Aristidis, acutum et vitam spectans, ordine chronologico digesta, in the edition of Jebb, and reprinted in that of Dindorf. The first edition of the orations of Aristides (53 in number) is that of Florence, 1517, fol. In 1566 W. Canter published at Basel a Latin translation, in which many passages were skilfully corrected. This translation, together with the Greek text, was re-edited by P. Stephens, 1604, in 3 vols. 8vo. A better edition, with some of the Greek Scholia, is that of Samuel Jebb, Oxford, 1722, 2 vols. 4to. Many corrections of the text of this edition are contained in Reiske's Animalc consolationes in Auct. Gracce, vol. iii. Morelli published in 1761 the oration ἄις ἀναγνωστὶ ἐρωτεύεται, which he had discovered in a Venetian MS. It was afterwards edited again by F. A. Wolf, in his edition of Demosthenes' oration against Leptines (Halle, 1789), and by Grauert in his edition of the orations of Aristeides (Bonn, 1827, 8vo.). This edition of Grauert contains also an oration ἄις Ἀναγνώστῳ ἐρωτεύεται, which had been discovered by A. Mai, and published in his Nova Collect. Script. Vet. vol. i. p. 3. A complete edition of all the works of Aristides, which gives a correct text and all the Scholia, was published by W. Dindorf, Leipzig, 1829, 3 vols. 8vo. [L. S.]

ARISTEIDES, ARTISTS. 1. Of Thebes, was one of the most celebrated Greek painters. His father was Aristodamus, his teachers were Euxenidas and his brother Nicomachus. (Plin. xxxv. 36, §§ 7, 22.) He was a somewhat older contemporary of Apelles (Plin. xxxv. 36, § 19), and flourished about 360-350 B.C. The point in which he most excelled is thus described by Pliny (L.c.): "Is omnium primum animam plantavit et sequum hominem expressit, quae vocant Graeci voces, item perturbationes," that is, he depicted the feelings, expressions, and passions which may be observed in common life. One of his finest pictures was that of a babe approaching the breast of its mother, who was mortally wounded, and whose fear could be plainly seen lest the child should suck blood instead of milk. (Anthol. Graec. ii. p. 251, Jacobs.) Fuseli (Lec. 1) has shown how admirably in this picture the artist drew the line between pity and disgust. Alexander admired the picture so much, that he removed it to Pella. Another of his pictures was a suppliant, whose voice you seemed almost to hear. Several other pictures of his are mentioned by Pliny (L. c.), and among them an Iris (ib. 40. § 41), which, though unfinished, excited the greatest admiration. As examples of the high price set upon his works, Pliny (ib. 36. § 19) tells us, that he painted a picture for Muson, tyrant of Elatea, representing a battle with the Persians, and containing a hundred figures, for each of which Aristides received ten minae; and that long after his death, Attalus, king of Pergamus, gave a hundred talents for one of his pictures. (Ib. and vii. 30.) In another passage (xxiv. 8) Pliny tells us, that when Mummium was selling the spoils of Greece, Attalus bought a picture of Bacchus by Aristides for 600,000 sesterces, but that Mummium, having thus discovered the value of the picture, refused to sell it to Attalus, and took it to Rome, where it was placed in the temple of Ceres, and was the first foreign painting which was exposed to public view at Rome. The commentators are in doubt whether these two passages refer to the same picture. (See also Strab. viii. p. 381.) Aristides was celebrated for his pictures of courtresses, and hence he was called ψωρωρυγάς. (Athen. xiii. p. 367, b.) He was somewhat harsh in his colouring. (Plin. xxxv. 36. § 19.) According to some authorities, the invention of encaustic painting in wax (Dict. of Ant. a. e. Painting, pp. 685, 686) was ascribed to Aristeides, and its perfection to Praxileos; but Pliny observes, that there were extant encaustic pictures of Polygnotus, Nicanor, and Areius (xxxv. 39.).

Aristides left two sons, Nicerus and Arison, to whom he taught his art. [Ariston; Nickrus.] Another Aristides is mentioned as his disciple. (Plin. xxxv. 36. § 23.) The words of Pliny, which are at first sight somewhat obscure, are rightly explained in the following table by Sillig. (Catal. Art. a. e. Antorides.)

2. A sculptor, who was celebrated for his statues of four-horsed and two-horsed chariots. Since he was the disciple of Polycletus, he must have flourished about 388 B.C. (Plin. xxxiv. 19. § 12.) Perhaps he was the same person as the Aristeides who made some improvements in the goals of the Olympic stadium. (Paus. vi. 20. § 7; Böckh, Corp. Inscript. i. p. 30.) [P. S.]

ARISTEIDES, of Athens, one of the earliest Christian apologists, was at first a philosopher, and continued such after he became a Christian. He is described by Jerome as a most eloquent man. His apology for Christianity, which he presented to the Emperor Hadrian about 123 or 126 A.D., was imbued with the principles of the Greek philosophy. It is said that the apology of Justin, who was also a philosopher, was, to a great extent, an imitation of that of Aristides. The work of Aristides is entirely lost. (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. iv. 3, Cron. Armen; Hieron. de Vir. Illust. 20; Epist. ad Magn. Orit. 84, p. 327.) [P. S.]

ARISTEIDES, the author of a work entitled Mileiastaca (Μιλειασακα or Μιλειανη ανθογα), which was probably a romance, having Milesia for its scene. It was written in prose, and was of a licentious character. It extended to six books at the least. (Harpocr. s. v. dedophtyfr.) It was translated into Latin by L. Cornelius Sisenna, a contemporary of Sulla, and it seems to have become popular with the Romans. (Plut. Crass. 32; Ovid. Trist. ii. 413, 414, 443, 444; Lucian, Amor. 1.) Aristides is reckoned as the inventor of the Greek romance, and the title of his work is supposed to have given rise to the term Mileiaus, as applied to works of fiction. Some writers think that his work was imitated by Appuleius in his Metamorphoses, and by Lucian in his Lucas.
ARISTOEUS.

The age and country of Aristoeides are unknown, but the title of his work is thought to favour the conjecture that he was a native of Miletus. For it is supposed that he was the same person as the Aristoeides of Miletus, whose works on Sicilian, Italian, and Persian history, are several times quoted by Plutarch (Parall.,) and that the author of the historical work, in his work De Nuptiis Philoloyiae et Mercurii, lib. 9. It seems probable also that he must be placed before Ptolemy, since he does not mention the difference between that writer and his predecessors with respect to the number of the modes. (Aristoxenus reckoned 13, his followers 15, but Ptolemy only 7. See Aristeid. pp. 22, 23; Pol. Harm. ii. 9.)

The work of Aristoeides is perhaps the most valuable of all the ancient musical treatises. It embraces, besides the theory of music (δραματική) in the modern sense, the whole range of subjects comprehended under μουσική, which latter science contemplated not merely the regulation of sounds, but the harmonious disposition of everything in nature. The first book treats of Harmonics and Rhhythm; the former subject being considered under the usual heads of Sounds, Intervals, Systems, Genera, Modes, Transition, and Composition (μουσική). The second, of the moral effects and numerical ratios which define musical intervals, and of their connexion with physical and moral science generally. Aristoeides refers (p. 87) to another work of his own, Περὶ Ποιητικῆς, which is lost. He makes no direct allusion to any of the ancient writers on music, except Aristoxenus.

The only edition of Aristoeides is that of Meilimsonius. It is printed, along with the latter part of the 5th book of Martianus Capella, in his collection entitled Antiquae Musice Anctores Septem, Augst. 1631. This edition is the best of all those, and of several other ancient musical writers, is announced by Dr. J. Fransis of Berlin. (Fabric. Biblia Graec. vol. ii. p. 259.)

ARISTENUS ALEXIUS. [ALEXIUS ARISTENUS.]

ARISTEUS (Ἀριστεύς), or ARISTEAS (Ἀρίστεας, Herod.) I. A Corinthian, son of Aedeimantus, commanded the troops sent by Corinth to maintain Potidaea in its revolt, b.c. 432. With Potidaea he was connected, and of the troops the greater number had volunteered, serving concurringly with him. Appointed on his arrival command-in-chief of the allied infantry, he encountered the Athenian Callias, but was outmanoeuvred and defeated. With his own division he was successful, and with it on returning from the pursuit he found himself cut off, but by a bold course made his way with slight loss into the town. This was now blockaded, and Aristoeus, seeing no hope, bid them leave himself with a garrison of 300, and the rest make their way to sea. This escape was effected, and he himself induced to join in it; after which he was occupied in petty warfare in Chalcis, and negotiations for aid from Peloponnesus. Finally, not long before the surrender of Potidaea, in the second year of the war, b.c. 430, he set out with other ambassadors from Peloponnesus for the court of Persia; but visiting Sitalces the Odrysian in their way, they were given to Athenian ambassadors there by Socrates, his son, and sent to Athens; and at Athens, partly from fear of the energy and ability of Aristoeus, partly in retaliation for the cruelties practised by Spartans, he was immediately put to death. (Thuc. i. 80—81, ii. 67; Herod, vii. 137; Thirlwall's Greeks, iii. pp. 102—103, 112.)

[ A. H. C.]

2. A Corinthian, son of Pellicius, one of the commanders of the Corinthian fleet sent against Epaminondas, b.c. 436. (Thuc. i. 29.)

3. A Spartan commander, b.c. 433. (Thuc. iv. 132.)

4. An Argive, the son of Cichon, conquered in the Delochis at the Olympic games. (Paus. vi. 9 § 1.)

ARISTIAS (Ἀριστιάς), a dramatic poet, the son of Pratinus, whose tomb Pausanias (i. 13. § 5) saw at Philip, and whose Satyric dramas, with those of his father, were surpassed only by those of Aeschylus. (Paus. i. c.) Aristias is mentioned in the life of Sophocles as one of the poets with whom the latter contended. Besides two dramas, which were undoubtedly Satyric, viz. the Köpse and Cyclops, Aristias wrote three others, viz. Anteus, Orpheus, and Atalante, which may have been tragedies. (Comp. Athen. xv. p. 686, a; Pollux, vii. 31; Welcker, Die Griech. Tragödien, p. 966.)

ARISTION (Ἀρίστιον), a philosopher either of the Epicurean or Peripatetic school, who made himself tyrant of Athens, and was besieged there by Sulla, b.c. 87, in the first Mithridatic war. His early history is preserved by Athenaeus (v. p. 211, &c.), on the authority of Posidonius of Apamene, the instructor of Cicero. By him it is called Athenion, whereas Pausanias, Appian, and Plutarch agree in giving him the name of Ariscon. Cassaubon on Athenaeus (iv. 11. 16) considers the true name was Athenion, but that on enrolling himself as a citizen of Athens, he changed it to Aristion, a supposition confirmed by the case of one Sossias mentioned by Theophrastus, whose name was altered to Sosistrattus under the same circumstances. Athenion or Aristion was the illegitimate son of a Peripatetic, also named Athenion, to whose property he succeeded, and so became an Athenian citizen. He married early, and began at the same time to teach philosophy, which he did with great success at Messene and Larissa. On returning to Athens with a considerable fortune, he was named ambassador to Mithridates, king of Pontus, then at war with Rome, and became one of the most intimate friends and counsellors of that monarch. His prowess at Athens represented the power of his patron in such glowing colours, that his countrymen began to conceive hopes of throwing off the Roman yoke. Mithridates then sent him to Athens, where he soon contrived, through the king's patronage, to assume the tyranny. His government seems to have been of the most cruel cha-Aristippus. for the purpose (Plat. de Carnio. 2), and remained with him almost up to the time of his execution, b. c. 399. Diodorus (xv. 76) gives b. c. 266 as the date of Aristippus, which agrees very well with the facts which we know about him, and with the statement (Schol. ad Aristoph. Plat. 179), that Lais, the courtezan with whom he was intimate, was born b. c. 421.

Though a disciple of Socrates, he wandered both in principle and practice very far from the teaching and example of his great master. He was luxurious in his mode of living; he indulged in sensual gratifications, and the society of the notorious Lais; he took money for his teaching (being the first of the disciples of Socrates who did so, Diog. Laert. ii. 63), and avowed to his instructor that he resided in a foreign land in order to escape the trouble of mixing in the politics of his native city. (Xen. Mem. ii. 1.) He passed part of his life at the court of Dionysius, tyrant of Syracuse, and is also said to have been taken prisoner by Artaxerxes, the satrap who drove the Spartans from Rhodes n. c. 396. (Diod. Sic. xiv. 79; see Broeker, Hist. Crit. Phil. ii. 2, 3.) He appears, however, at last to have returned to Cyrene, and there he spent his old age. The anecdotes which are told of him, and of which we find a most tedious number in Diogenes Laertius (ii. 65, &c.), by no means give us much idea of the real man. He is so much absorbed in his passions, but rather of one who took a pride in extracting enjoyment from all circumstances of every kind, and in controlling adversity and prosperity alike. They illustrate and confirm the two statements of Horace (Ep. i. 1. 18), that to observe the precepts of Aristippus is "meli res, non me rebus subjungere," and (i. 17. 23) that, "omnis Aristippum decuit color et status et res." Thus when reproached for his love of bodily indulgences, he answered, that there was no shame in enjoying them, but that it would be disgraceful if he could not at any time give them up. When Dionysius, provoked at some of his remarks, ordered him to take the lowest place at table, he said, "You wish to dignify the seat." Whether he was prisoner to a satrap, or grossly insulted and even spit upon by a tyrant, or enjoying the pleasures of a banquet, or reviled for faithlessness to Socrates by his fellow-pupils, he maintained the same calm temper. To Xenophon and Plato he was very obnoxious, as we see from the Memorabilia (i. c.), where he maintains an odious discussion against Socrates in defence of voluptuous enjoyment, and from the Phaedo (p. 59, c), where his absence at the death of Socrates, though he was only at Aegina, 200 stadia from Athens, is doubly mentioned as a reproach. (See Stallbaum's note.) Aristotle, too, calls him a sophist (Metaphys. ii. 2), and notices a story of Plato speaking to him with rather undue vehemence, and of his replying with calmness. (Ibid. ii. 28.) He imparted his doctrine to his daughter Arete, by whom it was communicated to her son, the younger Aristippus (hence called μεταφυσικός), and by him it is said to have been reduced to a system. Laertius, on the authority of Sotion (b. c. 205) and Panaetius (b. c. 143), gives a long list of books whose authorship is ascribed to Aristippus, though he also says that Sosicrates of Rhodes (b. c. 255) states, that he wrote nothing. Among these are treatises Περὶ Παιδείας, Περὶ Ἀρέτης, Περὶ Υψώματος, and many others. Some epistles attributed to him are... deservedly rejected as forgeries by Bentley. (Dis¬ sertation on Phalaris, §c. p. 104.) One of these is Arete, and its spuriousness is proved, among other arguments, by the occurrence in it of the name of a city near Cyrene, Bepécrian, which must have been given by the Macedonians, in whose dialect β stands for φ, so that the name is equivalent to Bepécrian, the victorious.

We shall now give a short view of the leading doctrines of the earlier Cyrenaic school in general, though it is not to be understood that the system was wholly or even chiefly drawn up by the elder Aristippus; but a considerable num¬ ber of the loss of contemporary documents to separate the parts which belong to each of the Cyrenaic philosophers, it is better here to combine them all.
From the fact pointed out by Ritter (Geschichte der Philosophie, vii. 3), that Aristotle chooses Eudoxus rather than Aristippus as the representative of the doctrine that Pleasure is the summum bonum (Eth. Nic. x. 2), it seems probable that but little of the Cyrenaic system is due to the founder of the school.

The Cyrenaeics despised Physics, and limited their inquiries to Ethics, though they included under that term a much wider range of science than can fairly be reckoned, as belonging to it. So, too, Aristippus accuses Aristippus of neglecting math¬ ematics, as a study not concerned with good and evil, which he said, are the objects even of the carpenter and tanner. (Metaphys. ii. 2.) They divided Philosophy into five parts, viz. the study of (1) Objects of Desire and Aversion, (2) Feel¬ ings and Affections, (3) Actions, (4) Causes,
(5) Proofs. Of these (4) is clearly connected with physics, and (5) with logic.

1. The first of the five divisions of science is the only one in which the Cyrenaic view is connected with the Socratic. Socrates considered happiness (i.e. the enjoyment of a well-ordered mind) to be the aim of all men, and Aristippus, taking up this position, pronounced pleasure the chief good, and pain the chief evil; in proof of which he referred to the natural feelings of men, children, and animals; but he wished the mind to preserve its authority in the midst of pleasure.
Desire he could not admit into his system, as it subjects men to hope and fear; the ταλαος of human life was momentary pleasure (μυκγερχων, μεριμν). For the Present only is ours, the Past is gone, and the Future uncertain; present happiness therefore is to be sought, and not εδηβανικα, which is only the sum of a number of happy states,
just as he considered life in general the sum of particular states of the soul. In this point the Cyrenaeics were opposed to the Epicureans. All pleasures were held equal, though they might ad¬
mitt of a difference in the degree of their purity.
So that a man ought never to covet more than he possesses, and should never allow himself to be overcome by sensual enjoyment. It is plain that, even with these concessions, the Cyrenaic system destroys all moral unity, by proposing to a man as many separate ταλαος as his life contains moments.

2. The next point is to determine what is plea¬

* Ritter believes that Aristippus is hinted at (ETH. Nis. x. 6), where Aristotle refutes the op¬ ion, that happiness consists in amusement, and speaks of persons holding such a dogma in order to recommend themselves to the favour of tyrants.

ARISTIPPUS.

3. Actions are in themselves morally indifferent, the only question for us to consider being their result; and law and custom are the only authori¬ ties which make an action good or bad. This monstrous dogma was a little qualified by the statement, that the advantages of injustice are slight; but we cannot agree with Bruckcr (Hist.
Crit. ii. 2), that it is not clear whether the Cyre¬ naics meant the law of nature or of men. For Léntius says expressly, ὅ σωφρονες οὐδὲν ἄνων πρέπει ἔναδ. εἰ τὸ ἐνευμενικὼς ἐργαὶ καὶ δόμαι, and no-pain to a calm—a simile not quite apposite,
for the sake of the mental state resulting from it.

4. There is no universality in human concep¬ tions; the senses are the only avenues of know¬ ledge, and even these admit a very limited range of information. For the Cyrenaeics said, that men could agree neither in judgments nor notions, in nothing, in fact, but names. We have all certain sensations, which we call white or sweet;
but whether the sensation which A calls white is similar to that which B calls by that name, we cannot tell; for by the common term while every man denotes a distinct object. Of the causes which produce these sensations we are quite igno¬ rant; and from all this we come to the doctrine of modern phillohal metaphysics, that truth is what each man troweth. All states of mind are motions; nothing exists but states of mind, and they are not the same to all men. True wisdom consists therefore in transforming disagreeable into agreeable sensations.

5. As to the Cyrenaic doctrine of proofs, no evidence remains.

In many of these opinions we recognize the happy, careless, selfish disposition which charac¬ terized their author; and the system resembles in many points those of Heraclitus and Protagoras, as given in Plato's Theaetetus. The doctrines that a subject only knows objects through the prism of the impression which he receives, and that man is the measure of all things, are stated or implied in the Cyrenaic system, and lead at least to the consequence, that what we call reality is appearance; so that the whole fabric of human knowledge becomes a fantastic picture. The prin¬ ciple on which all this rests, viz. that knowledge is sensation, is the foundation of Locke's modern ideology, though he did not perceive its connexion with the consequences to which it led the Cyre-ia. To revive these was reserved for Hume.

Artemis at Athens. (Paus. i. 29. § 2.) [L. S.]

ARISTOBULUS (Aριστοβουλός), princes of Judaea. 1. The eldest son of Johannes Hyrcanus.
In n. c. 110 we find him, together with his second brother Antigonus, successfully prosecuting for his father the siege of Samaria, which was destroyed in the following year. (Joseph. Ant. xiii. 10. §§ 2, 3; Bell. Jud. i. 2. § 7.) Hyrcanus dying in 107, Aristobulus took the title of king, this being the first instance of the assumption of that name among the Jews since the Babylonish captivity (but comp.
Strab. xvi. p. 762), and secured his power by the imprisonment of all his brothers except his favourite Antigonus, and by the murder of his mother, to whom Hyrcanus had left the government by will.
The life of Antigonus himself was soon sacrificed to his brother's suspicions through the intrigues of the queen and her party, and the remorse felt by Aristobulus for this deed increased the illness under which he was suffering at the time, and hastened his death. (n. c. 106.) In his reign the Ituracans were subdued and compelled to adopt the observance of the Jewish law. He also received the name of Φίλου Αραχαντος from the favour which he showed to the Greeks. (Joseph. Ant. xiii. 11; Bell. Jud. i. 5. § 1.)

2. The younger son of Alexander Jannaeus and Alexandra. (Joseph. Ant. xiii. 16. § 1; Bell. Jud.
i. 5. § 1.) During the nine years of his mother's reign he set himself against the party of the Phariseems, whose influence she had restored; and after her death, c. 70, he made war against his eldest brother Hyrcanus, and obtained from him the resignation of the crown and the high-priesthood, chiefly through the aid of his father's friends, whom Alexandra had placed in the several fortresses of the country to save them from the vengeance of the Pharisees. (Joseph. Ant. xii. 16, xiv. 1. § 2; Bell. Jud. i. 5, 6, § 1.) In n. c. 65 Judaea was invaded by Aretas, king of Arabia Petraea, with whom, at the instigation of Antipater the Idumaean, Hyrcanus had taken refuge. By him Aristobulus was defeated in a battle and besieged in Jerusalem: but Aretas was obliged to raise the siege by Scartus and Gabinius, Pompey's lieutenants, whose intervention Aristobulus had purchased. (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 2, 3. § 2; Bell. Jud. i. 6, §§ 2, 3.) In n. c. 63, he pleaded his cause before Pompey at Damascus, but, finding him disposed to favour Hyrcanus, he returned to Judaea and prepared for war. On Pompey's approach, Aristobulus, who had fled to the fortress of Alexandria, was persuaded to obey his summons and appear before him; and, being compelled to sign an order for the surrender of his garrisons, he withdrew in impotent discontent to Jerusalem. Pompey still advanced, and Aristobulus again met him and made submission; but, his friends in the city refusing to perform the terms, Pompey besieged and took Jerusalem, and carried away Aristobulus and his children as prisoners. (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 3, 4; Bell. Jud. i. 6, 7; Plut. Pompe. c. 39, 43; Strab. xvi. p. 762; Dion Cass. xxxvi. 7, 16.) Appian (Bell. Mith. c. 117) erroneously reports that Pompey had already marched immediately after Pompey's triumph. In n. c. 57, he escaped from his confinement at Rome with his son Antigonus, and, returning to Judaea, was joined by large numbers of his countrymen and renewed the war; but he was besieged and taken at Mahomern, the fortifications of which he was attempting to restore, and was sent back to Rome by Gabinius. (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 6. § 1; Bell. Jud. i. 8. § 6; Plat. Ant. c. 3; Dion Cass. xxxix. 56.) In n. c. 49, he was again released by Julius Caesar, who sent him into Judaea to forward his interests there; he was, however, poisoned on the way by some of Pompey's party. (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 7. § 4; Bell. Jud. i. 9. § 1; Dion Cass. xii. 18.)

3. Grandson of No. 2, was the son of Alexander and brother of Herod's wife Mariamne. His mother, Alexander, indignant at Herod's having conferred the high-priesthood on the obscure Ananias, endeavoured to obtain that office for her son from Antony through the influence of Cleopatra. Herod, fearing the consequences of this application, and urged by Mariamne's entreaties, deposed Ananias and made Aristobulus high-priest, the latter being only 17 years old at the time. The king, however, still suspecting Alexandra, and keeping a strict and annoying watch upon her movements, she renewed her complaints and designs against him with Cleopatra, and at length made an attempt to escape into Egypt with her son. Herod discovered this, and afflicted to pardon it; but soon after he caused Aristobulus to be treacherously drowned at Jericho, n. c. 55. (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 2, 3; Bell. Jud. i. 22. § 2.)

4. One of the sons of Herod the Great by Mariamne, was sent with his brother Alexander to Rome, and educated in the house of Pollio. (Joseph. Ant. xv. 10. § 1.) On their return to Judaea, the suspicions of Herod were excited against them by their brother Antipater [Antipater], aided by Phorbas and their aunt Salome, though Berenice, the daughter of the latter, was married to Aristobulus; the young men themselves supplying their enemies with a handle against them by the indiscreet expression of their indignation at their mother's death. In n. c. 11, they were accused by Herod at Aquileia before Augustus, through whose mediation, however, he was reconciled to them. Three years after, Aristobulus was again involved with his brother in a charge of plotting against their father, but a second reconciliation was effected by Archelaus, king of Cappodocia, the father-in-law of Alexander. A third accusation, through the arts of Eucyles, the Lacedaemonian adventurer, proved fatal: by permission of Augustus, the two young men were arraigned by Herod before a council convened at Berytus (at which they were not even allowed to be present to defend themselves), and, being condemned, were soon after strangled at Sebastæ, n. c. 6. (Joseph. Ant. xvi. 1—4, 8, 10, 11; Bell. Jud. i. 23—27; comp. Strab. xvi. p. 765.)

5. Surnamed "the Younger" (ὁ νεότερος), Joseph. Ant. xx. 1. § 2) was son of Aristobulus and Berenice, and grandson of Herod the Great. (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 5. § 4; Bell. Jud. i. 28. § 1.) Himself and his two brothers,—Agrippa I., and Herod the future king of Chalcis,—were educated at Rome together with Claudius, who was afterwards emperor, and who always regarded Aristobulus with great favour. (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 5. § 4, 6. § 1, xx. 1. § 2.) He lived at enmity with his brother Agrippa, and drove him from the protection of Flaccus, proconsul of Syria, by the charge of having been bribed by the Damascenes to support their cause with the proconsul against the Sidonians. (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 6. § 3.) When Caligula sent Petronius to Jerusalem to set up his statues in the temple, we find Aristobulus joining in the remonstrance against the measure. (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 8; Bell. Jud. ii. 10; Tac. Ann. v. 9.) He died as he had lived, in a private station (Joseph. Bell. Jud. ii. 11. § 6), having, as appears from the letter of Claudius to the Jews in Josephus (Ant. xvi. 5. § 1), made a determined attempt to escape to Rome. His death took place in a. d. 44. He was married to Iotapa, a princess of Euneae, by whom he left a daughter of the same name. (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 5. § 4; Bell. Jud. ii. 11. § 6.)

6. Son of Herod king of Chalcis, grandson of the Aristobulus who was strangled at Sebaste, and great-grandson of Herod the Great. In a. d. 55, Nero made Aristobulus king of Armenia Minor, in order to secure that province from the Parthians, and in a. d. 61 added to his dominions some portion of the Greater Armenia which had been given to Tigranes. (Joseph. Ant. xx. 6. § 4; Tac. Ann. xvii. 7, xiv. 3; Mommsen. i. 7.) Who a. d. 110 also (Joseph. Ant. xvi. 7. § 2) to have obtained from the Romans his father's kingdom of Chalcis, which had been taken from his cousin Agrippa II., in a. d. 55; and he is mentioned as joining Cæsennius Petrus, proconsul of Syria, in the war against Antiochus, king of Commagene, in the 4th year of Vespasian, a. d. 73. (Joseph. l. c.) He was married to Salome, daughter of the infamous Herodias, by whom he had three sons, Herod, Agrippa, and Aristocles; of these things further is recorded. (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 8, § 4.)

ARISTOBULUS, a painter, to whom Pliny (xxxiv. 40, § 42) gives the epithet Syrus, which Sillog understands of one of the Cynodides. [P. S.]

ARISTOCLES (Ἀριστοκλῆς), a priestess in Delphi, from whom Pythagoras said that he had received many of his precepts. (Porphyry, p. 41, ed. Kistler.) She is called Themistoclea in Diogenes Laërtius (viii. 21), and Theocles in Suidas. (s. v. Πυθαγόρας.) Pythagoras is said to have written a letter to her. See Fabri. Bibli. Graec. i. p. 881.

ARISTOCLEIDES (Ἀριστοκλείδης), of Aegina, son of Aristocles, won the victory in the Panathenae in the Nemean Games, but it is not known in what Olympiad. Disser conjectures that it was gained before the battle of Salamis. The third Nemean Ode of Pindar is in his honour.

ARISTOCLEIDES (Ἀριστοκλείδης), a celebrated player on the cithara, who traced his descent from Terpander, lived in the time of the Persian war. He was the master of Phrynis of Mytilene. (Schol. ad. Aristoph. Nub. 956; Suidas, s. v. Φρύνης.)

ARISTOCLETUS (Ἀριστοκλετος), as he is called by Plutarch (Lycurg. c. 2), or Aristocrates (Ἀριστοκράτης) or Aristocrates (Ἀριστοκλῆς), as he is called by Pausanias (iii. 6 § 4, § 5, §§ 3, 5, vi. 3 § 6, Æc.), the father of Lyssander, the Spartan lawyer.

ARISTOCLES (Ἀριστόκλης). 1. Of Rhodes, a Greek grammerian and rhetorician, who was a contemporary of Sesto. (Xiv. p. 685.) He is the probable writer of whom Ammonius (de Diff. Voc. under ἐπιώκας) mentions a work περὶ παραγωγής. There are several other works: viz. περὶ διάλεξης (Etymol. M. s. v. κύκλος; comp. Cratius' Ancolod. i. p. 231, iii. p. 285), Διοδόν ὀρατική (Athen. iv. 140), and a work on the history of Italy, of which Plutarch (Paral. Minor. 25, 41) mentions the third book,—which are ascribed to Aristocles; but whether all or only some of them belong to Aristocles the Rhodian, is uncertain. (Compare Clem. Alex. Strom. vi. p. 267; Varr. de Ling. Lat. x. 10, 75, ed. Müller; Dionys. Hal. Dietarch. 6.)

2. Of Pergamus, a sophist and rhetorician, who lived in the time of the emperors Trajan and Hadrian. He spent the early part of his life upon the study of the Peripatetic philosophy, and during this period he completely neglected his outward appearance. But afterwards he was seized by the desire of becoming a rhetorician, and went to Rome, where he enrolled himself among the pupils of Herodes Atticus. After his return to Pergamus, he made a complete change in his mode of life, and appears to have enjoyed a great reputation as a teacher of rhetoric. His deaculations are praised for their perspicuity and for the purity of the Attic Greek; but they were wanting in passion and animation, and resembled philosophical discussions. Suidas ascribes to him a work on rhetoric (περὶ διάλεξης) by another, Dirokh. (Porphyr. de Ling. Soph. ii. 3; Suidas, s. v. Αριστοκλῆς; Endoec. p. 66.)

3. Of Messene, a Peripatetic philosopher, whose age is uncertain, some placing him three centuries before and others two centuries after Christ. But if the statement is correct, that he was the teacher of Alexander Aphrodias (Cyrill. c. Juli. ii. 61), he must have lived about the beginning of the third century after Christ. According to Suidas (s. v. Ευδοκία) and Endoec. (p. 71), he wrote several works:—

1. Περὶ τοῦ κόσμου οἰκείου φύσας καὶ ἔθους.
2. Τῆς γονίας τῆς λογικῆς. A work on the god Serapis.
3. A work on Ethics, in ten books; and 5. A work on Philosophy, likewise in ten books. The last of these works appears to have been a history of philosophy, in which he treated of the philosophers, their schools, and doctrines. Several fragments of it are preserved in Eusebius. (Procop. Evang. xiv. 17-21, xv. 2, 14; Comp. Theodoret. Theseg. Sermon. 8, and Suidas, who also mentions some other works of his.)

4. A Stoic philosopher, who wrote a commentary in four books on a work of Chrysippus. (Suidas, s. v. Αριστόκλης.)

5. A musician, to whom Athenaeus (iv. p. 174) attributes a work περὶ χώρων.

6. The author of an epigram in the Greek Anthology. (Append. Epigr. n. 7, ed. Tauchnitz.)

7. The author of a work called Παραδόξος, which consisted of several books. Jacobs (ad Anthol. Gr. xii. p. 862) is of opinion, that he is the same as the Messenian. Some fragments of his are preserved in Stobaeus (Floridag. 64, 37) and the Scholast on Pindar. (Olymp. vii. 66.) [L. S.]

ARISTOCLES (Ἀριστόκλης), a physician, whose medicines are several times quoted by Aemonomachus. (Ap. Gal. De Compso. Mediciin. sec. Leore. vi. 6, xvol. xii. p. 930; ibid. vii. xii. d. p. 285; De Compso. Medicin. sec. Con. vii. 7, xvol. xiii. p. 977.) He is also mentioned in the first volume of Cranse's Analecta Graeco Parthisiana, p. 395. Nothing is known of the events of his life, but he must have lived some time in or before the first century after Christ. [W. A. G.]

ARISTOCLES (Ἀριστοκλῆς), sculptors. From different passages in Pausanias we learn the following particulars:—

1. Aristocles of Cydonia was one of the most ancient sculptors; and though his age could not be clearly fixed, it was certain that he flourished before Zancl was called Messene (Paus. v. 25, § 6), that is, before 484 B.C.

2. The startling-piller of the Hippodrome at Olympia was made by Cleocetas, the same sculptor by whom there was a statue at Athens bearing this inscription:

Ο των ἄραξέων Ὀλυμπίδος εἰδή πρῶτος Τεῖστε με Κλαύτας ἰός Ἄριστοκλῆς, (vi. 20, § 7.)

3. There was an Aristocles, the pupil and son of Cleocetas. (v. 24, § 1.)

4. Aristocles of Sicyon was the brother of Canachus, and not much inferior to him in reputation. This Aristocles had a pupil, Synnoon, who was the father and teacher of Polichus of Aegina. (v. 9, § 1.) We are also told, in an epigram by Antipater Sidonius (Greek Anthol. ii. p. 15, no. 35, Jacobs), that Aristocles made one of three statues of the Muses, the other two of which were made by Aeladas and Canachus. [Aeladas.]

5. Pantas of Chiles, the disciple of Socrates, was the seventh disciple reckoned in order from Aristocles of Sicyon (Paus. vi. 3, § 4), that is, according to a mode of reckoning which was common with the Greeks, counting both the first and the last of the series.

From these passages we infer, that there were two sculptors of this name: Aristocles the elder, who is called both a Cydonian and a Sicymian, probably because he was born at Cydonia and practiced and taught his art in Sicyon; and Aristocles, the younger, of Sicyon, who was the grandson of the former, son of Cleoetas, and brother of Canachus: and that these artists founded a school of sculpture at Sicyon, which secured an hereditary reputation, and of which we have the heads for seven generations, namely, Aristocles, Cleoetas, Aristocles and Canachus, Symoön, Potilichus, Sostratus, and Pantias.

There is some difficulty in determining the age of these artists; but, supposing the date of Canachus to be fixed at about 540—508 B.C. (P. Canu.), we have the date of his brother, the younger Aristocles, and allowing 30 years to a generation, the elder Aristocles must have lived about 600—568 B.C. Büch. (Corp. Inscr. i. p. 39) places him immediately before the period when Zanclt was first called Messene, but there is nothing in the words of Pausanias to require such a restriction. By extending the calculation to the other artists mentioned above, we get the following table of dates:

1. Aristocrates flourished 600 to 568 B.C.
2. Cleoetas 570—538
3. Aristocles 540—508
4. Canachus 510—478
5. Potilichus 480—448
6. Sostratus 450—418
7. Pantias 420—388

These dates are found to agree very well with all that we know of the artists. (See the respective articles.) Silig (Cover Art. A. c. c.) gives a table which does not, materially differ from the above. He calculates the dates at 564, 536, 508, 480, 452, 424, and 396 B.C. respectively. In this computation it has been assumed that the elder Canachus was the brother of the younger Aristocles, and that Pantias was the seventh in order from the elder Aristocles. Any other supposition would throw the whole matter into confusion.

Pausanias mentions, as a work of the elder Aristocles, a group in bronze representing Hercules struggling for a girdle with an Amazon on horseback, which was dedicated at Olympia by Evagoras of Zancle (v. 25, § 6); and, as a work of the younger, a group in bronze of Zeus and Ganymede, dedicated at Olympia by Gnothios, a Thessalian. (v. 24, § 1.) The Muse by the latter, mentioned above (4), was in bronze, hold a lyre (χέριν), and was intended to represent the Muse of the diatonic genus of music. (P. S.)

ARISTOCYPRUS, a painter mentioned by Pliny (xxxv. 11, p. 40) as one of those who deserved to be ranked next to the masters in their art. His age and country are unknown. He painted the temple of Apollo at Delphi. (C. P. M.)

ARISTOCRATES (Αριστοκράτης). 1. King of Orchomenus in Arcadia, son of Aecheinus, was stoned to death by his people for violating the virgin-priestess of Artemis Hymnia. (Paus. viii. 6, § 3, 13; 8, § 43.)

2. King of Orchomenus in Arcadia, son of Hicetas, and grandson of the preceding, was the leader of the Arcadians in the second Messenian war, when they espoused with other nations in the Peloponnesus the side of the Messenians. He was hailed by the Lacedaemonians, and was guilty of treachery at the battle of the Trench; and when this was discovered some years afterwards, he was stoned to death by the Arcadians. His family was deprived of the sovereignty according to Pausanias, or completely destroyed according to Polybius; but the latter statement at all events cannot be correct, as we find that his son Aristocles ruled over Orchomenus and a great part of Arcadia. The date of Aristocrates appears to have been about B.C. 630—640. (Strab. viii. p. 362; Paus. iv. 17, § 4, 22, § 2, &c., viii. 5, § 3; Polyb. iv. 33; Plut. de ser. Num. Vind. c. 2; Müller, Arg. Hellen. p. 55, Dor. i. 7, § 11.)

3. The son of Scellia. See below.

4. A person against whom Demosthenes wrote an oration. He wrote it for Euthycles, who accused Aristocrates of proposing an illegal decree in relation to Charidemus. (Charidemus.)

5. General of the Rhodians, about B.C. 154, apparently in the war against the Cretans. (Polyb. xxxii. 9, with Seweighnauer's note.)

6. An historian, the son of Hipparchus, and a Spartan, wrote a work on Lacedaemonian affairs (Σαριστοκράτης), an Athenian of wealth and influence (Pit. Corp. p. 472, a.), son of Scellia, attached himself to the oligarchic party, and was a member of the government of the Four Hundred, which, however, he was, together with Theromenes, a main instrument in overthrowing. (Thuc. vi. 69, 92, Lys. c. 16, Diod. Thuc. i. 21.) Aristocrates (Art. 126) refers to him with a punning allusion to his name and politics. In 407, when Alcibiades, on his return to Athens, was made commander-in-chief, Aristocrates and Adeimantus were elected generals of the land forces under him. (Xen. Hell. i. 4, § 21; comp. Diod. viii. 69; Nep. A. c. 7.)

In the same year, Aristocrates was appointed one of the ten commanders who superseded Alcibiades, and he was among the six who were brought to trial and executed after the battle of Arginusae, B.C. 406. (Xen. Hell. i. 5. § 16, 6, § 29, 27, §§ 2, 34; Diod. xiii. 74, 101.) (E. E.)

ARISTOCRATES (Αριστοκράτης), a grammarian, whose remedy for the tooth-ache is preserved by Andromachus (ap. Gal. De Cancr. Medicum. sec. Loc. v. 5, vol. xii. pp. 878, 879), and who must therefore have lived some time in or before the first century after Christ. He is also mentioned in the first volume of Cramer's Anecdota Graeca Parthienia, p. 395. (W. A. G.)

ARISTOCRITUS (Αριστοκρίτος), 1. Father of Lysander. (Aristocrates.)

2. A Greek writer upon Miletus (Schol. ad Apoll. Rhod. i. 186), who is quoted by Parthenius (c. 11), and Pliny. (H. N. v. 31, c. 37.)

ARISTOCRYPUS (Αριστοκρύπος), son of Philocyrus, whom Solon visited, the king of Soli in Cyprus, fell in the battle against the Persians, B.C. 498. (Herod. vi. 113.)
ARISTODEMUS. (Ἀριστόδημος), a Sicyonian woman, who, according to a local tradition of Sicyon, became the mother of Aristodemus, in the form of a dragon (serpent). A painting of her and the dragon existed at Sicyon in the temple of Asclepius. (Paus. ii. 10. § 3, iv. 14. § 5.)

A daughter of Priam of this name occurs in Apollod. iii. 12. § 5. [L. S.]

ARISTODEMUS (Ἀριστόδημος), a son of Aristocles, and a descendant of Hercules, was married to Argeia, by whom he became the father of Eurysthenes and Procles. According to some traditions Aristodemus was killed at Naupactus by a flash of lightning, just as he was setting out on his expedition into Peloponnesus (Apollod. ii. 8. § 2, &c.), or by an arrow of Apollo at Delphi because he had consulted Hercules about the return of the Heraclids instead of the Delphic oracle. (Herod. vii. 229—233; see Valck. and Bahr, ad loc. i. p. 553, &c.)

According to this tradition, Eurysthenes and Procles were the first Heraclid kings of Lacedaemon; but a Lacedaemonian tradition stated, that Aristodemus himself came to Sparta, was the first king of his race, and died a natural death. (Herod. vi. 52; Xenoph. Agesil. 8. § 7.) Another Heraclid of this name, the grandfather of the former, is mentioned by Eutropides. (Ap. Schol. ad Piat. 16th. iv. 104.) [L. S.]

ARISTODEMUS (Ἀριστόδημος), the Spartan, when the last battle at Thermopylae was expected, was lying with Eurytas sick at Alpeni; or as others related, they were together at Thermopylae, and the latter was killed by the camp, Eurytas returned and fell among the Three Hundred. Aristodemus went home to Sparta. The Spartans made him ὀτρυγία; "no man gave him light for his fire, no man spoke with him; he was called Aristodemus the coward" (ὅ τρυγίας seems to have been the legal title; comp. Diod. xix. 70). Stung with his treatment, next year at Plataea, B. C. 479, he fell in doing away his disgrace by the wildest feats of valor. The Spartans, however, though they removed his ὄτρυγία, refused him a share in the honors they paid to his fellows, Poseidomus, Philocyon, and Amompharetus, though he had outdone them. (Herod. vii. 229—233; see Valcken. and Bähr, ad loc. i. p. 71; Suidas, s. v. Λυκομήσιος.)

ARISTODEMUS (Ἀριστόδημος), a Spartan, who appears as one of the chief heroes in the first Messenian war. In the sixth year of that war the Messenians sent to Delphi to consult the oracle, and the ambassador Tissis brought back the answer, that the preservation of the Messenian state demanded that a maiden of the house of the Aepytids should be sacrificed to the gods of the lower world. When the daughter of Lycisca was drawn by lot, the seer Epelobus declared that she was a supposititious child, and not a daughter of Lycisca. Hereupon Lycisca left her country and went over to the Lacedaemonians. As, however, the oracle had added, that if, for some reason, the maiden chosen by lot could not be sacrificed, another might be chosen in her stead, Aristodemus, a gallant warrior, who likewise belonged to the house of the Aepytids, came forward and offered to sacrifice his own daughter for the deliverance of his country. A young Messenian, however, who loved the maiden, opposed the intention of her father, and declared that he as her betrothed had more power over her than her father. When this reason was not listened to, his love for the maiden drove him to despair, and in order to save her life, he declared that she was with child by him. Aristodemus, on this pretence, murdered the maiden, opened her body to refute the calumny. The seer Epelobus, who was present, now demanded the sacrifice of another maiden, as the daughter of Aristodemus had not been sacrificed to the gods, but murdered by her father. But king Euphaes persuaded the Messenians, who, in their indignation, wanted to kill the lover, who had been the cause of the death of Aristodemus' daughter, that the command of the oracle was fulfilled, and as he was supported by the Aepytids, the people accepted his counsel. (Paus. iv. 9. §§ 2—6; Diodor. Fragm. Vit. p. 7, ed. Dindorf; Euseb. Praep. Beang. v. 27.) When the news of the oracle and the manner of its fulfillment became known at Sparta, the Lacedaemonians were desponding, and for five years they abstained from attacking the Messenians, until at last some favourable signs in the sacrifices encouraged them to undertake a fresh campaign against Ithome. A battle was fought, in which king Euphaes lost his life, and as he left no heir to the throne, Aristodemus was elected king by the Messenians, notwithstanding the opposition of some, who declared him unworthy on account of the murder of his daughter. This happened about B. C. 723. Aristodemus showed himself worthy of the confidence placed in him: he continued the war against the Lacedaemonians, and in B. C. 724 he gained a great victory over them. The Lacedaemonians now endeavoured to effect by fraud what they had been unable to accomplish in the field, and their success convinced Aristodemus that his country was devoted to destruction. In his despair he put an end to his life on the tomb of his daughter, and a short time after, B. C. 722, the Messenians were obliged to recognize the supremacy of the Lacedaemonians. (Paus. iv. 10—13.)

2. Tyrant of Cumae in Campania, a contemporary of Tarquinius Superbus. His history is related at great length by Dionysius. He was of a distinguished family, and surnamed Μαλακέας,—respecting the meaning of which the ancients themselves are not agreed. By his bravery and popular arts, he gained the favour of the people; and having caused many of the exiled nobles to be put to death, or sent into exile, he made himself tyrant of Cumae, B. C. 502. He secured his usurped power by surrounding himself with a strong body-guard, by disarming the people, removing the male descendants of the exiled nobles from the town, and compelling them to perform servile labour in the country. In addition to this, the whole of the young generation of Cumae were educated in an effeminate and enervating manner. In this way he maintained himself for several years, until at last the exiled nobles and their sons, supported by Campanians and mercenaries, recovered the possession of Cumae, and took cruel vengeance on Aristodemus and his family. (Dionys. Hal. viii. p. 415, &c.; ed. Hyl.; Diod. Fragm. Lib. viii. in the "Excerpt. de Virt. et Vit.", Suidas, s. v. Αριστόδημος.) According to Plutarch (de Virt. Mulier. p. 261), he assisted the Romans against the Etruscans, who endeavoured to restore the Tarquins. According to Livy (ii. 21), Tarquinius Superbus took refuge at the court of this tyrant, and died there. (Comp. Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, i. p. 553, &c.)

3. Surnamed the Small (ὁ μικρός), a disciple of Socrates, who is reported to have had a conversation with him respecting sacrifices and divination, which Aristodemus despised. (Xen. Memor. Scorr. i. 4. § 2, &cc.) He was a great admirer of Socrates, whose society he sought as much as possible. He always walked barefoot, which he seems to have done in imitation of Socrates. (Plat. Sympos. p. 173, Phaed. p. 239.)

4. A tragic actor of Athens in the time of Philip of Macedonia and Demosthenes. He took a prominent part in the political affairs of his time, and belonged to the party who saw no safety except in peace with Macedonia. (Dem. de Corun. p. 232, de Fals. Leg. pp. 344, 571.) Demosthenes (c. Phil. iii. p. 150) therefore treats him as a traitor to his country, and in his negotiations with Philip, who was fond of him on account of his great talent for acting, and made use of him for his own purposes. (Dem. de Fals. Leg. p. 442; comp. Cic. de Re Public. iv. 11; Plut. Vit. X. Orat.; Schol. ad Lucian, vol. ii. p. 7.) There was a tragic actor of the same name at Syracuse in the time of the first Punic war. (Liv. xxiv. 24.)

5. Of Miletus, a friend and flatterer of Antigonus, king of Asia, who sent him, in b.c. 315, to Peloponnesus with 1000 talents, and ordered him to maintain friendly relations with Polyperchon and his son Alexander, to collect as large a body of mercenaries as possible, and to conduct the war against Cassander. On his arrival in Laconia, he obtained permission from the Spartans to engage mercenaries in their country, and thus raised in Peloponnesus an army of 8000 men. The friendship with Polyperchon and his son Alexander was confirmed, and the former was made governor of the peninsula. Ptolemy, who was allied with Cassander, sent a fleet against the general and the allies of Antigonus, and Cassander made considerable conquests in Peloponnesus. After his departure, Aristodemus and Alexander at first endeavoured in common to persuade the towns to expel the garrisons of Cassander, and recover their independence. But Alexander soon allowed himself to be made a traitor to the cause he had hitherto espoused, and was rewarded by Cassander with the chief command of his forces in the Peloponnesus. In b.c. 314, Aristodemus invited the Alexander to support the cause of Antigonus; and having missed a great number of mercenaries among them, he attacked Alexander, who was besieging Cyllene, and compelled him to raise the siege. He then restored several other places, such as Patrae in Achaea and Dyme in Aetolia, to what was then called freedom. After this, b.c. 306, Aristodemus occurs once more in history. (Diod. xix. 57—66; Plut. Demosth. 16. 17.)

6. Tyrant of Megalopolis in the reign of Antigonus Gonatas, and shortly before the formation of the Achaean league. He was a native of Phigalea and a son of Artyla. He was one of those tyrants who were set up at that time in various parts of Greece through Macedonian influence. He was esteemed by the surname Xynergas. In his reign, Cleomenes of Sparta and his eldest son Acrotatus invaded the territory of Megalopolis. A battle was fought, in which Aristodemus defeated the enemy and Acrotatus was slain. (Paus. viii. 27. § 8.) Aristodemus was assassinated afterwards by the emissaries of Ecdemus and Demo- phanes, two patriotic citizens of Megalopolis, and friends of young Philopoemen. (Plut. Philop. 1.)

Aristodemus. His sepulchral mound in the neighbourhood of Megalopolis was seen as late as the time of Pan- sanias. (viii. 36. § 3.)

[4. § 2, &c.] Aristodemus ('Aroto6mos), literary.

1. Of Nysa in Caria, was a son of Menecrates, and a pupil of the celebrated grammarian, Aristarchus. (Schol. ad Pind. Nem. viii. 1. 1; Strab. xiv. p. 650.) He himself was a celebrated grammarian, and Strabo in his youth was a pupil of Aristodemus at Nysa, who was then an old man. It is not improbable that the Aristodemus whom the Scholiast on Pindar (fr. i. 11) calls an Alexandrian, is the same as the Nysian, who must have resided for some time at Alexandria.

2. Of Nysa, a relation (avrokalos) of the former. He was younger than the former, distinguished himself as a grammarian and rhetorician, and is mentioned among the instructors of Pompey the Great. During the earlier period of his life he taught rhetoric at Nysa and Rhodes; in his later years he resided at Rome and instructed the sons of Pompey in grammar. (Strab. xiv. p. 650.) One of these two grammarians wrote an historical work (istoria), the first book of which is quoted by Parthenius ('Erov. 8), but whether it was the work of the elder or the younger Aristodemus, and what was the subject of it, cannot be decided. (Comp. Var. de Ling. Lat. x. 75, ed. Müller; Schol. ad Hom. Il. ii. 354, xii. 1.)

3. Of Elia, a Greek writer, who is referred to by Habartnum ('e8alatiPiva) as an authority respecting the number of the Hellenodice. He is probably the same as the one mentioned by Tertullian (de An. 46) and Eusebius. (Chor. i. p. 37; comp. Synecellus, p. 370, ed. Dindorf.) An Aristodemus is mentioned by Athenaeus (pi. 495) as the author of a commentary on Pindar, and is often referred to in the Scholia on Pindar, but whether he is the Eleian or Nysian, cannot be decided.

4. Of Thesbes (Schol. ad Theorit. viii. 108), wrote a work on his native city (Onsalei), which is often referred to by ancient authors, and appears to have treated principally of the antiquities of Thesbes. Suidas (e. v. ri6w6v v6so), where the name 'Arotoelo6v has been justly corrected into 'Aroto6v, quotes the second book of this work. (Compare Schol. ad Eorip. Phoen. 162, 1120, 1126, 1163; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. ii. 906; Valcken. ad Schol. ad Eorip. Phoen. 1120, p. 732.)

There are many passages in ancient authors in which Aristodemus occurs as the name of a writer, but as no distinguishing epithet is added to the name in those passages, it is impossible to say whether in any case the Aristodemus is identical with any of those mentioned above, or distinct from them. Plutarch (Parallel. Min. 35) speaks of an Aristodemus as the author of a collection of fables, one of which he relates. A second, as the author of ge6vov drj6vomix6v, is mentioned by Athenaeus (vi. p. 244, viii. pp. 338, 345, xii. p. 565). A third occurs in Cleomenes Alexandrinus (Stron. i. p. 133) as the author of a work rjel epyro0da6, and a fourth is mentioned as the epitomizer of a work of Herodian, which he dedicated to one Danaus. (Suidas, e. v. 'Aroto6v.) A Platonic philosopher of the same name is mentioned by Plutarch (adv. Colot. init.) as his contemporary.

[5. § 2, &c.] Aristodemus ('Aroto6mos), artists.
1. A painter, the father and instructor of Nicomachus [Nicomachus], flourished probably in the early part of the fourth century B.C. (Plin. xxxv. 10. s. 36.)

2. A statuary, who lived after the time of Alexander the Great. Among other works of his Pliny (xxxiv. 8. s. 19) mentions a statue of king Seleucus. To what country he belonged is uncertain.

3. A painter, a native of Caria, contemporary with Philostratus the elder, with whom he was connected by the ties of hospitality. He wrote a work giving an account of distinguished painters, of the cities in which painting had flourished most, and of the kings who had encouraged the art. (Philos. Procon. Icon. p. 4, ed. Jacob. [C.P.M.]

ARISTODICUS (Ἀριστοδίκος). 1. Of Cyme in Asia Minor, and son of Heracleides. When his fellow-citizens were advised, by an oracle, to deliver up Pausanias to the Persians, Aristodicus dissuaded them from it, saying, that the oracle might be a fabrication, as Pausanias had come to them as a suppliant. He was accordingly sent himself to consult the oracle; but the answer of Apollo was the same as before; and when Aristodicus, in order to avert the criminal act of surrendering a suppliant, endeavoured in a very ingenious way, to demonstrate to the god, that he was giving an unjust command, the god still persisted in it and added, that it was intended to bring ruin upon Cyme. (Heron. i. 158, 159.)

2. The author of two epigrams in the Greek Anthology, in one of which he is called a Rhodian, but nothing further is known about him. (Bruneck, Analect. p. 260, comp. p. 191; Anthol. Gr. vii. 189, 473.) [L.S.]

ARISTOGEITON. [Παρμούδιος.]

ARISTOGEITON (Ἀριστογείτων), an Athenian orator and adversary of Demosthenes and Deinarchus. His father, Scylidas, died in prison, as he was a debtor of the state and unable to pay: his son, Aristogeiton, who inherited the debt, was likewise imprisoned for some time. He is called a demagogue and a sycophant, and his eloquence is described as of a coarse and vehement character. (Hermog. de Forn. Orat. i. p. 296, and the Scholia passim; Phot. Cod. p. 496; Plut. Phoc. 10; Quintil. xii. 10. § 22.) His impudence drew upon him the surname of "the dog." He was often accused by Demosthenes and others, and defended himself in a number of orations which are lost. Among the extant speeches of Demosthenes there are two against Aristogeiton, and among those of Deinarchus there is one. Suidas and Endecia (p. 65) mention seven orations of Aristogeiton (comp. Phot. Cod. pp. 491, 493; Texts. Chel. vi. 94, &c., 165, &c.; Harpocrat. s. v. Aristocles and νασιλικος) and an eighth against Phryne is mentioned by Athenaeus. (xiii. 581.) Aristogeiton died in prison. (Plut. Apophth. Reg. p. 188; b.; compare Taylor, Praef. ad Demosth. Orat. c. Aristog. in Schaeler's Apparat. Crit. iv. p. 297, &c.; and Aeschin. c. Timarch. p. 22; S. Thucydides, Opusc. ii. pp. 201—240.) [L.S.]

ARISTOGEITON (Ἀριστογείτων), a statuary, a native of Thebes. In conjunction with Hypatodorus, he was the maker of some statues of the heroes of Argive and Theban tradition, which the Argives had made to commemorate a victory gained by themselves and the Athenians over the Macedonians at Oenoe in Argos, and dedicated in the temple of Apollo at Delphi. (Paus. x. 10. § 3.) The names of these two artists occur together likewise on the pedestal of a statue found at Delphi, which had been erected in honour of a citizen of Orchomenus, who had been a victor probably in the Pythian games. (Böckh, Corp. Insers. 25.) We learn from this inscription that the artist, Aristogeiton, died about Ol. 102. That Hypatodorus lived about Ol. 102. The above-mentioned inscription was doubtless earlier than Ol. 104, when Orchomenos was destroyed by the Thebans.

The battle mentioned by Pausanias was probably some skirmish in the war which followed the treaty between the Athenians and Argives, which was brought about by Alcibiades, B.C. 420. It appears therefore that Aristogeiton and Hypatodorus lived in the latter part of the fifth and the early part of the fourth centuries B.C. Böckh attempts to show that Aristogeiton was the son of Hypatodorus, but his arguments are not very convincing. [C.P.M.]

ARISTOGITON (Ἀριστογείτων), one of the ten commanders appointed to suppress the mutineers after the battle of Notium, B.C. 407. (Xen. Hell. i. 5. § 16; Diod. xiii. 74; Plut. Alc. c. 36.) He was one of the eight who conquered Callisthenes at Arginusae, B.C. 460; and Pericles, and himself, by not returning to Athens after the battle, escaped the fate of their six colleagues, though sentence of condemnation was passed against them in their absence. (Xen. Hell. i. 7. §§ 1, 34; Diod. xiii. 101.) [E.E.]

ARISTOGENES (Ἀριστογένης), the name of two Greek physicians mentioned by Suidas, of whom one was a native of Thasos, and wrote several medical works, of which some of the titles are preserved. The other was a native of Cnidos, and was servant to Chrysippus, the philosopher, according to Suidas; or rather, as Galen says (de Ven. sect. ad, Erasistr. Rom. Deor. c. 2, de Cen. Nat. per Ven. Sect. c. 2, vol. xi. pp. 197, 222), he was a pupil of the physician of that name, and afterwards became physician to Antigonus Gonatas, king of Macedonia, B.C. 283—239. A physician of this name is quoted by Celsus, and Pliny, Hardouin (in his Index of authors quoted by Pliny) thinks that the two physicians mentioned by Suidas were in fact one and the same person, and that he was called "Cnidian" from the place of his birth, and "Thasius" from his residence; this, however, is quite uncertain. (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. xiii. p. 83, ed. vet.; Kühn, Additam. ad Elenchum Medicor. Veter. a Jo. A. Fabricio, &c. exhibuium, Lips. 1826, 4to. fascic. ii. p. 10.) [W.A.G.]

ARISTOLAPUS, a painter, the son and scholar of Pausias. [Pausias.] He flourished therefore about Ol. 138, B.C. 306. Pliny (xxxv. 11. s. 40) mentions several of his works, and characterises his style as in the highest degree severe. [C.P.M.]

ARISTOLOCHUS (Ἀριστολόχος), a tragic poet, who is not mentioned anywhere except in the collection of the Epistles formerly attributed to Phalaris (Epist. 18, ed. Lemep.), where the tyrant is made to speak of him with indignation for venturing to compete with him in writing tragedies. But with the genuineness of those epistles the existence of Aristolochus must fall to the ground, and Bentley (Phalaris, p. 260) has shewn, that if Aristolochus were a real personage, this tragic writer must have lived before tragedy was known. [L.S.] of Dion, was married to the elder Dionysius on him and threw him into the sea at Cenchreae. (Apollod. iii. 6. § 3.) Hyginus marched with an army against Croton, and as the father of Ilippomedon, one of the seven heroes to surrender the town to them. The Bruttians divided into two parties, the people being in favour of the Carthaginians, and the nobles or senators in favour of the Romans. The Bruttians, who were in alliance with the Carthaginians, had hoped to gain possession of Croton with their assistance. As this had not been done, they determined to make the conquest by themselves. A deserter from Croton informed them of the state of political parties there, and that Aristomachus was ready to surrender the town to them. The Bruttians marched with an army against Croton, and as the lower parts, which were inhabited by the people, were open and easy of access, they soon gained possession of them. Aristomachus, however, as if he had nothing to do with the Bruttians, withdrew to the arch, where the nobles were assembled and defended themselves. The Bruttians in conjunction with the people of Croton besieged the nobles in the arch, and when they found that they made no impression, they applied to Hanno the Carthaginian for assistance. He proposed to the Crotonians to receive the Bruttians as colonists within the extensive but deserted walls of their city; but all the Crotonians, with the exception of Aristomachus, declared that they would rather die than submit to this. As Aristomachus, who had betrayed the town, was unable to betray the arch also, he saw no way but to take to flight, and he accordingly went over to Hanno. The Crotonians soon after quitted their town altogether and migrated to Locri. (Liv. xxiv. 2, 3.)

4. A Greek writer on agriculture or domestic economy, who is quoted several times by Pliny. (H. N. xiii. 47, xiv. 26. § 4.) [L. S.]

ARISTOMACHUS ('Aposto\'machs). 1. A son of Talus and Lyssimach, and brother of Adrastus. (Apollod. i. 9. § 13.) He was the father of Hippomedon, one of the seven heroes against Thebes. (Apollod. iii. 6. § 3.) Hyginus makes Hippias son of a sister of Adrastus. (Comp. Paus. v. 10. § 2.)

2. A son of Cleodamus or Cleocleon, and great-grandson of Heracles, was the father of Temenus, Cresphontes, and Aristodemus. He marched into Peloponnesus at the time when Tissamenus, the son of Orestes, ruled over the Peninsula; but his expedition failed as he had misunderstood the oracle, and he fell in battle. (Apollod. ii. 6. § 2; Paus. ii. 7. § 6; Herod. vi. 52.) Another Aristomachus occurs in Paus. vi. 21. § 7. [L. S.]

ARISTOMACHUS ('Aposto\'machs). 1. Tyrant of Argos, in the reign and under the patronage of Antigonus Gonatas. He kept the citizens of Argos in a defenceless condition, but a conspiracy was formed against him, and arms were secretly introduced into the town by a contrivance of Aratus, who wished to gain Argos for the Achaean league. The plot was discovered, and the persons concerned in it took to flight. But Aristomachus was soon after assassinated by slaves, and was succeeded by Aristippus II. (Plut. Art. 25.)

2. Succeeded Aristippus II. in the tyranny of Argos, apparently towards the end of the reign of Demetrius. (B. C. 240—230.) He seems to have been related to some of his predecessors in the tyranny of Argos. (Polyb. ii. 59.) After the death of Demetrius, B. C. 229, he resigned his power, as Lydiades had done before, and several others did now, for the influence of Macedon in Peloponnesus had nearly ceased, and the Aetolians were allied with the Achaenians. Aristomachus had been persuaded to this step by Aratus, who gave him fifty talents that he might be able to pay off and disband his mercenaries. Aratus now joined the Achaean league, and Aristomachus was chosen strategus of the Achaenians for the year B. C. 227. (Plut. Art. 55; Polyb. ii. 44; Paus. ii. 8. § 5; Plut. Cleom. 4.) In this capacity he undertook the command in the war against Cleomenes of Sparta, but he seems to have been checked by the jealousy of Aratus, in consequence of which he afterwards deserted the cause of the Achaenians and went over to Cleomenes, who with his assistance took possession of Argos. Aristomachus now again assumed the tyranny at Argos. Aratus tried in vain to recover that city for the Achaean league, and the consequence only was that the tyrant ordered 30 distinguished Argives to be put to death, as they were suspected of being favourable towards the Achaean. Not long afterwards, however, Aratus was taken by Antigonus Dosen, whose assistance Aratus had called in. Aristomachus fell into the hands of the Achaean, who murdered him and threw him into the sea at Cenchreae. (Polyb. ii. 50, 60; Plut. Art. 44; Schern, Ge- sch. d. Griechenv. p. 111, note 1.)

3. The leader of the popular party at Croton, in the Hannibal war, about B. C. 215. At that time nearly all the towns of southern Italy were divided into two parties, the people being in favour of the Carthaginians, and the nobles or senators in favour of the Romans. The Bruttians, who were in alliance with the Carthaginians, had hoped to gain possession of Croton with their assistance. As this had not been done, they determined to make the conquest by themselves. A deserter from Croton informed them of the state of political parties there, and that Aristomachus was ready to surrender the town to them. The Bruttians marched with an army against Croton, and as the lower parts, which were inhabited by the people, were open and easy of access, they soon gained possession of them. Aristomachus, however, as if he had nothing to do with the Bruttians, withdrew to the arch, where the nobles were assembled and defended themselves. The Bruttians in conjunction with the people of Croton besieged the nobles in the arch, and when they found that they made no impression, they applied to Hanno the Carthaginian for assistance. He proposed to the Crotonians to receive the Bruttians as colonists within the extensive but deserted walls of their city; but all the Crotonians, with the exception of Aristomachus, declared that they would rather die than submit to this. As Aristomachus, who had betrayed the town, was unable to betray the arch also, he saw no way but to take to flight, and he accordingly went over to Hanno. The Crotonians soon after quitted their town altogether and migrated to Locri. (Liv. xxiv. 2, 3.)

ARISTOMETES ('Aristometes), a statuary, born on the banks of the Strymon, made statues of courtesans. His age is not known. (Anth. Palmt. vi. 260.) [C. P. M.]

ARISTOMEDES ('Aristomedeis), a statuary, a native of Thebes, and a contemporary of Pindar. In conjunction with his fellow-townsmen Societes, he made a statue of Cybele, which was dedicated by Pindar in the temple of that goddess, near Thebes. (Paus. ix. 22. § 3.) [C. P. M.]

ARISTOMEDON ('Aristomedon), an Argive statuary, who lived shortly before the Persian wars, made some statues dedicated by the Phocians at Delphi, to commemorate their victory over the Thessalians. (Paus. x. 1. §§ 3—10.) [C. P. M.]

ARISTOMENES ('Aristomenes), the Messenian, the hero of the second war with Sparta, has been connected by some writers with the first war (Myron. op. Paus. iv. 6; Diod. Sic. xv. 68, Fragn. x.), but in defiance apparently of all tradition. (Tyr. op. Paus. i. s. c.; Müller, Dor. 7. i. § 9.) For the events of his life our main authority is Pausanias, and he appears to have principally followed the Messenian Cocalus, the author of a lost epic poem, of which Aristomenes was the hero. (Paus. iv. 6.) The life of Aristomenes, therefore, belongs more to legend than to history, though the truth of its general outline may be depended on. (Paus. iv. 22; Polyb. iv. 33.)
Thirty-nine years had elapsed since the capture of Ithome and the end of the first Messenian war, when the spirit of Messenia, chafing under a degrading yoke (Polb, iv. 32; Justin, iii. 5; Tyrt. op. Pass. iv. 14), and eager for revolt, found a leader in Aristomenes of Andania, sprung from the royal line of Aepytus, and even referred by legendary tradition to a miraculous and superhuman origin. (Paus. iv. 14.) Having gained promises of assistance from Argos, Arcadia, Styxion, Elis, and Pisa (Paus. iv. 5; Strab. viii, p. 147), he hence began the war, n. c. 651. The first battle at Derae, before the arrival of the allies on either side, was indecisive; but Aristomenes so distinguished himself there by his valor, that he was offered the throne, but refused it, and received the office of supreme commander. This was followed by a remarkable exploit. Entering Sparta by night, he affixed a shield to the temple of Athena of the Brazen House (Xαλανθάος), with the inscription, “Dedicated by Aristomenes to the goddess from the Spartan spoils.” The next year, he utterly defeated the enemy at the battle of the Boar’s Pillar (αιδηρέωρ οίνεια), a place in the region of Steneceus, at which the allies on both sides were ambuscaded, and the hosts were annihilated respectively by the exhortations of Tyrtacus and the Messenian Hierophants. (Paus. iv. 16; Müll. Dor. i. 5, § 16, i. 7, § 9, note, ii. 10, § 3.)

His next exploit was the attack and plunder of Pharae (Pharis, ll. ii. 582); and it was only the warning voice of Helen and the Twin Brothers, visiting him in a dream, that saved Sparta itself from his assault. But he surprised by an ambush the Laconian maidens who were celebrating at Caryae with dances the worship of Artemis, and carried them to Messenia, and himself protected them from the violence of his followers, and restored them, for ransom, unjured. Next came, in the third year of the war, at which point the poem of Rhihun began, the battle of the Trench (αίεθαν τάφρον), where, through the treachery of Aristocrates, the Arcadian leader, Aristomenes suffered his first defeat, and the Messenian army was cut almost to pieces. (Paus. iv. 17.) But the hero gathered the remnant to the mountain fortress of Eira, and there maintained the war for eleven years (Rhiun. op. Pass. iv. 17), and so ravaged the land of Laconia, that the Spartans decreed that the border should be left untilled. In one of his incursions, however, they met and overpowered him with superior numbers, and carrying him with fifty of his comrades to Sparta, cast them into the pit (εκελάξα) where condemned criminals were thrown. The rest perished; not so Aristomenes, the favourite of the gods; for legends told how an eagle bore him up on its wings as he fell, and a fox guided him on the third day from the cavern. The enemy could not believe that he had returned to Eira, till the destruction of an army of Corinthians, who were coming to the Spartans’ aid, convinced them that Aristomenes was indeed once more amongst them. And now it was that he offered for a second time to Zeus of Ithome the sacrifice for the slaughter of a hundred enemies (εικασιομφές, comp. Plut. Rom. c. 25). The Pythian festival coming on at Sparta, a truce was made, and Aristomenes, wandering on the faith of it too far from Eira, was seized by some Cretan bowmen (mercenaries of Sparta) and placed in bonds, but again burst them, and slew his foes through the aid of a maiden who dwelt in the house where they lodged him, and whom he bereaved in gratitude to his son Gorgus. But the anger of the Twins was roused against him, for he was said to have counterfeited them, and polluted with blood a Spartan festival in their honour. (Her: 8. 8. Hist. vol. i. p. 364; Polyaeus. xi. 31.) So the favour of heaven was turned from his country, and the hour of her fall came. A wild fig-tree, called in the Messenian dialect by the same name that also means a goat (γράσαος), which overhun the Neda, touched at length the water with its leaves, and Theocles the seer privately warned Aristomenes that the Delphic oracle was accomplished, which after the battle of the Trench had thus declared (Paus. iv. 20):

*This date is from Paus. iv. 15; but see Justin, iii. 5; Müll. Dor. i. 7, 10, Append. ix., Hist. of Gr. Lit. c. 10. § 5; Cint. Fast. i. p. 256.
told, when Messenia had once more regained her place among the nations (v. c. 370), how at Lenae the apparition of Aristomenes had been seen, aiding the Theban host and scattering the bands of comic poet of Athens. He belonged to the ancient Sparta. (Paus. iv. 32.)

ARISTOMENES (Ἀριστομένης). 1. A comic poet of Athens. He belonged to the ancient Attic comedy, or more correctly to the second class of the poets constituting the old Attic comedy. For the ancients seem to distinguish the comic poets who flourished before the Peloponnesian war from those who lived during that war, and Aristomenes belonged to the latter. (Suidas, s. v. Ἀριστομένης; Diodor. p. 65; Argum. ad Aristoph. Euthid.) He was sometimes ridiculed by the surname ὕποπτος, which may have been derived from the circumstance that either he himself or his father, at one time, was an artisan, perhaps a carpenter. As early as the year b. c. 425, he brought out a piece called διοδρόμος, on the same occasion that the Equites of Aristophanes and the Satyri of Cratinus were performed; and if it is true that another piece entitled Admetus was performed at the same time with the Plutus of Aristophanes, in v. c. 389, the dramatic career of Aristomenes was very long. (Argum. ad Aristoph. Plat.) But we know of only a few comedies of Aristomenes; Meineke conjectures that the Admetus was brought out together with the first edition of Aristophanes’ Plutus, an hypothesis based upon very weak grounds. Of the two plays mentioned no fragments are extant; besides these we know the titles and possess a few fragments of three others, viz. 1. Διόδρομος, which is sometimes attributed to Aristophanes, the names of Aristomenes, and Aristophanes being often confounded in the MSS. 2. Ἑρμῆς, and 3. Διανοοῦσα δεμοτικῆς. There are also three fragments of which it is uncertain whether they belong to any of the plays here mentioned, or to others, the titles of which are unknown. ( Athen. i. p. 11; Pollux, vii. 167; Harpocrat. s. v. μερολογια.) Comp. Meineke, Quaest. Soc. Spec. ii. p. 48, &c.; Hist. Crit. Com. Gr. p. 210, &c.

2. An actor of the old Attic comedy, who lived in the reign and was a freed-man of the emperor Hadrian, who used to call him Ἀττικοθρήσχος. He was a native of Athens, and is also mentioned as the author of a work ἐρώτα πᾶς διαργύριας, the third book of which is quoted by Athenaeus. (iii. p. 113.) He is perhaps the same as the one mentioned by the Scholist on Apollonius Rhodius, (A. 184.)

3. A Greek writer on agriculture, who is mentioned by Varro (de Re Rust. i. 1; Columella, l. 1) among those whose native place was unknown.

4. An Acarnanian, a friend and flatterer of the contemptible Agathocles, who for a time had the government of Egypt in the name of the young king Ptolemy V. (Euergetes.) During the administration of Agathocles Aristomenes was all-powerful, and when the insurrection against Agathocles broke out in v. c. 205, Aristomenes was the only one among his friends who ventured to go and try to pacify the rebellious Macedonians. But this attempt was useless, and Aristomenes himself narrowly escaped being murdered by the insurgents. After Agathocles was put to death, Telesphorus, who had headed the insurrection, was appointed regent. But about v. c. 202, Aristomenes contrived to get the regency and distinguish himself now by the energy and wisdom of his administration no less than previously by his faithfulness to Agathocles. Scopas and Dimearchus, two powerful men, who ventured to oppose his government, were put to death by his command. Towards the young king, Aristomenes was a frank, open, and sincere counsellor; but as the king grew up to manhood, he became less and less able to bear the sincerity of Aristomenes, who was at last condemned to death, in v. c. 192. (Polyb. xv. 31, xviii. 36, &c.; Diod. Excerpt. lib. xxix., de Virt. et Vit. p. 573; Plat. de Discr. Adulat. 33.)

L. S.

ARISTOMENES, a painter, born at Thebes, is mentioned by Vitruvius (iii. Prosem. § 2), but did not attain to any distinction. (C. P. M.)

ARISTON (Ἀρίστων), king of Sparta, 14th of the Eurypontids, son of Agesicles, contemporary of Anaxandrides, ascended the Spartan throne before v. c. 560, and died somewhat before (Paus. iii. 7), or at any rate not long after, 510. He thus reigned about 50 years, and was of high reputation, of which the public prayer for a son for him, when the house of Procles had other representatives, is a testimony. Demaratus, hence named, was borne him, after two barren marriages, by a third wife, whom he obtained, it is said, by a fraud from her husband, his friend, Agetus. (Herod. i. 65, vi. 61—66; Paus. iii. 7, § 7; Plut. Apophth. Lic.) (A. H. C.)

ARISTON (Ἀρίστων), son of Pyrrichus, a Corinthian, one of those apparently who made their way into Syracuse in the second year of the Sicilian expedition, 414 b. c., is named once by Thucydides, in his account of the sea-fight preceding the arrival of the second armament (413 b. c., and styled afterwards the Argives) at the side of the Syracusans. He suggested to them the stratagem of retreating early, giving the men their meal on the shore, and then renewing the combat unexpectedly, which in that battle gave them their first naval victory. (vii. 39; comp. Polycyn. v. 13.) Plutarch (Nicias, 20, 25) and Diodorus (xii. 10) ascribe to him further the invention or introduction at Syracuse of the important alterations in the build of their galleys' bows, mentioned by Thucydides (vii. 34), and said by him to have been previously used by the Corinthians in the action off Ereineus. Plutarch adds, that he fell when the victory was just won, in the last and decisive sea-fight. (A. H. C.)

ARISTON (Ἀρίστων), historical. 1. Was sent out by one of the Ptolemies of Egypt to explore the western coast of Africa, which derived its name of Possidion from an altar which Ariston had erected there to Poseidon. (Diod. iii. 41.)

2. A strategus of the Aetolians in v. c. 221, who, labouring under some bodily defect, left the command of the troops to Scopas and Dorimachus, while he himself remained at home. Notwithstanding the declarations of the Achaeans to regard every one as an enemy who should trespass upon the territories of Messenia or Achaea, the Aetolian commanders invaded Peloponnesus, and Ariston was stupid enough, in the face of this fact, to assert that the Aetolians and Achaeans were at peace with each other. (Polvby. iv. 5, 9, 17.)

3. The leader of an insurrection at Cyrene in v. c. 463, who obtained possession of the town and put to death or expelled all the nobles. The latter however, after skills, became restored to the popular party, and the powers of the government were divided between the two parties. (Diod. xiv. 34; comp. Paus. iv. 26, § 2.)
ARISTON.

4. Of Megalopolis, who, at the outbreak of the war of the Romans against Perseus in B.C. 170, advised the Achaean ambassadors, who were sent to bring about a peace between Antiochus III. and Ptolemy Philopator, to remain neutral between the two belligerent parties. In the year following, he was one of the Achaean ambassadors, who were sent to bring about a peace between Antiochus III. and Ptolemy Philopator. (Polyb. xxviii. 6, xxix. 10.)

5. A Rhodian, who was sent, in the spring of B.C. 170, with several others as ambassador to the Roman consul, Q. Marcius Philippus, in Macedonia, to renew the friendship with the Romans, and clear his countrymen from the charges which had been brought against them by some persons. (Polyb. xxviii. 14.)

6. Of Tyre, who appears to have been a friend of Hannibal. When the latter was staying at the court of Antiochus and meditated a fresh war against the Romans, he despatched Ariston to Carthage to rouse his friends there. Hannibal, however, lest the messenger should be intercepted, gave him nothing in writing. On Ariston's arrival at Carthage, the enemies of Hannibal soon conjectured the object of his presence from his frequent interviews with the men of the other party. The suspicions were at last loudly expressed, and Ariston was summoned to explain the objects of his visit. The explanations given were not very satisfactory, and the trial was deferred till the next day. But in the night Ariston embarked and fled, leaving behind a letter which he put up in a public place, and in which he declared that the communications he had brought were not for any private individual, but for the senate. Respecting the consequences of this stratagem, see Liv. xxxiv. 61, 62. Compare Appian, Syr. 8; Justin, xxxi. 4.

ARISTON ('Aριστόν), literary. 1. A son of Sophocles by Theocris. (Suidas, s. v. 'Οροφός.) He had a son of the name of Sophocles, who is said to have brought out, in B.C. 401, the Oedipus in Colonus of his grandfather Sophocles. (Argum. ad Soph. Col. ii. p. 12, ed. Wunder.) Whether he is the same as the Ariston who is called a writer of tragedies (Diog. Laërt. vii. 164), and one of those whose tragedies was directed against Mnesilhemus, cannot be said with any certainty, though Fabri- cius (Bibl. Gr. ii. p. 287) takes it for granted.

2. A friend of Aristotle, the philosopher, to whom he is said to have addressed some letters. (Diog. Laërt. v. 27.)

3. A Peripatetic philosopher and a native of the island of Ceos, where his birthplace was the town Cean. (HSab. v. 5), a man of taste and elegance, was the head of the Peripatetic school, about B.C. 260, and was therefore contemporaneous with Epicurus, Aratus, and Ctesias, particularly Ariston of Chios and Aristion of Ceos. Simentia, ad Plut. Thes. 3, and especially the treatise of Hubmann referred to above, [L. S.]

The name of Ariston occurs very frequently in ancient writers, and it has been calculated that about thirty persons of this name may be distinguished; but of most of them we know nothing but the name. They have often been confounded with one another both by ancient and modern authors, particularly Ariston of Chios and Aristion of Ceos.}

4. Of Alexandria, likewise a Peripatetic philosopher, was a contemporary of Strabo, and wrote a work on the Nile. (Diog. Laërt. viii. 164; Strab. xvii. p. 790.) Eudorus, a contemporary of his, wrote a book on the same subject, and the two works were so much alike, that the authors charged each other with plagiarism. Who was right is not said, though Strabo seems to be inclined to think that Eudorus was the guilty party. (Hubmann, l. c. p. 164.)

5. Of Pella in Palestine, lived in the time of the emperor Hadrian or shortly after, as is inferred from his writing a work on the insurrection of the Jews, which broke out in the reign of this emperor. (Euseb. H. E. iv. 6; Niceph. Callist. Hist. Eccl. iii. 24.) He also wrote a work entitled Ἀριστον βολάς καὶ ἱδρον, that is, a dialogue between Papias, a Jew, and Jason, a Jewish Christian, in which the former became convinced of the truth of the Christian religion. (Orig. c. Oec. iv. p. 199; Hieronym. Epist. ad Galil. iii. 13.) It was translated at an early time into Latin by one Celsus, but, with the exception of a few fragments, it is now lost. The introduction written to it by the translator is still extant, and is printed in the Oxford edition of the "Opuscula" of Cyprian (p. 30) and elsewhere. (Hubmann, l. c. p. 105.)

6. Of Alen ('Ἀλένης), a Greek rhetorician who wrote, according to Diogenes Laërtius (vii. 164) scientific treatises on rhetoric. Another rhetorician of the same name, a native of Gerasa, is mentioned by Stephanus of Byzantium, (s. v. Ῥητορ.)

The name of Ariston occurs very frequently in ancient writers, and it has been calculated that about thirty persons of this name may be distinguished; but of most of them we know nothing but the name. They have often been confounded with one another both by ancient and modern authors, particularly Ariston of Chios and Aristion of Ceos. (Simentia, ad Plut. Thes. 3, and especially the treatise of Hubmann referred to above.) [L. S.]

ARISTON ('Αρίστων), son of Miletades, born in the island of Chios, a Stoic and disciple of Zeno, flourished about B.C. 260, and was therefore contemporary with Epicurus, Aratus, Antigonus Gonatas, and with the first Punic war. Though he professed himself a Stoic, yet he differed from Zeno in several points; and indeed Diogenes Laërtius (vii. 160, &c.) tells us, that he quitted the school of Zenon for that of Polonius the Platonist. He is said to have displeased the former by his loquacity,—a quality which others prized so highly, that he acquired the surname of Siren, as a master of persuasive eloquence. He was also called Phalanthus, from his baldness. He rejected all branches of philosophy but ethics, considering physiology as beyond man's powers and logic as unsuited to them. Even with regard to ethics, Democritus (Ep. 89) complains, that he deprived them of all their practical side, a subject which he said belonged to the schoolmaster rather than to the philosopher. The sole object, therefore, of ethics was to show wherein the supreme good consists, and this he made to be däifiopia, i. e. entire indifference to everything except virtue and vice. (Cic. Acad. i. 42.) All external things therefore were in his view perfectly indifferent; so that he entirely rejected Zeno's distinction between the good and the preferable (τὰ προτυποῦσα), i. e. whatever excites desire in the individual mind of any rational being, without being in itself desirable or good, and of which the pure Stoical doctrine permitted an account to be taken in the conduct of human life. (Cic. Fin. iv. 25.)

But this notion of προτυποῦσα was so utterly rejected by Ariston, that he held it to be quite indifferent whether we are in perfect health, or afflicted by the severest sickness (Cic. De Nat. Deor. i. 14.)

Ariston is the founder of a small school, opposed to that of Herillus, and of which Diogenes Laërtius mentions Diphilus and Miletides as members. We learn from Athenaeus (vi. p. 291), on the authority of Eranthias and Apollonius, two of his pupils, that in the year 130 B.C. when he abandoned himself to pleasure, he is said to have died of a coup de soleil. Diogenes (l. c.) gives a list of his works, but says, that all of them, except the Letters to Cleanthes, were attributed by Panncius (b.c. 143) and Sociocrates (b.c. 200-129) to another Ariston, a Peripatetic of Cees, with whom he is often confounded. Nevertheless, we find in Stobaeus (Spect. iv. 110, &c.) fragments of a work of his called ὁμοιομαχα.
to Rome to adorn the triumph of Aquillius, and was then beheaded. (Justin, xxxvi. 4; Liv. Epit. 59; Vell. Pat. ii. 4; Flor. ii. 20; Oros. v. 10; Sall. Hist. 4; Appian, Mithr. 12, 62, de Bell. Civ. i. 17; Val. Max. iii. 4. § 5; Diod. Pragm. lib. 34, p. 598; Cic. de Leg. Agr. ii. 33; Philip. xi. 8; Ascon. ad Cic. pro Scaur. p. 24, ed. Orelli.)

3. A eunuch of Ptolemy Epiphanes, who had been brought up with the king from his early youth. Polybius speaks of him in terms of high praise, as a man of a generous and warlike disposition, and skilled in political transactions. In the 1. c. 135, when the king had to fight against some disaffected Egyptians, Aristonicus went to Greece and engaged a body of mercenaries there. (Polyb. xxiii. 16, 17.)

4. Of Alexandria, a contemporary of Strabo (p. 38), distinguished himself as a grammarian, and is mentioned as the author of several works, most of which related to the Homeric poems. — 1. On the wanderings of Menelaus (περὶ τῆς Μενελαίας πολέμου; Strab. l. c.). 2. On the critical signs by which the Alexandrine critics used to mark the suspected or interpolated verses in the Homeric poems and in Theocritus's Theogony. (Περὶ τῶν αὐτοῦ τὰ τῆς Θεοκρίτου κοινωνίας, Ρύμ. Μ. ε. xv. Αὐγομένων, ἀστρον καὶ φωτιωτικῆς, Suidas, s. v. Ἀριστονίδης; Eudoc. p. 64; Schol. Venct. ad Hom. II. ix. 397.)

5. Of Tarentum, the author of a mythological work which is often referred to. (Phot. Cod. 190; Serv. ad Aen. iii. 335; Cues. Germ. in Aen. Phoen. 327; Hygin. Poët. Astr. ii. 34.) He is perhaps the same as the one mentioned by Athenaeus (i. 20), but nothing is known about him. (Roulez, de l'Homme. Hypocrit. p. 145.)

ARISTONIDAS, a statuary, one of whose productions is mentioned by Pliny (H. N. xxxiv. 14. s. 40) as extant at Thebes in his time. It was a statue of Athamas, in which bronze and iron had been mixed together, that the rest of the latter, showing through the brightness of the bronze, might have the appearance of a blush, and so might indicate the remorse of Athamas. (C. P. M.)

ARISTONIDES, a painter of some distinction, mentioned by Pliny (H. N. xxxiv. 11. s. 40), was the father and instructor of Mnasitimus. (C. P. M.)

ARISTONUS (Ἀριστονύς). 1. Of Gela in Sicily, one of the founders of the colony of Agrigentum in the 4th cent. B. C. 582. (Thuc. vi. 4.)

2. Of Pella, son of Ptolemias, of the bodyguard of Alexander the Great, distinguished himself greatly on one occasion in India. On the death of Alexander, he was one of the first to propose that the supreme power should be entrusted to Perdiccas. He was subsequently the general of Olympia in the war with Cassander; and when he was taken prisoner in B. C. 316, he was put to death by order of Cassander. (Arrian, Anab. vi. 28, ap. Phot. Cod. 92, p. 69, a. 14, ed. Bekker; Curt. iv. 5, 6, 8; Diod. iii. 55, 50, 81.)

ARISTOPHADES (Ἀριστοφάνης), a comic writer, a native of Aegina, made a statue of Zeus, which was dedicated by the Metapontines at Olympia. (Paus. v. 22, § 5; Müller, Aegin. p. 107.)

ARISTOPHARIS. (Ἀριστοφάρης), a comic poet and contemporary of Aristophanes and Amepeias. (Anonym. in Vit. Aristoph.; Schol. ad Platon. p. 331, Bekker.) We know the titles of only two of his comedies, viz. Theseus (Athen. iii. p. 87), and ΗΜΙΟΝ ήρων (Athen. vii. pp. 284, 287), of which only a few fragments are extant. Schweighäuser and Fabricius place this poet in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphia, an error into which both were led by Suidas (s. n. Αριστοφάρης), who, if the reading is correct, evidently confounds the poet with some grammarian. If there had ever existed a grammarian of this name, and if he had written the works attributed to him by Suidas, he would assuredly have been mentioned by other writers also. This is not the case; and as we know that Aristophanes of Byzantium was the successor of Apollonius as chief librarian at Alexandria (which Suidas says of Aristonymus), Meineke conjectures with great probability, that the name of Aristophanes has dropped out in our text of Suidas. (Meineke, Hist. Crit. Cont. Gr. p. 196, &c.)

An Athenian, of the name of Aristophanes, who was a contemporary of Alexander the Great, but not a grammarian, is mentioned by Athenaeus (x. p. 452, xii. p. 538). There were also two writers of this name, but neither of them appears to have been a grammarian. (Plut. de Plat. p. 1165; Stobaeus, passim.)

ARISTOPhilus (Ἀριστόφιλος), a druggist, of Plataea in Boeotia, who lived probably in the fourth century B. C. He is mentioned by Theophratus (Hist. Plant. ix. 18. § 4) as possessing the knowledge of certain antphrodisiac medicines, which he made use of either for the punishment or reformation of his slaves. (W. A. G.)

ARISTOPHANES (Ἀριστοφάνης), the only writer of the old comedy of whom any entire works are left. His later extant plays approximate rather to the middle comedy, and in the Ccalus, his last production, he so nearly approached the new, that Huisman brought it out a second time with very little alteration.

Aristophanes was the son of Philippus, as is stated by all the authorities for his life, and proved by the fact of his son also having that name, although a bust exists with the inscription Ἀριστοφάνης Φιλιππίου, which is, however, now generally allowed to be spurious. He was an Athenian of the tribe Pandionis, and the Cydathenacan Demus, and is said to have been the pupil of Prodidus, though this is improbable, since he speaks of him rather with contempt. (Nud. 560, Ath. 692, Toge- nist. Fragm. xviii. Bekk.) We are told (Schol. ad Rau. 502), that he first engaged in the comic con-ypothesis, it is possible to know that the date of his first comedy was 427: we are therefore warranted in assigning about 444 as the date of his birth, and his death was probably not later than 380. His three sons, Philippus, Araros, and Nicostatus, were all poets of the middle comedy. Of his private history we know nothing but that he was a lover of pleasure (Plat. Symp, particularly p. 229), and one who spent whole nights in drinking and witty conversation. Accusations (his anonymous biographer says, more than one) were brought against him by Cleon, with a view to deprive him of his civic rights (κακέος και ἀγαθός), but without success, as indeed they were merely the fruit of revenge for his attacks on that demagogue. They have, however, given rise to a number of traditions of his being a Rhodian, an Egyptian, an Aegyptian, a native of Camirus or of Nauractus.

The comedies of Aristophanes are of the highest historical interest, containing as they do an admirable series of caricatures on the leading men of the day, and a contemporary commentary on the evils existing at Athens. Indeed, the caricature is the only feature in modern social life which at all resembles them. Aristophanes was a bold and often a wise patriot. He had the strongest affection for Athens, and longed to see her restored to the state in which she was flourishing in the previous generation. In his own time, however, he had just passed away. The first great evil of his own time against which he inveighs, is the Peloponnesian war, which he regards as the work of Pericles, and even attributes it (Aصف 506) to his fear of punishment for having connived at a robbery said to have been committed by Phidias on the statue of Athene in the Parthenon, and to the influence of Aspasia. (Aصف 500.) To this fatal war, among a host of evils, he ascribes the influence of vulgar demagogues, of barbarian slaves employed in a mill, which object of the poet's satire, and probably the public vendetta of tow. Cleon also must have been a main feature of the times was the excessive love for litigation at Athens, the consequent import for competing for a prize. Fifth year of the war. 426. Babyllonias (€ι Γαρμηνδης). 425. + Acharnians. (Leena.) Produced in the name of Callistatus. First prize. 424. + Εραστής, Knights or Horsemen. (Leena.) The first play produced in the name of Aristophanes himself. First prize; second Clinias. 423. + Clouds (€ι Γαρμηνδης). First prize; Clinias; second Ameipsias. 422. + Wasps. (Leena.) Second prize. Papir (€ι Γαρμηνδης), according to the probable conjectures of Mr. Hamilton. Essay on the Papir, translated by Mr. Hamilton. Clouds (second edition), failed in obtaining a prize. But Ranke places this n. c. 411, and the whole subject is very uncertain. 419. + Peace (€ι Γαρμηνδης). Second prize; Eu- polis first. 414. Amphimenes. (Leena.) Second prize. + Birds (€ι Γαρμηνδης); second prize; Ameipsias first; Phrynichus third. Second campaign in Sicily. Τεσσαροποιη (€ι Γαρμηνδης). Exhibited in the time of Nicias. (Plut. Nic. c. 6.) 411. + Lysistrata. + Thesmophorizae. During the Oligarchy. 408. + First Plutus. 403. + Pegas. (Another.) First prize; Phry- nicus second; Plato third. Death of Sophocles. 392. + Ecclesiazae. Cominian war. 388. Second edition of the Plutus.

The last two comedies of Aristophanes were the Acolosion and Cocalus, produced about b. c. 387 (date of the peace of Antalcidas) by Aratus, one of his sons. The first was a parody on the Acolus of Euripides, the name being compounded of Acolus and Sicon, a famous cook. (Rheinisches Museum, 1828, p. 50.) The second was probably a similar parody of a poem on the death of Minos, said to have been killed by Cocalus, king of Sicily. Of the Acolosion there were two editions. In the Ακολοσιος the object of Aristophanes was to censure generally the abandonment of those ancient manners and feelings which it was the labour of his life to restore. He attacked the modern schemes of education by introducing a father with two sons, one of whom had been educated according to the old system, the other in the sophistries of later days. The chorus consisted of a party who had been feasting in the temple of Hercules; and Bp. Thirlwall supposes, that as the play was written when the plague was at its height (Schol. ad Ran. 502), the poet recommended a return to the gymnastic exercises of which that god was the patron (comp. Εγκ. 1379), and to the old system of education, as the means most likely to prevent its continuance. In the Βαβυλωνιομ we are told, that he “attacked the system of appointing to offices by lot.” (Fid. Aristoph. Bekk. p. xiii.) The chorus consisted of barbarian slaves employed in a mill, which Ranke has conjectured was represented as belonging to the demagogue Eucrates (Εγκ. 129, &c.), who united the trade of a miller with that of a vender of tow. Cleon also must have been a main object of the poet's satire, and probably the public functionaries of the day in general, since an action was brought by Cleon against Callistatus, in whose name it was produced, accusing him of ridiculing the government in the presence of the allies. But the attack appears to have failed.
In the Acharnæs, Aristophanes exalts his countryman to peace. An Athenian named Dionysopolis makes a separate treaty with Sparta for himself and his family, and is exhibited in the full enjoyment of its blessings, whilst Lamechus, as the representative of the war party, is introduced in the want of common necessaries, and suffering from cold, and snow, and wounds. The Knights was directed against Cleon, whose power at this time was so great, that no one was bold enough to make a mask to represent his features; so that Aristophanes performed the character himself, with his face smeared with winclees. Cleon is the confidential steward of Demus, the impersonation of the Athenian people, who is represented as almost in his doings, but at the same time cunning, suspicions, ungenerous, and tyrannical. His slaves, Niches and Demosthenes, determine to rid themselves of the insolence of Cleon by raising up a rival in the person of a sausage-seller, by which the poet ridicules the mean occupation of the demagogues. This man completely triumphs over Cleon in his own arts of lying, stealing, fawning, and blustering. Having thus gained the day, he suddenly becomes a model of ancient Athenian excellence, and by boiling Demus in a magic cauldron, restores him to a condition worthy of the companionship of Aristides and Miltiades. (Eq. 1322.)

In the Clouds, Aristophanes attacks the sophistical principles at their source, and selects as their representative Socrates, whom he depicts in the most odious light. The selection of Socrates for this purpose is doubletless to be accounted for by the supposition, that Aristophanes observed the great philosopher from a distance only, while his own unphilosophical turn of mind prevented him from entering into Socrates' merits both as a teacher and a practiser of morality; and by the fact, that Socrates was an innovator, the friend of Euripides, and pupil of Archelaus; and that there was much in his appearance and habits in the highest degree ludicrous. The philosopher, who wore no under garments, and the same upper robe in winter and summer,—who generally went barefoot, and appears to have possessed one pair of dress-shoes which lasted him for life (Boeckh, Economy of Athens, i. p. 150), who used to stand for hours in a public place in a fit of economy, which appeared to be intended for the sake of the old comedy. The invariably speculative turn which he gave to the conversation, his bare acquisitiveness in the stories of Greek mythology, which Aristophanes would think the most dangerous of all to subject to inquiry (see Plut. Phaedrus, p. 289), had certainly produced an unfavourable opinion of Socrates in the minds of many, and explain his being set down by Aristophanes as an archsophist, and represented even as a thief. In the Clouds, he is described as corrupting a young man named Philepides, who is wasting his father's money by an insane passion for horse-racing (μεταφραικών) of Socrates and Chiron, and a peculiar excellence is given him to achieve the useful accomplishment of cheating his creditors. In this spendthrift youth it is scarcely possible not to recognise Alcibiades, not only from his general character and connexion with the Sophists, but also from his peculiar traits, as allusions to his παραμύθια, or inability to articulate certain letters (Nub. 1281; Plut. Aic. p. 192, &c.), and to his fancy for horse-breeding and animals. (Sextus, op. cit. xii. p. 533.) Aristophanes would be prevented from introducing him by name either here or in the Birds, from fear of the violent measures which Alcibiades took against the comic poets. The instructions of Socrates teach Philepides not only to defraud his creditors, but also to beat his father, and disown the authority of the gods; and the play ends by the father's preparations to burn the philosopher and his whole establishment. The hint given towards the end, of the propriety of prosecuting him, was acted on twenty years afterwards, and Aristophanes was believed to have contributed to the death of Socrates, as the charges brought against him before the court of justice express the substance of those contained in the Clouds. (Plut. Apol. p. 16, &c.) The Clouds, though perhaps its author's masterpiece, met with a complete failure in the contest for prizes, probably owing to the intrigues of Alcibiades; nor was it more successful when altered for a second representation, if indeed the alterations were ever completed, which Silvem denies. The play, as we have it, contains the parabasis of the second edition.

The Wasps is the pendant to the Knights. As in the one the poet had attacked the sovereign assembly, so here he aims his battery at the courts of justice, the other stronghold of party violence and the power of demagogues. This play furnished Racine with the idea of Les Plaidcurs. The Peace is a return to the subject of the Acharnæs, and points out forcibly the miseries of the Peloponnesian war, in order to stop which Trygauens, the hero of the play, ascends to heaven on a dung-beetle's back, where he finds the god of war pounding the Greek states in a mortar. With the assistance of a large party of friends equally desirous to check this proceeding, he succeeds in dragging up Peace herself from a well in which she is imprisoned, and finally marries one of her attendant nymphs. The play is full of humour, but neither it nor the Wasps is among the poet's greater works.

Six years now elapse during which no plays are preserved to us. The object of the Amphiarous and the Birds, which appeared after this interval, was to discourage the disastrous Sicilian expedition. The former was called after one of the seven chiefs of Thebes, remarkable for prophesying ill luck to the expedition, and therefore corresponding with the credulous young Athenians (είσελθας, Thuc. vi. 24). The city, to be called Nephalœkonurgya (Cloudecuckowton), is to occupy the whole horizon, and to cut off the gods from all connection with mankind, and even from the power of receiving sacrifices, so as to force them ultimately to surrender at discretion to the birds. All this scheme, and the details which fill it up, coincide admirably with the Sicilian expedition, which was designed not only to take possession of Sicily, but afterwards to conquer Carthage and Libya, and so, from the supremacy of the Mediterranean, to acquire that of the Polopennesus, and reduce the Spartans, the gods of the play. (Thuc. vi. 15, &c.; Plut. Nic. 12, &c. 17.) The plan succeeds; the gods send amends to Achilles, to acquire that of the Polopennesus, and reduce the Spartans, the gods of the play. (Thuc. vi. 15, &c.; Plut. Nic. 12, &c. 17.) The plan succeeds; the gods send ambassadors to demand terms, and finally Peisthenes espouses Basileia, the daughter of Zeus. In no play does Aristophanes more indulge in the exuberance of wit and fancy than in this; and though we believe Sivern's account to be in the main correct, yet we must not suppose that the poet limits himself to this object: he keeps only the main correct, yet we must not suppose that the poet limits himself to this object: he keeps only the main correct, yet we must not suppose that the Aristophanes was the first who introduced the use of accents in the Greek language. (J. Kreuser, Griech. Accentslehre, p. 167, &c.) He too, like his disciple Aristarchus, was not occupied with the criticism or the explanation of words and phrases only, but his attention was also directed towards the higher subjects of criticism; he discussed the aesthetic construction and the design of the Homeric poems. In the same spirit he studied and commented upon other Greek poets, such as Hesiod, Pindar, Alcaeus, Sophocles, Euripides, Anacreon, Aristophanes, and others. The philosophers Plato and Aristotle likewise engaged his attention, and of the former, as of several among the poets, he made new and critical editions. (Schol. ad Heiod. Theog. 68; Dio. Laer. iii. 61; Thom. Mag. Vita Pindari.) All we possess of his numerous and learned works consists of fragments scattered through the Scholia on the above-mentioned poets, some arguments to the tragic poets and some plays of Aristophanes, and a part of his Adeis, which is printed in Boissoneau's edition of Herodian's Partitiones. (London, 1819, pp. 283-289.) His Gaia and Troymaiata, which are mentioned among his works, referred probably to the Homeric poems. Among his other works we may mention: 1. Notes upon the Flaccus of Callinus (Athen. c. 408), and upon the poems of Anacreon. (Aelian, H. A. vii. 39, 47.) 2. An abridgment of Aristotla's work Pepi Haoeis Zobow, which is perhaps the same as the work which is called Troymaiata ei Aristotelou. 3. A work on the Attic courtezan, consisting of several books. (Athen. xiii. pp. 567, 568.) 4. A number of grammatical works, such as Antiklos Adeis, Aztoukal Tawosi, and a work Pepi Arachyias, which was much used by M. Tarentius Varro. 5. Some works of an historical character, as Onsiai (perhaps the same as the *Onsiaos'), and Bouvdai, which are frequently mentioned by ancient writers. (Suid. s. v. Orosios Zesi; Apostol. Proerb. xiv. 49; Plat. de Mat. Herod. 31, 33; Schol. ad Theocr. vii. 105; Steph. Byz. s. v. Aztoukoledas, &c.) Some modern writers have proposed in all these passages to substitute the name Aristodemos for Aristophanes, apparently for no other reason but because Aristodemos is known to have written works under the same titles. (Compare Villoison, Proleg. ad Hom. ii. pp. xxiii. and xxix.; F. A. Wolf, Proleg. in Hom. p. cxxvii.; &c.; Wellauer, in Ersch. und Gruber's Encyclop. v. p. 271, &c.) 2. Of Mallas in Cilicia, is mentioned as a writer on agriculture. (Varro, de Rer Rost. l. 1.) 3. A Boeotian (Plat. de Malign. Herod. p. 874), of whom Suidas (s. v. Orosios, Onsiaos Zros; comp. Steph. Byz. s. v. Aztoukoledas) mentions the second book of a work on Thebes (Onsiai). Another work bore the name of Eumelias, and the second book of it is quoted by Suidas. (s. v. Xenoph.) 4. A Corinthian, a friend of Libanius, who addressed to him some letters and mentions him in others. (Lil. Epist. 76, 1186, 1228.)

ARISTOTELES.

703. De Coron. Tertr. p. 1230) where it is uncertain whether he is speaking of Aristophen the Azenian or the Colyttian.

3. Archon Epomenys of the year b.c. 330. (Diodor. viii. 62; Plut. Demosth. 24.) Theophrastus (Charact. 8) calls this Aristophen an orator. That this man, who was archon in the same year in which Demosthenes delivered his oration on the crown, was not the same as the Colyttian, 's clear from that oration itself, in which (p. 281) the Colyttian is spoken of as deceased. Whether he was actually an orator, as Theophrastus states, is very doubtful, since it is not mentioned anywhere else, and it is a probable conjecture of Ruhnken's that the word ψηφωσ was inserted by some one who believed that either the Azenian or Colyttian was meant in that passage. (Clayton, F. I. ad ann. 330.)

ARISTOPHANES (Ἀριστοφάνης), a comic poet respecting whose life or age nothing is known, from the titles of whose comedies we must infer, respecting whose life or age nothing is known, but that they belonged to the middle comedy. We know the titles of nine of his plays, viz. 1. Ilioupereis (Athen. xii. p. 552), 2. Naukratis (Athen. xii. p. 552), 3. Alkophonus (Athen. vi. p. 238; Athen. vii. p. 161, xiii. p. 563), 4. Boiotias (Athen. xi. p. 96. 21), 5. Kakophanes (Athen. xiii. p. 559), 6. Paraskavophanes (Stob. Serv. xiii. 96. 21), 7. Paraskavophanes (Athen. xiii. p. 559), 8. Paraskavophanes (Stob. Serv. xiii. 96. 21), and 9. Pephsios (Athen. vii. p. 303). We possess only a few fragments of these comedies, and two or three others of which it is uncertain to which plays they belonged. (Meinecke, Hist. Crit. Com. p. 404. 69.)

ARISTOPHANES (Ἀριστοφάνης), a painter of some distinction, the son and pupil of Aglaophon, and the brother of Polygnotus. He was also probably the father of the younger Aglaophon, and born at Thasos. Some of his productions are mentioned by Pliny (xxxv. 11. s. 49), and Plutarch (de audiend. Poet. 3). It is probably through a mistake that Plutarch (Alcib. 16) makes him the author of a picture representing Alcibidas in the arms of Nemea. (See Aglaphon.) [ C. P. M.]

ARISTOTELES (Ἀριστότελης), was one of the thirty tyrants established at Athens in b.c. 404. (Xen. Hell. ii. 3. § 2.) From an allusion in the speech of Themistocles before his condemnation (Xen. Hell. ii. 3. § 46), Aristoteles appears to have been also one of the Four Hundred, and to have taken an active part in the scheme of fortifying Etheuion and admitting the Spartans into the Peiraecus. (Xen. Hell. ii. 411. § 8.) In b.c. 405 he was living in banishment, and is mentioned by Xenophon as being with Lyssander during the siege of Athens. (Xen. Hell. ii. 2. § 18.) Plato introduces him as one of the persons in the "Parmenides," and as a very young man at the time of the dialogue. [ F. E.]

ARISTOTELES (Ἀριστοτέλης). I. BIOGRAPHY.—Aristotle was born at Stageira, a sea-port town of some little importance in the district of Chalcidice, in the first year of the 99th Olympiad. (A. B.C. 384.) His father, Nicocamenes, an Aesclapiad, was physician in ordinary to Amyntas II., King of Macedonia, and the author of several treatises on subjects connected with natural science. (Studis, s. v. 'Αριστοτέλης.) His mother, Phaeistis (or Phaeistas), was descended from a Chalcidian family (Dionys. de Demosth. et Arist. 5); and we find mention of his brother Arimnestus, and his sister Arimnestas. (Diog. Laertr. v. 15; Suid. l. c.) His father, who was a man of scientific culture, soon introduced his son at the court of the king of Macedonia in Pella, where at an early age he became acquainted with the son of Amyntas II., afterwards the celebrated Philip of Macedonia, who was only three years younger than Aristotle himself. The studies and occupation of his father account for the early inclination manifested by Aristotle for the investigation of nature, an inclination which is perceived throughout his whole life. * He lost his father before he had attained his seventeenth year (his mother appears to have died earlier), and he was entrusted to the guardianship of one Proxenus of Atarneus in Mysia, who, however, without doubt, was settled in Stageira. This friend of his father provided conscientiously for the education of the young orphan, and secured for himself a lasting remembrance in the heart of his grateful pupil. Afterwards, when his foster-parents died, leaving a son, Nicamor, Aristotle adopted him, and gave him his only daughter, Pythias, in marriage. (Amm. p. 44, ed. Buhle.)

After the completion of his seventeenth year, his ardent yearning after knowledge led him to Athens, the mother-city of Hellenic culture. (b.c. 367.) Various calamitous reports respecting Aristotle's youthful days, which the hatred and envy of the schools invented, and gossiping anecdotemongers spread abroad (Athen. viii. p. 354; Att. F.II. v. 9; Eus. Proc. Eclog. xv. 2; comp. Appuleius, Apol. pp. 510, 511, ed. Oudendorp) to the effect that he squandered his hereditary property in a course of dissipation, and was compelled to seek a subsistence first as a soldier, then as a drug-seller (σαρκοκόμος), have been already amply refuted by the ancients themselves. (Comp. Aristocles, ap. Euseb. L. C.) When Aristotle arrived at Athens, Plato had just set out upon his Sicilian journey, from which he did not return for three years. This intervening time was employed by Aristotle in preparing himself to be a worthy disciple of the great teacher. His hereditary fortune, which, according to all appearance, was considerable, not merely relieved him from anxiety about the means of subsistence, but enabled him also to support the expense which the purchase of books at that time rendered necessary. He studied the works of the earlier as well as of the contemporary philosophers with indefatigable zeal, and at the same time sought for information and instruction in intercourse with such followers of Socrates and Plato as were living at Athens, among whom we may mention Hemeicles Ponticus.

So aspiring a mind could not long remain concealed from the observation of Plato, who soon distinguished him above all his other disciples. He named him, on account of his restless industry and his untiring investigations after truth and knowledge, the "intellect of his school" (ὡς τῆς δυναμοῦπος, Philopon. de Aetern. Mundi adv. Proclus. vii. 27, ed. Venet. 1535, fol.), his house, the house of the "reader" (ἴδρυσαντίς, Ammon. l. c.; Caesius Rhodigin. xvii. 17), who needed a curb, whereas Xenocrates needed the spur. (Diog. Laer. iv. 6.) And while he recommended the latter "to sacrifice to the Graces," he appears rather to have warned Aristotle against the "too much." Aristotle lived at Athens for twenty years, till b. c. 347. (Apoll. ap. Diog. Laer. v. 9.) During the whole of this period the good understanding which subsisted between teacher and scholar continued, with some trifling exceptions, undisturbed. For the stories of the disrespect and ingratitude of the latter towards the former are nothing but calumnies invented by his enemies, of whom, according to the expression of Themistius (Orat. iv.), Aristotle had raised a whole host. (Ael. V. i. iii. 10. in Alcin. De var. gen. 34. This. Think) ii. 109, v. 2; Amm. Vict. Arist. p. 45.) Nevertheless, we can easily believe, that between two men who were engaged in the same pursuits, and were at the same time in some respects of opposite characters, collisions might now and then occur, and that the youthful Aristotle, possessed as he was of a vigorous and aspiring mind, and having possibly a presentiment that he was called to be the founder of a new epoch in thought and knowledge, may have appeared to many to have sometimes entered the lists against his grey-headed teacher with too much impetuosity. But with all that, the position in which they stood to each other was, and continued to be, worthy of both. This is not only proved by the character of each, which we know from other sources, but is also confirmed by the truly amiable manner and affectionate reverence with which Aristotle conducts his controversies with his teacher. In particular, we may notice a passage in the Nicomachean Ethics (i. 6), with which others (as Ethic. Nic. i. 5. Pol. ii. 3. § 3) may be compared. According to a notice by Olympiodorus (in his commentary on Plato's Gorgias), Aristotle even wrote a biographical Λόγος ἄγωναυτικος on his teacher. (See Cousin, Journ. d. Savans, Dec. 1852, p. 744.)

During the last ten years of his first residence at Athens, Aristotle himself had already assembled around him a circle of scholars, among whom we may notice his friend Hermias, the dynast of the cities of Atarneus and Assos in Mysia. (Strabo, xiii. p. 414.) The subjects of his lectures were not so much of a philosophical as of a rhetorical and political kind. (Quintil. xi. 2. § 25.) At least it is proved that Aristotle entered the lists of controversy against Isocrates, at that time the most distinguished teacher of rhetoric. Indeed, he appears to have opposed most decidedly all the earlier and contemporary theories of rhetoric. (Arist. Rh. i. 1, 2.) His opposition to Isocrates, however, led to most important consequences, as it accounts for the bitter hatred which was afterwards manifested towards Aristotle and his school by all the followers of Isocrates. It was the conflict of profound philosophical investigation with the superficiality of stylistic and rhetorical accomplishment; of systematic observation with shallow empiricism and prosaic insipidity; of which Isocrates might be accounted for in the principal representative, since he not only despised poetry, but held physics and mathematics to be illiberal studies, cared not to know anything about philosophy, and looked upon the accomplished man of the world and the clever rhetorician as the true philosophers. On this occasion Aristotle published his first rhetorical writings. That during this time he continued to maintain his connexion with the Macedonian court, is intimated by his going on an embassy to Philip of Macedonia on some business of the Athenians. (Diog. Laer. v. 2.) Moreover, we have still the letter in which his royal friend announces to him the birth of his son Alexander. (b. c. 356; Gall. ix. 8; Dion Chrysost. Orat. xix.)

After the death of Plato, which occurred during the above-mentioned embassy of Aristotle (b. c. 347), the latter left Athens, though we do not exactly know for what reason. Perhaps he was offended by Plato's having appointed Speusippus as his successor in the Academy. (Diog. Laer. v. 2, iv. 1.) At the same time, it is more probable that, after the notions of the ancient philosophers, he esteemed travels in foreign parts as a necessary completion of his education. Since the death of Plato, there had been no longer any ties to detain him at Athens. Besides, the political horizon there had assumed a very different aspect. The undertakings of Philip against Olynthus and most of the cities of the Chalcidice had added to the Athenians with hatred and anxiety. The native city of Aristotle met with the hate of many others, and was destroyed by Philip at the very time that Aristotle received an invitation from his former pupil, Hermias, who from being the confidential friend of a Bithynian dyest, Eubulus (comp. Polit. xix. 6; Arist. Polit. ii. §§ 9, 10), had, as already stated, mixed himself to be the ruler of the cities of Atarneus and Assos. On his journey thither he was accompanied by his friend Xenocrates, the disciple of Plato. Hermias, like his predecessor Eubulus, had taken part in the attempts made at that time by the Greeks in Asia to free themselves from the Persian dominion. Perhaps, therefore, the journey of Aristotle had even a political object, as it appears not unlikely that Hermias wished to avail himself not merely of his council, but of his good offices with Philip, in order to further his plans. A few years, however, after the arrival of Aristotle, Hermias, through the treachery of Mentor, a Grecian general in the Persian service, fell into the hands of the Persians, and, like his predecessor, lost his life. Aristotle himself escaped to Mytilene, whither his wife, Pythias, the adoptive daughter of the assassinated prince, accompanied him. A poem on his unfortunate friend, which is still preserved, testifies the warm affection which he had felt for him. He afterwards caused a statue to be erected to his memory at Delphi. (Diog. Laer. v. 6, 7.) He transferred to his adoptive daughter, Pythias, the almost enthusiastic attachment which he had entertained for his friend; and long after her death he recommended to her that his ashes should be placed beside his own. (Diog. v. 16.)

Two years after his flight from Atarneus (b. c. 318 ARISTOTELES.

* On the other hand, Augustin (de Civit. Dei, viil. 12) says, "Quum Aristoteles, vir excellentis ingenii, sectam Peripateticam condidisset, et plurimos discipulos, praecellent fama excellent, vice adhue praeceptor in saam haeresin congregasset."
439) we find the philosopher accepting an invitation from Philip of Macedon, who summoned him to his court to undertake the instruction and education of his son Alexander, then thirteen years of age. (Plut. Alex. 5; Quintil. i. 1.) Here Aristotle was treated with the most marked respect. His native city, Stagira, was rebuilt at his request, and Philip caused a gymnasium (called Nymphaeum) to be built there in a pleasant grove expressly for Aristotle and his pupils. In the time of Plutarch, the shady walks (νερόπρανοι) and stone seats of Aristotle were still shown to the traveller. (Plut. i.e. 5.) Here, in quiet retirement from the intrigues of the court at Pella, the future conqueror of the world ripened into manhood. Plutarch informs us that several other noble youths enjoyed the instruction of Aristotle; Callisthenes, a relation of Aristotle, and afterwards the historian of Alexander, and Theophrastus of Eresus (in Lesbos). Neaerchus, Ptolemmy, and Harpalus also, the three most intimate friends of Alexander's youth, were probably his fellow pupils. (Plut. Alex. 10.) Alexander attached himself with such ardent affection to the philosopher, that the youth, whom no one yet had been able to manage, soon valued his instructor above his own father. Aristotle spent seven years in Macedonia; but Alexander enjoyed his instruction without interruption for only four. But with such a pupil even this short period was sufficient for a teacher like Aristotle to fulfill the highest purposes of education, to aid the development of his pupil's faculties in every direction, to awaken susceptibility and lively inclination for every art and science, and to create in him that sense of the noble and grand, which distinguishes Alexander from all those conquerors who have only swept like a hurricane through the world. According to the usual mode of Greek education, a knowledge of the poets, eloquence, and philosophy, were the principal subjects into which Aristotle initiated his royal pupil. Thus we are even informed that he prepared a new recension of the Iliad for him (τόν Λείαν, Ζωλτο, Προςοδό, p. cxxvii.), that he instructed him in ethics and politics (Plut. Alex. 7), and disclosed to him the abstractions of his own speculations, of the publication of which by his writings Alexander afterwards complained. (Gell. xx. 5.) Alexander's love of the science of medicine and every branch of physics, as well as the lively interest which he took in literature and philosophy generally (Plut. Alex. 8), were awakened and fostered by this instruction. Nor can the views communicated by Aristotle to his pupil on politics have failed to exercise the most important influence on his subsequent plans; although the aim of Alexander, to unite all the nations under his sway into one kingdom, without due regard to their individual peculiarities (Plut. de Viti. Alex. i. 6, vol. i. pp. 38, 42, ed. Huyton), was not (as Joh. W. Müller maintains) founded on the advice of Aristotle, but, on the contrary, was opposed to the views of the philosopher, as Plutarch (l.c. p. 88) expressly remarks, and as a closer consideration of the politics of Aristotle is of itself sufficient to prove. (Comp. Polit. iii. 9. vi. c. i. 1.) On the other hand, this connexion had likewise important consequences as regards Aristotle himself. Living in what was then the centre and soul of political activity, his survey of the relations of life and of states, as well as his knowledge of men, was extended. The position in which he stood to Alexander occasioned and favoured several studies and literary works. In his extended researches into natural science, and particularly in his zoological investigations, he received not only from Philip, but in still larger measure from Alexander, the most liberal support, a support which stands unrivalled in the history of civilization. (Aelian. v. i. p. 308, e.; Plin. ii. N. T. viii. 17.)

In the year b. c. 340, Alexander, then scarcely seventeen years of age, was appointed regent by his father, who was about to make an expedition against Byzantium. From that time Aristotle's instruction of the young prince was chiefly restricted to advice and suggestion, which may very possibly have been carried on by means of epistolary correspondence.

In the year b. c. 335, soon after Alexander ascended the throne, Aristotle quitted Macedonia for ever, and returned to Athens*, after an absence of twelve years, whither, as it appears, he had already been invited. Here he found his friend Xenocrates president of the Academy. He himself had the Lyceum, a gymnasium in the neighbourhood of the temple of Apollo Lykeios, assigned to him by the state. He soon assembled round him a large number of distinguished scholars out of all the Hellenic cities of Europe and Asia, to whom, in the shady walks (νερόπρανοι) which surrounded the Lyceum, while walking up and down, he delivered lectures on philosophy. From one or other of these circumstances the name Peripatetic is derived, which was afterwards given to his school. It appears, however, most correct to derive the name (with Jonsius, Dissert. de Hist. Perip. i. 1, pp. 419—423, ed. Elswich) from the place where Aristotle taught, which was called at Athens (αριστοτεία, αριστοτης, διηραξάς, ατανατωσ, ατανατός, ατανατότος, ατανατότος) or περικλής, as is proved also by the wills of Theophrastus and Lycon. His lectures, which, according to an old account preserved by Gellius (xx. 5), which he delivered in the morning (βιολύμαρ ηπικαλλωσ) to a narrower circle of chosen and confidential (esoteric) hearers, and which were called ανακροατικά or ακροατικά, embraced subjects connected with the more abstruse philosophy (theology), physics, and dialectics. Those which he delivered in the afternoon (βιολύμαρ ηπικαλλωσ) and intended for a more promiscuous circle (which accordingly he called εξορκέτους, εξορκέτους, εξορκέτους, εξορκέτους) extended to rhetoric, sophistics, and politics. Such a separation of his more intimate disciples and more profound lectures, from the main body of his other hearers and the popular discourses intended for them, is also found among other Greek philosophers. (Plut. Theoet. p. 152, c.; Plut. Theaet. p. 62, b.) As regards the external form of delivery, he appears to have taught not so much in the way of conversation, as in regular lectures. Some notices have been preserved to us of certain external regulations of his school, e. g., that, after the example of Xenocrates, he created an archon every ten days among his scholars, and laid down certain laws of good breeding for their social meetings (τοίς συμμετοχ. Diog. Laërt. ii. 180; Athen. v. p. 186, a. e.). Neither of the two schools of philosophy which flourished at the same time in Athens approached, in extent and celebrity, that of Aristotle, from which proceeded a large number of distinguished philosophers, historians, statesmen, and orators. We mention here, especially Callisthenes of Olynthus, who has been already spoken of, only the names of Theophrastus, and his countryman Phanias, of Ereusa, the former of whom succeeded Aristotle in the Lyceum as president of the school; Aristoxenus the Tarentine, surnamed μουσιοκότος; the brothers Eudemos and Pasiphrates of Rhodes; Eudemus of Cyprus; Clearchus of Soli; Theodectes of Phaselis; the historians Dianerchus and Satyrus; the celebrated statesman, orator, and writer, Demetrius Phalereus; the philosopher Ariston of Cos; Philon; Neicus of Scepsis, and many others, of whom an account was given by the Alexandrine grammarians Nicander in his lost work, Περὶ τῶν Ἀριστοτείου μαθητῶν. During the thirteen years which Aristotle spent at Athens in active exertions amongst such a circle of disciples, he was at the same time occupied with the composition of the greater part of his works. In these labours, as has already been observed, he was assisted by the truly kingly liberality of his former pupil, who not only presented him with 800 talents, an immense sum even for our times, but also, through his viceroy in the conquered provinces, caused large collections of natural curiosities to be made for him, to which posterity is indebted for one of his most excellent works, the "History of Animals." (Plin. H. N. vii. 17.)

Meanwhile various causes contributed to throw a cloud over the latter years of the philosopher's life. In the first place, he felt deeply the death of his wife Pythias, who left behind her a daughter of the same name; he lived subsequently with the friend of his wife's, the slave Heripylus, who bore him a son, Nicomachus, and of whose faithfulness and attachment he makes a grateful and substantial acknowledgement in his will. (Diog. Laërt. v. 1; v. 13.) But a source of still greater grief was an interruption of the friendly relation in which he had hitherto stood to his royal pupil. The occasion of this originated in the opposition raised by the philosopher Callisthenes against the changes in the conduct and policy of Alexander. Aristotle, who had in vain advised Callisthenes not to lose sight of prudence in his behaviour towards the king, disapproved of his conduct altogether, and foresaw its unhappy issue. (Cf. Callisthenes.) Still Alexander refrained from any expression of hostility towards his former instructor (a story of this kind in Diog. Laërt. v. 10, has been corrected by Stahr, Aristotella, p. 133); and although, as Plutarch expressly informs us, their former cordial connexion no longer subsisted undisturbed, yet, as is proved by a remarkable expression (Toponor. iii. 1, 7, ed. Buhle; comp. Albert Heydemann's German translation and explanation of the categories of Aristotle, p. 32, Berlin, 1835), Aristotle never lost his trust in his royal friend. The story, that Aristotle, irritated by the above-mentioned occurrence, took part in poisoning the king, is altogether unfounded. Alexander, according to all historical testimony, died a natural death, and no writer mentions the name of Aristotle in connexion with the rumour of the poisoning except Pliny. (H. N. xxx. 53.) Nay, even the passage of Pliny has been wrongly understood by the biographers of Aristotle (by Stahr as well, i. p. 139); for, far from regarding Aristotle as guilty of such a crime, the Roman naturalist, who everywhere shows that he cherished the deepest respect for Aristotle, says, on the contrary, just the reverse,—that the rumour had been "magna cum insania Aristotelis excogitatum."

The movements which commenced in Greece against Macedonia after Alexander's death, b. c. 323, endangered also the peace and security of Aristotle, who was regarded as a friend of Macedonia. To bring a political accusation against him was not easy, for Aristotle was so spotless in this respect, that not even his name is mentioned by Demosthenes, or any other contemporary orator, as implicated in those relations. He was accordingly accused of impiety (δισετελεσ) by the hierarchant Eurymedon, whose accusation was supported by an Athenian of some note, named Demophilus. Such accusations, as the rabulist Euthyphron in Plato remarks, seldom missed their object with the multitude. (Plato, Euthyph. p. 3, v. Εὐθύφορον τὸ τιμαύτω πρὸς τοὺς πολίτες.) The charge was grounded on his having addressed a hymn to his friend Hermias as to a god, and paid him divine honours in other respects. (Diog. Laërt. v. 5; Igen. Disquisit. de Soc. Posti, p. 69; and the Ἀριστοτελεσ ὁ δισετέλεσ attributed to Aristotle, but the authenticity of which was doubted even by the ancients, in Athen. xv. 6, p. 696.) Certain dogmas of the philosopher were also used for the same object. (Orig. e. Cels. i. p. 51, ed. Hoeschel.) Aristotle, however, knew his danger sufficiently well to withdraw from Athens before his trial. He escaped in the beginning of b. c. 322 to Chalcis in Euboea, where he had relations on his mother's side, and where the Macedonian influence, which had been long afforded him protection and security, in his will also mention is made of some property which he had in Chalcis. (Diog. Laërt. v. 14.) Certain accounts (Strabo, x. p. 448; Diog. Laërt. x. 1) even render it exceedingly probable that Aristotle had left Athens and removed to Chalcis before the death of Alexander. A fragment of a letter written by the philosopher to his friend Antipater has been preserved to us, in which he states his reasons for the above-mentioned change of residence, and at the same time, with reference to the unjust execution of Socrates, adds, that he wished to deprive the Athenians of the opportunity of winning a second time against philosophy. (Comp. Eustath. ad Hom. Od. vii. 120. p. 1378, 12. ed. Rom. 275, 29, Bas.; Aelian, V. H. iii. 36.) From Chalcis he may have sent forth a defence against the accusation of his enemies. At least antiquity possesses a defence of that kind under his name, the authenticity of which, however, was already doubted by Athenaeus. (Comp. Phavorin. ap. Diog. Laërt. i. c., who calls it a λέγος διεινεκτικός.) However, on his refusing to answer the summons of the Areopagus, he was deprived of all the rights and honours which had been previously bestowed upon him (Aelian, V. H. xiv. 1), and condemned to death in his absence. Memine the philosopher continued his studies and lectures in Chalces for some time longer without molestation. He died in the beginning of August, in the year B. C. 323, a short time before Demosthenes (who died in October of the same year), in the 63rd year of his age, from the effects, not of poison, but of a chronic disorder of the stomach. (Censorinus, ap. Aten. ii. 7.) He wished to form the noblest moral sentiments. Such he appears in his views of the various relations of actual life, and in the nobler moral sentiments. Such he appears in his life as well as in his writings. Such other information as we possess respecting his character accords most completely with this view, if we estimate at their real value the manifest ill-will and exaggerations of the literary anecdotes which have come down to us. At Athens the fact of his being a foreigner was of itself a sufficient reason for his taking no part in politics. For the rest, he at any rate did not belong to the party of democratical patriots, of whom Demosthenes may be regarded as the representative, but probably coincided rather with the conciliatory politics of Phocion. A declared opponent of absolutism (Politi. ii. 7, § 6), he everywhere insists on conformity to the law, for the law is "the only safe, rational standard to which the individual man cannot be depended on." He wished to form the beau ideal of a ruler in Alexander (Politi. iii. 8, extr.), and it is quite in accordance with the oriental mode of viewing things, when the Arabian philosophers, as Avicenna and Abu-l-faraj, sometimes call Aristotle, Alexander's vizier. (Comp. Schneeloder's Documenta Philosoph. Arab. p. 74.)

The whole demeanour of Aristotle was marked by a certain briskness and vivacity. His powers of eloquence were considerable, and of a kind adapted to produce conviction in his hearers, a gift which Antipater praiseth highly in a letter written after Aristotle's death. (Plut. Cat. Maj. p. 354, Corid. p. 294.) He exhibited remarkable attention to external appearance, and bestowed much care on his dress and person. (Timotheus, ap. Dio. Lib. iv. 1; Plut. de Die Nat. 14, extr.; Apollonius. ap. Dio. Laer. v. 10; Dionys. l. c. 5.) The accounts of his having committed suicide belong to the region of fables and tales. One story (found in several of the Christian fathers) was, that he threw himself into the Euripus, from vexation at being unable to discover the causes of the currents in it. On the other hand, we have the account, that his mortal remains were transported to his native city Stageira, and that his memory was honoured there, like that of a hero, by yearly festivals of remembrance. (Vet. Inq. ap. Buhle, vol. i. p. 56; Ammon. p. 47.) Before his death, in compliance with the wish of his school, he had intimated in a symbolical manner that of his two most distinguished scholars, Menodorus of Rhodes and Theophrastus of Eresus (in Lesbos), he intended the latter to be his successor in the Lyceum. (Gellius, xiii. 5.) He also bequeathed to Theophratus his well-stored library and the originals of his own writings. From his will (in Dio. Laer. v. 21; Hermipp. ap. Athen. xiii. 589, c.), which attests the flourishing state of his worldly circumstances not less than his judicial and sympathetic care for his family and servants, we gather, that his adoptive son Nicanor, his daughter Pythias, the offspring of his first marriage, as well as Herpyllis and the son he had by her, survived him. He named his friend Antipater as the executor of his will.

If we cast a glance at the character of Aristotle, we see a man of the highest intellectual powers, gifted with a piercing understanding, a comprehensive and deep mind, practical and extensive views of the various relations of actual life, and the noblest moral sentiments. Such he appears in his life as well as in his writings. Such information as we possess respecting his character accords most completely with this view, if we estimate at their real value the manifest ill-will and exaggerations of the literary anecdotes which have come down to us. At Athens the fact of his being a foreigner was of itself a sufficient reason for his taking no part in politics. For the rest, he at any rate did not belong to the party of democratical patriots, of whom Demosthenes may be regarded as the representative, but probably coincided rather with the conciliatory politics of Phocion. A declared opponent of absolutism (Politi. ii. 7, § 6), he everywhere insists on conformity to the law, for the law is "the only safe, rational standard to which the individual man cannot be depended on." He wished to form the beau ideal of a ruler in Alexander (Politi. iii. 8, extr.), and it is quite in accordance with the oriental mode of viewing things, when the Arabian philosophers, as Avicenna and Abu-l-faraj, sometimes call Aristotle, Alexander's vizier. (Comp. Schneeloder's Documenta Philosoph. Arab. p. 74.)

The whole demeanour of Aristotle was marked by a certain briskness and vivacity. His powers of eloquence were considerable, and of a kind adapted to produce conviction in his hearers, a gift which Antipater praiseth highly in a letter written after Aristotle's death. (Plut. Cat. Maj. p. 354, Corid. p. 294.) He exhibited remarkable attention to external appearance, and bestowed much care on his dress and person. (Timotheus, ap. Dio. Lib. iv. 1; Plut. de Die Nat. 14, extr.) He is described as having been of weak health, which, considering the astonishing extent of his studies, shows all the more the energy of his mind. (Censor. de Die Nat. 14.) He was short and of slender make, with small eyes and a limp in his pronunciation, using L for Ρ (τραχωδός, Dio. Lib. v. 1), and with a sort of sarcastic expression in his countenance (μωσία, Aelian, iii. 19), all which characteristics are introduced in a maliciously caricatured description of him in an ancient epigram. (Anth. 1551, vol. iii. p. 176, ed. Jacob.) The plastic works of antiquity, which pass as portraits of Aristotle, are treated of by Visconti. (Iconographie Grecque, i. p. 290.)

II. ARISTOTLE'S WRITINGS.

Before we proceed to enumerate, classify, and characterise the works of the philosopher, it is necessary to take a review of the history of their transmission to our times. A short account of this kind has at the same time the advantage of indicating the progress of the development and influence of the Aristotelian philosophy itself.

According to ancient accounts, even the large number of the works of Aristotle which are still preserved, comprises only the smallest part of the writings he is said to have composed. According to the Greek commentator David (ad Catoxy, Proem. p. 24, l. 40, Brand.), Andromacus the Rhodian stated their number at 1000 συνώπηματα. The Anonym. Menagii (p. 61, ed. Buhle in Arist. Opp. vol. 1) sets down their number at 400 Ἠδονα. Diogenes Laërtius (v. 27) gives 44 myriads as the number of lines. If we reckon about 10,000 lines to a quire, this gives us 44 quires, while the writings extant amount to about the fourth part of this. (Hegel, Vorlesungen über die Gesch. der Philosophie, vol. ii. pp. 307, 308.) Still these statements are very indefinite. Nor do we get on much better with the three ancient catalogues of his writings which are still extant, those namely of Diogenes Laërtius, the Anonym. Menag., and the Arabian writers in Caesarii (Bibl. Arab. Hosp. vol. i. p. 306), which may be found entire in the first volume of Buhle's edition of Aristotle. They all three give a mere enumeration, without the least trace of arrangement, and without any critical remarks. They differ not only from each other, but from the quotations of other writers and from the titles of the extant works to such a degree, that all idea of reconciling them must be given up. The difficulty of doing so is further increased by the fact, that one and the same work is frequently quoted under different titles (Brandis, de periaph. Arist. Libr de Ideo et de Bono, p. 7; Ruvinson, Méthoplogyque de Aristotle, vol. i. p. 48, Paris, 1837), and that sections and books appear as independent writings under distinct titles. From Aristotle's own quotations of his works criticism can here derive but little assistance, as the references for his most part are quite general, or have merely been supplied by later writers. (Ritter, Gesch. der Phil. vol. iii. p. 21, not. 1.) The most complete enumeration of the writings of Aristotle from those catalogues, as well of the extent as of the lost works, is to be found in Fabriuus. (Bibl. Gr. ill. iii. pp. 267—284, and pp. 388—407.) The lost works alone have been enumerated by Buhle (Commentario de perd. Arist. lib. 9 in Comment. crit. Genu: vol. v. p. 587, &c. &c.) Amongst the names of these scholars no longer satisfy the demands of modern critical science. To make use of, and form a judgment upon those ancient catalogues, is still further attended with uncertainty from the circumstance, that much that was spurious was introduced among the writings of Aristotle at an early period in antiquity. The causes of this are correctly assigned by Ammonius. (Ad Arist. Catalog. fol. 3. a.) In the first place, several of the writings of the immediate disciples of Aristotle, which treated of like subjects under like names, as those of Theophrastus, Eudemus, Rhodius, Phanias, and others, got accidentally inserted amongst the works of the Stagirite. Then we must add mistakes arising from οὐκ ἐκαίνιον, as in the ancient philosophical, rhetorical, and historically popular books there were general writers of the same name. Lastly, the endeavours of the Ptolemies and Attali to enrich their libraries as much as possible with works of Aristotle, set in motion a number of people, whose love of gain rendered them not over scrupulously honest. (Comp. David, ad Catalog. p. 28, a. 15, who assigns additional causes of falsification; Ammon. loc. c.; Simplicius, fol. 4. 6; Galen, Comment. in libr. de Nat. hum. pp. 16. 17; Brandis, Rhet. Mus. p. 209, 1827.) It is very possible that the Greek lists, in particular that in Diogenes Laertius, are nothing else than catalogues of these libraries. (Trendelenburg, ad Arist. de Anima, p. 123.)

As regards the division of Aristotle's writings, the ancient Greek commentators, as Ammonius (ad Catalog. p. 5. b. Ad.) and Simplicius (ad Catalog. p. 1. 6. ed. Bas.) distinguish—1. ἐκαίνιον, i. e. collections of notices and materials, drawn up for his own use. 2. ἐκαίνιον, elaborate works. Those which were composed in a strictly scientific manner, and contained the doctrinal lectures (ἀκροατικά) of the philosopher, they called ἐκαίνιον (Gell. x. 5, has δεηματικά, which form, however, Schaefer, ad Plut. vol. v. p. 245, rejects), or else ἐκαίνιον, ἐκαίνιον. Those, on the other hand, in which the method and style were of a more popular kind, and which were calculated for a circle of readers beyond the limits of the school, were termed ἐκαίνιον. The latter were composed chiefly in the form of dialogues, particularly such as treated upon points of practical philosophy. Of these dialogues, which were still extant in Cicero's time, nothing has been preserved. (The whole of the authorities relating to this subject, amongst whom Strab. xiii. pp. 608, 609; Cic. de Fin. v. 5, ad Att. iv. 16; Gell. l. c.; Plut. Alex. 5. Advers. C. tot. p. 115, b. are the most important, are given at full length in Stahr's Aristotelica, vol. ii. p. 244, &c. ; to which must be added Sopater atque Syriam, ad Hermod. p. 120, in Leonhard Spengel, Εκαίνιαν τέκνα, s. de Arist. Script. &c. p. 167.)

The object which Aristotle had in view in the composition of his exoteric writings appears to have been the satisfaction of the curiosity of those who wished by means of them to come to an understanding with the public. The Platonic philosophy was so widely diffused through all classes, that it was at that time almost a duty for every educated man to be a follower of Plato. Aristotle therefore was obliged to break ground for his newer philosophy by enlightening the public generally on certain practical points. In this way originated writings like the "Eudemus," a refutation, as it appears, of Plato's Phaedon; his book τὸν Ἀριστοτέλειον ΚΟΙΝΑΝ Ἰσωρίων, &c. (Comp. Philop. ad Arist. de Anima, i. 138, c. 2.) In Aristotle himself (and this has not always been duly considered) there occurs no express declaration of this distinction. The designations ἐκαίνιον, ἀκροατικά, or ἐκαίνιον writings, would alike be looked for in vain in all the genuine works of the philosopher. It is only in his answer to the complaint of Alexander, that by publishing his lectures he had made the secrets of philosophy the common property of all, that he says, that "the acroatic (acroamatic, or esoteric) books had been published and yet not published, for they were intelligible only to one who had been initiated into philosophy." The expression ἐκαίνιον, on the other hand, we find in Aristotle himself, and that in nine passages. (Ech. vi. 13, vi. 4. 2. Eudem. T. ii. 1. 8. 4. Polit. iii. 4. vii. 1. Phys. iv. 14, Metaph. xiii. 1.) These various passages prove incontestably, that Aristotle himself had not in view a division of this kind in the sense in which it was subsequently understood. In one instance he applies the name ἐκαίνιον to writings which, in accordance with the above-mentioned division, must necessarily be set down as ἐκαίνιον; and secondly, in several of those passages the term is merely employed to denote disquisitions which are of the same order as the writings of Nuxy, the expression is used to denote the writings of other authors. The whole subject concerns us more as a point of literary history than as having any scientific interest. "One sees at once for one's self," says Hegel (Gesch. der Philos, ii. p. 310, comp. 220, 236), "what works are philosophic and speculative, and what are more of a mere empirical nature. The ἐκαίνιον is the speculative, which, even though written and printed, yet remains concealed from those who do not take sufficient precaution in the matter to apply themselves vigorously. It is no secret, and yet is hidden." But the same author is wrong in maintaining, that among the ancients there existed no difference at all between the writings of the philosophers which they published, and the lectures which they delivered to a select circle of hearers. The contrary is established by positive testimony. Thus Aristotle was the first to publish what with Plato were, strictly speaking, lectures (ἐκαίνια τῶν Πλάτων), conducted to appear in print, and Kant also found it unavoidable for a philosopher "to give utterance in his works to all that he thought, although he would certainly say nothing that he did not think." The genuine Aristotelian writings which are extant would have to be reckoned amongst the aecromatique books. The Problems alone belong to the class designated by the ancients hypomnematische writings. Of the dialogues only small fragments are extant. All that we know of them places them, as well as those of Theophratus, far below the dramatic as well as lively and characteristic dialogues of Plato. The introductions, the according to a notice in Cicero (ad Att. iv. 10), had no internal connexion with the remainder of the treatises, which he completed in his lifetime. This is indisputably certain with regard to the exoteric writings. Of the rest, those which had not been published by Aristotle himself, were made known by Theophratus, and, particularly those of Theophratus, published those which had completed his lifetime. This is indisputably certain with regard to the exoteric writings. Of the rest, those which had not been published by Aristotle himself, were made known by Theophratus in a more enlarged and complete form; as may be proved, for instance, of the physical and historical-political writings. Other scholars of the Stagirite, as for example, the Rhodian Eudemus, Phanias, Pasistates, and others, illustrated and completed in works of their own, which frequently bore the same title; certain works of their teacher embracing a distinct branch of learning; while others, less independently, published lectures of their master which they had reduced to writing. The exertions of these scholars were, indeed, chiefly directed to the logical writings of the philosopher; but, considering the well-known multiplicity of studies which characterised the school of the Peripatetics, we may assume, that the remaining writings of their great master did not pass unnoticed. But the writings of Aristotle were read and studied, in the first two centuries after his death, beyond the limits of the school itself. The first Ptolemies, who were friends and personal patrons of Aristotle, Theophratus, Strato, and Demetrius Phalerus, spared no expense in order to incorporate in the library which they had founded at Alexandria the works of the founder of the Peripatetic school, in as complete a form as possible. For this and, they caused numerous copies of the same works to be purchased; and although much that was spurious found its way in, yet the artisten and learning of the great Alexandrine critics and grammarians are a sufficient security for us that writings of that kind were subsequently discovered and separated. It cannot be determined, indeed, how far the studies of these men were directed to the strictly logical and metaphysical works; but that they studied the historical, political, and rhetorical writings of Aristotle, the fragments of their own writings bear ample testimony. Moreover, as is well known, Aristotle and Theophratus were both students of the famous "Cannon," the tradition of which is at any rate very ancient, and which included besides only the philosophers, Plato, Xenophon, and Aeschines. There can therefore be little doubt, that it is quite false that the philosophical writings of Aristotle, for the first two centuries after his death, remained rotting in the cellar at Scepsis; and that it was only certain copies which met with this fate; this view of the case accords also with the direct testimony of the ancients. (Gell. xx. 5; Plut. Alcaz. 7; Simplicius, Proem. ad Av. Phys. extr., Ar. Post. 5, extr.; Brandis, Abhandl. der Berlins. Akad. xvii. p. 268.) And in this way is it to be explained why neither Cicero, who had the most obvious inducements for doing so, nor any one else of much Greek education, mentions a syllable of this tradition about the fate and long concealment of all the more important works of Aristotle. In saying this, however, we by no means intend to deny—1. That the story in Strabo has some truth in it, only that the conclusions which he and others drew from it must be regarded as erroneous: or
2. Through the discovery of Apelleion several writings, e.g. 2. That the fate which befell the literary remains and Straton, yiz. Lycon, Ariston of Ceos, Critolaus, The heads of the school, who followed Theophrastus have come to light for the first time. Attention was especially directed to a popular, rhetorical system of Ethics. The school declined in splendour and influence; the more abstruse writings of Aristotle were neglected, because their form was not sufficiently pleasing, and the easy superficiality of the school was deterred by the difficulty of unfolding them. Thus the expression of the master himself respecting his writings might have been repeated, "that they had been published and yet not published." Extracts and anthologies arose, and satisfied the superficial wants of the school, while the works of Aristotle himself were thrust into the back-ground. In Rome, before the time of Cicero, we find only slender traces of an acquaintance with the writings and philosophical system of Aristotle. They only came there with the library of Apelleion, which Sulla had carried off from Greece. Here Tyrrhanion, a learned freedman, and still more the philosopher and literary antiquary, Andronicus of Rhodes, gained great credit by the pains they bestowed on converting the works of Aristotle: among these we may point expressly for the task. The works of Aristotle became a subject of study ends with these writers; and after a long interval, the last support of philosophical literature in the East. The series of the more profound commentators ends with these writers; and after a long interval, the works of Aristotle became a subject of study among the Arabsians and in the East, while among the Greeks scarcely any one else is to be mentioned than IOH. DAMASCENUS and PHOTUS in the eighth and ninth centuries; MICHAEL PSILLUS, MICHAEL EPHESIUS in the eleventh century; GEOR. PACHYMERES and EURYSTRATUS in the twelfth; LEO MAGNENTUS in the fourteenth; and GEORGIUS GEMISTUS PLETHRO and GEORGIUS OF TRAPEZUS in the fifteen. These borrow all that they have of any value from the older commentators. (Comp. Labbeus, Gracceor. Aristotelis Commentator. Compendius, Par. 1758.) The older editions of these commentators were published in the most complete form at Göttingen, in 30 vols. The best edition is by Chr. Aug. Brandis, Scholia in Arist. collegii, &c., Berl. 1838, &c. In two volumes, of which as yet only the first has appeared.

2. History of the writings of Aristotle in the East and among the schoolmen of the West in the middle ages.—While the study of the writings and philosophy of Aristotle was promoted in the West by Boethius,* the emperor Justinian abolished the philosophical schools at Athens and in all the cities of his empire, where they had hitherto enjoyed the protection and support of the state. At that time also the two Peripatetics, Damascius and Simplicius, left Athens and emigrated to Persia, where they met with a kind reception at the court of the khalifs of Persia, and by means of translations diffused the knowledge of Greek literature. Soon afterwards the Arabsians appeared as conquerors, and the Arabians appeared as a conquering people, under the Abbassides; and though at first they had no taste for art and science, they were soon led to appreciate them under the Abbassides, who ascended the throne of the khalifs in the middle of the eighth century. The khalifs Al-Mansur, Harun-al-Raschid, Mamun, and the Arabians, favoured the Graeco-Christian sect of the Nestorians, who were intimately acquainted with the Aristotelian philosophy; invited Greek scholars to the court at Bagdad, and caused the philosophical works of Greek literature, as well as the medical and astronomical ones, to be rendered into Arabic, chiefly from Greek originals, by translators appointed expressly for the task. Through the last of the Ommiädes, Abd-alrafsman, who escaped to Spain on the downfall of his house in the East, this taste for Greek literature and philosophy was introduced into the West also. Schools and academies, like those at Bagdah, arose in the Spanish cities subject to the Arabs, which continued in constant connexion with the East.

From the fifth century onwards the first Latin translations of Aristotle begin with that by St. Augustin.
Bagdad was for Asia. In Bagdad the celebrated physician and philosopher, Avicenna (1036), and in the West Averroës (1185), and his disciple, Moses Maimonides, did most to promote the study of the Aristotelian philosophy, by means of translations, or rather free paraphrases, of the philosopher’s writings. Through the Spanish Christians and Jews, the knowledge of Aristotle was propagated to the other nations of the West, and translations of the writings of Avicenna, who was translated into Latin, was Hermannus Alemannus, at Toledo and other Greek cities. The first western writings of Aristotle, which were made either from Arabic copies from Spain, or from Greek originals which they had brought with them from Constantinople and other Greek cities. The first western writer who translated any of the works of Aristotle into Latin, was Hermannus Alemannus, at Toledo in Spain, who translated the Ethics. Other translators, whose works are in part still preserved, were Robert, bishop of Lincoln (1253), John of Basingstoke (1252), Wilhelm of Moerbeke (1281), Gerard of Cremona (1187), Michael Scotus (1217), and Albertus Magnus. In the years 1260—1270 Thomas Aquinas, the most celebrated commentator on Aristotle in the middle ages, prepared, through the instrumentality of the monk Wilhelm of Moerbeke, a new Latin translation of the writings of Aristotle after Greek originals.* He wrote commentaries on almost all the works of the Stagirite; and, together with his teacher, the celebrated Albertus Magnus, rendered the same services to the Aristotelian philosophy in the West which Avicenna and Averroës had done for the East and the Arabians in Spain. For the West, Paris was the seat of science and of the Aristotelian philosophy in particular. Next to it stood Oxford and Cologne. Almost all the celebrated schools of the middle ages owed their education to one or other of these cities.

3. History of the writings of Aristotle since the revival of classical studies.—After Thomas Aquinas, distinguished schoolmen, it is true, occupied themselves with the writings of Aristotle; but the old barbaric translation was read almost exclusively. With the revival of classical studies in Italy, at the end of the fourteenth and the beginning of the fifteenth century, the writings of Aristotle and the mode of treating them experienced a revolution. The struggle between liberal studies and the rigidity and empty quibbling of the scholastic Aristotelianism, ended in the victory of the former. Among the first and most distinguished promoters of the study of Aristotle was the excellent Greek scholar, Joh. Argyropylus of Byzantium (A.D. 1486), from whom Lorenzo de Medici took lessons. With him should be mentioned Theodor, Gaza (1478), Franciscus Philippius (1490), Georgius of Trani, Giovanni, Leonard, Arzinius (Erani di Serafien). The exertions of the last-named scholar were warmly seconded by the learned and accomplished pope Niccolao V. (1447—1455), who was himself attached to the Aristotelian philosophy. Their scholars, Angelus Politianus, Hermolaus Barbarus, Donatus Acciaiuolis, Bassarion, Augustinus Niphus, Jacob Faber Stapulensis, Laurentius Valla, Joh. Reuchlin, and others, in like manner contributed a good deal, by means of translations and commentaries, towards stripping the writings of Aristotle of the barbarous garb of scholasticism. The spread of Aristotle’s writings by means of printing, first in the Aldine edition of five volumes by Ald. Pius Manutius, in Venice, 1495—1498, was mainly instrumental in bringing this about. In Germany, Rudolph Agricola, as well as Reuchlin and Melanchthon, taught publicly the Aristotelian philosophy. In Spain, Genesius Sepulveda, by means of new translations of Aristotle and his Greek commentators made immediately from Greek originals, laboured with distinguished success against the scholastic barbarism and the Aristotelianism of Averroës. He was supported by the Jesuits at Coimbra, whose college composed commentaries on almost all the writings of the philosopher. In like manner, in France, Switzerland, and the Netherlands, Jacob Faber, Ludwig Vives, Erasmus of Rotterdam, and Konrad Gesner, took an active part in promoting the study of the Aristotelian philosophy; and in spite of the counter-efforts of Francisca Patitius and Petrus Ramus, who employed all the weapons of ingenuity against the writings, philosophy, and personal character of Aristotle, the study of his philosophy continued predominant in almost all the schools of Europe. Among the learned scholars of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, we find the most distinguished buried with Aristotle. Their lectures, however, which gave rise to numerous commentaries and editions of Aristotle, are confined principally to his rhetorical, ethical, political, and aesthetic works. The works on logic and natural history were seldom regarded, the metaphysical treatises remained wholly unnoticed. In Italy we must here mention Petrus Victorius (1585), and his imitator M. Antonius Maiocagius (Conti, 1555), Franc. Robortelli (1567), J. C. Scagli. (1558), Julius Pauciis a Bergia (1635), Bapt. Camotius, Vincent Madius, and Barthol. Lombardus, Riccoboni, Accoromboni, Montecattini, &c.; among the French, Muretus, Is. Casabon. Ph. J. Maussac, Dionys. Lambinus (1572); among the Dutch, Swits, and Germans, Obert. Gipplanius (van der), ——, 1594), the physician Thed. Zendiger (a friend of and fellow-labourer with Lambinus, and a scholar of Konrad Gesner), Camerarius of Bamberg (1674), Wilh. Hilden of Berlin (1887), Joh. Sturm (1889), Fred. Sylburg (1596), &c. Within a period of eighty years in the sixteenth century, besides innumerable editions of single writings of Aristotle, there appeared, beginning with the Basle edition, which Erasmus of Rotterdam superintended, no fewer than seven Greek editions of the entire works of the philosopher, some of which were repeatedly reprinted. There was also published a large number of Latin translations. From facts of this kind we may form an estimate of the interest and application of the learned public in that age in the writings of the philosopher. In England we see no signs of such studies; and it is only in Casabon (in the preface to his edition of the works of Aristotle) that we meet with the notice, that at the beginning of the sixteenth century, under the guidance of the learned physician, Tho-
With Casaubon, who intended to study the philosophy and the method of forming a judgment respecting them. The means of forming a judgment respecting them. The works of Ravaissone, Miechelt, and Barthélémé-St. Hilairre are valuable in this respect. Several French translations also made their appearance. In England, in like manner, where the Ethics and Rhetoric of Aristotle still maintained their place in the course of classical instruction, some works of merit connected with the study of Aristotle have appeared of late, among which Taylor's translation may be particularly mentioned.

The most important editions of the entire works of Aristotle are: 1. Aldina, editio princeps, by Aldus Pius Manutius, Venice, 1495—98, 5 vols. fol. (called also Aldina major). For the criticism of the text, this is still the most important of all the old editions. 2. Sylburgiana, by Isaac Casaubon, 2 vols. fol. reprinted in 1597, 1605, 1646. This is the first Greek and Latin edition of the entire works of Aristotle, but prepared hastily and now worthless. The same may be said of the 6. Du Valliana, Paris, 1619 and 1629, 2 vols. fol.; 1639, 4 vols. fol. by Guili. Du Val. Much more important is the 7. Bipontina (not completed), edited by Joh. Gottil. Buhle 1791—1800, 5 vols. 8vo. It contains only the Organon and the rhetorical and poetical writings. The continuation was prevented by the conflagration of Moscow, in which Buhle lost the materials which he had collected. The first volume, which contains, amongst other things, a most copious enumeration of all the earlier editions, translations, and commentaries, is of great literary value. The critical remarks contain chiefly the variations of older editions. Little is done in it for criticism itself and exegesis. 8. Dohlerianis, Berolini, 1831—1840, ex recensione Immanuelis Dohleri, edid. Acad. Reg. Boruss., 2 vols. text, 1 vol. Latin translations by various authors, which are not always good and well chosen, and not always in accordance with the text of the new recension. Besides these, there are to be 2 vols. of scholia edited by Brandis, of which only the first volume has yet appeared. This is the first edition founded on a diligent though not always complete comparison of ancient MSS. It forms the commencement of a new era for the criticism of the text of Aristotle. Unfortunately, there is still no notice given of the MSS. made use of, and the cause in consequence pursued by the editor, which occasions great difficulty in making a critical use of this edition. Békker's edition has been reprinted at Oxford, in 11 vols. 8vo., with the Indices of Sylburg. Besides these, there is a stereotype edition published by Tauschnitz, Lips. 1832, 16mo., in 16 vols., and another edition of the text, by Weisse, in one volume, Lips. 1843.

III. ENUMERATION AND REVIEW OF THE WRITINGS OF ARISTOTLE.

We possess no safe materials for a chronologica arrangement of the several writings, such as wa attempted by Samuel Petites. (Miscell. iv. 9.) The citations in the separate writings are of no use for this purpose, as they are often additions made by a later hand; and, not unfrequently, two writings refer reciprocally to each other. (Ritter, Gesch. der Philosophie, iii. p. 29, not. 1, p. 33, not. 2.) Moreover, such an arrangement is of small importance for the works of a philosopher like Aristotle.

A systematic arrangement was first given to the writings of Aristotle by Andronicus of Rhodes. He placed together in pragmatics (pragmatikē) the works which treated of the same subjects, the logical, physical, &c. (Porphyry, V. Philos. 24; Casiri, Biblioth. Arabico-Esotérica, p. 308.) His arrangement, in which the logical pragmacy came first, agreed, as it appears, in many other respects with the present arrangement in the editions. (Ravaisson, Essai sur la Métaphys. i. pp. 22—27.) He seems to have been followed by Adrastus, as is in part testified by the express evidence of Greek interpreters. The arrangement of Andronicus appears to have been preserved in the division peculiar to the Latins (cará earivous), i.e. to the Latin translators and expositors from the fourth to the sixth century, which is spoken of in one or two notices in the MSS. of Aristotle collated by Bekker. (Arist. Orig. ed. Bekker, Rhet. i. 8, p. 1368, b. iii. init. p. 1377, b., iii. init. p. 1403, b.) The divisions of the Greek commentators may be found in Stahr (Aristot. ii. p. 254), with which David ad Categ. p. 24; Philop. ad Categ. p. 36, ed. Berolin. may be compared. They separate the writings of Aristotle into three principal divisions. 1. Theoretic. 2. Practical. 3. Logical or organisal, which again have their subdivisions. The arrangement in the oldest printed edition of the entire works rests probably upon a tradition, which in its essential features may reach back as far as Andronicus. In the Aldine the Organon (theological writings) comes first; then follow the works on physical science, including the Problems; then the mathematical and metaphysical writings; at the end the writings which belong to practical philosophy, to which in the following editions the Rhetoric and Poetics are added. This arrangement has continued to be the prevailing one down to the present day. In the following survey we adhere to the arrangement adopted by Zell, who divides the works into: A. Doctrinal; B. Historical; C. Miscellaneous; D. Letters; E. Poems and Speeches. Every systematic division of course has reference principally to the first class. The principle to be kept in view in the division of these works must be determined from what Aristotle says himself. According to him, every kind of knowledge has for its object either, 1. Merely the ascertainment of truth, or the result is the act itself, and its process (praktikē); or II. Practical (praktikē praktikē); or III. Theoretical (praktikē theorētikē). Theoretical knowledge has three main divisions (philosophia, prapatmata), namely: 1. Physical science (praktikē phainomén); 2. Mathematics (praktikē mathēmata); 3. The doctrine of absolute existence (in Aristotle ἡ πρῶτη φιλοσοφία, ἡ ἕπατη σκολο-

The origin of these categories, according to Tren denburg's investigation, is of a linguistic-grammatical nature. (Trend. de Arist. Categ. Berol. 1833, 8vo.)

2. Περὶ ἐπιστείας (de Elucidione oratoria), i. e.
concerning the expression of thoughts by means of speech. By ἐπιστεία Aristotle understands the in import of all the component parts of judgments and conclusions. As the Categories are of a grammatical origin, so also this small treatise, which was probably not quite completed, was, as it were,
the first attempt at a philosophical system of grammar. (See Classen, de Grammaticis Graecus Primoritius, Bonae, 1829, p. 52; K. E. Geppert, Darselndag der Grammatistischen Kategorien, Berlin, 1836, p. 11.)

After these protopreliminary treatises, in which definitions (ὑπο) and propositions (προτάσεις) are handled, there follow, as the first part of Logic, properly so called, 3. The two books Aναλυτικὴ πρῶτη (Analestic prôton), the theory of conclusions.
The title is derived from the resolution of the conclusion into its fundamental component parts (διάλεξις).
The word πρῶτη, appended to the title, is from a later hand. 4. The two books Αναλυτικὴ δύοτη (also δύοτη, μέγαλα), treat of the first, demonstrable (apodeictic) knowledge,
the second of the application of conclusions to proof.
5. The eight books Τοῦκλικὶς ἐμβαθείας, i. e.
the logic of the probable according to Aristotle.
It is the method of arriving at further conclusions on every problem according to probable propositions and general points of view. From these last, (τῶν, διότι ἔσται ἀργύριον, leg. Cic. Top.
c. 2, Orig. c. 14,) the work takes its name. We must regard as an appendix to the Topics the treatise, 6. Περὶ ὅσον τιναί έλέγχειν, concerning the failures which only apparently prove something to us. Published separately by Winkelman, Leipzig, 1823, as an appendix to his edition of Plato's Ethydemus.

2. Theoretical Philosophy.

Its three parts are Physics, Mathematics, and Metaphysics. In Physics, theoretical philosophy considers material substances, which have the source of motion in themselves (τά ἄλητα ή κατομενα). In mathematics the subject is the attributes of quantity and extension (τό πόσον καὶ τό συνεχές), which are external to motion indeed, but not separate from things (χωριστά), though they are still independent, καὶ αὐτὰ μένων.
Metaphysics (in Arist. πρῶτη φιλοσοφία, σοφία, θεολογία, θεολογικὴ ἐπιστήμη, ό φιλοσοφία simply) have to do with existence in itself and as such (τό ὁμόν ή δέ, Met. Π. I, E. 1), which in like manner is external to motion; but at the same time exists by itself separably from individual things (τό χωριστά δέ καὶ τό ἄλητον).
Their subject therefore is the universal, the ultimate causes of things, the best, the first (τό καθόλου, tά αἰσθητά, τά ἀρχοντά, τά πρῶτα, περὶ ἄρχας ἐπιστήμην), absolute existence, and the one.
To this last branch belong

The Metaphysics, in 14 books (τῶν μετὰ τά φυσικά, A—N), which probably originated after Aristotle's death, and the collection of originally independent treatises. The title also is of late origin. It occurs first in Plutarch (Alex. c. 7), and must probably be traced back to Andronicus of Rhodes. Out of this profusion there have been lost the writings Περὶ φιλοσοφίας, in three books, containing the first sketch of metaphysics, and a description of the Pythagorean and Platonic philosophy; and Περὶ ἔθες, in at least four books, a polemic representation of the Platonic doctrine of ideas. (See Brandis, Diätro de pord. Arist. Libr. 14.)

Mathematics, the second science in the sphere of Theoretical Philosophy, is treated of in the following writings of Aristotle:—

1. Περὶ ὅσον ἔχειν γραμμὰς, i. e. concerning indivisible lines, intended as a proof of the doctrine of the infinite divisibility of magnitudes. This work was attributed by several ancient critics to Theo-

2. Μηχανικὴ προβλῆματα, Mechanical Problems, critically and exegetically edited by Van Capelle, Amstedol. 1812. The Roman writer Vitruvius made diligent use of this treatise.

We now come to the third main division of Theoretical Philosophy, viz. Physics or Natural science (πραγματεία σ. μέθοδος φυσική, ἐπιστήμη περὶ φύσεως, ἒστορία περὶ φύσεως, Phys. i. 1; de Caelo, iii. i.) According to the way in which it is treated of by Aristotle, it exhibits the following division and arrangement: The science of Physics considers as well the universal causes and relations of entire nature, as the individual natural bodies. The latter are either simple and therefore eternal and imperishable, as the heaven, the heavenly bodies, and the fundamental powers of the elements (warm, cold, moist, dry); or they are compound, carly, and perishable. The compound physical substances are, 1. such as are formed immediately by the above-mentioned fundamental forces, as the elements—fire, air, water, earth; 2. collections of homogeneous matter (διαμορφαί, similaria), which are compounded of the elements, e. g. stones, blood, bones, flesh; 3. heterogeneous component parts (δρομομόρφα, dissimilaria), as e. g. head, hand, &c., which are compounded of different homogeneous constituent parts, as of bones, blood, flesh, &c.; 4. organized objects compounded of such heterogeneous constituent parts: animals, plants.
The course of observation and investigation proceeds from the whole and universal to the particular and individual body, in the case of each individual portion of the representation, from the component observation of the external appearance to the investigation of the causes. (Phys. i. 1, iii. i; de Part. Anim. i. 5; Hist. Anim. i. 6, § 4; Scheneder.) In the latter the most important thing is the investigation of the purpose (τὸ ὀφεῖσθαι, causa finit), by means of which one arrives at the idea of the thing (λόγος, ἀπὸ τοῦ ἅπαντος).

Aristotle reproaches the older investigators with the investigation of the causa fisialis, by means of which one arrives at the idea of the individual sides and parts of nature, and with having always sought merely for the material cause of things. (De Generatione, v. 1, ii. 6.) In this investigation of the purpose, the leading idea is always to show, that the natural object, which forms the subject of investigation, corresponds most completely in the way in which it exists to the idea intended to be realized, and accordingly best fulfills its purpose. (De Partih. Anim. i. 5; Phys. i. 8; De Incesso Anim. 2.)

According to this mode of considering the writings of this pragmaty, they will be arranged in the following manner:

1. The eight books of Physics (φυσικαὶ ἀρκεῖα), called also by others περὶ φύσεως; the last three books are likewise entitled περὶ γενεσεως by Simplicius, Proem. ad Phys. and ad vi. pp. 404-5, ed. Berol.) In these Aristotle develops the general principles of natural science. (Cosmology.)

The investigation of the principles of the universe is naturally succeeded by the consideration of the principal parts of it, the heaven, the heavenly bodies, and the elements. There follows accordingly,

2. The work concerning the Heaven (περὶ οὐρανοῦ), in four books, which is entitled περὶ κατηγορίαν by Alexander of Aphrodisias. (Fabric. Bibliogr. Gr. iii. p. 230, Harl.) According to an astronomical notice in i. 12, the work was composed after the year n. c. 357. See Kepler, Astron. opt. p. 589; Bailly, Histoire de l'Astronomie, p. 244.

3. The two books on Production and Destruction (περὶ γενεσεως καὶ φθορᾶς, de Generatione et Corruptione), develop the general laws of production and destruction, and are more definitely in the process of formation which goes on in inorganic nature, or in meteorological phenomenum. The consideration of this forms the contents of the

4. Four books on Meteorology (μετεωρολογικά, de Meteorois). This work, which is distinguished by the clearness and case of its style, was composed after n. c. 341, and before the time when an acquaintance with India was obtained by Alexander's expedition. (St. Croix, Examen critique des Hist. d'Alex. p. 703; Ideler, Meteorologie vet. Graecor. et Rom., Berol. 1822.) It contains the groundwork of a physical geography. It has been edited by Ideler, Lips. 1834, 2 vols., with a proemimentary commentary. This work is commonly followed in the editions of the treatise

5. On the Universe (περὶ κατηγορίαν, de Mundo), a letter to Alexander, which treats the subject of the last two works in a popular tone and a rhetorical style altogether foreign to Aristotle. The whole is probably a translation of a work with the same title by Appelleus, as Stahr (Arist. bei den Kōnern, p. 165, &c.) has endeavoured to prove. Osann ascribes it to the Stoic Chrysippus (Beiträge zur Griech. u. Rom. Litt. Gesch., Darmstadt, 1835, vol. i. pp. 141—283). The latest editor of Appelleus (Hildebrand, Proleg. ad Appelleus, vol. i. p. xii., &c.), on the contrary, looks upon the Latin work as the translation.

The same division of this pragmaty belongs
The organization of plants had been treated of by Aristotle in a separate work (περὶ φυτῶν).† The extinct
15. Two books Περὶ φυτῶν (de Plantis), according to a remark in the preface, are a translation from a Latin translation, which again was founded on an Arabic version of the original. In spite of all the doubts which have been raised against their authenticity, there are many expressions found in them which bear an undoubtedly Aristotelian stamp. (Compare Henschel, de Arist. Botan. Philos. Vratslaviae, 1823.)

Several anatomical works of Aristotle have been lost. He was the first person who in any especial manner was successful in conducted anatomical investigations, and showed the necessity of them for the study of the natural sciences. He frequently refers to investigations of his own on the subject. (Hist. Anim. i. 17, extr., ill. 2, vi. 10.) Diog. Laërt. (v. 25) mentions eight books διατομῶν, and one book ἡλεγομεν διατομῶν, by Aristotle. According to Aristotle's own intimations (de Gen. An. ii. 7, de Part. An. iv. 5), these writings were illustrated by drawings. The treatise Ἐθικός ἡ περὶ φυσική, a dialogue called after Buddha of Cyprus, the friend of the philosopher, has also been lost. In this work, of which a considerable fragment has been preserved by Plutarch (de Consol. ad Apollon. i. 115, b.), Aristotle refuted the proposition, that the soul is no independent essence, but only the harmony of the body. Whether the treatise quoted by Diog. Laërt., διετές περὶ φυσικῆς, belongs to this class of works, is doubtful. Respecting the lost medical works, see Buhle, i. c. p. 102.

3. Practical Philosophy, or Politics.
All that falls within the sphere of practical philosophy is comprehended in three principal works: the Ethics, the Politics, and the Oeconomies. In them Aristotle treats of the sciences which have reference to the operation of the reason manifesting itself in particular spheres. Their subject, therefore, is adicia, morality with reference to the individual, to the family, and to the state. Next to these we place the sciences which have for their object the exercise of the creative faculty (τεχνή), i. e. Art.

Ethics.—The principal work on this subject is 1. ΘΕΩΡΙΚΗ ΝΙΚΟΜΑΧΙΑ, in 10 books. Aristotle here begins with the highest and most universal end of life, for the individual as well as for the community in the state. This is happiness (εὐδαιμονία); and its conditions are, on the one hand, perfect virtue exhibiting itself in the actor, and on the other hand, corresponding bodily advantages and favourable external circumstances. Virtue is the readiness to act constantly and consciously according to the laws of the rational nature of man (δύναμις λόγος). The nature of virtue shews itself in its appearing as the medium between two extremes. In accordance with this, the several virtues are enumerated and characterized. The authenticity of the work, which an ancient tradition ascribes to Nicomachus, the son of Aristotle, is indubitable, though there is some dispute as to the proper arrangement of the several books. The title ΝΙΚΟΜΑΧΙΑ μαχα, under which David (Proleg. ad Categ. p. 25, a. 40, Schol. ed. Berolin.) quotes the work, has not yet been explained. The best editions are by Zell, Heidelberg, 1820, 2 vols. 8vo.; Corais, Paris, 1822, 8vo.; Cardwell, Oxon.
ARISTOTELES.

1823, 2 vols.; Michele, Berlin, 1823, 2 vols. Besides the Nicomachean Ethics, we find amongst the works of Aristotle

2. "Hétairopoi" in seven books, of which only books i. ii. iii. and vii. are independent, while the remaining books iv. v. and vi. agree word for word with books v. vi. and vii. of the Nicomachean Ethics. This ethical work is perhaps a recension of Aristotle's lectures, edited by Eudemus.

3. "Hétairopoi" (in David, l. c. "Hétairopoi" in two books, which Pansch ("die Arist. magnum moral. subjiciit abl. libro," 1841), has lately endeavoured to show not to be a work of Aristotle, but an abstract, and one too not made by a very skilful hand; whilst another critic, Glaser ("die Metaph. des Arist. pp. 53, 54," looks upon it as the authentic first sketch of the larger work.

4. The treatise "Peri ἔργων καὶ νομῶν," a collection of definitions, is of very doubtful origin, though probably belonging to the later age of extemate. The Ethics conduct us to the Politics. (See Ed. Nic. x. ext.) The connexion between the two works is so close, that in the Ethics by the word ὑστεροφ reference is made by Aristotle to the Politics, and in the latter by ὑστεροφ to the Ethics. The Aristotelian Politics (παράκειται; in Diogenes Laërtius, v. 24, παράκειται δεῖσθαι) in eight books, have for their object to shew how happiness is to be attained for the human community in the state; for the object of the state is not merely the external preservation of life, but "happy life, as it is attained by means of virtue." (ἄρετη, perfect development of the whole man). Hence also ethics form the first and most general foundation of political life, because the state cannot attain its highest object, if morality does not prevail among its citizens. The house, the family, is the element of the state. Accordingly Aristotle begins with the doctrine of domestic economy, then proceeds to a description of the different forms of government, after which he gives an historic-critical delineation of the most important Hellenic constitutions, and then investigates which of the constitutions is the best (the ideal of a state). The doctrine concerning education, as the most important condition of this best state, forms the conclusion. Doubts have been raised by scholars respecting the arrangement of the several books; and lately by Hilaire, in the introduction to his edition (p. xxvi.), has urged the adoption of a transposition, in accordance with which the following would be the original order of the books: i. ii. iii. vii. iv. v. vi. On the other hand, Biese ("Phil. des Arist. ii. p. 400") has acutely defended the old order.

The best editions of the Politics are by Schneider, Lips. 1815; and Güttling, Jena, 1850.

Among the lost writings of this pragmaty we have to mention:

1. "Προτετάκτως," an exhortation to the study of philosophy.

2. "Περὶ εὐρήκειας," on Nobility, which, however, ancient critics (as Plut. "Aristid. 27") already looked upon as spurious; in which opinion most modern scholars agree with them. (See Luzac, Loc. Cit. Attic. pp. 82—85; Welcker, ad Theog. p. lxx. &c.)

B. HISTORICAL WORKS.

Of the large number of writings, partly politico-historical, partly connected with the history of literature, and partly antiquarian, belonging to this class, only scanty fragments and solitary notices have been preserved. The extant treatise, de Xenophanes, Zemane, et Gorgias, which is important for an acquaintance with the Eleatic philosophy, is only a fragment of a more comprehensive work on the history of philosophy. (Spalding, "Comment. in prim. part. libelli de Xen. Zem. et Gorg. Berol. 1793.

The lost writings belonging to this pragmaty are

1. The Politics (πολιτικῶν), a description and history of the constitutions, manners, and usages of 158 (Diog. Laërt. v. 27; according to others, 250 or more) states, the historical foundation of the Politics. The numerous fragments of this invaluable work have not yet been collected with sufficient care. The collection by Neumann (Heidel. 1827) is quite unsatisfactory.

2. "Νέκτυμα Βασιλικῶν," the Manners and Customs of the Barbarians.

3. Κλεισία, Legends of the foundings of Cities.

4. "Περὶ ἀκούσματος," For poetical literature and chronology the following treatises were important:

6. Τὰ ἐκ τοῦ Τυμαῖον καὶ τῶν Ἀρχιτεχνών, a work the first part of which is preserved in Timaeus Lecuena (de Anima Mundio), just as the second part, on Archytas, is in the fragments preserved in Stobaeus under the name of Archytas. (O. F. Group, "Ueber die Fragmente des Archytas," Berlin, 1840.)

7. Diels, a critical-chronological specification of the repertory of the Athenian stage. (Diog. Laërt. v. 26.)

8. Κόλοδ ή περὶ σοφίων. (Comp. Welcker, "über die Cyclischen Dichter," p. 48.)

9. "Ἀναφορά Ομηρίας," (See Nitzsch, "de Arist. adv. Wolfisn, Kian, 1831.)

We now turn to those writings of Aristotle which, as belonging to the ἐποιήμα τούτων, have for their subject the exercise of the creative faculty, or Art. To these belong the Poetics and Rhetoric.

1. The Poetics (Περὶ τούτων), which penetrated deeper than any of the ancients, either before or after him, into the essence of Hellenic art, and with the most comprehensive mind traversed the region in which the intellectual life of the Hellenes unfolded itself, and brought it under the dominion of science. He is the father of the aesthetics of poetry, as he is the completer of Greek rhetoric as a science. The treatise itself is undoubtedly genuine; but the explanation of its present form is still a problem of criticism. Some (as Gott. Hermann and Bernhardy) look upon it as the first sketch of an uncompleted work; others, as an extract from a larger work; others again, as the notes, taken by some hearer, of lectures delivered by Aristotle. Thus much, however, is clear, that the treatise, as we have it at present, is an independent whole, and, with the exception of a few interpolations, the work of one author. Further, that the lost work περὶ τοῦ γωνία, a history of the life and teaching of poetry, must not be confounded with the Poetics, to which it stands in the same relation as the Politics do to the Politics. As regards the contents of the Poetics, Aristotle, like Plato, starts from the principle of the imitation, or imitative representation (μίμησις), either of a real object existing in the external world, or of one produced by the internal power of imagination. It is in accordance with this view that the different species of art generally, and of poetry in particular, assume their definite forms. The activity of art is distinguished from practical activity in this respect: that in the case of the former the exercise of the creative faculty, the production of a work, is the main thing; and that the internal condition, the disposition, of the person who performs the creative faculty, is a matter of indifference. The greatest part of the treatise (cc. 6—22) contains a theory of tragedy; nothing else is treated of, with the exception of the opos; comedy is merely alluded to. The best editions of the work are by Gottf. Hermann, Lips. 1802, with philological and philosophical (Kantian) explanations; Graffenhans, Lips. 1821, an ill-arranged compilation; Bekker, Berol. 1832, 8vo.; and Ritter, Colon. 1839, 8vo. Ritter considers two-thirds of the Poetics to consist of the interpolations of a later and extremely silly editor; but his opinion has been almost universally rejected in Germany. As explanatory writings, besides Lessing's Marchburgische Dramaturgic, we need mention only Müller, Gesch. der Theorie der Kunst bei den Alten, pt. ii. pp. 1—181, and the German translation by Knebel, Stuttgart, 1840.

* For this section Aristotle had made preparation by his collection of 158 Hellenic constitutions; of which hereafter.

2. The Rhetoric (τεχνὴ προταση), in three books. Aristotle, in accordance with his method, as we have already observed in the case of the Physics, Politics, and Poetics, before proceeding to lay down a theory of rhetoric, prepared a safe foundation by means of extensive studies. These studies gave rise to a separate historical work (entitled τεχνῶν συναγωγή), in which he collected all the earlier theories of the rhetoricians from Tisias and Corax onwards. From the latter work the Aristotelian rhetoric developed itself, a work of which, as regards its leading features, the first sketch was drawn at an early period;—it has been Theodectes or Conon. As an extract from a larger work, the treatise, as we have already observed in the case of the Poetics, Aristotle, like Plato, starts from the principle of the imitation, or imitative representation, which is quite at variance with the character of that of which the orator appears to him to be worthy of credit. Yet it is not sufficient merely to know what must be said,—one must also say this in a proper manner, if the speech is to produce the intended effect. Therefore in the third part he treats of oratorical expression and arrangement. The best edition with a commentary is the one published at Oxford, 1820, 8vo.; but a good critical and explanatory edition is still a desideratum. Among the writings of Aristotle we also find 3. A work on Rhetoric addressed to Alexander (Προτασῆς πρὸς Ἀλέξανδρον); but it is spurious, and should probably be ascribed to Anaximenes of Lampsaucus. Others consider its author to have been Theodectes or Conon.

C. MISCELLANEOUS WORKS.

Among the writings which Aristotle left behind him, there was undoubtedly a large number of Collectanea, which had grown up under the hand of the philosopher in the course of his extended studies. To these writings, which were not originally destined for publication, belong 1. The Probleme (προβληματα), in 36 sections, questions on individual points in all the departments of knowledge, a treasure of the deepest and most acute remarks, which has been far from being properly used and sifted. A good edition is a desideratum. (Compare Chabanon, Trois Mémoires sur les Probèmes d'Arist., in the Mém. de l'Acad. des Inscrip. vol. xiv. p. 295, &c., p. 320, &c. 2. Θαυμασία Ακαδημών, short notices and accounts of various phenomena, chiefly connected with natural history, of very unequal value, and in part manifestly not of Aristotelian origin. The best edition is by Westermann, in his Rerum Mirabil. script. Graeci, Bruns, 1839.

D. LETTERS.

All those which are extant are spurious: the genuine and copied collections of Aristotle's letters, which antiquity possessed, is lost. Those which were arranged by Andronicus of Rhodes filled 20 books. (Pseudo-Demetrius, de Elcct. § 231.) A later collection by Artemon, a learned Christian of the third century, consisted of 6 books. (See David, Categ. p. 24, n. 1, 97, ed. Berol.) David (p. 29, n. 21, Berol.) praises the clear, simple, noble style of Aristotle's letters, a description which is quite at variance with the character of those that are extant. Respecting Aristotle's will, which Diog. Laert. (v. 17—16) has preserved, we have spoken before. [p. 321, a.]

E. POEMS AND SPEECHES.

There are preserved —

1. The Scillon addressed to Hermias, which we have already mentioned. (In Ilen, Socia, Jenae, 1798, p. 157; Graffenhans, Aristot. poetis, Mulhusae, 1831, 4to.; Bergk, Poetic Lyrici Graeci.)

2. Two epigrams, the one on a statue erected to his friend Hermias, and one on an altar dedicated to Plato.

The speeches of Aristotle which are lost, were 'Απολογία ευθείας πρὸς Ευθυμιάσων, of which we have already spoken; an Ἑγεμόνων πλάθων, and an Ἐργασία λόγου. Among the writings which were foisted upon Aristotle in the middle ages, there were the treatises (in Latin): 1. Mysticae Aegyptiorum philosophiae libri, xiv., a compilation from Plotinus. (Classical Journal, vol. xv. p. 279.) 4. De Pomo (translated from the Hebrew by Manfred, son of the emperor Frederick II.), a treatise on the immortality of the soul. 3. Secreta secretorum (doctrines on prudence and the art of government), and others.

IV. LEADING FEATURES OF ARISTOTLE'S PHILOSOPHY.

All that the Hellenes had as yet attained in the whole compass of science and art, was embraced by the gigantic mind of Aristotle, which, so to say, traversed in thought all that the Hellenic world had up to that time struggled and lived through, and transmitted to posterity in his writings and philosophy the result, as reflected in his mind, of this earlier age. Aristotle stands at the turning point of Hellenic life, when, after the original forms of political existence and art were completed, after the close of the age of production, the period of reflection set in, and endeavoured by the exercise of thought to possess itself of the immense mass of materials that had been gained. And we cannot but admire the Divine Providence, which summoned to this task a mind like Aristotle's, at the very time when the contemplation of the past was still fresh and lively, and tradition still recent; and which called forth all his powers by placing him in the midst of the new im petus which the Hellenic mind had received through the Macedonian conquest of the world. Thus did the genius of the age find in Aristotle its first and wonderful instrument. We have already, in enumerating his works, had occasion to admire the universality of the philosopher, for whom a mythical legend of the foundation of a city was not less attractive than speculations on first causes and highest ends, or observations on animal life and poetry. "Quot saeculis," exclaims Quintilian (Or. Inst. xii. § 22) in treating of Aristotle, "did his works fail to have the greatest influence? of the sciences, the logical and metaphysical, and the speculative writings, the logical and metaphysical works, were scarcely read by any one. Nay, even on certain aesthetic propositions (e. g. on the three unities of the drama) false traditions prevailed, which were utterly unsubstantiated by the Poetics. And yet the Poetics was one of the most read and most easily accessible of his writings. To this were added other causes. Very many derived their acquaintance with Aristotelian philosophy from Cicero, in whose works Aristotle appears only as a moral philosopher and natural historian. Others confounded the so-called scholastic Aristotelianism with the genuine Aristotelian philosophy, which, however, in the schoolmen appears as mere empty formalism. Others, lastly, overlooked in the consideration of the method in which Aristotle philosophized the essential character of the philosophy itself. This last circumstance in particular introduced that false conception, according to which common empiria, experience, was looked upon as the principle of Aristotelian philosophy. We must therefore first endeavour to make clear Aristotle's method.

The peculiar method of Aristotle stands in close connexion with the universal direction which he gave to his intellectual exertions, striving to penetrate into the whole compass of knowledge. This endeavour has certainly set out from experience, in order first to arrive at the consciousness of that which really exists, and so to grasp in thought the multiplicity and breadth of the sensible and spiritual world. Thus he always first lays hold of his subject externally, separates that in it which is merely accidental, renders prominent the contradictions which result, seeks to solve them and to refer them to a higher idea, and so at last arrives at the cognition of the ideal intrinsic nature, which manifests itself in every separate object of reality. In this manner he consecutively develops the objects as well of the natural as of the spiritual world, proceeding genetically from the lower to the higher, from the more known to the less known, and translates the world of experience into the Idea. Accordingly he usually first points out how, when an object is produced, it first presents itself to our cognition generally, and then how this general object branchest out into separate species, and first really manifests itself in these. In this way he also develops the origin of science itself genetical.

which had been formed of Aristotle's philosophy up to the time of Hegel, was, that Aristotle had made what is called experience the principle of knowledge and cognition. Accordingly the Aristotelian philosophy, as realism in the most ordinary sense of the word, was placed in direct opposition to the Platonid idealism. This complete misapprehension of the Aristotelian philosophy proceeded from various causes. Firstly and chiefly, from want of acquaintance with the writings of Aristotle. Little more than twenty years ago Aristotle was still very little read. We have seen how even the philological study of his writings was neglected, and the philosophical study of them fared no better. The properly speculative writings, the logical and metaphysical works, were scarcely read by any one. Nay, even on certain aesthetic propositions (e. g. on the three unities of the drama) false traditions prevailed, which were utterly unsubstantiated by the Poetics. And yet the Poetics was one of the most read and most easily accessible of his writings. To this were added other causes. Very many derived their acquaintance with Aristotelian philosophy from Cicero, in whose works Aristotle appears only as a moral philosopher and natural historian. Others confounded the so-called scholastic Aristotelianism with the genuine Aristotelian philosophy, which, however, in the schoolmen appears as mere empty formalism. Others, lastly, overlooked in the consideration of the method in which Aristotle philosophized the essential character of the philosophy itself. This last circumstance in particular introduced that false conception, according to which common empiria, experience, was looked upon as the principle of Aristotelian philosophy. We must therefore first endeavour to make clear Aristotle's method.

The peculiar method of Aristotle stands in close connexion with the universal direction which he gave to his intellectual exertions, striving to penetrate into the whole compass of knowledge. In this endeavour he certainly set out from experience, in order first to arrive at the consciousness of that which really exists, and so to grasp in thought the multiplicity and breadth of the sensible and spiritual world. Thus he always first lays hold of his subject externally, separates that in it which is merely accidental, renders prominent the contradictions which result, seeks to solve them and to refer them to a higher idea, and so at last arrives at the cognition of the ideal intrinsic nature, which manifests itself in every separate object of reality. In this manner he consecutively develops the objects as well of the natural as of the spiritual world, proceeding genetically from the lower to the higher, from the more known to the less known, and translates the world of experience into the Idea. Accordingly he usually first points out how, when an object is produced, it first presents itself to our cognition generally, and then how this general object branchest out into separate species, and first really manifests itself in these. In this way he also develops the origin of science itself genetical.

* The best works upon his philosophy are—cally; he seizes upon the individual steps of consciousness, from the impression on the senses to the highest exercise of reason, and exhibits the internal wealth of intellectual life. He sets out, therefore, from the individual, the concrete individual existence of the apparent world; and this is the empir-ical side of his philosophy. The beginning of his philosophical investigations is external. But the end in view manifests itself in the course of them.
For, while in this way he begins with the external,
he steadily endeavours to bring into prominent and distinct relief the intrinsic nature of each separate thing according to the internal formative principles which are inherent in it, and essentially belong to it.

Next to this starting-point, an essential part of his method is the exhibition and removal of the difficulties which come in the way of the investigation (dreponei, διρεπεια). Comp. Metaph.
who investigate without removing the difficulties are like persons who do not know whither they ought to go, and at the same time never perceive whether they have found what they were seeking or not. For the end in view is not clear to such a person, but is clear to one who has previously acquired a consciousness of the difficulties. Lastly, that person must necessarily be in a better condition for judging, who, has, as it were, heard all the opposing doctrines as though they were antagonist parties pleading before a tribunal." Hence he everywhere has regard to his predecessors, and endeavours carefully to develop the foundation and relative truth of their doctrines. (Metaph.
i. 3,
Top. i. 2.) In this manner Aristotle proceeds with an impartiality which reminds one of the epic repose in Homer, and which may easily give him a tinge of scepticism and indefiniteness, where the solution does not immediately follow the aporia, but occurs in the progress of the development.

Intimately connected with his endeavour to set out with that which is empirically known, is his practice of everywhere making conceptions of the ordinary understanding of men, manners, and customs, proverbs, religious conceptions (comp. Metaph.
xii. 8, xiv. 8, de Caelo, ii. 1, de Generat. Anim. i. 2), and above all, language, the points on which to hang his speculative investigations. The Ethics in particular give abundant proofs of the last. Thus, advancing from the lower to the higher, from the more imperfect to the more perfect, he constantly brings into notice the entelechel (ἐντελεχεια), or that to which everything, according to its pecunularity, is capable of attaining; whereupon, again
he also points out in this entelechel the higher principle through which the entelechel itself becomes a potentiality (στορμας). In this manner he exhibits the different steps of development in natural existence in their internal relation to each other, and so at last arrives at the highest unity, consisting in the purpose and cause, which, in its creative, organizing activity, makes of the manifold and different forms of the universe one internally connected whole.

With all this, however, we must bear in mind,
that this method did not lead Aristotle to a perfect and compact system. The philosophy of Aristotle is not such. In every single science he always, so to say, starts afresh from the commencement.
The individual parts of his philosophy, therefore, subsist independently side by side, and are not combined by the vigorous self-development of the idea into one whole, the several members of which are mutually connected and dependent. This, the demonstration of the unity of idea in the entire universe of natural and spiritual life, was a problem which was reserved for after ages.

The composition of Aristotle's writings stands in close connection with the method of his philoso-phizing. Here the object of investigation is always first laid down and distinctly defined, is clearer to obviate any misunderstanding. Thereupon he gives an historical review of the way in which the subject has been hitherto treated by earlier philosophers (Phys. i. 2, &c., de Anima, i. 2, Metaph.
i. 3, &c., Eth. Nic. i. 3, Magm. Mor. i. 1, Polit. ii.);
and indeed it may be remarked generally, that Aristotle is the father of the history of philosophy.
The investigation itself then begins with the exhibition of the difficulties, doubts, and contradictions
which present themselves (drepelai, ἀπόρευται).
These are sifted, and discussed and explained on all sides (μεροπηλεια), and the solution and reconciliation of them (λευς, εύπορεια, in opposition to dreponei) is given in the course of the investigation.

In this manner Aristotle proceeds with the difficulties, doubts, and contradictions
which present themselves (drepelai, ἀπόρευται).
In this enumeration of the various views and apories, Aristotle is not unfrequently explicit to a degree which wearsies the reader, as it is continued without any internal necessity.

V. RELATION OF THE ARISTOTELIAN PHILO-SOPHY TO THE PLATONIC.

In the Platonic philosophy the opposition between the real and the ideal had completely developed itself. For while the opposition and contradiction in the ideal—in the world of thought—was conquered by Plato's dialectics, the external and sensible world was looked upon as a world of appearance, in which the ideas cannot attain to true and proper reality. Between these two, the world of ideas and the visible world of appear-cances, there exists, according to Plato, only a passing relation of participation (μικτησις) and imitation, in so far namely as the ideas, as the prototypes, can only to a certain extent rule the formless and resisting matter, and fashion it into a visible existence. Plato accordingly made the external world the region of the incomplete and bad, of the contradictory and false, and recognized ab-bsolute truth only in the eternal immutable ideas.

Now this opposition, which set fixed limits to cognition, was surmounted by Aristotle. He laid down the proposition, that the idea, which cannot of itself fashion itself into reality, is powerless, and has only a potential existence, and that it becomes living reality only by realizing itself in a creative manner by means of its own energy. (Metaph.
xii. 6, p. 246. 8., Brandis.) The transition of the idea into the real, however, Aristotle explains by means of the pure idea of negation (στερεσα). That is to say, ideality and reality are not opposed to each other, as existence and non-existence, according to Plato's view; but the material itself contains in itself the opposition, the negation, through which it comes to have a kind of feeling of want, and strives after the ideal form, as the ugly strives after the beautiful. The giving it a definite form does away not with the matter, but with the negation which is inherent in the matter, and by that means the material is fashioned so as to assume a definite existence. Thus matter is that which is eternal, fundamental, whilst the single object, fashioned so as to assume an individual existence is produced, and perishes. The material in which the negation is inherent, is the potentiality (δύναμις), out of which the formative principle, as an entelechian, fashions itself into existence. This, as the full reality (ἐνέργεια), is the higher step in opposition to the mere potentiality. According to these definitions, the Aristotelian philosophy progresses genetically from the lower to the higher, from the δύναμις to the ἐνέργεια of that, of which the potential, according to its peculiarities, is capable. Thus by means of the ἐδοκίμα the universe becomes a whole consisting of mutually connected members, in which these ἐδοκίμα must not be interpreted as absolutely independent. For the nature of the purpose is still identical with the necessity of the matter; but in organic nature it comes into existence as the soul of the enlivened object (ψυχῆς). The energy (ἐνέργεια) of the soul is, as an entelechian, thought, both οὐσία πνευματικά, since, as the temporary activity of the mind, it is necessarily dependent on the co-operation of the senses, and νοῦς πνευματικός, i.e. cognoscent, self-acting reason, in so far as, in the pure element of thought freed from what is sensuous, it elevates the finite world into cognoscent truth. From this excited point of view Aristotle regarded and subjected to inquiry that entire empire of reality and life, as it had developed itself up to his time in science, arts, and politics.

VI. ARISTOTELIAN LOGIC.

Aristotle is the creator of the science of logic. The two deepest thinkers of Germany, Kant and Hegel, acknowledge that from the time of Aristotle to their own age logic had made no progress. Aristotle has described the pure forms and operations of abstract reason, of finite thought, with the accuracy of an investigator of nature, and his logic is, as it were, a natural history of this "finite thought."

Aristotle obtains the categories, the fundamental conceptions of thought, from language, in which these universal forms of thought appear as parts of speech. These categories (κατηγορίαι, also κατηγορία, τὰ κατηγορία) give all the possible definitions for the different modes in which everything that exists may be viewed; they are the most elevated forms of expression (ἐξαίρεσις), from which constantly recur in things; fundamental definitions, which cannot be comprehended under any higher generic conception, and are, therefore, called γένη. Yet they are not themselves generic conceptions, which give what is essential in an object, but the most universal modes of expressing it. An independent existence belongs to οὐσία, substance, alone of all the categories; the rest denote only the different modes of what is inherent. The categories themselves, therefore, are not an ultimatum, by means of which the true cognition of an object can be attained. The most important proposition in Aristotle's doctrine of substances is the one that expresses the idea only in the individual." (μὴ οὐσίαν ὃν τῶν πρώτων οὐσιῶν ἀλλοτρότον τῶν ἀλλῶν τι εἶναι.)

* ἐδοκίμα is the internal formative principle; μέρος is the external form itself.
† The πρώτα οὐσία expresses the essential qualities only, the τεθεωρέω οὐσίαι are substances, including both essential and accidental qualities.

ARISTOTELIS.

After substance (οὐσία) Aristotle first treats of quantity, which with that which is relative attaches to the material of the substance, then passes to what is qualitative, which has reference especially to the determination of the form of the object. (In the Metaphysics on the other hand (v. 15), where the categories are defined more in accordance with our conceptions of them, the investigation on the qualitative precedes that on the relative.) The six remaining categories are treated of only in short outlines.

The object of the categories is, to render possible the cognition of the enormous multiplicity of phenomena; since by means of them those modes of viewing things which constantly recur in connexion with each other are fixed, and thus the necessity for advancing step by step ad infinitum is removed. But in Aristotle's view they are not the ultimatum for cognition. They rather denote only the different modes in which anything is inherent in the substance, and are truly and properly determined only by means of that which is substantial. This again is determined by the ἐδοκίμα, which is what is essential in the material, and owes its existence to the purpose of the thing. This purpose, and nothing short of this, is an ultimatum for cognition. The highest opposition in which the purpose realises itself is that of δύναμις and ἐνέργεια. (Arist. de An. 465 a 25.)

The categories are single words (τὰ ἕνα συμβολικά λέγοντα). As such, they are in themselves neither true nor false. They become both only in the union of ideas by means of mutual reference in a proposition (τὰ κατὰ συμβολήν λέγοντα). A proposition is the expression (ἐρμηνεία) of reflecting thought, which separates and combines (διαφθορά, συμβολή). This operation of thought manifests itself first of all in judgment. In this way Aristotle succeeds in advancing from the categories to the doctrine of the expression of thought (ἐρμηνεία). Here he treats first of all of the component elements of the proposition, then of simple propositions, together with the mode of their opposition with reference to the true and the false; lastly, of compound propositions (αἱ συμβολικά ἀριθμοὶ στάσεως), or modal forms of judgment (αἱ αἱ ἀριθμοὶ μετὰ τρόπου), out of which the category of modality was afterwards formed.

In the second part of the treatise ποιήσασθαι the different modes of opposition of both kinds of propositions are discussed. The essence of judgment, which presents itself in a visible form in the proposition, consists in this, that the idea, which in itself is neither true nor false, separates itself into the moments peculiar to it, the universal, the particular, the individual, and that the relation between these moments is either established by means of affirmation, or abolished by means of negation.

Judgment, however, stands in essential relation to conclusion. In judgment, Universal and Particular are referred to each other; these two moments of our conceptions separate themselves, with reference to the conclusion, into two premises (πρὸς τοὺς ἐνδεχόμενος), of which the one asserts the universal, the other the particular. (Anal. pr. i. 25; τῷ μὲν ὡς διάθεν, τῷ δὲ ὡς μορὸ.) The conclusion itself, however, is that expression, in which, from certain premises, something else beyond the premises is necessarily deduced. But the conclusion is still considered apart from its particular contents; it is treated quite as a form, and the remark is at the same time made, that for that very reason it is unequal supplies us with no knowledge (έπιστήμην). But because this abstract universal is the subject matter of demonstration, Aristotle makes the doctrine of the syllogism precede that of proof, for according to him, proof is a particular kind of conclusion. (Anal. pr. i. 4.) Accordingly, together with the mode of its formation, he treats of the figures of the syllogism, and the different forms of conclusion in them. (cc. 1—27.) Then he gives directions for finding with ease the syllogistic figures for each problem that is proposed (εὑρεσίς), and lastly shows how to refer given conclusions to their principles, and to arrange them according to premises. Thereupon, in the second book of the Analytics, he treats of the complete conclusion according to its peculiar determining principles (Anal. ii. i—12), points out errors and deficiencies in concluding (cc. 16—21), and teaches how to refer to the syllogistic figures incomplete arguments, which have for their object subjective conviction only. (cc. 22—27.)

We do not arrive at that conclusion which is the foundation of knowledge till we arrive at proof, i.e. a conclusion conveying a distinct meaning (συλλογισμὸς ἐπιστημονικός, ἀπόδειξις), which proceeds from the essential definitions of the matter in question. Proof, in order to lead to objective truth, necessarily presupposes principles. Without an acquaintance with principles, we cannot attain to knowledge by means of proof. Aristotle, therefore, treats first of the nature of principles. They are the Universal, which serves as a medium through which alone we can attain to knowledge; they have their certainty in themselves, and are not susceptible of any additional separate proof. In this point of view Aristotle compares them with the immediate certainty of sensuous perceptions. The reason (νοῦς) and the exertion of the reason (νοτική), which is itself the Universal, develops these principles (δήκες) out of itself.

In proof we may distinguish three things: 1. That which is proved (Anal. post. i. 7), i.e. that which is to be pertained to some definite object (γένει τινὲς) considered in itself. 2. The principles from which this is deduced. 3. The object, the attributes of which are to be exhibited. According to their subject-matter, proofs come into closer relation to the particular sciences. Here the important point is, to know what science is more accurate, and may be presupposed as the groundwork of another (πρωτεύον εἰκόν). The knowledge to which proof conducts by means of principles (πρωτεύουσα) has for its object necessary existence; conception (δήκες), on the other hand, has for its object that which may be otherwise constituted. After Aristotle, in the first book of the second Analytics, has shown how by means of proof we may receive a knowledge that something is, and why it is so, he considers that which we cannot get at by means of proof, but which is necessary for the complete development of our ideas, viz. the definition of that which is substantial, by means of which we have stated what an object is. It is affected by the definition (δήκες). The definition states what the essence of a thing is, and is therefore always universal and affirmative. It cannot be proved by any conclusion, nor even be demonstrated by means of induction. (Anal. post. ii. 7.) We find out the essence of a thing only when we know the essential attributes of the thing, and its existence itself. Aristotle analyses the different kinds of definition (Anal. post. ii. 10), then treats of the individual causes (for the definition declares the why of a thing with reference to its essence), and lastly lays down the method of finding a correct definition. (Anal. post. ii. 11, &c. ii. 13.) The object of definition is, to comprehend the whole according to its essential differences, and to refer these again to the genera, in order by these means to bring under contemplation the whole as a unity consisting of mutually connected and dependent members. One aid in definition is subdivision (βαθέσεις). The definition must be clear and distinct. This distinctness is attained by endeavouring first to define the particular, in order to become acquainted with the import of it in every species. The use of definition is especially important in proposing problems. (Anal. post. ii. 14.)

Aristotle, however, does not, either in his Metaphysics, or in the particular sciences, proceed according to the abstract forms of conclusion, as he develops them in the Organon; but the definition (δήκες) forms the central point in the further prosecution of his philosophical investigations. He forms his conception of the idea of a thing (τὸ εἶδος ἐν καθίστασι) in the identity of its existence and essence, and so continually points out the universal in the particular.

VII. Metaphysics.

The first philosophy (for such is the name Aristotle gives to what we call Metaphysics) is the science of the first principles and causes of things. (Met. ii. 6, 4.) It is theoretic science, and the most excellent, but at the same time the most difficult of all sciences, because its object, the universal, is removed as far as possible from the perceptions of the senses. (Met. i. 2.) It is, however, at the same time the most accurate science, because its subject-matter is most knowable; and the most free, because it is sought solely for the sake of knowledge.

There are four first causes or principles of things: a. The substance and the idea (ἡ όντια καὶ τὸ ἐν ἐννα); b. The subject and the matter (ἡ πράσι καὶ τὸ ἐπωνυμενόν); c. The principle of motion (ὅθεν ἢ ἀρχή τῆς κίνησεως); d. The purpose and the good (τὸ σε ἐνεκα καὶ τὸ γιαθές). The earlier philosophers (this Aristotle shews in the first book of the Metaphysics) recognized indeed all these classes singly, but neither distinctly nor in connexion. With full consciousness he declares, after having developed the history of metaphysics from the Ionian philosophers to Plato in bold and masterly outlines, that this science of the first philosophy had up to his time resembled a lipsing child (φαλακροκάπη, Met. i. 10, p. 993, Beek.).

The consciousness of the opposition between truth existing in and for itself, and the cognition of it, must necessarily be presupposed in all philosophizing. This consciousness, which has come out in all its distinctness only in the philosophy of the most recent times, Aristotle also possesses. But he has it in the form of doubts (διαφωτις), which arise against science itself. These doubts and questions, then, Aristotle considers on all sides, and therefore arrives at the following result:—
1. There is a science which considers existence as such, and the definitions pertaining to it as such. 2. It is not the same with any one of the particular sciences, for all these consider only a part of what exists and its attributes. 3. The principles and highest causes of things must have a nature appropriate only to them.

Existence is indeed defined in various ways, and denotes at one time the What and the idea, at another time the condition or constitution, magnitude, &c., of a thing; of all the definitions, however, the What, which denotes the substance, is the first. (Met. vii. 1, p. 1028, Bekk.) All other definitions only state attributes or qualities of this first definition, and are not in their nature independent, or capable of being separated from the substance. On the other hand, the idea of substance (οφθηκας) lies at the foundation of our ideas of everything, and we do not arrive at the cognition of anything when we know how great, or where, &c., it is, but when we know what it is. The question, therefore, is, What is the substance? (vis in ophth.) which has ever been the object of philosophical investigation. (Met. vii. 1, p. 1028.) Aristotle distinguishes three kinds of substances: 1. Substance perceptible by the senses (Met. xii. 1, 2, vii. 7), which is finite and perishable, like single sensible objects. The momenta of this sensible substance are, —a. the matter, that which is fundamental, constant; b. particular things, the negative in relation to each other; c. the motive principle, the pure form or idea. The second higher kind of substance is that which may be perceived by the senses, but is imperishable, such as the heavenly bodies. Here the active principle (ενεργεια, actus) steps in, which, in so far as it contains that which is to be produced, is understanding (νους). That which it contains is the purpose, which is realized by means of the ενεργεια. The two extremes are here potentiality and agency (matter and thought), the passive universal and the active universal. These two are not subject to change. That which is changed is the particular thing, and passes from one into the other by means of something else by which it is moved. The purpose, in so far as it is the motive principle, is called the κατηχησις; but, in so far as it is the purpose, it is the reason, οντως. (Met. v. 1, 2.) The active principle gives reality to that which it contains in itself: this remains the same: it is still, however, matter, which is different from the active principle, though both are combined. That which combines them is the form, the union of both. The relation of the newly coined idea of *ενεργειας, or the purpose realized by the formative principle, to the idea of ενεργεια, is this: *ενεργειας signifies in the different grades of existence the completion which is in conformity with each single existing thing; and ενεργεια denotes the actuality which is in conformity with this completion. (Metaph. i. 3, p. 175, 176, Brand.) Thus the soul is essentially ενεργειας.

* The actuality of such thing presupposes an original internal potentiality, which is in itself only conceivable, not perceptible. The potentiality of a thing is followed by its actuality in reference either to mere existence or to action. This actuality is ενεργεια, actus, and is perceptible. But, that the potential thing may become a real thing, the potentiality must pass into actuality. The principle of the transition from the potential to the actual in a thing Aristotle calls entelechiae (το ενεργεια), because it unites both the potentiality and the actuality. Every union of potentiality and actuality is a motion, and accordingly the entelechiae is the principle of motion (Ανθρακος, νεορακος, ιστος άτομος). The potentiality (δυναμις) can never become actuality (ενεργεια) without entelechiae; but the entelechiae also cannot dispense with the potentiality. If the entelechiae does not manifest itself in a thing, it is merely a thing ανθρακος; if it does manifest itself, it becomes a thing ενεργεια. The same thing is often both together, the former in reference to qualities which it has not yet, but can obtain; the latter in reference to attributes already actually present in it. (Buhle, in Ersch and Gruzer's Encyclopaedia.

3. The third kind of substance is that in which δυναμις, ενεργεια, and ενεργειας are united; the absolute substance; the eternal, unmov’d; but which is at the same time motive, is pure activity (στατικας, Met. xii. 6, ix. 8, xii. 7), is God himself. This substance is without matter, and so also is not a magnitude.

The chief momentum in the Aristotelian philosophy is, that thought and the subject of thought are one; that what is objective and thought (the ενεργεια) are one and the same. God himself is eternal thought, and his thought is operation, life, action,—it is the thought of thought.* Objects exist in their truth only in so far as they are the subjects of thought, are thoughts. That is their essence (ουδα). In nature, indeed, the idea exists not as a thought, but as a body; it has, however, a soul, and this is its idea. In saying this, Aristotle stands upon the highest point of speculation: God, as a living God, is the universe.

In the course of the investigation, Aristotle, with careful regard to, and examination of, the views of earlier philosophers, points out that neither abstractly universal, nor particular, sensuously perceptible essences can be looked upon as principles of existence. Neither the universal apart from the particular, nor the particular by itself, can be a principle of the natural and spiritual world; but the absolute principle is God,—the highest reason, the object of whose thought is himself. Thus the dominion of the ἀναγκορευ马云os was declared in a profounder manner by Aristotle. In the divine thought, existence is at the same time thought. Thought is the sum and substance of the universe, and realizes itself in the eternal immutable formative principles which, as the essences indwelling (immanent) in the material, fashion themselves so as to assume an individual existence. In man, the thought of the divine reason completes itself so as to become the self-conscious activity of thinking reason. By it he recognizes in the objective world his own nature again, and so attains to the cognition of truth. With these slight intimations, we must here leave the subject.

VIII. THE PARTICULAR SCIENCES.

Respecting the Essence of the Particular Sciences, and the division of them into Theoretical and Practical Sciences.—The science of the particular can... exist only when the essence of the particular, the νομος, i.e. the conceivable, the reasonable, is perceived. (Met. vii. 6.) It presupposes the principles of the intellectual and real, and has reference to that which is demonstrable from them. The individual sciences deduce from principles the truth of the particular by means of proof, which is the foundation of knowledge. Hence we limit our statement in this: that the individual science sets out from something presupposed, which is recognized, and deduces the rest from this by means of definition (syllogism). That operation of the mind which refers the particular to the universal, is the reflecting understanding (αναλὺσις), which is opposed as well to sensible perception as to the higher operation of the reason. With it the difference between existence and thought, between truth and falsehood, becomes a matter of consciousness.

Every single science has reference to a definite object (γιόνος, Anal. post. i. 39; Met. xi. 7), and seeks certain principles and causes of it. The particular object therefore determines the reason, and every science deduces from principles the principles peculiar to it, i.e. out of the essential definitions of the particular object. Three things are presupposed for every particular science: a. That its object, and the essential definitions of that object (i.e. the principles peculiar to it), exist. b. The common principles (axioms), and c. The signification of the essential attributes of the object. According to their common principles, all sciences are mutually connected. Such common principles are, for example, the law of contradiction.

The accuracy (δεσπέζεται) of the single sciences depends on the nature of their objects. The less this is an object of sense, the more accurate is the science of it. (Met. xiii. 3; Anal. post. i. 27; Met. iv. 1, 1.) Therefore metaphysics is the most accurate, but also the most difficult science. A knowledge of the kind of scientific treatment which the subject in hand requires must be acquired by intellectual cultivation. To wish to apply in all cases the method and schematism of a philosophy, which in constructing its theories begins from the fundamental idea (δημοσίας), is pedantic (ἐνδείκτικον, Met. i. 1, p. 29, Brund.). Natural science, for example, does not admit of the application of a mere abstract definition of the idea, for it has to take into consideration as well the manifold, as also the accidental. The same may be said of the province of practical science, where, in ethics and politics, universal, thorough definitions are not always possible, but the true can often be exhibited only in outline (το τὸνοτον). The practical has also to do with the individual, and therefore accidental. For that reason, experience and what is matter of fact, have a high value as the proper basis of cognition. For the individual existence (τὸ δικτυκτον with its formative principle, is the really substantial; and the sensuously perceptible essences and those which are universal are almost the same natures (Met. xiii. 9, p. 1088, B Beck.). It is only in the individual that the universal attains reality.

The particular sciences have for their object the cognition of the world of appearances in its essential characteristics. For this purpose the co-operation of the senses is necessary. Therefore here the proposition, nihil est in intellectu quod non fuerit in sensu, holds good. (De Anim. iii. 8.) In the Reason is either theoretical or practical reason (de Anima. iii. 10). The object of the first is the cognition of truth (of the universal, the unchangeable); the object of the other is the realisation, by means of action, of the truth, the cognition of which has been attained. (Metaph. ii. 1.) Practical reason, therefore, is directed to the particular and individual, which is determined and regulated by the universal. (Eth. Nic. vii. 12.) The scientific treatment of the moral (ethic and polity) has, therefore, to investigate not so much what virtue is (*κὸν ἐν τῷ ἐνδικτίκω ὁ ὁ ή ἀρετή εἰσερχόμενον, Eth. Nic. ii. 2), as rather how we may become virtuous (ὅλα οὐκ ἀρετή εἰσερχόμενα). Without this last object it would be of no use. The difference between action and the exercise of the creative power (πρὸς τέκνα and ποιμέν) in the province of practical reason, is the foundation of the difference between morality and art. What is common to both is, that the commencing point of the activity lies here in the subject (Met. xi. 7), and that the object of the activity has reference to that which admits of different modes of existence. (Eth. Nic. vii. 4.) The difference, therefore, between the two is this: that in action (πρὸς τέκνα) the purpose lies in the activity itself (in the ποιμέν), whereby the will of the actor manifests itself, while in the exercise of the creative power (ποιμέν) it lies in the work produced. (Metaph. vi. 1; Magn. Mor. i. 35.)

The theoretical sciences have to do with that which exists in accordance with the idea, and can be deduced from it. Their object is either, a. the universal, as it is the object of cognition to the abstracting understanding, which, however, is still restricted to one side of the material, to the quantitative (Met. xii. 2),—accordingly ῥα ἀγωγὴ ἀλλὰ ἀνα σχεματικά; or, b. the universal, as by means of the formative principles, which give it some definitive shape, it attains to existence in the essences of natural things (ῥα ἀγωγὴ ἀλλὰ ἀνα σχεματικά); or, c. the object is the individual, as it exhibits itself as necessary existence (ῥα διόνυσι σχεματικά καὶ χαρακτήρα). Out of these the theoretical sciences of mathematics, physics, and theology develop themselves, as well as the practical sciences, which have for their object action, morality in the individual and in the state (ethic, economics, polity), or the exercise of the creative faculty, and art (poetics, rhetoric).

The Theoretical Sciences.

1. Natural Sciences.

The science of Physics (ἡ φυσική), ἡ ψεπί φυσική τοιοῦτον considers that existence which is susceptible of motion. Its object is not the idea in its spiritual existence (ῥα τὸ τὶ ἐν δικτύκτον), but the idea in its real existence in the material (ῥα τὶ ἐν θέτετον). Natural existence has the origin of motion in itself originally. Motion is change from what exists to what exists. Nature, therefore, is no lifeless substratum, but an organization pos-
in inseparable union. Matter is the foundation, and the formative principle, are that which gives it its shape. In natural existence deprivation (στρίψις), and the formative principle, on the other hand, is the basis of what is unchangeable in that which is manifold. For the formative principle is in itself eternal and imperishable, and is inseparable from one to another. This is engendered in the material. Natural science considers the formative principles which in motion and change continually reengender themselves. The formative principle and the purpose are the same, only conceived of in a different relation: — the internal formative principle in relation to that which actually exists; purpose, in relation to the why? of it. The identity of the two is the operative cause. The relation of purpose is the highest cause, in which all physical causes concentrate themselves. (Phys. ii. 7—9.) Wherever there is purpose there is activity (πεπράστευκα, Phys. ii. 5) in relation to this purpose, and according to the activity of each thing, so is its natural constitution. Nature now has a purpose, but it is independent of all reflection and consideration. (Phys. i.e.c.) It creates according to an unconscious impulse, and its activity is a diaphanous, but not a divine activity (δευτέρα, Phys. ii. 6) or Dionysius, ή η Σειρα, η αποστολή. Sometimes it does not attain its object, because in its formative process it cannot overpower the material; and then, through this partial frustration of the purpose, abstractions are produced. (Phys. i.e.c., de Gener. Anim. iv. 4.) Nature therefore has the foundation of its development and existence in itself,—is its own purpose; it is an organic whole, in which everything is in a state of vigorous reciprocal action, and exhibits a series of gradations from the less perfect to the more perfect forms of existence, and does, and this when perfected is κατασκευασμένος και σύνομος, in contrast with which the material, as the merely potential, is the lower principle. The connecting link between the two is motion, the process of becoming; accordingly motion is a condition in all nature, and he who has not arrived at the cognition of motion does not understand nature. (Phys. i. 1.) Motion is the means by which everything strives to advance from potentiality (matter) to that actuality, of which, according to its nature, it is capable, i.e. to the form appropriate to it, which is its purpose. The ἀδιάβος is thus what is true in the visible object, but not apart from the process of becoming; but it is the basis of this process of becoming itself, inasmuch as it is the active, fashioning principle. The true principle of natural science, therefore, lies in the dynamico-genetical method, which looks upon nature as something continually becoming, which strives to advance from potentiality to actuality. Motion itself is eternal and unproduced; it is the life (ζωή) of all nature. (Phys. viii. 1.) Through this striving of all natural existences after the imperishable, everything is in some sort filled with soul. (De Gener. Anim. iii. 11.) The elementary bodies, considered in themselves, have motion in themselves, reciprocally produce each other, and so imitate the imperishable (as e.g. earth and fire, Met. ix. 8). Things possessed of life produce in the process of generation an object of like kind with themselves (de Anim. ii. 4, 2), and participate in eternity as far as they can, since in their individual existence, as one according to number (ἐν ἄριστῳ), they are not eternal. A constant dynamical connexion exhibits itself in the process of development of natural life, it aims at more and more perfect forms, and makes the lower and less perfect forms a preliminary condition of the higher, so that the higher sphere comprehends also the lower (De Caelo, i. 4) and the more perfect formations of the unsensed between earth and heaven, the several elements are separated by no definite limit, but pass insensibly from one to the other (Phys. iv. 5; De Caelo, iv. 1, 4), and also in organisms possessed of life the same gradation, from the lower to the more and more perfect forms, shows itself. (De Anim.a, ii. 2, 3.) Natural science then must follow this process of development, for it is only in this way that it attains to a lively apprehension of nature. To develop how Aristotle, according to these leading outlines, treats the particular natural sciences, how he first develops the gradations of the elements, the motion of the heavenly bodies, and the unmoved moving principle, and then points out the process of formation in inorganic and organic nature, and lastly arrives at man, as the end and centre of the entire creation, of which he is the most complete organization (Polit. i. 8; Hist. Anim. ix. 1; De Partih. Anim. iv. 10), would lead us farther than our present limits allow. We can only again direct attention to the excellent delineation, a perfect model of its kind, in the work of Biene above referred to, vol. ii. pp. 59—216. 2. Mathematics and the Mathematical Sciences. Mathematics and Physics have the same objects in common, but not in the same manner; for mathematics abstract from the concrete attributes of sensible things, and considers, only the quantitative. (Met. xiii. 3.) This is the only side of that which is material on which the understanding (συνειδησία) dwells, where it considers the universal in the way in which it is presented by the abstractive power of the understanding. This mode of procedure, however, does not admit of being applied in all cases (Phys. ii. 2); and mathematics, from their very nature, cannot rise above the material and reach real existence as such. The investigations of this science are restricted to one part of material existence (τοις τις μέροις τῶν ἐν κατασκευήσει τῆς ἐν οὐσίᾳ, Met. xii. 4). The relation between the three theoretical sciences, therefore, is this: the science of physics basizes itself indeed with the internal formative principle, with that which has an absolute existence, but only in so far as this has passed into the material, and is accordingly not immovable. (Met. vi. 1, xii. 7.) The science of mathematics, on the other hand, occupies itself indeed with that which is immovable and at rest, as its definitions are fixed and unalterable; but not with that which is absolutely immovable, but immovable in so far as it is connected with matter. The science of metaphysics, lastly, occupies itself with that which exists really and absolutely, with that which is eternal and immovable. 52 Mathematics, therefore, stand half-way between physics and metaphysics. (Met. i. 6, p. 20, 29, i. 9, p. 33, 23, xi. 1, p. 212, 22.) Mathematical existence only occurs in novusae: (according to potentiality) in the abstractive operation of the understanding, and is therefore no independent existence, nothing substantial. We arrive at the cognizance of its peculiar definitions not from the idea, but only by means of separation (e.g. auxiliary lines in figures for proof). On that account, neither motion nor the idea of purpose occurs in mathematics. (Met. iv. 2, Phys. ii. 9.) In this science, that which is simple, as an abstractum, forms the starting-point, and its necessity depends on our advancing from the simple to the composite, or from the basis to that which is based upon it. (Phys. ii. 9.) Respecting the axioms from which mathematical sciences proceed, mathematics can therefore say nothing (Met. iv. 3), because these belong to every existing thing as such.*

B.

The Practical Sciences.

Mathematics, restricted as the science is to the quantitative, can exhibit the good and the beautiful only as they manifest themselves in that immutability which consists in the fixed order and harmony of the quantitative. But the way in which these two, the good and the beautiful, acquire existence in the department of the mind, is considered and pointed out by the practical sciences, Ethics, Politics (with Economics as an appendix), and Poetics (Aesthetics, Philosophy of Art).

1. Ethics.

1. General Definitions.†—The highest and last purpose of all action, according to Aristotle, is happiness (εὐδαιμωνια. Eth. Nic. i. 2—7, x. 6—8, and elsewhere). This he defines to be the energy (εὐφυιεα) of life existing for its own sake (perfect life), according to virtue existing by and for itself (perfect virtue). As the highest good, it must be pursued for its own sake; as the highest tōναντα (perfect virtue), its essence must be derived from the peculiar destination of man. Accordingly, happiness is the activity of the soul in accordance with virtue during a separate independent period of existence (Eth. Nic. i. 7). The two principal component parts of this definition are virtue, and external induces a pleasure, which exercises a powerful influence in urging the man on to virtuous activity, besides being the constant attendant of the latter. In this point of view Aristotle, in the 10th book (Eth. Nc. x. 1-6), treats of pleasure as a powerful means of virtue.

* The only mathematical work of Aristotle (μαθηματικον, Diog. Laëtit. v. 24) quoted by ancient writers is lost. The method which was followed at a later stage for mathematics, rests altogether on the doctrine of proof given in the Analytics. Aristotle probably composed no separate treatises on arithmetic and geometry. In his Organon he frequently borrows examples from geometry. Aristotle, as an opponent of the Pythagoreans, laid great stress on the separation of arithmetical and geometry. (Anal. post. i. 27, Met. v. 6.)

ARISTOTELES.

After the principal elements of the definition of virtue have been thus gone through, the happiness of the theoretical life of reason, i.e. of the life devoted to philosophical contemplation, is brought prominently into view; which, as a divine kind of life, is accorded to but few men. (Eth. Nc. x. 8.) In contrast with this stands the happiness of active, practical life, which has its firm basis in the ethical virtues, and in external good circumstances the means of carrying out and accomplishing the higher ends of life. This, however, can only take place in the state; and so Ethics of themselves conduct us to the doctrine of the state, to politics.

The ethics of Aristotle preserved the most complete development of the doctrine of virtue, regarded from the point of view chosen by the ancients. The problem which he here proposed to himself was no other than this: to exhibit the good in the process of becoming, in that way in which it is a thing attainable by man, and individualizes itself most immediately in the bents or inclinations of men (the existence of which as such in their natural condition, according to the view taken by the ancients, cannot be denied). Then, secondly, by means of practical wisdom, to determine the proper medium for these manifold bents, and so to lay down the rule for action. Farther, to show that the obligation to live according to this rule, which is founded in the essential nature of the higher rationality, and that in this those sentiments which are firm and immovable form the immutable basis of action.

2. Politics.

The ethics of Aristotle contain the fundamental elements (στοιχεῖα, Polit. iv. 11, ed. Stahr) of politics, of which the former science is itself a particular part (πολιτικά τις, Eth. Nc. i. 1, Magn. Mov. i. 1.) Both have the same end—happiness, only that it is far more noble and more divine to conduct whole peoples and states to this end. (Polit. iii. 12.) Practical wisdom and politics are one and the same species of habit (Eth. Nc. vi. 8); all they differ in is this: that the object of the one is to promote the happiness of an individual, the object of the other to promote that of a community. In the latter point of view, practical wisdom is:

a. The management of the family—oeconomies.

b. In the management of the state.—a. Legislative power (κοινοκρατία), which regulates the general relations (ἀρχιτεχνοτητά). B. Administrative power (πολιτεία) in the government of the state, where action, or the special application of the laws under particular circumstances, is concerned. The administrative power realizes itself first in that part of the state which deliberates on the public concerns (Εκτελεστήρια), and which possesses the power of applying the laws to public relations; secondly, in the judicial power (Δικαστερία), with the application of the laws to private concerns.

As the highest good is something absolutely perfect, i.e. a thing of such a nature that it is striven after purely for its own sake, happiness, as it is a good of this kind, cannot be imperfect, but the quality of self-sufficiency (συναρκεία) must pertain to it. This, however, is to be obtained not in isolated or family life, but only in the state, which is the union of all other circles of social life. Man therefore, as being created by nature for the state and for life in the state (Εκ του πολιτείαν, Polit. i. 2, lli. 6, and elsewhere), strives after it. The state, moreover, as a totality consisting of organically connected members, is by nature prior to the individual and the family; it is the absolute prius. As the hand of a corpse is no more a hand, so the annihilation of the state is at the same time the annihilation of the individual; for only a wild beast or a god can live out of the bounds of the state, or without it. (Polit. i. 2, extr.) It is only through the state that ab práteía, self-sufficiency, not merely for the preservation of bare life, but also for happy life, is rendered possible. Happiness, however, is only the consequence of an activity of the soul consisting in complete virtue (ἀρετή); consequently, in the state, and in nothing short of it, does virtue itself attain complete reality.

And the object of the political art is the most honourable, in as far as the statesman directs all his care to the training of such citizens as are morally good and actively promote everything honourable and noble. (Eth. i. 10, 13, init.) The science of politics therefore is the necessary completion of ethics, and it is only in reference to the state that the latter can attain its full development. The two sciences, therefore, in Aristotle's view, stand in such close connexion, that in the Politics by στοιχεία he refers to the Ethics, and in the latter by ἄρετα to the Politics.

According to the method of genetic development (κατὰ τὴν γενετικὴν μέθοδον, Polit. i. 1), Aristotle begins in the politics with the consideration of the first and most simple human association, the family (οἰκία). A marriage of free men and women is known only by the Hellenes, not by the barbarians, among whom not free men and women, but male and female slaves unite themselves together. The distinction between Hellenes and barbarians, free men and slaves, in Aristotle's view is still a primary distinction, because the natural determining circumstances of birth (as Hellen or barbarian) is still an essential element in the idea of freedom. Christianity first laid down the principle, that freedom is founded on the spiritual entity of man, without regard to the natural determining circumstance of birth.

Out of the component parts of the family (slaves and free persons, master and slaves, man and wife, father and children) arise three relations: the despotic (δεσποτικά), nuptial (γάμω), and parental (τεκνογονία), with which is associated besides the οἰκογένεια. These Aristotle treats of in the first book of the Politics. The arrangement of the whole domestic system resembles monarchy (Polit. i. 7), but at the same time the family is the image of political life generally, for in it lie the germs of friendship, constitution, and all that is just. (Eth. Eudem. vii. 10, p. 1242. 6, Bek.) After this, in the second book, he considers the purpose of the state, as the unity of a whole consisting of mutually dependent and connected members, with reference as well to imaginary (Plato), as to actually existing constitutions. He calls attention to their points of superiority and inferiority, and so indicates the essential conditions, which are necessary for the foundation and realization of the idea of a state. Thereupon in the third book he develops the idea of the state according to its separation into different forms of government; in the fourth book he considers the several constitutions according to their differences in kind, because these exercise an influence on legal regulations, and are independent on the constitution, not vice versa. That is to say, constitution is the arrangement of the powers in the state, according to which the sovereignity (τὸ κράτος) is determined. The constitution is thus the soul of the state. (Polit. iv. 1, iii. 4.) The laws, on the other hand, are the determining principles, according to which the governing bodies govern, and holds in check those who transgress them. Aristotle distinguishes aristocracy, kingdom, and republic (συμβολικὸ τὸ κόσμον προσαγωγομένη δύναμις), and sets by the side of these the three perversions (απειβάλλοντος) of them: oligarchy, tyranny, democracy. These constitutions arise out of the three principles, 1, of equality, founded on the preponderance of number; 2, of inequality, which is founded either, a. on the preponderance of external strength and wealth (tyranny, oligarchy), or b. on the preponderance of internal or spiritual strength (monarchy, aristocracy). Aristotle then, in the fifth book, considers the disturbing and preserving causes in the different constitutions, always having regard to reality and experience (Polit. iii. 17, iv. 1); and, for the determination of that form of government which is best adapted for the greatest number of states, gets this result, that in it democratical and oligarchical principles must be intermixed and united. (Polit. iv. 12.) From such a mixture of the elements of constitutions result new forms of mixed constitutions (συσχεδίων), which Aristotle characterizes more closely according to the three essential functions of political power. (Polit. iv. 14, vi.) Having thus prepared the way, the philosopher proceeds to the real problem, to show how a state can be so perfectly constituted, as to answer to the requisitions of human nature. He shows that the question, What is the best constitution? is connected with the question, What is the most desirable mode of life? (Polit. vii. 1) he develops the external conditions for the realisation of the best constitution (Polit. vii. 4, &c.), which are dependent on fortune,—and then passes to the internal conditions of such a constitution, which are independent of fortune. (Polit. vii. 13, &c.) For these latter he finds the central point in the education of youth, which he therefore considers as a public concern of the state. (Polit. viii. 1.) Its object is the harmonious culture of all the physical and mental powers, which lays the foundation for that harmony of perfect virtue both in the man and in the citizen, in which the purely human develops itself in all its fulness and power. By the individual citizens of the state (Polit. vii. 13) being trained to a virtuous, moral life, virtue and morality become predominant in all the spheres of political life, and accordingly by means of politics that is completely realised, for which ethics form the groundwork, viz. human happiness depending on a life in accordance with virtue. Thus on the one hand the science of politics is again self-legislative, and on the other hand, inasmuch as art and oratory are included in the circle of the means by which the citizen is to be trained, it points beyond what is immediately connected with itself to the departments of them. The difference of purpose again involves attention to the appropriate arguments, according as these are common to all, or particular.

The power of convincing, however, depends not merely on oratorical conclusions, but also on the credibility of the orator, and the disposition of the hearers. Therefore it is necessary to shew how the favourable disposition requisite on every occasion is to be produced in the mind of the hearer. But a person must know not only what to say, but also how to say it. Therefore rhetoric, has, by way of conclusion, to treat of oratorical expression and arrangement.

2. Poetics.—"Thou, O man, alone possessest art!" This dictum of Schiller's is already expressed by Aristotle. (Met. i. 1.) In art the production of a work is the main matter and the main purpose, whilst the purpose of oratory, which is throughout practical, is extraneous to speech itself. The relation of art to morality and virtue is, on the side of the artist, a very slight one; for, with dispositions and sentiments, which in actions form the most important point, one has nothing to do in the practice of art, whereas the main thing is the production of a work. On the other hand, however, every art, and every work of art, exerts a moral influence, purifies and purges the stronger emotions of the soul, strengthens and elevates the mind.

Art, like nature, produces by fashioning organically, but, with consciousness (Phys. ii. 8), and its creative efforts, as well as the contemplation of these efforts, and of the work of art produced, belong to those higher exertions of the mind (τὸ ποιητικὸ τὸ οίκομεν τὸ ἐν εἰκονισμῷ τῆς καλλικότατης αὐτοῦ) which have their purpose in themselves. Aristotle, indeed, in accordance with the light in which the matter was generally viewed by the ancients, reckons art amongst the higher purposes of the state and of religion (Poet. viii.), but with him it has also already the signification of an independent creation of the mind, which endows reality, and which again draws within its sphere religion and morality likewise.

All the several arts find a common bond of union in this, that they are all imitations (μιμησίαι), i.e. all arts, epic poetry, tragedy, comedy, lyric poetry, music, orchestic (the art of dancing), painting, and statutory, strive after truth, the real essence of things, which they represent. That which distinguishes the arts from each other lies partly in the diversity of the means by which they represent, partly in the object of representation, partly in the mode of representation. According to this diversity arise the distinct differences in the arts, the species of art, and the different styles of art. How, according to Aristotle's view, the beautiful developed and manifested itself in the separate arts, can be pointed out only with reference to poetry, because this is the only art that Aristotle (in his work τοιοῦτοῖς) has treated of. Poetry is the product of inspiration (Rhet. iii. 7), and its means of representation is language, metrical as well as unmetrical. (Poet. i.) Improvisations form the historical starting-point for all poetry, which from its very commencement divides itself into two principal directions, that which follows the more homely, and that which follows the more exalted. This depended on the peculiar characters of the poet. A delicate perception of what is correct and appropriate, an acute faculty of observation, and a mind easily excitabl

Some modern persons of the name of Aristotles, respecting whom no particulars are known. Diogenes enumerates eight, including the great philosopher, and Jonus (De Script. Hist. Phil. i. 12) no less than thirty-two persons of this name. [L. S.]

ARISTOTELUS (Ἀριστοτέλος), a philosopher of the Peripatetic school. The date of his birth is not known; but from the account of Suidas, and from incidental notices in other writers, we learn that he was born at Tarentum, and was trained as a learned musician named Spinophilus (otherwise Mnesias). (Adian, H. A. ii. 11.) He learnt music from his father, and having been afterwards instructed by Lamprias of Erythrae and Xenophilus the Pythagorean, finally became a disciple of Aristotle (Gell. iv. 11; Cic. Tusc. Disp. i. 18), whom he appears to have rivalled in the variety of his studies, though probably not in the success with which he prosecuted them. According to Suidas, he produced works to the number of 453 upon music, philosophy, history, in short, every department of literature. He gained so much credit as a scholar of Aristotle, that it was expected, at least by himself, that he would be chosen to succeed him; and his disgust at the appointment of Theophrastus caused him afterwards to slander the character of his great master. This story is, however, contradicted by Aristocles (op. Euseb. Praep. Evang., xv. 2), who affirms that he never mentioned Aristotles but with the greatest respect. We know nothing of his philosophical opinions, except that he held the soul to be a harmony of the body (Cic. Tusc. Disp. i. 10, 18; Laet. Inst. v. 13, de Orph. Del. c. 16), a doctrine which had been already discussed by Plato (in the Phaedo) and combatted by Aristotle. (De An. i. 4.) It is only in his character as a musician that Aristotles appears to have deserved and acquired a reputation for real excellence; and no considerable remains of his works have come down to us except three books of dionýsmoi eurýnymoi, or rather, as their contents seem to shew, fragments of two or three separate musical treatises. (See Burney, Hist. of Musici, vol. i. p. 442.) They contain less actual information on the theory of Greek music than the later treatises ascribed to Euclid, Aristedes Quintilianus, and others; but they are interesting from their antiquity, and valuable for their criticisms on the music of the times to which they belong. Aristotles, at least if we may trust his own account, was the first to attempt a complete and systematic exposition of the subject; and he aimed at introducing not only a more scientific knowledge, but also a more refined and intellectual taste than that which prevailed among his contemporaries, whom he accuses of cultivating only that kind of music which was capable of sweetness. (Aristox. p. 23, ed. Melborn.) He became the founder of a sect or school of musicians, called, after him, Aristoxeneans, who were opposed to the Pythagoreans on the question whether reason or sense should furnish the principles of musical science and the criterion of the truth of its propositions. Pythagoras had discovered the connexion between musical intervals and numerical ratios; and it had been found that the principal concords were defined by simple ratios which were either superparticular (of the form $\frac{n+1}{n}$) or multiple (of the form $\frac{m}{n}$). From this fact, he or his followers inferred, that no interval could be consonant which was defined by a ratio of a different kind; and hence they were obliged to maintain (contrary to Archi-timus works of Aristoxenus have been collected from various sources by Meursius and others. (See Fabric. Müll. vol. ii. p. 357; Clinton. F. H. Müll.

vol. ii. appendix, c. 12.) Among them are lives of Pythagoras, Archytas, Socrates, Plato, and other distinguished persons; and several treatises on subjects connected with music, including one $\Pi \rho \alpha \tau \iota \gamma \mu \nu

More. Ant. iii. 16, p. 232), who was a pupil of 10, vol. viii. p. 748), and must therefore have lived about the beginning of the Christian era. He was a follower of Herophilus (ibid. c. 7. p. 724), and studied at the celebrated Herophilic school of medicine, established in Phrygia, at the village of Men-Cubrus, between Laodicea and Carum. He wrote a work Πελοπίδης Ἀριστέρος, De Herophilic Secta, of which the thirteenth book is quoted by Galen (ibid. c. 10. p. 746), and which is now not extant. (Mahne, * Diatribe de Arbistoxeno,*

ARIUS (Ἀριύς), of Salmis in Cyprus, who wrote a history of Alexander the Great, in which he mentioned the embassy of the Romans to Alexander at Babylon (Arrian.
Anad. vii. 16; Athen. x. p. 436; Clements Alex.
Protrept. p. 16; Strab. xiv. p. 682.) That he lived a considerable time later than Alexander, may be inferred from Strabo (xv. p. 730), although it is impossible to determine the exact time at which he lived. Some writers are inclined to believe that Arius, the historian, is the same person as Arius the academic philosopher, who was a contemporary and friend of Cicero; who taught philosophy at Athens, and by whom M. Brutus was instructed. This philosopher moreover was a brother of the celebrated Anthochus of Ascalon.
But the opinion which identifies the historian and philosopher, is a mere hypothesis, supported by nothing but the circumstance that both bore the same name. (Cic. Brut. 97, de Fideb. v. 5.
Academ. i. 3, ii. 4, Tusc. Quist. v. 8, de Att. v.
10; Plut. Brut. 2.)

ARIUSTYLUS (Ἀριστύλου), a Greek astro-nomor, who appears to have lived about n. c. 233.
(Plut. de Pyth. Oro. 18.) He wrote a work on the fixed stars (τοφιδά ἀπλωνα), which was used by Hipparchus and Ptolemy (Magn. Synth. vii. 2), and he is undoubtedly one of the two persons of this name who wrote commentaries on Aratus, which are now lost. (L. S.)

ARIUS or ARIEUS (Ἀρίους), the celebrated heretic, is said to have been a native of Libya, and must have been born shortly after the middle of the third century after Christ. His family's name appears to have been Ammonius. In the religious disputes which broke out at Alexandria in a. d. 306, Arius at first took the part of Meletius, but afterwards became reconciled to Peter, bishop of Alexandria, and the opponent of Meletius, who made Arius deacon. (Sosom. H. E. i. 15.)
After this Arius again opposed Peter for his employment of Meletius and his followers, and was in consequence excommunicated by Peter.
After the death of the latter, Achilles, his succesor in the see of Alexandria, not only forgave Arius his offence and admitted him deacon again, but ordained him presbyter, a. d. 313, and gave him the charge of the church called Bucealets at Alexandria. (Epiph. Hoes. 68. 4.) The opinion that, after the death of Achilles, Arius himself wanted to become bishop of Alexandria, and that for this reason he was hostile to Alexander, who became the successor of Achilles, is a mere conjecture, based upon the fact, that Theodoret (H. E. i. 2) accuses Arius of envy against Alexander. The official position of Arius at Alexandria, by virtue of which he interpreted the Scriptures, had undoubtedly gained for him already

ARISTOXENUS (Ἀρίστοκρένος). 1. Of Selinus in Sicily, a Greek poet, who is said to have been the first who wrote in enapaetoscopic metres.
Respecting the time at which he lived, it is expressly stated that he was older than Epicharmus, from about n. c. 540 to 445. (Schol. ad Aristoph.
Plat. 487; Hephastion, Eucharid. p. 45, ed. Gaisf.) Eusebius (Chron. p. 333, ed. Mai) places him in Ol. 29 (a. d. 664), but this statement requires some explanation. If he was born in that year, cannot have been a Selinitan, as Selinus was not founded till about a. d. 628. But Aristoxenus may perhaps have been among the first settlers at Selinus, and thus have come to be regarded as a Selinitan.

2. A Cyreniac philosopher, who appears not to have been distinguished for anything except his gluttony, whence he derived the surname of κυληγ.
(Athen. i. p. 7; Suid. s. v. Ἀρίστοκρένος.) [L. S.]

physician, quoted by Caecilius Aurelianus (De

ARIUS, a considerable number of followers, when in A.D. 318, the celebrated dispute with bishop Alexander broke out. This dispute had a greater and more lasting influence upon the development of the Christian religion than any other controversy. The accounts respecting the immediate occasion of the dispute differ (Epiphani. Haeres. 69. 3; Socrat. H. E. i. 5; Sozom. H. E. i. 15; Philostorg. i. 4), but all agree in stating that Alexander after having heard some reports respecting Arius's novell views about the Trinity, attacked them in a public assembly of presbyters. Hereupon Arius charged the bishop with being guilty of the errors of Sabellius, and endeavoured to defend his own opinions. He maintained that the Son of God had been created by God, previous to the existence of the world and of time, by an act of God's own free will and out of nothing; that therefore the Son had not existed from all eternity; and that consequently in this respect the Son was not perfectly equal to the Father, although he was raised far above all men. This first dispute was followed by a circular letter from Alexander to his clergy, and by a second conference, but all had no effect. As in the meantime the number of Arius's followers was rapidly increasing, and as both the clergy and laity of Egypt, as well as several bishops of Syria and Asia Minor, were favourably disposed towards Arius, partly because his doctrines resembled those of Lucian, who had died a martyr about ten years before, and partly because they were captivated by Arius's insinuating letters addressed to them, Alexander, in A.D. 321, convened at Alexandria a synod of nearly one hundred Egyptian and Libyan bishops. The influence of Alexander, of course, prevailed at this synod: Arius was deposed, and he and his followers were excommunicated. In order to insure the proper effect of this verdict, Alexander addressed numerous letters to foreign bishops, in which he announced to them the judgment passed upon Arius, endeavoured to refute his doctrines, and urged them to adopt his own views of the case, and not to afford any protection to the heretic. Two of these letters are still extant. (Euseb., Hist. p. 111.)

It was owing to these letters and to the extensive exertions of Arius to defend his doctrines and to win more followers, that the possibility of an amicable settlement of the question diminished more and more every day. At Alexandria the Arians regularly withdrew from the church, and had their separate places of worship; and in Palestine, whither Arius had fled from Egypt, he found a favourable reception. Here he addressed a letter, still extant (Epiphani. Haeres. 69. 6; Theodoret. H. E. i. 5), to his friend, Eusebius, bishop of Nicomedia, the most influential bishop of the time, and who himself bore a grudge against Alexander of Alexandria. Eusebius in his answer, as well as in a letter he addressed to Paulinus, bishop of Tyre, expressed his perfect agreement with the views of Arius (Athanas. de Synod. § 17; Theodoret. H. E. i. 6), and even received Arius into his own house. During his stay at Nicomedia, Arius wrote a theological work called Thaleia (Ωδέα), which is said to have been composed in the effeminate style of Sotades, and to have been written in part in the so-called Sotadic metre. (Sotades.) He also addressed a letter to bishop Alexander, in which he entered into an explanation of his doctrines, and which was signed by the clergy who had been excommunicated with him. Of his Thaleia we possess only some abstracts made by his enemy Athanasius, which are written in a philosophical and earnest tone; but they contain statements, which could not but be offensive to a believer in the divinity of Christ. These things, when compared with the spirit of Arius's letters, might lead to the belief that Athanasius in his epistle exaggerated the statements of Arius; but we must remember that Arius in his letters was always prudent and moderate, to avoid giving offence, by not shewing how far his theory might be carried. On the whole, the controversy between Arius and Alexander presents no features of noble generosity or impartiality; the former is ambitious and obstinate. Arius was as zealous in endeavouring to acquire new followers as Alexander was fierce and stubborn in his persecution. At last, in A.D. 323, Eusebius and the other bishops who were in favour of Ariusianism, assembled in council in Bithynia, and issued a circular to all the bishops, requesting them to continue their ecclesiastical communion with Arius, and to use their influence with Alexander on his behalf. But neither this step nor the permission granted by several bishops to Arius to resume his functions, as presbyter, so far as it could be done without encroachment upon the rights of Alexander, was calculated to restore peace; on the contrary, the disputes for and against Ariusianism spread so much both among the laity and clergy of Egypt, Syria, and Asia Minor, that in A.D. 324, the emperor Constantine thought it necessary to write a letter to Arius and Alexander in common, in which he declared the contested point of little importance, exhorted the disputants to a speedy reconciliation, and left it to each to hold his own opinions, provided he did not disturb the outward union of the church. (Euseb. De Vit. Const. M. ii. 64, &c.) This letter was carried to Alexandria, whither Arius had returned in the meantime, by Hosius, bishop of Corduba, who was also to act as presbyter at the synod of Nicomedia. (Euseb., Hist. p. 154.)

The disputes became more vehement from day to day, and Constantine at last saw himself obliged to convene a general council at Nicaea, A.D. 325, at which upwards of 300 bishops were present, principally from the eastern part of the empire, and among them Arius, Alexander, and his friend Athanasius. Each defended his own opinions; but Arius being the accused party was in a disadvantageous position, and a confession of faith, which he presented to the council, was torn to pieces in his presence. Athanasius was the most vehement opponent of Arius, and after long debates the council came to the resolution, that the Son of God was begotten, not made, of the same substance with the Father, and of the same essence as the Son of God. This was done in order to prevent the spirit of Arius's letters, which he presented to the council, from being made use of by the Arians, and that the council might not be offensive to a believer in the divinity of Christ. Meanwhile, the disputes for and against Ariusianism spread so much among the laity and clergy of Egypt, Syria, and Asia Minor, that the emperor Constantine thought it necessary to write a letter to Arius and Alexander in common, in which he declared the contested point of little importance, exhorted the disputants to a speedy reconciliation, and left it to each to hold his own opinions, provided he did not disturb the outward union of the church. (Euseb. De Vit. Const. M. ii. 64, &c.) This letter was carried to Alexandria, whither Arius had returned in the meantime, by Hosius, bishop of Corduba, who was also to act as presbyter at the synod of Nicomedia. (Euseb., Hist. p. 154.) render the books of Arius, which were to be burnt, and stigmatizing the Arians with the name of Porphysn — (from Porphysn, a heathen opponent of Christianity, who had nothing to do with the Arian question). The Arians at Alexandria, however, remained in a state of insurrection, and began to make common cause with the Meletians, a sect which had likewise been condemned by the council of Nicaea, for both had to regard Alexander, and his successor Athanasius, as their common enemies.

Arius remained in Illyricum till A. D. 328, when Eusebius of Niconoeidea and his friends used their influence at the court of Constantine, to persuade the emperor that the creed of Arius did not in reality differ from that established by the council of Nicaea. In consequence of this Arius was recalled from his exile by very gracious letters from the emperor, and in A. D. 330, had an audience with Constantine, to whom he presented a confession of faith, which consisted almost entirely of the opinions of faith, which was apparently orthodox. Hereupon Alexander, bishop of Constantinople, received orders from the emperor to have a second interview with Arius and his friends. The attempt of Arius to re-establish himself at Alexandria failed notwithstanding, and in A. D. 336, he travelled to Constantinople to have a second interview with the emperor. He again presented his confession of faith, which was apparently orthodox. Hereupon Alexander, bishop of Constantinople, who had hitherto refused recognising Arius as a member of the orthodox church, received orders from the emperor to administer to Arius, on the Sunday following, the holy communion. When the day came, Arius accompanied by Eusebius and other friends, went in a sort of triumph through the streets of Constantinople to the church. On his way thither he went aside for a moment to relieve himself and at such a moment, naturally gave rise to so many strange suspicions and surmises; the corpse was found by his friends and buried. (Soz. Hist. Eccl. i. 38; Epiph. Haer. 69. 10; Rufin. Hist. Eccl. i. 13.) His sudden death in such a place and at such a moment, naturally gave rise to a number of strange suspicions and surmises; the orthodox regarded it as a direct judgment from heaven, while his friends supposed that he had been poisoned by his enemies.

Arius must have been at a very advanced age when he died, since he is called the old Arius at the time when he began his disputes with Alexander, and he was undoubtedly worn out and exhausted by the continued struggles to which his life had been exposed. He is said to have been unusually tall, pale, and thin, of a severe and gloomy appearance, though of captivating and modest manners. The excellence of his moral character seems to be sufficiently attested by the silence of his enemies to the contrary. That he was of a covetous and sensual disposition, is an opinion unsupported by any historical evidence. Besides the works already referred to in this article, Arius is said to have written songs for sailors, millers, and travellers; but no specimen or fragment of them is now extant. (Q. M. Tavarni, Storia critica della Vita di Ario, Venetiæ, 1746; Fabret. Bibl. Graec. ix. p. 214, &c.; Walch, Historiae der Ketzerzereien; and the church histories of Mosheim, Neander, and Giesseler.)

ARMINIUS. 347

ARMENIDAS or ARME'NIDES (Αρμενιδας or Αρμενιδος), a Greek author, who wrote a work on Thebes (Θεσσαλία), which is referred to by the Scholiast on Apollonius Rhodius (i. 551) and Stephanus Byzantius. (c. v. 'Αλιατρος.) But whether his work was written in prose or verse, and at what time the author lived, cannot be ascertained.

ARMENIUS (Αρμενιος or Αρμενος), one of the Argonauts, who was believed to have been a native of Rhodes or of Armenia in Thessaly, and to have settled in the country which was called after him, Armenia, in the time of Polydorus of Megara, &c. He is mentioned by Hyginus, 13. 2; Steph. Byz. c. v. 'Αρμενιος.)

ARMENIUS (Αρμενος), a Christian, who wrote in Greek an account of the martyrdom of Chrysanthus and Daria, whose contemporary he appears to have been. The Greek original has never been published, but a Latin translation is printed in Surius, Act. Sacra. v. under the 25th of October. (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. x. p. 210.)

ARMINIUS, or Hermann, "the chieftain," was the son of Sigimer, "the conqueror," and chief of the tribe of the Cherusi, who inhabited the country to the north of the Hartz mountains, now forming the south of Hanover and Brunswick. He was born in the year 18 B.C., and in his youth he led the warriors of his tribe as auxiliaries of the Roman legions in Germany (Tac. Ann. ii. 10), where he learnt the language and military discipline of Rome, and was admitted to the freedom of the city, and enrolled amongst the equites. (Vell. Pat. ii. 118.)

He appears in history at a crisis which is one of the most remarkable in the history of Europe. In the year A. D. 9, the Romans had forts along the Danube, the Rhine, on the Elbe and the Weser. Tiberius Nero had twice (Vell. Pat. ii. 107) overrun the interior of Germany, and had left Varus with three legions to complete the conquest of the country, which never seemed destined to become, like Gaul, a Roman province. But Varus was a man whose licentiousness and extortion (Dion Cass. lvi. 18; Vell. ii. 117) made the yoke of Rome intolerable to the Germans. Arminius, who was now twenty-seven years old, and had succeeded his father as chief of his tribe, persuaded the other chiefs who were with him in the camp of Varus, to join him in the attempt to free his country. He united Varus with professions of friendship, with assurances that his countrymen were pleased with the improvements of Roman civilization, and induced him to send off detachments of his troops in different directions to protect his convoys; and as these troops were separately attacked and cut to pieces, Varus gave orders for the army to march to quell what seemed an insurrection. Arminius promised to join him at a certain place with his Germans.
It was in the upper Valley of the Lippe, and then covered with the deep wood of the Teutoburger Wald. Here Arminius met him, as he had promised, but with a furious assault. (Dion Cass. lxi. 19.) The legions were in disorder, making their way through the forest, and encumbered with a heavy baggage train, when the Germans charged on all sides upon them. Night put an end to the fight, which was renewed at daybreak. But the country was almost impassable—a violent storm of wind and rain rendered it still more so—and the legions were unable to advance or retreat. Varus fell on his own sword. (Tac. Ann. i. 61.) Those who were taken alive were sacrificed at altars in the forest to the gods of the country, and the legions were cut to pieces, with the exception of a very small body, who broke through the Germans, and made their way to the Rhine.

The consternation felt at Rome is well known. (Stat. Aug. 23.) Tiberius was despatched (A. D. 10) with a veteran army to the Rhine. But Arminius had manifestly succeeded in making that river again the barrier of the Roman power.

In the year A. D. 14, Germanicus took the command of the legions, and collected his forces on the Ems to penetrate along that river into Germany. But the party of Arminius had rapidly gathered strength. He had been joined by his uncle, Inguiomer, a powerful chief who had hitherto fought for the invaders; and the popular feeling was so strong against his father-in-law, Segestes, still a partisan of the Romans, that he had been rescued only by the legions of Germanicus from a place in which he had been beset by his own tribe. It was on this occasion that the wife of Arminius fell into the hands of the Romans, and was reserved, with the infant boy to whom she was so strong against his father-in-law, Segestes, still a partisan of the Romans, that he had been rescued only by the legions of Germanicus from a place in which he had been beset by his own tribe. It was on this occasion that the wife of Arminius fell into the hands of the Romans, and was reserved, with the infant boy to whom she was surrendered. (Tac. Ann. i. 67.) As Germanicus advanced, Arminius retired before him into the forests. He at last halted on some open ground, and allowed the Romans to attack. He then gradually withdrew his men towards a wood, on the skirts of which he had concealed strong bodies of men, whose unexpected charge threw the Romans into confusion. After an obstinate struggle, Arminius remained master of the field, and Germanicus with his men was deserted by his uncle, Inguiomer, who was jealous of his glory, and joined his enemy. But he had attached himself, as the champion of German liberty, the powerful tribes of the Semones and Longobardi, and a battle was fought in which he was victorious. (Tac. Ann. ii. 17.)

These successes, however, suggested to him other objects than his country's liberty. Not contented with being the chief of a free tribe, he aimed at absolute power. His countrymen rose in arms against him, and the struggle was undecided when he fell by the hands of his own relations in the 37th year of his age, A. D. 19. (Tac. Ann. ii. 43.)

while yet a catechumen, his celebrated work against the Pagans, in seven books (Libri septem aduersus Gentes), which we still possess. The time when he wrote it, is not quite certain: some assign its composition to the years A.D. 297 and 298, but it is more probable that it was written in or shortly after the year A.D. 293, since it contains some allusions (as iv. 380) to the persecution of the Christians by Diocletian, which commenced in that year. The work is a vindication of Christianity, and the author first refutes the charges of the Pagans against the Christian religion, especially the one which was then frequently brought against it, that the sufferings and calamities of the times were only the fruits of Christianity. He then proceeds to prove, with great learning, acuteness, and eloquence, that polytheism is irreconcilable with good sense and reason, and tends to demoralize mankind. In the sixth book he describes the superiority of the Christian religion; and the last contains a justification of the Christian views respecting sacrifices, and a comparison of the Christian notions of the Deity and divine things with those of the Pagans.

In writing this work, Arnobius was evidently animated by a genuine zeal to establish the truth of Christianity, but was free from the eccentricity and enthusiasm of Tertullian. His style is plain and lucid; though animated and sometimes rhetorical, it is yet not free from harsh and barbarous expressions: he treats of his subject with calmness and dignity, and is on the whole a pleasing writer, and superior to his contemporaries. As regards his knowledge of Christianity, it is difficult to form a decided opinion, for it was either his intention to set forth only the main doctrines of Christianity against the pagan mythology, or he possessed but a limited knowledge of the Christian religion. The latter is indeed the more probable, since he wrote his work when yet a catechumen. What he says in his second book about the nature and immortality of the soul, is not in accordance with Christian views, but with those of the Gnostics, and at a later time would have been regarded as heretical. The Old Testament seems to have been altogether unknown to him, and he shows no acquaintance with the New, except so far as the history of Christ is concerned. In regard to heathen antiquity, on the other hand, its religion and modes of worship, the work exhibits most extensive and minute learning, and is one of our best sources of information respecting the religions of antiquity. It is for this reason that Vossius called him the Varro of the early Christian writers. The arrangement of his thoughts is philosophical, though not always sufficiently strict. Arnobius is a writer worthy to be studied not only by theologians, but also by philologists. He is not known to have written anything besides his book against the Gentiles; there are, however, some works which have sometimes been ascribed to him, though they manifestly belong to a later writer or writers of the same name. (See the following article.)

The first edition of Arnobius appeared at Rome in 1542 or 1547, fol., and in it the Octavius of Minucius Felix, which was edited as the eighth book. The next was edited by S. Gallina, Basel, 1546, 8vo. The most important among the subsequent editions are those of Antwerp (1562, 8vo., with Canter's notes), of F. Ursinus (Rome, 1583, 4to., reprinted with notes by Steuwechius, Antwerp, 1604, 8vo.), D. Hendidus (Paris, 1605, 8vo.), G. Elmenhorst (Hamburg, 1610, fol.), the Variorum edition (Leiden, 1651, 4to.), and that of Prior (Paris, 1666, fol.). It is also contained in the Bibliotheca Patrum, vol. iii. p. 350, &c., ed. Lugdun. and in Galandi's edition, vol. iv. p. 133, &c. The best edition of Arnobius, which contains the best notes of all the earlier commentators, is that of J. C. Orelli, Leipzig, 1816, 2 vols. 8vo., to which an appendix was published in 1817, 8vo. (Compare Baronius, ad Ann. 302; Du Pin, Nouv. Bibl. des Auteurs Eccles. i. p. 203, &c. ed. 2, Paris, 1690; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. p. 112, ed. Lond.; Bähr, Die Christl. Röm. Theol. p. 65, &c.) [L.S.]

ARNOB'BIUS, the Younger, is usually placed about A.D. 469, and is believed to have been a bishop or presbyter in Gaul. He is known to us only as the author of one or two works of very little importance, which have sometimes been attributed to Arnobius the elder. We possess under his name an allegorical commentary on the Psalms, which is inscribed to Leontius, bishop of Arles, and is printed as the eighth book. The commentary, though the notes are very brief, contains sufficient evidence that the author was a Semi Pelagian. It was first printed at Basel (1522, 4to.) together with Erasmus's commentary on Psalm ii., and was reprinted at Cologne, 1533, 8vo. A much better edition than either of these is that by L. de la Barre, Paris, 1639, 8vo., which also contains some notes by the same Arnobius on several passages of the Gospels, which had been published separately before by G. Cognant, Basel, 1543, 8vo. The commentary of Arnobius is also contained in the Bibl. Patr. (Lugdun. vol. viii.), where it is also assigned to a work entitled "Altercatio eum Serapione Aegypto," which has come down to us as the production of an anonymous writer; but his arguments are not satisfactory. (Du Pin, Nouv. Bibl. des Aut. Eccles. iii. 2, p. 219; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. p. 360, ed. Lond.; Bähr, Die Christl. Röm. Theol. p. 378.) [L.S.]

C. ARPINIUS, a Roman knight, a friend of Q. Titurius, sent to have a conference with Ambrichus, n. c. 54. (Cæs. B. G. vi. 27, &c.)

ARPXOIAI (Ἀρποξαιαί), the son of Tarigianus, was the ancestor, according to the Scythians, of the Scythian people, called Aushatan. (Herod. iv. 5, 6.)

ARRACHION (Ἀρράχιος), or Phigalos in Arcadia, a celebrated Parnassian, conquered in the Olympic games in the 52nd, 53rd and 54th Olympiads. In the last Olympiad he was unfairly killed by his antagonist, and was therefore crowned and proclaimed as conqueror, although dead. (Paus. viii. 40, § 2.) Philostratus (Imag. ii. 6) calls him Arrichion, and Africanus (ap. Euseb. Chron. p. 50) Arrichion.

ARRIBAEBUS (Ἀρριξαῖος), king or chief man of the Macedonians of Lynceus, is mentioned by Thucydides, in the eighth and ninth years of the Peloponnesian war, as in revolt against his sovereign, king Perdiccas. (Thuc. ii. 99.) It was to reduce him that Perdiccas sent for Brasidas (p. c. 424), and against him took place the unsuccessful joint expedition, in which Perdiccas deserted Brasidas, and Brasidas effected his bold and skilful who was born shortly afterwards, was associated at the time of Alexander's death, b.c. 323, and was elected king under the name of Philip.

The young Alexander, the infant son of Roxana, was of imbecile understanding, which was said to have been occasioned by a potion administered to him when a boy by the jealous Olympias. Alexander had removed Arrihaedus from Macedonia, perhaps through fear of his mother Olympias, but had not entrusted him with any civil or military command. He was at Babylon at the time of Alexander's death, n. c. 323, and was elected king under the name of Philip. The young Alexander, the infant son of Roxana, who was born shortly afterwards, was associated with him in the government. [Alexander IV., p. 122, b.]

In the following year, n. c. 322, Arrhiadeus married Eurydice [Eurydice], and was from this time completely under the direction of his wife. On their return to Macedonia, Eurydice attempted to obtain the supreme power in opposition to Polyperchon. Roxana and her infant son fled to Epirus, and Olympias induced Aeschines, king of Epirus, to invade Macedonia in order to support Polyperchon. Aeschines was successful in his undertaking: Arrihaedus and Eurydice were taken prisoners, and put to death by order of Olympias, n. c. 317. In the following year, Casander conquered Olympias, and interred the bodies of Arrihaedus and Eurydice with royal pomp at Aegae, and celebrated funeral games to their honour. (Plut. Alc. 77; Deyippus, op. Plat. Cod. 82; Arrian, op. Plat. Cod. 92; Justin, ix. 8, xii. 30; Dion. xii. 55; Pauli, i. 6, § 3, 5, §§ 3, 5, vii. 7, § 5; Athen. iv. p. 155.)

2. One of Alexander's generals, was entrusted with the conduct of Alexander's funeral to Egypt. On the murder of Perdiccas in Egypt, n. c. 321, he and Pithon were appointed regents, but through the intrigues of Eurydice, were obliged soon afterwards to resign their office at Triparadisus in Upper Syria. On the division of the provinces which was made at this place, Arrihaedus obtained the Hollespontine Phrygia. In n. c. 319, after the death of Antipater, Arrihaedus made an unsuccessful attack upon Cyzicus; and Antigonus gladly seized this pretext to require him to resign his satrapy. Arrianus, however, refused, and shut himself up in Cius. (Justin, xiii. 4; Arrian, op. Plat. Cod. 72, p. 71, s. 28, &c.; ed. Bekker; Dion. xvii. 36, 59, 51, 52, 72.)

3. One of the kings of Macedonia during the time of the anarchy, n. c. 279. (Porphyry, op. Euseb. Arrn. i. 38, p. 171.)

A'RR'IA. 1. The wife of Caeceus Paetus. When her husband was ordered by the emperor Claudius to put an end to his life, A. d. 42, and hesitated to do so, Arria stabbed herself, handed the dagger to her husband, and said, "Pactus, it does not pain me." (Plin. Ep. iii. 16; Dion Cass. ix. 16; Martial. i. 14; Zonaras, xi. 9.)

2. The daughter of the preceding, and the wife of Thamas, who was put to death by Nero, A. d. 67. (Cal. Lex. xvi. 33. 144.)

ARRIANUS.

from the similarity of his connexion with Epictetus, to that which existed between Xenophon and Socrates (Photius, 17, b. ed. Bekker, Suidas, s. v. "Athanas.") In A. D. 124, he gained the friendship of the emperor Hadrian during his stay in Greece, and he received from the emperor's own hands the broad purple, a distinction which conferred upon him not only the Roman citizenship, but the right to hold any of the great offices of state in the Roman empire. From this time Arrian assumed the praenomen Flavius. In A. D. 138, he was appointed praefect of Cappadocia, which was invaded, the year after, by the Alani or Massagetae. He defeated them in a decisive battle, and added to his reputation of a philosopher that of a brave and skilful general. (Dion Cass. xix. 15.) Under Antoninus Pius, the successor of Hadrian, Arrian was promoted to the consulsip, A. D. 146. In his later years he appears to have withdrawn from public life, and from about A. D. 150, he lived in his native town of Nicomedia, as priest of Demeter and Persephone (Phot. p. 73, b.), devoting himself entirely to study and the composition of historical works. He died at an advanced age in the reign of M. Aurelius. Dion Cassius is said to have written a life of Arrian shortly after his death, but no part of it has come down to us. (Suid. s. v. "Arrian.")

Arrian was one of the most active and best writers of his time. He seems to have perceived from the commencement of his literary career a resemblance between his own relation to Epictetus and that of Xenophon to Socrates; it was his endeavour for a long time to carry out that resemblance, and to be to Epictetus what Xenophon had been to Socrates. With this view he published 1. the philosophical lectures of his master (Διαπείραται Ἐπικτητοῦ) in eight books (Phot. p. 17, b.), the first half of which is still extant. They were first printed by Trincavelli, 1535, and afterwards together with the Encheiridion of Epictetus and Simplicius's commentary, with a Latin translation, by H. Wolf, Basel, 1560. The best editions are in Schwegler's Ἐπιτείκες Φιλοσοφικὰ Μνημεία, vol. iii., and in Cornes' Περγέρα Εἰκονομία, book vii. 11. His familiar conversations with Epictetus ('Ἐπικτητὸν συνέχεια,' in twelve books, (Phot. L. c.) This work is lost with the exception of a few fragments preserved in Stobaeus. 111. An abstract of the practical philosophy of Epictetus ('Ὑπερακμονίῳ Ἐπικτῆρῳ'), which is still extant. This celebrated work, which seems to have been regarded even in antiquity as a suitable manual of practical philosophy, maintained its authority for many centuries, both with Christians and Pagans. About A. D. 550, Simplicius wrote a commentary upon it, and two Christian writers, Nusius and an anonymous author wrote paraphrases of it, adapted for Christians, in the first half of the fifth century of our era. The Encheiridion was first published in a Latin translation by Politianus, Rome, 1493, and in 1496, by Beroaldus, at Bologna. The Greek original, with the commentary of Simplicius, appeared first at Venice, 1528, 4to. This edition was soon followed by numerous others, as the work was gradually regarded and used as a school book. The best among the subsequent editions are those of Halonder (Nürnberg, 1529, 8vo.), Trincavelli (Venice, 1535, 8vo.), Nageorgius (Strassburg, 1554, 8vo.), Berkel (Leyden, 1670, 8vo.), Schroeder (Frankfurt, 1723, 8vo.), and Heyne (Dresden and Leipziger, 1756 and 1776). The best among the recent editions are those of Schweighäuser and Coroas, in the collections above referred to. In connexion with Epictetus, we may also mention, IV. A life of this philosopher by Arrian, which is now lost. Although the greater part of these philosophical works of Arrian has perished, yet the portion still extant, especially the διαπειράται, is the best and most perfect system of the ethical views of the Stoics, that has come down to us. In the case of the διαπειράται, Arrian is only the editor, and his conscientiousness in preserving his master's statements and expressions is so great, that he even retains historical inaccuracies which Epictetus had fallen into, and which Arrian himself was well aware of. Another work in which Arrian likewise followed Xenophon as his guide is, V. A treatise on the chase (Χαιρετικαὶ). It is so closely connected with the treatise of Xenophon on the same subject, that not only is its style an imitation of the latter's, but it forms a kind of supplement to Xenophon's work, in as much as he treats only of such points as he found omitted in Xenophon. It was first published with a Latin translation by L. Holstenius (Paris, 1644, 4to.); it is also contained in Zeune's Oeupus minor of Xenophon, and in Schneider's edition of Xenophon, vol. vi. The most important among the works in which he took Xenophon as his model is, VI. His account of the Asiatic expedition of Alexander (Ἰστορίαν ἀδαμασίας Ἀλεξάνδρου, or simply Ἀνθέας Ἀλεξάνδρου), in seven books, which we possess complete, with the exception of a gap in the 12th chapter of the seventh book, which unfortunately exists in all the MSS. This great work reminds the reader of Xenophon's Anabasis, not only by its title, but also by the ease and clearness of its style. The work is not, indeed, equal to the Anabasis in point of composition: it does not possess either the thorough equality and noble simplicity, or the vividness of Xenophon; but Arrian is, nevertheless, in this work one of the most excellent writers of his time, above which he is raised by his simplicity and his unbiased judgment. Great as his merits thus are, he has preserved his Excellences as an historical critic. His Anabasis is based upon the most trustworthy historians among the contemporaries of Alexander, whose works are lost, such as Polioen, the son of Lagus, Aristobulus, the son of Aristobulus, which two he chiefly followed, Diodotus of Erythrae, Eumenes of Cardia, Nearchus of Crete, and Megasthenes; and his sound judgment as to who deserved credit, justly led him to reject the accounts of such authors as Onesicritus, Callisthenes, and others. No one at all acquainted with this work of Arrian can refuse his assent to the opinion of Photius (p. 75, a.; comp. Lucian, Λειτ. 2), that Arrian was the best among the numerous historians of Alexander. The work begins with the death of Philip, and after giving a brief account of the occurrences which followed that event, he proceeds in the eleventh chapter to relate the history of that gigantic expedition, which he continues down to the death of Alexander. One of the great merits of the work, independent of those already mentioned, is the clearness and distinctness with which he describes all military movements and operations, the drawing up of the armies for battle, and the conduct of battles and sieges. In all these respects the Anabasis is a masterly production, and Arrian shows that he himself possessed a thorough practical knowledge of military affairs. He seldom introduces speeches, but wherever he does, he shows a profound knowledge of man; and the speech of Alexander to his rebellious soldiers and the reply of Coenus (v. 25, &c.), as well as some other speeches, are masterly specimens of oratory. Everything, moreover, which is not necessary to make his narrative clear, is carefully avoided, and it is probably owing to this desire to omit everything superfluous in the course of his narrative, that we are indebted for his separate work, VII. On India (ινδηκα) or τα ινδικα), which may be regarded as a continuation of the Anabasis, and has sometimes been considered as the eighth book of it, although Arrian himself speaks of it as a distinct work. It is usually printed at the end of the Anabasis, and was undoubtedly written immediately after it. It is a curious fact, that the Indica is written in the Ionic dialect, a circumstance which has been accounted for by various suppositions, the most probable among which is, that Arrian in this point imitated Ctesias of Cnidus, whose work on the same subject he wished to supersede by a more trustworthy and correct account. The first part of Arrian's Indica contains a very excellent description of the interior of India, in which he took Megasthenes and Stratothenes as his guides. Then follows a most accurate description of the whole coast from the mouth of the Indus to the Persian gulf, which is based entirely upon the Περιπλους of Nearchus the Cretan, and the book concludes with proofs, that further south the earth is uninhabitable, on account of the great heat. Of Arrian's Anabasis and India two Latin translations, the one by C. Valgulius (without date or place), and the other by B. Facius (Fiumar. 1508) appeared before the Greek text was printed; and the editio princeps of the original is that by Trincavelli, Venice, 1535, 8vo.

Among the subsequent editions we mention only those of Gerbel (Strassb. 1539, 8vo.), H. Stephens (Paris, 1575, 8vo.), Blanccard (Amsterd. 1688, 8vo.), J. Gronovius, who availed himself of several Augsburg and Italian MSS. (Leyden, 1704, fol.), K. A. Schmidt, with the notes of G. Raphelides (Amsterd., 1757, 5vo.) and Schneider, who published the Anabasis and Indica separately, the former at Leipzig, 1798, 8vo., and the latter at Halle, 1798, 8vo. The best modern editions of the Anabasis are those of J. E. Ellendt (Regimini, 1832, 2 vols. 8vo.) and of C. W. Krüger. (Berlin, 1835, vol. i., which contains the text and various readings.)

All the works we have hitherto mentioned seem to have been written by Arrian previous to his government of Cappadocia. During this whole period, he appears to have been unable to get rid of the idea that he must imitate some one or another of the more ancient writers of Greece. But from this time forward, he shews a more independent spirit, and throws off the shackles under which he had laboured hitherto. During his government of Cappadocia, and before the outbreak of the war against the Alani, about A. D. 137, he dedicated to the emperor Hadrian—VIII. his description of a voyage round the coasts of the Euxine (περιπλαν του ουξιαν), which had undoubtedly been made by Arrian himself. The starting-point is Trapezus, whence he proceeds to Dioscurias, the Cimmerian and Tanacian Bosporus, and Byzantium. This Periplos has come down to us together with two other works of a similar kind, the one a Periplos of the Erythraean, and the other a Periplos of the Euxine and the Palus Maeotis. Both these works also bear the name of Arrian, but they belong undoubtedly to a later period. These Peripluses were first printed, with other geographical works of a similar kind, by S. Gelenius, Bazel, 1533, and somewhat better by Stuck, Geneva, 1577. They are also contained in the collection of the minor works of Arrian by Blancard (Amsterd. 1683 and 1750). The best editions are in Hudson's Geographi Minores, vol. i., and in Gall's and Hoffmann's collections of the minor Geographers.

It seems to have been about the same time that Arrian wrote, IX. a work on Tactics (Αγορας τασκοων ον τεχνης τασκισ), which however has no merits at all. (Saint Croix, Examen crit. des Anciens Historiens d'Alexandre le Grand, Paris, 1804, p. 88, &c.; Ellendt, De Arri-

ARRI'A'NUS, a Roman jurisconsult, of uncertain date. He probably lived under Trajan, and, according to the conjecture of Grotius, is perhaps the same person with the orator Arrianus, who corresponded with the younger Pliny. (Plin. Ep. i. 2, ii. 11, 12, iv. 6, vii. 21.) He may also possibly be identical with the Arrianus Severus, praefectus aerearii, whose opinion concerning a constitution, in the Digest in an extract from Ulpian. (Dig. 49. tit. 14. s. 42.) He wrote a treatise de Industriis, of which the second book is quoted in the Digest in an extract from Ulpius. (Dig. 5. tit. 3. s. 11.) In that extract, Proculus, who lived under Tiberius, is mentioned in such a manner, that he might be supposed to have written after Arrianus. There is no direct extract from Arrianus in the Digest, though he is several times mentioned. (Majansius, vol. ii. p. 219; Zimmerm., Rom. Recht-Geschichte, i. § 90.) [T. G. O.]

ARRIBAS, ARRIBAS, ARYMBAS, or ΑΡΡΙΒΑΣ, ΑΡΥΜΒΑΣ (Ἄρυμβας, Ἀρυμβάς, or Αρυμβάς), a descendant of Achilles, and one of the early kings of the Molossians in Epirus. When he came to the possession of the throne, he was yet very young, and being the last surviving member of the royal family, his education was conducted with great care, and he was sent to Athens with this view. On his return he displayed so much wisdom that he won the affection and admiration of his people. He framed for them a code of laws, and established a regular constitution, with a senate and annual magistrates. The accounts of this king cannot, of course, be received as historical, and he must be looked upon as one of the mythical ancestors of the royal house of the Molossians, to whom they ascribed the foundation of their political institutions. ARRIUS. 1. Q. Arrius, praetor, b. c. 72, defeated Crixus, the leader of the runaway slaves, and killed 20,000 of his men, but was afterwards conquered by Spartacus. (Liv. Epit. 95.) In b. c. 71, Arrius was to have succeeded Verres as propraetor in Sicily (Cic. Verr. ii. 13, iv. 20; Pseudo-Acro. in Cic. Div. p. 101, ed. Orelli), but died on his way to Sicily. (Schol. Gronov. in Cic. Div. p. 583, ed. Orelli.) Cicero ( Brut. 69) says, that Arrius was of low birth, and without learning or talent, but rose to honour by his acquisition.

2. Q. Arrius, a son of the preceding, was an unsuccessful candidate for the consuls, b. c. 59. (Cic. ad Att. ii. 5, 7.) He was an intimate friend of Cicero (in Vatini, 12, pro Mil. 17); but Cicero during his exile complains bitterly of the conduct of Arrius. (Ad Qu. fr. i. 3.)

3. C. Arrius, a neighbour of Cicero at Formiae, who honoured Cicero with more of his company than was convenient to him, b. c. 59. (Cic. ad Att. ii. 14, 15.)

ARRUNTUS, a physician at Rome, who lived probably about the beginning or middle of the first century after Christ, and is mentioned by Pliny (H. N. xxix. 6) as having gained by his practice the annual income of 250,000 sesterces (about 1953. 2s. 6d.). This may give us some notion of the fortunes made by physicians at Rome about the beginning of the empire. [W. A. G.]

ARRUNTUS. 1. Arruntius, described by the trimvir, and killed, b. c. 43. His son escaped, but perished at sea, and his wife killed herself by voluntary starvation, when she heard of the death of her son. (Appian, B. C. iv. 21.)

2. Arruntius, was also proscribed with the trimvirs in b. c. 43, but escaped to Pompey, and was restored to the state together with Pompey. (Appian, B. C. iv. 46; Vell. Pat. ii. 77.) This is probably the same Arruntius who commanded the left wing of the fleet of Octavianus at the battle of Actium, b. c. 31. (Vell. Pat. ii. 85; comp. Plut. Ant. 66.) There was a L. Arruntius, consul in b. c. 22 (Dion Cass. liv. 1), who appears to be the same person as the one mentioned above, and may perhaps be the same as the L. Arruntius, the friend of Trebatius, whom Cicero mentions (ad Fam. vii. 18) in b. c. 55.

3. L. Arruntius, son of the preceding, consul in a. d. 6. Augustus was said to have declared in his last illness, that Arruntius was not unworthy of the empire, and would have boldness enough to seize it, if an opportunity presented. This, as well as his riches, talents, and reputation, rendered him an object of suspicion to Tiberius. In a. d. 15, when the Tiber had flooded a great part of the city, he was appointed to take measures to restrain it within its bed, and he consulted the senate on the subject. The province of Spain had been assigned to him, but Tiberius, through jealousy, kept him at Rome ten years after his appointment, and obliged him to govern the province by his legates. He was accused on one occasion by Arsusius and Sanquinius, but was acquitted, and his accusers punished. He was subsequently charged in a. d. 57, as an accomplice in the crimes of Albucilla; and though his friends wished him to delay his death, as an accomplice, he could not recover, he refused to listen to their advice, as he knew the wickedness of Caligula, who would succeed to the empire, and accordingly put himself to death by opening his veins. (Tac. Ann. i. 8, 13, 76, 79, vii. 27, Hist. ii. 65, Ann. vi. 5, 7, 47, 48; Dion Cass. iv. 23, iviii. 27.)

It was either this Arruntius or his father, in all probability, who wrote a history of the first Punic war, in which he imitated the style of Sallust. (Senec. Epist. 114.)

ARSACES. (Ἀρσάκης) the name of the founder of the Parthian empire, which was also borne by all his successors, who were hence called the Arsacidæ. Pott (Elgymatographische Forschungen, ii. p. 172) supposes that it signifies the “ Shah or King of the Aròi,” but it occurs as a Persian name long before the time of the Parthian kings. Aeschylus (Pers. 557) speaks of an Arsaces, who perished in the expedition of Xerxes against Greece; and Ctesias (Pers. cc. 49, 53, 57, ed. Lion) says, that Arsaces was the original name of Artaxerxes Mnemon.

ARSACES I. is variously represented by the ancient writers as a Scythian, a Bactrian, or a Parthian. (Strab. xii. p. 519; Arrian, Op. Phot. Cod. 56, p. 17, ed. Beckter; Herod. vi. 9; Moses Chor. i. 7.) Justin (xiii. 4) says, that he was of uncertain origin. He seems however to have been of the Scythian race, and to have come from the neighbourhood of the Ochus, as Strabo says (c. c.), that he was accompanied in his undertaking by the Parni Daei, who had migrated from the great race of the Scythian Daei, dwelling above the Palus Maeoticus, and who had settled near the Ochus. But from whatever country the Parthians may have come, they are represented by almost all ancient writers as Scythians. (Curt. vi. 2; Justin, xli. 1; Plut. Crass. 24; Isidor. Orby. ix. 2.) Arsaces, who was a man of approved valour, and was accustomed to live by robbery and plunder, invaded Parthia with his band of robbers, defeated Andragoras, the governor of the country, and obtained the royal power. This is the account given by Justin (c. c.), which is in itself natural and probable, but different from the common one which is taken from Arrian. According to Arrian (ap. Phot. Cod. 68), there were two brothers, Arsaces and Tiridates, the descendants of Arsaces, the son of Phriapatius. These were the satraps of Parthia in the reign of Antiochus II., attempted to violate Tiridates, but was slain by him and his brother Arsaces, who induced the Parthians in consequence to revolt from the Syrians. The account of Arrian in Synecclus (p. 284) is again different from the preceding one preserved by Photius; but it is impossible to determine which has given us the account of Antiochus II. most faithfully. According to Synecclus, Arrian stated that the two brothers Arsaces and Tiridates, who were descended from Artaxerxes, the king of the Persians, were satraps of Bactria at the same time as the Macedonian Agathocles governed Persia (by which he means Parthia) as Eparch. Agathocles had an unnatural passion for Tiridates, and was slain by the two brothers. Arsaces then became king, reigned two years, and was succeeded by his brother Tiridates, who reigned 37 years.

The time, at which the revolt of Arsaces took place, is also uncertain. Appian (Syr. 63) places it at the death of Antiochus II., and others in the reign of his successor, Seleucus Callinicus. According to the statement of Arrian quoted above, the revolt commenced in the reign of Antiochus II., which is in accordance with the date given by Eusebius, who fixes it at B.C. 250, and which is also supported by other authorities. (Clinton, F. H. vol. iii, sub anno 250.) Justin (xli. 4, 5), who is followed in the main by Ammianus Marcellinus (xxiii. 6), ascribes to Arsaces I. many events, which probably belong to his successor. According to his account Arsaces first conquered Hyrcania, and then prepared to make war upon the Bactrian and Syrian kings. He concluded, however, a peace with Theodotus, king of Bactria, and defeated Seleucus Callinicus, the successor of Antiochus II., in a great battle, the anniversary of which was ever after observed by the Parthians, as the commencement of their liberty. According to Poesidonus (ap. Athen. iv. p. 153, a.), Seleucus was taken prisoner in a second expedition which he made against the Parthians, and detained in captivity by Arsaces for many years. After these events Arsaces devoted himself to the internal organization of his kingdom, built a city, called Dara, on the mountain Zapaortenon, and died in a mature old age. This account is directly opposed to the one given by Arrian, already referred to (ap. Synecld. 1. c.), according to which Arsaces was killed after a reign of two years and was succeeded by his brother. Arrian has evidently confounded Arsaces I. and II., when he says that the former was succeeded by his son. This statement we must refer to Arsaces II.

ARSACES II., Tiridates, reigned, as we have already seen, 37 years, and is probably the king who defeated Seleucus.

ARSACES III., Artabanus I., the son of the preceding, had to resist Antiochus III. (the Great), who invaded his dominions about B.C. 212. Antiochus at first met with some success, but was unable to subdue his country, and at length made peace with him, and recognized him as king. (Polyb. x. 27—31; Justin, xii. 5.)

The reverse of the annexed coin represents a Parthian seated, and bears the inscription ΒΑΣΙΛΕΩΣ ΜΕΓΑΛΟΥ ΑΡΣΑΚΟΥ.°

ARSACES IV., Phriapatius, son of the preceding, reigned 15 years, and left three sons, Phnates, Mithridates, and Artabanus. (Justin, xlii. 5, xlii.)

ARSACES V., Phnates I., subdued the Mordi, and, though he had many sons, left the kingdom to his brother Mithridates. (Justin, xlii. 5.) The reverse of the annexed coin has the inscription ΒΑΣΙΛΕΩΣ ΒΑΣΙΛΕΩΝ ΜΕΓΑΛΟΥ ΑΡΣΑΚΟΥ ΕΠΙΦΑΝΟΥΣ.

Eckhel, with more probability, assigns this coin to Arsaces VI., who may have taken the title of "king of kings," on account of his numerous victories.

ARSACES VI., Mithridates I., son of Arsaces IV., whom Orosius (v. 4) rightly calls the sixth from Arsaces I., a man of distinguished bravery, greatly extended the Parthian empire. He conquered Eucratides, the king of Bactria, and deprived him of many of his provinces. He is said even to have penetrated into India and to have subdued all the people between the Hydaspes and the Indus. He conquered the Medes and Elymacans, who had revolted from the Syrians, and his empire extended at least from the Hindu Caucasus to the Euphrates. Demetrius Niactor, king of Syria, marched against Mithridates; he was at first successful, but was afterwards taken prisoner in B.C. 138. Mithridates, however, treated him with re-

Bpcct, and gave him his daughter Rhodogune in marriage; but the marriage appears not to have been solemnized till the accession of his son Phraates II. Mithridates died during the captivity of Demetrius, between B. c. 138 and 130. He is described as a just and upright prince, who did not give way to pride and luxury. He introduced among his people the best laws and usages, which he found among the nations he had conquered. (Justin, xlii. 4; Dio. xvi. 9; 1 Macrob. c. 14; Dion. Euc. p. 597, ed. Wess.) The reverse of the annexed coin has the inscription BAΣΙΛΕΩΣ ΜΕΓΑΛΟΥ ΑΡΣΑΚΟΥ ΘΕΟΠΑΤΟΡΟΣ ΝΙΚΑΤΟΡΟΣ.

ARSACES VII., PHRAATES II., the son of the preceding, was attacked by Antiochus VII. (Sidetes), who defeated Phraates in three great battles, but was at length conquered by him, and lost his life in battle, B. c. 128. [See p. 199.] Phraates soon met with the same fate. The Scythisans, who had been invited by Antiochus to assist him against Phraates, did not arrive till after the fall of the former; but in the battle which followed, the Greeks whom Phraates had taken in the war against Antiochus, and whom he now kept in his service, deserted from him, and revenged the ill-treatment they had suffered, by the death of Phraates and the destruction of his army. (Justin, xxxviii. 10, xlii. 1.) The reverse of the annexed coin has the inscription BAΣΙΛΕΩΣ ΜΕΓΑΛΟΥ ΑΡΣΑΚΟΥ ΘΕΟΠΑΤΟΡΟΣ ΝΙΚΑΤΟΡΟΣ.

ARSACES VIII., ARTAXANUS II., the youngest brother of Arscases VI., and the youngest son of Arscases IV., and consequently the uncle of the preceding, fell in battle against the Thorgarri or Tochari, apparently after a short reign. (Justin, xlii. 2.)

ARSACES IX., MITHRIDATES II., the son of the preceding, prosecuted many wars with success, and added many nations to the Parthian empire, whence he obtained the surname of Great. He defeated the Scythisans in several battles, and also carried on war against Artavasdes, king of Armenia. It was in his reign that the Romans first had any official communication with Parthia. Mithridates sent an ambassador, Orbobazus, to Sulla, who had come into Asia B. c. 92, in order to restore Aristobuluses I. to Cappadocia, and requested alliance with the Romans, which seems to have been granted. (Justin, xlii. 2; Plut. Sulla, 5.)

has confounded this king with Mithridates III., i.e. Arscases XIX.

ARSACES X., MNASCRES? The successor of Arscases IX. is not known. Vaillant conjectures that it was the Mnascrese mentioned by Lucian (Macrob. 10), who lived to the age of ninety-six; but this is quite uncertain.

ARSACES XI., SANAPROCES, as he is called on coins. Philemon calls him Sinatriuces; Appian, Sintrinices; and Lucian, Sinatrocles. He had lived as an exile among the Scythian people called Sacaranes, and was placed by them upon the throne of Parthia, when he was already eighty years of age. He reigned seven years, and died while Lucullus was engaged in the war against Tigranes, about B. c. 70. (Lucian, Macrob. 15; Plut. Philem. p. 34, ed. Bekker; Appian, Mithr. 104.)

ARSACES XII., PHRAATES III., surnamed Osoe (Philegon, l.c.), the son of the preceding. Mithridates of Pontus and Tigranes applied to Phraates for assistance in their war against the Romans, although Phraates was at enmity with Tigranes, because he had deprived the Parthian empire of Nimis and part of Mesopotamia. Among the fragments of Sallust (Hist. lib. iv.) we have a letter purporting to be written by Mithridates to Phraates on this occasion. Lucullus, as soon as he heard of this embassy, also sent one to Phraates, who dismissed both with fair promises, but according to Dion Cassius, concluded an alliance with the Romans. He did not however send any assistance to the Romans, and eventually remained neutral. (Men. mun. p. 224, p. 239, ed. Bekker; Dion. Cass. xxxvi. 1, 3, comp. 6; Appian, Mithr. 87; Plut. Lucull. 30.) When Pompey succeeded Lucullus in the command, B. c. 66, he renewed the alliance with Phraates, to whose court meantime the youngest son of Tigranes, also called Tigranes, had fled after the murder of his two brothers by their father. Phraates gave the young Tigranes his daughter in marriage, and was induced by his son-in-law to invade Armenia. He advanced as far as Artaxata, and then returned to Parthia, leaving his son-in-law to besiege the city. As soon as he had left Armenia, Tigranes attacked his son and defeated him in battle. The young Tigranes then fled to his grandfather Mithridates, and afterwards to Pompey, whom he found the former was unable to assist him. The young Tigranes conducted Pompey against his father, who surrendered on his approach. Pompey then attempted to reconcile the father and the son, and promised the latter the sovereignty of Sophanene; but as he shortly after offended Pompey, he was thrown into chains, and reserved for his triumph. When Phraates heard of this, he sent to the Roman general to demand the young man as his son-in-law, and to propose that the Euphrates should be the boundary between the Roman and Parthian dominions. But Pompey merely replied, that Tigranes was nearer to his father than his father-in-law, and that he could determine the boundary in accordance with what was just. (Dion Cass. xxxvi. 28, 34—36; Plut. Pompey 33; Appian, Syr. 104, 105.) Matters now began to assume a threatening aspect between Phraates and Pompey, who had deeply injured the former by refusing to give him his usual title of "king of kings." But although Phraates marched into Armenia, and sent ambassadors to Pompey to bring many charges against him, and Tigranes, the Roman general judged it more prudent not to enter into war with the Parthians, alleging as reasons for declining to do so, that the Roman people had not approved him for this duty, and that Mithridates, still in arms. (Dion Cass. xxi. 6, 7; Plut. Pompe. 38, 39.) Phraates was murdered soon afterwards by his two sons, Mithridates and Orodès. (Dion Cass. xxix. 56.)

ARSACES XIII., MITHRIDATES III., the son of the preceding, succeeded his father apparently during the Armenian war. On his return from Armenia, Mithridates was expelled from the throne, on account of his cruelty, by the Parthian senate, as it is called, and was succeeded by his brother Orodes. Orodes appears to have given Medin to Mithridates, but to have taken it from him again, whereon Mithridates applied to the Roman general, Gabinius, in Syria, b. c. 55, who promised to restore him to Parthia, but soon after relinquished his design in consequence of having received a great sum from Ptolemy to place him upon the throne of Egypt. Mithridates, however, seems to have raised some troops; for he subsequently obtained possession of Babylon, where, on sustaining a long siege, he surrendered himself to his brother, and was immediately put to death by his orders. (Justin, xiii. 4. Dion Cass. xxi. 55; Appian, Syr. 51; Joseph. B. J. i. 8, 7.)

ARSACES XIV., ORODES I., the brother of the preceding, was the Parthian king, whose general Surenas defeated Cæsus and the Romans, in b. c. 53. (Cæsus.) The death of Cæsus and the destruction of the Roman army spread universal alarm through the eastern provinces of the Roman empire. The Parthians, being apprised by Surenas of the Parthian money, and were immediately put to death by his orders. (Justin, xiii. 4. Dion Cass. xxi. 55; Appian, Syr. 51; Joseph. B. J. i. 8, 7.)

In the following year, b. c. 56, Orodes again invaded Syria with a still larger army, but was completely defeated in the district called Cyrhestes. Pacorus himself fell in the battle, which was fought on the 9th of June, the very day on which Cæsus had fallen, fifteen years before. (Dion Cass. xlvii. 24-41; Vell. Pat. ii. 76; Liv. Epit. 127; Flor. iv. 9; Plut. Anton. c. 33; Appian, B. C. vi. 65.) In the following year, b. c. 56, Pacorus again invaded Syria with a still larger army, but was completely defeated in the district called Cyrhestes. Pacorus himself fell in the battle, which was fought on the 9th of June, the very day on which Cæsus had fallen, fifteen years before. (Dion Cass. xlvii. 24-41; Vell. Pat. ii. 76; Liv. Epit. 127; Flor. iv. 9; Plut. Anton. c. 33; Appian, B. C. vi. 65.) This defeat was a severe blow to the Parthian monarchy, and was deeply felt by the aged king, Orodes. For many days he refused to take food, and did not utter a word; and when at length he spoke, he did nothing but call upon the name of his dear son Pacorus. Weighed down by grief and age, he shortly after surrendered the crown to his son, Phraates, during his life-time. (Justin, l. c.; Dion Cass. xliii. 23.)

and among the rest Monaeses, who was one of the most distinguished men in Parthia. At the instigation of Monaeses, Antony resolved to invade Parthia, and promised Monaeses the kingdom. Phraates, alarmed at this, induced Monaeses to return to him; but Antony notwithstanding persevered in his intention of invading Parthia. It was not, however, till late in the year (a. c. 38) that he commenced his march, as he was unable to tear himself away from Cleopatra. The expedition was a perfect failure; he was deceived by the Armenian king, Artavasdes, and was induced by him to invade Media, where he laid siege to Parnasp or Prata. His legate, Statianus, meantime was cut off with 10,000 Romans; and Antony, finding that he was unable to take the town, was at length obliged to raise the siege and retire from the country. In his retreat through Media and Armenia he lost a great number of men, and with great difficulty reached the Araxes with a part of his troops. (Dion Cass. xlix. 25—31; Plut. Ant. cc. 37—51; Suid. xii. p. 523, &c.; Liv. Epit. 130.)

He was driving the civil war soon afterwards between Antony and Octavianus compelled the former to give up his intention of again invading Parthia. He formed, however, an alliance with the king of Media against the Parthians, and promised Monaeses the kingdom. At the instigation of Monaeses to return to him; but Antony notwithstanding persevered in his intention of invading Parthia. It was not, however, till late in the year (a. c. 38) that he commenced his march, as he was unable to tear himself away from Cleopatra. The expedition was a perfect failure; he was deceived by the Armenian king, Artavasdes, and was induced by him to invade Media, where he laid siege to Parnasp or Prata. His legate, Statianus, meantime was cut off with 10,000 Romans; and Antony, finding that he was unable to take the town, was at length obliged to raise the siege and retire from the country. In his retreat through Media and Armenia he lost a great number of men, and with great difficulty reached the Araxes with a part of his troops. (Dion Cass. xlix. 25—31; Plut. Ant. cc. 37—51; Suid. xii. p. 523, &c.; Liv. Epit. 130.)

The breaking out of the civil war soon afterwards between Antony and Octavianus compelled the former to give up his intention of again invading Parthia. He formed, however, an alliance with the king of Media against the Parthians, and gave to the former part of Armenia which had been recently conquered. But as soon as Antony had withdrawn his troops in order to oppose Octavianus, the Parthian king overran both Media and Armenia, and placed upon the Armenian throne Artaxias, the son of Artavasdes, whom Antony had deposed. (Dion Cass. xlix. 44.)

Meanwhile the cruelties of Phraates had produced a rebellion against him. He was driven out of the country, and Tiridates proclaimed king in his stead. Phraates, however, was soon restored by the Scythians, and Tiridates fled to Augustus, carrying with him the youngest son of Phraates. Hereupon Phraates sent an embassy to Rome to demand the restoration of his son and Tiridates. Augustus, however, refused to surrender the latter; but he sent back his son to Phraates, on condition of his surrendering the Roman standards and prisoners taken in the war with Crassus and Antony. They were not, however, given up till three years afterwards (a. c. 29), when the visit of Augustus to the east appears to have alarmed the Parthian king. The restoration caused universal joy at Rome, and was celebrated not only by the poets, but by festivals, the erection of a triumphal arch and temple, and other monuments. Coins also were struck to commemorate the event, on one of which we find the inscription

SIGNIS RICPETIS. (Dion Cass. li. 18, lii. 35, liv. 3; Justin, xlii. 5; Suet. Aug. 21; Hor. Epist. i. 18, 56; Carne. iv. 15, 6; Ovid, Trist. i. 1. 226; Fast. vii. 467, Ar. Am. i. 179, &c.; Propert. ii. 10, iii. 4, iii. 5, 49, iv. 6, 79; Eckhel, vi. pp. 94—97.)

Phraates also sent to Augustus as hostages his four sons, with their wives and children, who were carried to Rome. According to some accounts he delivered them up to Augustus, not through fear of the Roman power, but lest the Parthians should appoint any of them king in his stead, or according to others, through the influence of his Italian wife, Thermusa, by whom he had five sons.

Phraates. (Tac. Ann. ii. 1; Joseph. Ant. xviii. 2. § 4; Suid. xvi. p. 748.)

In a. d. 2, Phraates took possession of Armenia, and expelled Artavasdes, who had been appointed king by Augustus, but was compelled soon after to give its up again. (Dion Cass. iv. 11; Vell. ii. 101; Tac. Ann. ii. 4.) He was shortly afterwards poisoned by his wife Thermusa, and his son Phraates. (Joseph. I. c.)

The coin given under Arsaces XIV. is assigned by most modern writers to this king.

Arsaces XVI. Phraates regained only a short time, as the murder of his father and the report that he committed incest with his mother made him hated by his subjects, who rose in rebellion against him and expelled him from the throne. The Parthian nobles then elected as king Orodus, who was of the family of the Arsacidae. (Joseph. I. c.)

Arsaces XVII. Orodus I., also reigned only a short time, as he was killed by the Parthians on account of his cruelty. Upon his death the Parthians applied to the Romans for Voonones, one of the sons of Phraates IV., who was accordingly granted to them. (Joseph. I. c.; Tac. Ann. ii. 14.)

Arsaces XVIII. Voonones I., the son of Phraates IV., was not more liked by his subjects than his two immediate predecessors. His long residence at Rome had rendered him more a Roman than a Parthian, and his foreign habits and manners produced general dislike among his subjects. They therefore invited Artabanus, king of Media, who also belonged to the family of the Arsacidae, to take possession of the kingdom. Artabanus was at first defeated, but afterwards drove Voonones out of Parthia, who then took refuge in Armenia, of which he was chosen king. But, threatened by Artabanus, he soon fled into Syria, in which province the Roman governor, Creticus Sianus, allowed him to reside with the title of king. (A. d. 16.) Two years afterwards he was removed by Germanicus to Pompeipolis in Cilicia, partly at the request of Artabanus, who begged that he might not be allowed to reside in Syria, and partly because Germanicus wished to put an affront upon Piso, with whom Voonones was very intimate. In the following year (A. d. 19) Voonones attempted to escape from Pompeipolis, intending to fly into Scythia; but he was overtaken on the banks of the river Pyramus, and shortly after put to death. According to Suetonius, he was put to death by order of Tiberius on account of his great wealth. (Joseph. I. c.; Tac. Ann. ii. 1—4, 56, 58, 68; Suet. Tiber. c. 49.)

Arsaces XIX. Artabanus III., obtained the Parthian kingdom on the expulsion of Voonones in A. d. 16. The possession of Armenia was the great cause of contention between him and the Romans; but during the life-time of Germanicus, Artabanus did not attempt to seize the country. Germanicus, on his arrival in Armenia in A. d. 14, recognized as king Zenon, the son of Polemon, whom the Armenians wished to have as their ruler, and who resigned under the name of Artaxias III.; and about the same time, Artabanus sent an embassy to Germanicus to renew the alliance with the Romans. (Tac. Ann. ii. 56, 58.)

After the death of Germanicus, Artabanus began to treat the Romans with contempt, placed Arsaces, one of his sons, over Armenia, and sent three embassies to Syria to demand the treasures which Voonones had carried with him out of Parthia. He also oppressed his subjects, till at length two of the chief men among the Parthians, Sin-cases, and the eunuch, Abuts, despatched an to Tiberius in A. D. 35, to beg him to and induced Mithridates and his brother Phars-and Phraates IV. (Tac. Ann. xi. 10), although had resigned, merely because he refused to assist him

Vologeses, he invaded Armenia, took

the throne on the death of Gotarzes, at which time

was only seventeen years of age. Nero, however,

and the Romans; for Vologeses could not endure

as hostages the noblest of the Arsacidae;

and Ummidius to conclude peace with the Romans

was seated on the kingdom those who were for the Romans and gave as hostages the noblest of the Arsacidae;

which he was induced to do, either that he might himself shortly afterwards, about A. D. 50. (Tac.

was deserted from his design by Vibilius Marsus,

the governor of Syria. He defeated his brother

Mais, who had repented of his resignation, and attempted to recover the throne; but his successes led him to treat his subjects with haughtiness, who accordingly put him to death while he het was hunting, A. D. 47. His death occasioned disputes for the crown, which was finally obtained

by Gotarzes; but as he also governed with cruelty,

the Parthians secretly applied to the emperor

Claudius, to beg him to send them from Rome

Meherdates, the grandson of Phraates IV.

Complied with their request, and commanded the governor of Syria to assist Meherdates. Through the treachery of Abgarus, king of Edessa, the hopes of Meherdates were ruined; he was defeated in battle, and taken prisoner by Gotarzes, who died

himself shortly afterwards, about A. D. 50. (Tac.

ARSACES XXII., VONONES II., succeeded

the throne on the death of Gotarzes, at which time he was satrap of Media. His reign was short

(Tac. Ann. xii. 14), and he was succeeded by

ARSACES XXIII., VOLEGOSES I., the son of

Vonones II., by a Greek concubine, according to Tacitus (Ann. xii. 14, 44); but according to

Josephus, the son of Artabates III. (Ant. xx. 3, § 4.)

Soon after his accession, he invaded Armenia, took Artaxata and Tigranocerta, the chief cities of the country, and dethroned Rhadamistes, the Iberian, who had usurped the crown. He then gave Armenia to his brother, Tiridates, having previously given Medin to his other brother, Pacorus. These occurrences excited considerable alarm at Rome, as Nero, who had just ascended the throne (A. D. 55),

was only seventeen years of age. Nero, however,

made active preparations to oppose the Parthians,

and sent Dominus Corbulo to take possession of Armenia, from which the Parthians had meantime withdrawn, and Quadratus Ummidius to command in Syria. Vologeses was persuaded by Corbulo

and Ummidius to conclude peace with the Romans

and give as hostages the noblest of the Arsacidae;

which he was induced to do, either that he might

the more conveniently prepare for war, or that he might remove from the kingdom those who were likely to prove rivals. (Tac. Ann. xii. 50, xiii.

5–9.) Three years afterwards (A. D. 58), the war at length broke out between the Parthians

and the Romans; for Vologeses could not endure

Tiridates to be deprived of the kingdom of Armenia, which he had himself given him, and would not let him receive it as a gift from the Romans.

This war, however, terminated in favour of the Romans. Corbulo, the Roman general, took and destroyed Artaxata, and also obtained possession of Tigranocerta, which surrendered to him.

Tiridates was driven out of Armenia; and Corbulo apprised in his place, as king of Armenia, the Cappadocian Tigranes, the grandson of king Archelaus, and gave certain parts of Armenia to the tributary kings who had assisted him in the war.

After making these arrangements, Corbulo retired into Syria, A. D. 60. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 34-41, xiv.

23–26; Dion Cass. Lxi. 19, 20.) Vologeses, however, resolved to make another attempt to recover Armenia.

He made preparations to invade Syria himself, and sent Monaesus, one of his generals, and Monobavus, king of the Arameans, to attack Tigranes and drive him out of Armenia. They accordingly entered Armenia and laid siege to Tigranocerta, but were unable to take it. As Vologeses also found that Corbulo had taken every precaution to secure Syria, he sent ambassadors to Corbulo to solicit a truce, that he might despatch an embassy to Rome concerning the terms of peace. This was granted; but as no satisfactory answer was obtained from Nero, Vologeses invaded Armenia, where he gained considerable advantages over Caesennius Paetus, and at length besieged him in his winter-quarters. Paetus, alarmed at his situation, agreed with Vologeses, that Armenia should be surrendered to the Romans, and that he should be allowed to retire in safety from the enemy. (Tac. Ann. xvi. 1—18, 25—31; Dion Cass. lxxii. 23—29, lxxiii. 1—7.)

In the struggle for the empire after Nero's death, Vologeses sent ambassadors to Vespasian, offering to assist him with 40,000 Parthians. This offer was declined by Vespasian, but he bade Vologeses send an embassy to the senate, and he secured peace to him. (Tac. Hist. iv. 51.) Vologeses afterwards sent an embassy to Titus, as he was returning from the conquest of Jerusalem, to congratulate him on his success, and present him with a golden crown; and shortly afterwards, he sent another embassy to Vespasian to intercede on behalf of Antiochus, the deposed king of Commagene. (Joseph. B. J. vii. 5. § 2, 7. § 3; comp. Dion Cass. lxxvi. 11; Suet. Nigr. 57.) In A.D. 73, Vologeses sent again to Vespasian, to beg him to assist the Parthians against the Alani, who were then at war with them; but Vespasian declined to do so, on the plea that it did not become him to meddle in other people's affairs. (Dion Cass. lxxxvi. 15; Suet. Dom. 2; Joseph. B. J. vii. 7. § 4.) Vologeses then sent two Euphrates, a little to the south of Babylon, the town of Volosocertin. (Plin. H. N. vi. 30.) He seems to have lived till the reign of Domitian.

Arsaces XXIV., Pacorus, succeeded his father, Vologeses I., and was a contemporary of Domitian and Trajan; but scarcely anything is recorded of his reign. He is mentioned by Martin (ix. 30), and it appears from Pliny (Ep. x. 16), that he was in alliance with Decebalus, the king of the Dacians. It was probably this Pacorus who fortified and enlarged the city of Ctesiphon. (Ann. Marec. xxvili. 6.)

Arsaces XXV., Chosroes, called by Dion Cassius Ostrogoth, a younger son of Vologeses I., succeeded his brother Pacorus during the reign of Trajan. Soon after his accession, he invaded Armenia, expelled Exedras, the son of Tiridates, who had been appointed king by the Romans, and gave the crown to his nephew Parthamaspis, the son of his brother Pacorus. Trajan hastened in person to the east, conquered Armenia, and reduced it to the form of a Roman province. Parthamaspis also fell into his hands. After concluding peace with Angarus, the ruler of Edessa, Trajan overran the northern part of Mesopotamia, took Nisibis and several other cities, and, after a most glorious campaign, returned to Antioch to winter, A.D. 114. In consequence of these successes, he received the surname of Parthicus from the soldiers and of Optatus from the senate. Parthia was at this time torn by civil commotions, which rendered the conquests of Trajan all the easier. In the spring of the following year, A.D. 115, he crossed the Tigris, took Ctesiphon and Seleucia, and made Mesopotamia, Assyria, and Babylonia, Roman provinces. After these conquests, he sailed down the Tigris to the Persian gulf and the Indian ocean; but during his absence there was a general revolt of the Parthians. He immediately sent against them two of his generals, Maximus and Lucius, A.D. 116, the former of whom was defeated and slain by Chosroes, but the latter met with more success, and regained the cities of Nisibis, Edessa, and Seleucia, as well as others which had revolted. Upon his return to Ctesiphon, Trajan appointed Parthamaspis king of Parthia, and then withdrew from the country to invade Armenia. Upon the death of Trajan, however, in the following year (A.D. 117), the Parthians expelled Parthamaspis, and placed upon the throne their former king, Chosroes. But Hadrian, who had succeeded Trajan, was unwilling to engage in a war with the Parthians, and judged it more prudent to give up the conquests which Trajan and Lucius had gained; he accordingly withdrew the Roman garrisons from Mesopotamia, Assyria, and Babylonia, and made the Euphrates, as before, the eastern boundary of the Roman empire. The exact time of Chosroes' death is unknown; but during the remainder of his reign there was no war between the Parthians and the Romans, as Hadrian cultivated friendly relations with the former. (Dion Cass. lxxviii. 17—83; Amul. Vict. Cass. c. 13; Paus. v. 12. § 4; Spartan. Hadr. c. 21.)

Arsaces XXVII., Vologeses II., succeeded his father Chosroes, and reigned probably from about A.D. 122 to 149. In A.D. 133, Meneius, which was then subject to the Parthians, was over run by a vast horde of Alani (called by Dion Cassius, Alavnioi), who penetrated also into Armenia and Cappadocia, but were induced to retire, partly by the presents of Vologeses, and partly through fear of Arrian, the Roman governor of Cappadocia. (Dion Cass. lxxxix. 15.) During the reign of Hadrian, Vologeses continued at peace with the Romans; and on the accession of Antoninus Pius, A.D. 138, he sent an embassy to Rome, to present the new emperor with a golden crown, which event is commemorated on a coin of Antoninus. (Eckhel, viii. pp. 5, 10, 11.) These friendly relations, however, did not continue undisturbed. Vologeses solicited from Antoninus the restoration of the royal throne of Parthia, which had been taken by Trajan, but did not obtain his request. He made preparations to invade Armenia, but was deterred from doing so by the representations of Antoninus. (Capitol. Anton. Pius, c. 2.)

Arsaces XXVIII., Vologeses III., probably a son of the preceding, began to reign according to coins (Eckhel, iii. p. 558), A.D. 149. During the reign of Antoninus, he continued at peace with the Romans; but on the death of this emperor, the long threatened war at length broke out. In A.D. 162, Vologeses invaded Armenia, and cut to pieces a Roman legion, with its commander Severianus, at Elaeagnia, in Armenia. He then entered Syria, defeated Atidius Cornelius, the governor of Syria, and laid waste every thing before him. Thereupon the emperor Verus proceeded to Syria, but when he reached Antioch, he remained in that city and gave the command of the army to Cassius, who soon drove Volgoeses out of Syria, and followed up his success by invading Mesopotamia and Assyria. He took Seleucia and Ctesiphon, both of which he sacked and set on fire, but on his march homewards lost a great number of his troops by diseases and famine. Meantime Statius Priscus, who had been sent into Armenia, was equally successful. He entirely subdued the country, and took Artaxata, the capital.

(Dion Cass. lxx. 2, lxxi. 2; Lucian, Alex. Pseudom. c. 27; Capitol. M. Ant. Phil. cc. 8, 9, Verus, cc. 6, 7; Entrep. viii. 10.) This war seems to have been followed by the cession of Mesopotamia to the Romans.

From this time to the downfall of the Parthian empire, there is great confusion in the list of kings. Several modern writers indeed suppose, that the events related above under Volgoeses III., happened in the reign of Volgoeses II., and that the latter continued to reign till shortly before the death of Commodus (A. D. 192); but this is highly improbable, as Volgoeses II. ascended the throne about A. D. 192, and must on this supposition have reigned nearly seventy years. If Volgoeses III. began to reign in A. D. 149, as we have supposed from Eckhel, it is also improbable that he should have been the Volgoeses spoken of in the reign of Caracalla, about A. D. 212. We are therefore inclined to believe that there was one Volgoeses more than has been mentioned by modern writers, and have accordingly inserted an additional one in the list we have given.

Volgoeses IV., was engaged, as already remarked, in civil wars with his brothers. It was against him that Caracalla made war in A. D. 215, because he refused to surrender Tiridates and Artabanes, who had fled to Parthia from the Romans, but did not prosecute it, since the Parthians through fear delivered up the persons he had demanded. (Dion Cass. lxxvii. 10.) He appears to have been dethroned about this time by his brother Artabanus.

Artabanus IV., the last king of Parthia, was a brother of the preceding, and a son of Volgoeses IV. According to Herodian, Caracalla entered Parthia in A. D. 216, under pretence of seeking the daughter of Artabanus in marriage; and when Artabanus went to meet him unarmed with a great number of his nobility, Caracalla treacherously fell upon them and put the greater number to the sword; Artabanus himself escaped with difficulty. Dion Cassius merely relates that Artabanus refused to give his daughter in marriage to Caracalla, and that the latter laid waste in consequence the countries bordering upon Media. During the winter Artabanus raised a very large army, and in the following year, A. D. 217, marched against the Romans. Macrinus, who had meantime succeeded Caracalla, advanced to meet him; and a desperate battle was fought near Nisibis, which continued for two days, but without victory to either side. At the commencement of the third day, Macrinus sent an embassy to Artabanus, informing him of the death of Caracalla, with whom the Parthian king was chiefly enraged, and offering to restore the prisoners taken by Caracalla, and to pay a large sum of money besides. On these conditions a peace was concluded, and Artabanus withdrew his forces.

In this war, however, Artabanus had lost the best of his troops, and the Persians seized the opportunity of recovering their long-lost independence. They were led by Artaxerxes (Arsibir), the son of Sassan, and defeated the Parthians in three great battles, in the last of which Artabanus was taken prisoner and killed, A. D. 226. Thus ended the Parthian empire of the Arsacidæ, after it had existed 476 years. (Dion Cass. lxxvii. 1, 3, 26, 27, lxxx. 3; Herodian, iv. 9, 11, 14, 15, vi. 2; Capitolin. Mucrin. cc. 6, 12; Agathias, Hist. iv. 24; Synecellus, vol. i. p. 677, ed. Dindorf.) The Parthians were now obliged to submit to Artaxerxes, the founder of the dynasty of the Sassanidae, which continued to reign till A. D. 651. [Sassanidae.] The family of the Arsacidæ, however, still continued to exist in Armenia as an independent dynasty. [Arsacidæ.]

[Arsacidæ. pp. 362, b., 363, b., 364, a.]

ARSACIDÆ. 1. The name of a dynasty of Parthian treasurers. [Arsacidæ.]

2. The name of a dynasty of Armenian kings, who reigned over Armenia during the wars of the Romans with Mithridates the Great, king of Poun-tus, and with the Parthians. The history of this dynasty is involved in great difficulties, as the Latin and Greek authors do not always agree with the Armenian historians, such as Moses Chorenensis, Faustus Byzantinus, and others. The Romans do not call the dynasty of the Armenian kings by the name of Arsacidae; they mention several kings of this family who were descended from the Parthian dynasty of the Arsacidae, and they seem not to have known several kings mentioned by the Armenian historians. On the other hand, the Armenian writers know but one dynasty reigning in Armenia during that period, and they do not mention several kings spoken of by the Romans; or, if they mention their names, they do not consider them as kings. The consequence of this is, that every account based exclusively on Roman and Greek writers would be incomplete; they want to be compared with the Armenian historians, and thus only a satisfactory result can be obtained.

Several attempts have been made to reconcile the different statements of the western and eastern historians, as the reader may see from the notes of the brothers Whiston and the works of Vaillant, Du Four de Longueville, Richter, and especially St. Martin, which are cited below.

The expression "kings of Armenia" is in many instances vague, and leads to erroneous conclusions, especially with regard to the Arsacidae. The transactions of the Romans with Armenia will present much less difficulties if the student will remember that he has to do with kings in Armenia, and kings of Armenian origin reigning in countries beyond the limits of Armenia. The history of the Arsacidae cannot be well understood without a previous knowledge of the other dynasties before and after that of the Arsacidae; for Armenian kings were known to the Greeks long before the accession of the Arsacidae; and the annals of the Eastern empire mention many important transactions with kings of Armenia, belonging to those dynasties, which reigned in this country during a period of almost a thousand years after the fall of the Arsacidae. But as any detailed account would be out of place here, we can give only a short sketch.

I. Dynasty of Haig, founded by Haig, the son of Gathis, who is said to have lived A.D. 2107. Fifty-nine kings belong to this dynasty, and among them Zarmant, who, according to the Armenian historians, assisted the Trojans at the siege of their city, where he commanded a body of Assyrians; Dikran or Tigranes, a prince mentioned by Xenophon (Cyr. iii. 1, v. 1, 3, viii. 3, 4); and Waha, the last of his house, who fell in a battle with Alexander the Great in B.C. 328.

II. Dynasty of Artaxias, founded by Artaxias, who reigned after him, there are many who were not Arsacidae, but belonged to other Asiatic dynasties. The Armenians on the contrary say, that the dynasty of the Arsacidae was founded by Valarsaces or Wagharsing, the brother of Mithridates Arsaces [Arsacidae II.], king of Parthia, by whom he was established on the throne of Armenia in B.C. 149. A younger branch of the Arsacidae was founded by Arsham or Ardash, son of Ardashes (Artaxes) and brother of the great Tigranes, who reigned at Edesa, and whose descendants became masters of Armenia Magna after the extinction of the Arsacidae in that country with the death of Tiridates I., who was established on the throne by Nero, and who died most... probably in A. d. 62. The Armenian historians have treated with particular attention the history of the younger branch; they speak but little about the earlier transactions with Rome; and they are almost silent with regard to those kings, the offspring of the kings of Pontus and Judaea, who were imposed upon Armenia by the Romans. From this we may conclude, that the Armenians considered these instruments of the Romans as intruders and political adventurers, and that the Arsacidae were the only legitimate dynasty. Thus they sometimes speak of kings unknown to the Romans, and who perhaps were but pretend¬ers, who had succeeded in preserving an obscure independence in some inaccessible corner of the mountains of Armenia. On the other hand the Romans, with all the pride and hightness of conquerors, consider their instruments or allies alone as the legitimate kings, and they generally speak of the Arsacidae as a family imposed upon Armenia by the Parthians. As to the origin of the Armenian Arsacidae, both the Romans and Armenians agree, that they were descended from the dynasty of the Parthian Arsacidae, an opinion which was so generally established, that Procopius (De Antiqu. Justinianii, iii. 1) says, that nobody had the slightest doubt on the fact. But as to the origin of the earlier kings, who according to the Romans were not Arsacidae, we must prefer the statements of the Armenians, who, as all Orientals, paid great attention to the genealogy of their great families, and who say that those kings were Arsacidae.

The Persian historians know this dynasty by the name of the Ashestians, and tell us, that its founder was one Ashk, who lived at the time of Alexander the Great. But the Persian authors throw little light upon the history of the Arsacidae. A series of the kings, according to the Romans, is necessary for understanding their historians. But as their statements are rather one-sided, they will be found insufficient not only for a closer investigation into the history of Armenia, but also for many other events connected with the history of the eastern empire. It has, therefore, been thought advisable to give first the series of the kings according to the Roman writers, and afterwards a series of these kings according to the Roman accounts combined with those of the Armenians. The chronology of this period has not yet been satisfactorily fixed, and many points remain vague.

The following is a series of the Arsacidae and other kings of Armenia according to the Romans.

Artaxas I., praefect of Armenia Magna under Antichus the Great, became the independent king of Armenia in B. C. 188. [Artaxas I.]

Tigranes I., the ally of Mithridates the Great against the Romans. [Tigranes I.]

Artavasdes I., the son of Tigranes I., taken prisoner by M. Antonius. [Artavasdes I.]

Artaxias II., the son of Artavasdes I., killed by his rebellious subjects. [Artaxias II.]

Tigranes II., the son of Artavasdes I., and the brother of Artaxias II., established in Armenia by order of Augustus, by Tiberius Nero. [Tigranes II.]

Artavasdes II., perhaps the son of Artaxias II., driven out by his subjects. [Artavasdes II.]

Tigranes III., the son of Tigranes II., the competitor of Artavasdes II., driven out by Cains Caesar. He was the last of his race. [Tigranes III.]

Ariobarzanes. After Artavasdes II. and Tigranes III. had been driven out by the Romans, the choice of Augustus for a king of the Armenians fell upon one Ariobarzanes, a Median or Parthian prince, who seems not to have belonged to the dynasty of the Arsacidae. As Ariobarzanes was a person of great talents and distinguished by bodily beauty, a quality which the eastern nations have always liked to see in their kings, the Armenians applauded the choice of Augustus. He died suddenly after a short reign in A. d. 2, according to the chronology of St. Martin. He left male issue, but the Armenians disliked his children, and chose Erato their queen. She was, perhaps, the widow of Tigranes III. (Tac. Ann. iii. 4.)

Vonones. Erato was deposed by the Armenians after a short reign, and the throne remained vacant for several years, till the Armenians at length chose Vonones as their king, the son of Phraates IV., and the exiled king of Parthia. (A. d. 18.) Vonones maintained himself but one year on the throne, as he was compelled to fly into Syria through fear of Artabanus III., the king of Parthia. [Arsaces XVIII.]

Artaxias III., chosen king, A. d. 18, about two years after Vonones had fled into Syria. [Artaxias III.]

Arsaces I., the eldest son of Artabanus, king of the Parthians, was placed on the throne of Armenia by his father, after the death of Artaxias III. He perished by the treachery of Mithridates, the brother of Phraates, king of Iberia, who had bribed some of the attendants of Arsaces to kill their master. After his death, which happened in A. d. 35, Mithridates invaded Armenia and took its capital, Artaxata. Josephus (xviii. 3, § 4.) calls this Armenian king Ocades, but this was the name of his brother, who, as we learn from Tacitus, was sent by the Parthian king to revenge his death. (Tac. Ann. vi. 31—33; Dion Cass. lixiv. 26.)

Mithridates, the aseresaid brother of Phraates, was established on the throne of Armenia by the emperor Tiberius, A. d. 35. He was recalled to Rome by Caligula, but sent into Armenia again by Claudius, about A. d. 47, where he continued to reign, supported by the Romans, till he was expelled and put to death by his nephew Rhadamistus, A. d. 52. (Tac. Ann. vi. 33, ix. 8, 9, xii. 44—47; Dion Cass. ix. 8.)

Rhadamistus, the son of Phraates, king of Armenia, was a highly gifted but ambitious youth, whom his old father tried to get rid of by exciting him to invade Armenia, for which purpose he gave him an army. (A. d. 52.) Rhadamistus, seconded by the perfidy of the Roman praefect in Armenia, Pollio, succeeded in seizing upon the person of his uncle, whom he put to death with his wife and his children. Rhadamistus then ascended the throne; but Volgoleses I., the king of the Parthians, took advantage of the distracted state of the country to send his brother Tiridates into Armenia, and proclaim him king. Tiridates advanced upon Tigraocerta, took this city and Artaxata, and compelled Rhadamistus to fly. Rhadamistus was subsequently killed by his father Phraates. (Tac. Ann. xii. 44—51, xiii. 6, 57.)

Tiridates I., the brother of Volgoleses I., king of the Parthians, was driven out of Armenia by Corbula, who appointed in his place Tigranes IV., the grandson of king Archelaus. (A. D. 60. [Tigranes IV.] Tigrades subsequently received the crown as a gift from Nero, A. D. 65. [Arsaces XXIII., TiHRADES I.]

EXIEARS (Arsades III.), an Arsacid (of the younger Armenian branch), was driven out by Chosroes or Khosrow, king of the Parthians. (Dion Cass. Ixxvii. 17.) According to Moses Choremenas (p. 44—57), Exeares, who is called Arsaces III., was a mighty prince, who humbled the armies of Domitian, but was finally driven out by Trajan. Chosroes placed on the throne in his stead Parthamasiris, a Parthian prince. Exeares regained during forty-two years, from A. d. 78 to 120, but was several times compelled to fly from his kingdom.

PARTHAMASIRUS, the son of Pacoros (Arsaces XXIV.), king of Parthia, and the nephew of Chosroes, who supported him against Trajan. Parthamasiris, reduced to extremity, humbled himself before Trajan, and placed his royal diadem at the feet of the emperor, hoping that Trajan would restore it to him and recognize him as a subject king. But he was deceived in his expectation, and Armenia was changed into a Roman province. According to some accounts, he was put to death by Trajan. (Dion Cass. Ixxvii. 17—20; comp. Euseb. xvi. 5; Fronto, Priscip. Hist. p. 248, ed. Niebuhr.)

PARTHAMASPATES, was appointed by Trajan king of Parthia, but after he had been expelled by the Parthians [Arsaces XXV.]; he seems to have subsequently received the kingdom of Armenia from Hadrian. (Comp. Spartan. Hadr. co. 21, 5, where he is called Psamatosissiris.)

ACHARMENIDES, the son of Parthamaspates. There are some coins on which he is represented with the diadem, which seems to have been given to him by Antoninus Pius. (Iamblichus, op. Phot. Cod. 94. p. 75, b., ed. Bekker.)

SoARtMUS or SoHEMUS (Soëmuor), the son of Achamenides, was established on the throne by Thencydides, the lieutenant of Lucius (Martius) Verus, during the reign of M. Aurelius Antoninus. (Iamblich., op. Phot. l. c.) We learn from Moses Choremenas (ii. 60—64), that the national king, who was supported by Vologeses II. of Parthia, was Dikran or Tigranes. Soemus was an Arsacid. (Dion Cass. Fraga. Ixxxi. p. 1201, ed. Reinm.)

SANATRUCES (Saworphvct), the son of Soemus, as it seems, was established on the throne by Septimius Severus. According to Suidas, he was a man highly distinguished by his warlike qualities and many noble virtues. He seems to be the king of Armenia mentioned by Dion Cassius, who was treacherously seized upon by Caracalla, about A. D. 213. The Armenian name of Sanatraces is Samadrag. (Dion Cass. Ixxv. 9, ixxvii. 12; Suidas, s. v. Saworphvct; comp. Herodicus, iii. 81.)

Vologeses, the son of Sanatraces, whom Dion Cassius (ixxxv. 12) calls king of the Parthians. [Arsaces XXIX.] Vailliant thinks that he was the king seized upon by Caracalla. On the other hand, the Armenian historians tell us that Waghbash, in Greek Vologeses or Valarsaces, the son of Dikran (Tigranes), reigned over Armenia, or part of Armenia, from A. D. 178 to 198, and that he perished in a battle against the Khazars, near Derbent, in 198. It is of course impossible that he should have been seized by Caracalla, who succeeded his father Septimius Severus in 211. Nor do the Armenians mention any king of that name who was a contemporary either of Septimius Severus or Caracalla. (Moses Choren. ii. 65—68.)

TIHRADIES II., the son of Vologeses. [Tigrades II.]

ARSAES II., the brother of Artabasus IV., the last Arsacid in Parthia, by whom he was made king of Armenia in the first year of the reign of Alexander Severus. (A. D. 222—223.) When his brother was killed by Artaxerxes (Ardashir), the first Sassanid on the Persian throne, he resisted the usurper, and united his warriors with those of Alexander Severus in the memorable war against Artaxerxes. [Sassanidae.] (Proc. del. scol. Justin. i. 1; Dion Cass. lxxv. 3. 4; Herodian, vi. 2, &c.; Agathias, pp. 65, 134, ed. Paris.)

ARTAVASDES III., the ally of Sapor against the emperor Valerian, A. D. 260. (Treboll. Poll. Vallerian. 6.)

Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. i. 8) mentions a Christian king of Armenia during the reign of Diocletian, who seems to have been the son of Artavasdes III. During the war of Diocletian with Narces, king of Persia, this king of Armenia joined the Roman army commanded by Galerius Cæsar. After the accession of Maximinianus he was involved in a war with this emperor, who intended to abolish the Christian religion in Armenia. [Tigrades III.]

ARSAES III. (Tiranus), the son of Diran (Tigrades III.), ascended the throne either in the seventeenth year of the reign of Constantius, that is, in A. D. 354, or perhaps as early as 341 or 342, after his father had been made prisoner and deprived of his sight by Sapor II., king of Persia. After the reconciliation of Sapor with his captive Diran (Tigrades), Arsaces was chosen king, since his father, on account of his blindness, was unable to reign according to the opinion of the eastern nations, which opinion was also entertained by the Greeks of the Lower Empire, whence we so often find that when an emperor or usurper succeeded in making his rival prisoner, he usually blinded him, if he did not venture to put him to death. The nomination of Arsaces was approved by the emperor Constantius. The new king nevertheless took the part of Sapor in his war with the Romans, but soon afterwards made peace with the latter. He promised to pay an annual tribute, and Constantius allowed him to marry Olympias, the daughter of the praefect Ablavius, a near relation of the empress Constantia, and who had been betrothed to Constantes, the brother of Constantius. Olympias was afterwards poisoned by a mistress of Sapor, an Armenian princess of the name of Pharrandasem.

To punish the defection of Arsaces, Sapor invaded Armenia and took Tigranocerta. He was thus involved in a war with the emperor Julian, the successor of Constantius, who opened his famous campaign against the Persians (A. D. 363) in concert with Arsaces, on whose active co-operation the success of the war in a great measure depended. But Julian's sanguine expectations of overthrowing the power of the Sassanidae was destroyed by the pusillanimity, or more probably well calculated treachery, of Arsaces, who withdrew his troops from the Roman camp near Ctesiphon in the month of June, 363. Thence the disastrous retreat of the Romans and the death of Julian, who died from a wound on the 26th of the same month. Jovian, who was chosen emperor in the camp, saved the Roman army by a treaty in July, by which he renounced his sovereignty over the tributary kingdoms of Armenia and Iberia. Arscases, in the hope of receiving the reward of his treachery, ventured into the camp of Sapor. He was at first received with honour, but in the midst of an entertainment was seized by order of Sapor and confined in the tower of Oblivion at Ecbatana, where he was loaded with silver chains. He died there by the hand of a faithful servant, whom he implored to release him with his sword from the humiliation of his captivity. Arscases reigned tyrannically, and had a strong party against him, especially among the nobles. (Amm. Marc. xx. 11, xxii. 6, xxii. 2, 3, xxv. 7, xxvii. 12; Procop. de Bell. Pers. i. 5.)

Para, the son of Arscases III. and Olympia. (Tillemont, Histoire des Empereurs.) No sooner had Sapor seized Arscases, than he put one Asparaxes on the throne of Armenia. Para, the heir and successor of Arscases, was reduced to the possession of one fortress, Artograsça (perhaps Artaga, or Ardis, towards the sources of the Tigris, above Dijàrbel or Amida), where he was besieged with his mother Olympia by the superior forces of Sapor. The fortress surrendered after a gallant defence, Olympia fell into the hands of the conqueror, but Para escaped to Necacesaria, and implored the aid of the emperor Valens. The emperor ordered him to be well treated, and promised to assist him. Terentius, a Roman general, led the fugitive king back into Armenia with a sufficient force, and Para was acknowledged as king; and though attacked by Sapor, he continued to reign with the assistance of the Romans. Para was a tyrant. Misled by the intrigues of Sapor, he killed Clyaxes and Axtabamus, two of his chief ministers. As Valens was dissatisfied with the conduct of the Armenian king, Terentius persuaded him to go to Cilicia, pretending that the emperor wished to have an interview with him. When Para arrived at Taras, he was treated with due respect, but so closely watched as to be little better than a prisoner. He escaped with a body of light cavalry, and swimming across the Euphrates, arrived safely in Armenia in spirit of an ancient pursuit. He continued to show himself a friend of the Romans, but Valens distrusted him and resolved upon his death. Trajanus, a Roman dux, or general, executed the emperor’s secret order. He invited Para to a banquet, and when the guests were half intoxicated, a band of Roman soldiers rushed in, and Para and his attendants were slain after a brave resistance, A. D. 374 or 377. The Armenian name of Para is Bab. (Amm. Marc. xxvii. 12, xxx. 1.)

Arsaces IV. (V. of Vaillant), the son of Para or Bab. According to Vaillant, he was the nephew of Para, being the son of one Arscases (IV. of Vaillant), who was the brother of Para; this opinion is not adopted by the distinguished historians, but it seems untenable. Arscases IV. reigned a short time together with his brother Valarsaces or Waghrashag, who died soon. In a war against an usurper, Waraztad, the son of Anob, who was the brother of Arscases III., Arscases IV. showed such a want of character and energy that he owed his success merely to the bad conduct of the usurper, who was at first supported by the emperor Theodosius the Great. The weakness of Arscases being manifest, Theodosius and Sapor III. formed and carried into execution the plan of dividing Armenia. Arscases was allowed to reign as a vassal king of Constantinople in the western and smaller part of Armenia, while the larger and eastern part became the share of Sapor, who gave it to Chosroes or Khosrew, a noble belonging to the family of the Arsacidae, of which there were still some branches living in Persia. According to St. Martin this happened in 337. Procopius mentions one Tigrame, brother of Arscases, who reigned over eastern Armenia, which he ceded to Sapor. The whole history of the division of Armenia is very obscure, and the chief sources,Procopius and Moses Chorenensis, are in manifest contradiction. Arscases IV. died in 393, and his dominions were conferred by the emperor upon his general, Casavon, who was descended from the family of the Gamsaragans, which was a branch of the Arsacidae. It seems that this general was a most able diplomatist, and that his nomination was a plot concerted between him and Theodosius to bring all Armenia under the imperial authority; Casavon declared himself a vassal of Chosroes, and this vassal suddenly broke his allegiance towards Sapor, and submitted to Theodosius. On this Bahram IV., the successor of Sapor, invaded Armenia, seized Chosroes and put Bohram Shapur (Sapor) the brother of Chosroes, on the vassal throne of (eastern) Armenia. (392.) In 414, Chosroes was re-established by Yezdegird I., the successor of Bahram IV., and after the death of Chosroes, in 415, Yezdegird’s son, Shapur or Sapor, became king. Sapor died in 419, and till 421 there was an interregnum in Armenia till Ardashres (Artsares) ascended the throne. (Procopius, de Aedif. Justin. iii. 1. 5; De Bell. Pers. ii. 3; Moses Choren. iii. 40, &c., 49, &c.)

Ardashres, the last Arsacid on the throne of Armenia, the son of Bahram Shapur, and the nephew of Chosroes. Moses Chorenensis tells us, that his real name was Ardashar. (Artsares or Artaxes.) He was made king of Armenia in 422, by Bahram IV., who ordered or requested him to adopt the name of Ardashir (Artsares or Artaxes). He was a most able diplomatist, and that his nomination was addicted to vices of every description, the people, or rather the nobles of Armenia, wished for another king. Since the conversion of prince Gregory (afterwards St. Gregory), the son of Anag, the Arsacid, to the Christian religion, in the time of Constantine the Great, the Armenians had gradually adopted the Christian religion; and there was a law that the patriarch should always be a member of the royal family of the Arsacidae. During the reign of Artaxes the office of patriarch was held by Isaac, to whom the nobles applied when they wished to choose another king; but Isaac aware that their choice would fall upon Bahram, the heathen king of Persia, refused to assist them. The nobles thereupon applied straightway to Bahram, who invaded Armenia, possessed Ardashir’s dominions to Persia, A. D. 428. From this time eastern Armenia was called Persamnia. (Procop. De Aedif. Justin. iii. 1, 5; Moses Choren. iii. 63, &c.; Assamani, Bibliotheca Orientalis, vol. iii. pars i. p. 396, &c.)

The following chronological table, which differs in some points from the preceding narrative, is taken from St. Martin, and is founded upon the Armenian histories of Moses Chorenensis and Faustus Byzant. compared with the Greek and Roman authors.
ARSACIDA. 365

B. The second or younger Branch, at first at Edessa, and sometimes identical with the "Reges Osroenae," afterwards in Armenia Magna. a. d. 36. Ardashir, or Ardashir, the Artaxaces of Josephus. (Ant. Jud. xx. 2.) —b. c. 10. Mann, his son. —b. c. 5. Abgarus, the son of Arsham, the Ushama of the Syrians. This is the celebrated Abgarus who is said to have written a letter to our Saviour. (Moses Chor. h. 29.)

ARSMENES (Apoardais), the son of Dareius, the commander of the Utii and Myci in the army of Xerxes. (Herod. vii. 68.) ARSAMES (Apoardais). 1. The father of Hytyaspes and grandfather of Dareius. (Herod. i. 209, vii. 11, 224.)

2. Also called Arsames, the great-grandson of the preceding, and the son of Dareius and Artsyne, the daughter of Cyrus, commanded in the army of Xerxes the Armuhans and the Aethiopians who lived above Egypt. (Herod. vii. 69.) Aeschylus (Pers. 37, 300) speaks of an Arsames, who was the leader of the Egyptians from Memphis in the army of Xerxes.

3. An illegitimate son of Artaxerxes Monmon, murdered by his brother Artaxerxes Ochus. (Plut. Artax. c. 30.)

4. Supposed on the authority of a coin to have been a king of Armenia about the time of Seleucus II., and conjectured to have been the founder of the city of Arsamenes. (Eckel, iii. p. 204, &c.) ARSCHENUS (Apoardais). 1. Of Constantinople, surnamed Autorianus, lived about the middle of the thirteenth century. He was educated in some monastery in Nicea, of which he afterwards became the head. After he had held this office for some time, he led a private and ascetic life; and he appears to have passed some time also in one of the monasteries on mount Athos. At length, about a. d. 1253, the emperor Theodosius Lascaris the Younger raised him to the dignity of patriarch. In a. d. 1259, when the emperor died, he appointed Arsennes and Georgius Muzeo guardians to his son Johannes; but when Mnzale began to harbour treacherous designs against the young prince, Arsennes, in indignation at such faithless intrigues, resigned the office of patriarch, and withdrew to a monastery. In a. d. 1260, when the Greeks had recovered possession of Constantinople under Michael Palaeologus, Arsennes was invited to the imperial city, and requested to resume the dignity of patriarch. In the year following, the emperor Michael Palaeologus ordered prince Johnnes, the son of Theodosius Lascaris, to be blinded; and Arsennes not only censured this act of the emperor publicly, but published him for it with excommunication. Michael in vain implored forgiveness, till at length, enraged at such presumption, he assembled a council of bishops, brought several fictitious accusations against his son, banished him from the court, and deported him to Degla and exiled to Proconnesus. Here Arsennes survived his honourable disgrace for several years; but the time of his death is unknown. Fabricius places it in a. d. 1264. He was a man of great virtue and piety, but totally unfit for practical life. At the time when he was yet a monk, he wrote a synopsis of divine laws (Synopsis Canonum), collected from the writings of the fathers and the decrees of councils. The Greek original, accompanied by a Latin

2. A Greek monk (Cave calls him Patricius Romanus), who lived towards the end of the fourth century of our era, was distinguished for his knowledge of Greek and Roman literature. The emperor Theodosius the Great invited him to his court, and contributed to his the education of his sons Arcadius and Honorius, whose father Arsenius was called. At the age of forty, he left the court and went to Egypt, where he commenced his monastic life at Scetis in the desert of the Thebais. There he spent forty years, and then migrated to Troæ, a place near Memphis, where he passed the remainder of his life, with the exception of three years, which he spent at Canopus. He died at Troæ at the age of ninety-five. There exists by him a short work containing instructions and admonitions for monks, which is written in a truly monastic spirit. It was published with a Latin translation by Combafius in his Auctor. Noric. Bibl. Nat. Hist. Paris, 1672, p. 301, &c. We also possess forty-four of his remarkable sayings (apophthegmata), which had been collected by his ascetic friends, and which are printed in Cotelerius’ Monumenta, i. p. 333. (Cave, Hist. Lit. ii. p. 80, ed. London; Fabr. Bibl. Græc. xi. p. 580, &c.)

ARSÉNE, ARSÉS, or ARSÉS (Ἀρσέν, Νάρσ, or Ὀδύσ), the youngest son of king Artaxerxes I. (Ochus.) After the murder Bagases had poisoned Artaxerxes, he released Arses to the throne (ib. c. 339); and that he might have the young king completely under his power, he caused the king’s brothers to be put to death; but one of them, Bisthanes, appears to have escaped (Justin, xvii. 2, xxiv. 2, 3; Memnon, ap. Philoct. p. 225, a. 20, ed. Bekker.)

Arsinoë, who was anxious to secure the succession to the throne for her own children, was jealous of her step-son Agathocles, who was married to her half-sister Arsinoë, the daughter of Ptolemy I. and Eurydice. Through the intrigues of Arsinoë, Agathocles was eventually put to death in b. c. 284. (Agathocles, p. 53, a.) This crime, however, led to the death of Lysimachus; for Lysandros fled with his children to Scleucus in Asia, who was glad of the pretext to march against Lysimachus. In the war which followed, Lysimachus lost his life (ib. c. 261); and after the death of her husband, Arsinoë first fled to Ephesus, to which Lysimachus had given the name of Arsinoë in honour of her (Steph. Byz. s. w. Epeiros, and from thence (Polyen. viii. 57) to Cassandreia in Macedonia, where she shut herself up with her sons by Lysimachus.

Seleucos had seized Macedonia after the death of Lysimachus, but he was assassinated, after a reign of a few months, by Ptolemy Cæranus, the half-brother of Arsinoë, who had now obtained a throne of the Macedon. Ptolemy was anxious to obtain possession of Cassandreia and still more of the sons of Lysimachus, who might prove formidable rivals to him. He accordingly made offers of marriage to Arsinoë, and concealed his real object by the most solemn oaths and promises. Arsinoë consented to the union, and admitted him into the town; but he had scarcely obtained possession of the place, before he murdered the two younger sons of Lysimachus in the presence of their brother Seleucos. Arsinoë herself fled to Samothrace (Justin, xvii. 2, xxvi. 2, 3; Memnon, ap. Philoct. p. 226, b. 24); from whence she shortly after went to Alexandria in Egypt n. c. 279, and married her own brother Ptolemy II. Philadelphus. (Paus. i. 7, § 1, 3; Theocr. Idyll. xvi. 120, &c., with the Schol.; Athen. xiv. p. 621, a.) Though Arsinoë bore Ptolemy no children, she was exceedingly beloved by him; she gave her name to several cities, called a district (poiboi) of Egypt Arsinoitês after her, and honoured her memory in various ways. (Comp. Paus. L c.; Athen. vii. p. 318, b. xi. p. 497, d. e.) Among other things, he commanded the architect, Dinocles, to erect a temple to Arsinoë in Alexandria, of which the roof was to be arched with loadstones, so that her statue made of Asclepius also as her son. (Apollod. iii. 10. § 2; Paus. ii. 26. § 6; Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. iii. 14; Cic. de Nat. Deor. iii. 22.) At Sparta she had a sanctuary and was worshipped as a heroine. (Paus. iii. 12. § 7.)

ARSINOÉ (Ἀρσινόη). 1. The mother of Ptolemy I. king of Egypt, was originally a concubine of Philip, the father of Alexander the Great, and was given by Philip to Lagus, a Macedonian, while she was pregnant with Ptolemy. Hence Ptolemy was regarded by the Macedonians as the son of Philip. (Paus. i. 6. § 2; Curt. ix. 8; Suidas, s. v. Odys.)

2. The daughter of Ptolemy I. and Berenice, born about b. c. 316, was married in b. c. 300 to Lysimachus, king of Thrace, who was then far advanced in years. Lysimachus had put away Ammastris in order to marry Arsinoë, and upon the death of the former in b. c. 288 [Ammastris], Arsinoë received from Lysimachus the cities of Hermelae, Ammastris, and Dium, as a present. (Plut. Demetr. 31; Paus. i. 10. § 3; Memnon, ap. Philoct. p. 225, a. 20, ed. Bekker.)

ARSITIS (Aprigia), the satrap of the Hellespontine Phrygia when Alexander the Great invaded Asia. After the defeat of the Persians at the Granicus, Ariistas retreated to Phrygia, where he put an end to his own life, because he had advised the satraps to fight with Alexander, instead of retiring before him and buying waste the country, as Memnon had recommended. (Arrian, Anab. l.
13, 17; Paus. i. 29, § 7.)

ARTABANUS (Artaéarto), sometimes written Artacanas or Artacines. 1. A son of Hys-tapes and brother of Dareius Hystaspes, is described by Herodotus (iv. 63) as dissuading his brother from the expedition against the Scythians. In the reign of Xerxes, the successor of Dareius, Artabanus appears occasionally again in the character of a wise and frank counsellor, and Herodotus introduces him several times as speaking. (Herod.
vit. 10, 46–53.)

2. An Ilyrician, who was commander of the body-guard of king Xerxes. In n. c. 465, Artabanus, in conjunction with a eunuch, whom some call Spaminias and others Mithridates, assassinated Xerxes, with the view of setting himself upon the throne of Persia. Xerxes had three sons, Dareius, Artaxerxes, and Hystaspes, who was absent from the court as satrap of Bactria. Now as it was necessary for Artabanus to get rid of these sons
also, he persuaded Artaxerxes that his brother Dareius was the murderer of his father, and stimulated him to avenge the deed by assassinating Dareius. This was done at the earliest opportunity.
Artabanus now communicated his plan of usurping
the throne to his sons, and his intention to murder Artaxerxes also. When the moment for carrying this plan into effect had come, he insidiously struck Artaxerxes with his sword; but the blow only injured the prince slightly, and in the struggle which ensued Artaxerxes killed Artabanus, and thus secured the succession to himself. (Died. l.
69.) Justin (iii. 1), who knows only of the two brothers, Dareius and Artaxerxes, gives a different account of the circumstances under which Artabanus was killed. (Comp. Ctesias, Pers. p. 38, &c., ed. Lion; Aristot. Politi. v. 10.)

3. A Greek historian of uncertain date, who wrote a work on the Jews (ξερπ Τουδαλας), some of the statements of which are preserved in Clemens Alexandrinus (Strom. i. p. 149), the Chronicon Alexandrinum (p. 149), and Eusebius. (Procop. Evang. ix. 10, 23, 27.)

4. I., III., IV., kings of Parthia. [Ariasces, VIII. XIX. XXXI.] [LS.]

ARTABAZUS (Ἀρταβαζύν). 1. The eldest son of Dareius Hystaspis, also called Artabigues. [Ariobignes.]

2. King of the people whom Polybius calls the Satrapd, and who appear to have inhabited that part of Asia usually called Media Atropatene. Artabazanes was the most powerful king of this part of Asia in the time of Antiochus the Great, and appears to have been descended from Atropates, who founded the kingdom in the time of the last king of Persia, and was never conquered by the Macedonians. When Antiochus marched against Artabazanes, in B.C. 220, he made peace with Antiochus upon terms which the latter dictated. (Polyb. v. 55.)

ARTABAZUS. [Artavandes.]

ARTABAZUS (Ἀρταβαζύν). 1. A Median, who acts a prominent part in Xenophon's account of Cyrus the Elder, whose relative Artabazus pretended to be. He is described there as a friend of Cyrus, and advising the Medes to follow Cyrus and remain faithful to him. Cyrus employed him on various occasions: when Araspes was on the point of violating Panthieia, the wife of Abradates, Cyrus sent Artabazus to protect her; in the war against Croesus, Artabazus was one of the chieftains of the infantry. Cyrus bestowed upon him various honours and presents for his faithful attachment. (Xenoph. Cyrop. i. 4. § 27, iv. 1. § 28, vi. 1. §§ 28, 34, vi. 3. § 31, vii. 5. § 48, viii. 3. § 25, viii. 8. § 13, viii. 9. § 5.)

2. A distinguished Persian, a son of Pharnaces, who lived in the reign of Xerxes. In the expedition of this king to Greece, B.C. 480, Artabazus commanded the Parthians and Chosamians. (Herod. vii. 66.) When Xerxes quitted Greece, Artabazus accompanied him as far as the Hellespont, and then returned with his forces to Pallene. As Potidae and the other towns of Pallene had revolted from the king after the battle of Salamis, Artabazus determined to reduce them. He first led siege to Olynthus, which he took; he butch- ered the inhabitants whom he had compelled to quit the town, and gave the place and the town to the Chaldaeans. After this Artabazus began the siege of Potidae, and endeavoured to gain his end by bribes; but the treachery was discovered and his plans thwarted. The siege lasted for three months, and when at last the town seemed to be lost by the low waters of the sea, which enabled his troops to approach the walls from the sea-side, an almost wonderful event saved it, for the returning tide was higher than it had ever been before. The troops of Artabazus were partly overwhelmed by the waters and partly cut down by a sally of the Potidaeans. He now withdrew with the remnant of his army to Thessaly, to join Mardonius. (viii. 126—130.)

Shortly before the battle of Plateaeae, B.C. 479, Artabazus dissuaded Mardonius from entering on an engagement with the Greeks, and urged him to lead his army to Thebes in order to obtain provisions for the men and the cattle; for he entertained the conviction that the mere presence of the Persians would soon compel the Greeks to surrender. (ix. 41.) His counsel had no effect, and as soon as he perceived the defeat of the Persians at Plateaeae, he fled with forty thousand men through Phocis, Thessaly, Macedonia, and Thrace, to Byzantium, and led the remnant of his army, which had been greatly diminished by hunger and the fatigues of the retreat, across the Hellespont into Asia. (ix. 89; Diod. xi. 31, 33.) Subsequently Artabazus conducted the negotiations between Xerxes and Pausanias. (Thuc. i. 129; Diod. xi. 44; C. Nepos, Pass, 2, 4.)

3. One of the generals of Artaxerxes I., was sent to Egypt to put down the revolt of Inarus, B.C. 462. He advanced as far as Memphis, and accomplished his object. (Diod. xi. 74, 77; comp. Thuc. i. 109; Ctesias, Pers. p. 42, ed. Lion.) In B.C. 450, he was one of the commanders of the Persian fleet, near Cyprus, against Chimon. (Diod. xii. 4.)

4. A Persian general, who was sent in B.C. 362 as the regent of Artaxerxes II., against the revolted Dorians. Artabazus was sent to Tarsus, and then returned with his forces to Pallene. As Potidae and the other towns of Pallene had revolted from the king after the battle of Salamis, Artabazus determined to reduce them. He first led siege to Olynthus, which he took; he butchered the inhabitants whom he had compelled to quit the town, and gave the place and the town to the Chaldaeans. After this Artabazus began the siege of Potidae, and endeavoured to gain his end by bribes; but the treachery was discovered and his plans thwarted. The siege lasted for three months, and when at last the town seemed to be lost by the low waters of the sea, which enabled his troops to approach the walls from the sea-side, an almost wonderful event saved it, for the returning tide was higher than it had ever been before. The troops of Artabazus were partly overwhelmed by the waters and partly cut down by a sally of the Potidaeans. He now withdrew with the remnant of his army to Thessaly, to join Mardonius. (viii. 126—130.)

Shortly before the battle of Plateaeae, B.C. 479, beaux for his fidelity with the satrapy of Bactria. His daughter, Barsine, became by Alexander the mother of Heracles; a second daughter, Artocama, was given in marriage to Tolomey; and a third, Artonis, to Eumenes. In B. C. 328, Artabazus, then a man of very advanced age, resigned his satrapy, which was given to Cleitus. (Arrian, Anab. iii. 23, 29, vii. 13, 9, 12, vi. 5, vii. 3, viii. 1; Strab. xii. p. 570; comp. Droysen, Gesch. des Grossen, p. 497.) [L. S.]

ARTACAUSA. [Artabazus, No. 4.]

ARTACHAEES ('Arapayrph), a distinguished Persian, and the tallest man in the nation, superintended the construction of the canal across the isthmus of Athos. He died while Xerxes was with his army at Athos; and the king, who was deeply grieved at his loss, gave him a splendid funeral, and the whole army raised a mound. In the time of Herodotus, the Acanthians, in pursuance of an oracle, sacrificed to Artachaees as a hero. (Herod. vii. 22, 117.) This mound appears to be the one described by Lieutenant Wolfe, who remarks: "About 1£ mile to the westward of the north end of the canal (of Xerxes) is the modern village of Erao (on the site of Acanthus), which gives its name to the bay, situated on an eminence overhanging the beach: this is crowned by a remarkable mound, forming a small natural citadel." (Classical Museum, No. I. p. 83, London 1843.)

ARTANES ('Aprapi'), a son of Hystaspes and brother of Dareius Hystaspis, had given his only daughter and all his property to Dareius, and was afterwards one of the distinguished Persians who fought and fell in the battle of Thermopylae. (Herod. vii. 224.)

ARTAPANUS or ARTAPANES. [Artapanus.]

ARTAPHERNES ('Aprafupre) or Artaphernes. 1. A son of Hystaspes and brother of Dareius Hystaspis, who was appointed satrap of Sardis. In the year B. C. 508, when the Athenians sought the protection of Persia against Sparta, they sent an embassy to Artaphernes. The satrap answered, that the desired alliance with Persia could be granted only on condition of their recognizing the supremacy of king Dareius. When Hippias, the son of Peisistratus, had taken refuge in Asia, he endeavoured to induce Artaphernes to support his cause, and the Athenians, on being informed of his machinations, again sent an embassy to Artaphernes, requesting him not to interfere between his machinations and the Athenians. The reply of Artaphernes, that they should suffer no harm if they would recall their tyrant, showed the Athenians that they had to hope nothing from Persia. In B. C. 501, Artaphernes was induced by the brilliant hopes which Demosthenes and Suidas, a prince of the Messapians in the war, B. C. 497, Artaphernes and Otanes began to attack vigorously the towns of Ionia and Aeolis. Cumae and Clazomenae fell into the hands of the Persians. Artaphernes was sharp enough to see through the treacherous designs of Histiaeus, and expressed his suspicions to him at Sardis. The fear of being discovered led Histiaeus to take to flight. Some letters, which he afterwards addressed to some Persians at Sardis, who were concerned in his designs, were intercepted, and Artaphernes had all the guilty Persians put to death. From this time Artaphernes disappears from history, and he seems to have died soon afterwards. (Herod. v. 25, 30—32, 100, 123, vi. 1, &c.; comp. Hippias, Aristagoras, Histiaeus.)

2. A son of the former. After the unsuccessful enterprise of Mardonius against Greece in B. C. 492, king Dareius placed Datis and his nephew Artaphernes at the head of the forces which were to chastise Athens and Eretria. Artaphernes, though superior in rank, seems to have been inferior in military skill to Datis, who was in reality the commander of the Persian army. The troops assembled in Cilicia, and here they were taken on board 800 ships. This fleet first sailed to Samos, and thence to the Cyclades. Naxos was taken and laid in ashes, and all the islands submitted to the Persians. In Euboea, Carystus and Eretria also fell into their hands. After this the Persian army landed at Marathon. Here the Persians were defeated in the memorable battle of Marathon, B. C. 490, whereupon Datis and Artaphernes sailed back to Asia. When Xerxes invaded Greece, B. C. 480, Artaphernes commanded the Lydians and Mysians. (Herod. vi. 94, 116, vii. 10. § 2, 74; Aeschyl. Pers. 21.)

3. A Persian, who was sent by king Artaxerxes I., in B. C. 425, with a letter to Sparta. While he passed through Eion on the Strymon, he was arrested by Aristideus, the son of Archippus, and carried to Athens, where the letter of his king was opened and translated. It contained a complaint of the king, that owing to the many and discrepant messages they had sent to him, he did not know what they wanted; and he therefore requested them to send a fresh embassy back with Artaphernes, and to explain clearly what they wished. The Athenians thought this a favourable opportunity for forming connexions themselves with Persia, and accordingly sent Artaphernes in a galley, accompanied by Athenian ambassadors, to Ephesus. On their arrival there they received intelligence of the death of king Artaxerxes, and the Athenians returned home. (Thuc. iv. 50.)

ARTAS. [Artas, Thuc.; *Aptos, Demost.; Artos, Thuc. 1, 8.] In B. C. 421, during the winning of the Messapians in the time of the Peloponnesian war. Thucydides (vii. 33) relates that Demosthenes in his passage to Sicily (B. C. 413) obtained from him a force of 150 dartmen, and renewed with him an old-existing friendly connexion. This connexion with Athens is explained by the long enmity, which, shortly before, was at its height, between the Messapians and the Lacedaeomenian Tarentum. (Comp. Niebuhr, i. p. 148.) The visit of Demosthenes is, probably, what the comic poet Demetrius alluded to in the lines quoted from his "Sicily" by Athenaeus (iii. p. 108), who tells us further, that Polemon wrote a book about him. Possibly, however, as Polemon and Demetrius both flourished about 300 B.C., this may be a second Artas. The name is found also in Hoscy, who quotes from the lines of Demetrius, and in Sinus, who refers to Polemon.

[25x1237]ARTASIVS/RES. [Arsacidae, p. 364, b.]

ARTAVASDES ('A travaoovtj or 'Artavads), ARTAVASDES ('A travaoovtj), or ARTABAZES ('A travaoovtj), called by the Armenian historians, Artawaz. 1. King of the Greater Armenia, succeeded his father Tigranes I (II). In the expedition of Crassus against the Parthians, n. c. 54, Artavasdes was an ally of the Romans; but when Orodes, the king of Parthia, invaded Media, and Artavasdes was unable to obtain assistance from the Romans, he concluded a peace with the Parthian king, and gave his sister or daughter in marriage to Pacorus, the son of Orodes. When Pacorus subsequently invaded Syria, in B. c. 51, Artavasdes threatened a descent upon Cappadocia; and Cicero, who was then governor of Cilicia, made preparations to meet him; but the defeat of Pacorus put a stop to his designs. (Plut. Crass. 19, 21, 22, 33; Dion Cass. xi. 16; Cic. ad Att. v. 20, 21, ad Rom. iv. 2, 3.)

We next hear of Artavasdes in Antony's campaign against the Parthians in B. c. 36. Artavasdes joined the Romans, as he wished to injure his namesake Artavasdes, king of Media, with whom he was at enmity. He accordingly persuaded Antony to invade Media, but then treacherously deserted him, and returned with all his forces to Armenia. (Dion Cass. xlix. 23, 31; Plut. Ant. 39, 59; Strab. xi. 594.) The desertion of the Armenian king was one of the main causes of the failure of the Roman expedition [see p. 216, a.]; and Antony accordingly determined to be revenged upon Artavasdes. After deferring his invasion of Armenia for a year, he entered the country in B. c. 34, and contrived to entice Artavasdes into his camp, where he was immediately seized. The Armenians thereupon set upon the throne his son Arta-xias [Artaxias II.]; but Artavasdes himself, with his wife and the rest of his family, was carried to Alexandria, and led in triumph in golden chains. He remained in captivity till B. c. 30, when Cleopatra had him killed, after the battle of Actium, and sent his head to his old enemy, Artavasdes, an adherent of the worship of images, profited from the discontent of the people against Constantine, and during a campaign of the emperor against the Arabs, prepared a revolt in Phrygia. Constantine, doubtful of his fidelity, demanded the sons of Artavasdes as hostages for the good conduct of their father, who refused to give them up, and suddenly surprised his master at the head of an army. Constantine was defeated, and fled into Phrygia Paucotiana, where he assembled his troops, Menimite, the rebel had won over the patriarch Theophanes Monotes and Anastasius, the patriarch of Constantinople, to his cause. Both these men had great influence among the people, whom they persuaded that Constantine was dead; and thus Artavasdes was proclaimed emperor. He and Constantine both tried to obtain the aid of the Arabs; but they assisted neither, and shewed hostility to both. Artavasdes re-established the worship of images in Phrygia, abolished the destruction of images in the churches, and thus acquired the name of the new Mohammed. Artavasdes, an adherent of the worship of images, profited from the discontent of the people against Constantine, and the Parthian king, Phraates, about the booty which had been taken from the Romans. In consequence of this dispute, and also of his desire to be revenged upon the king of Armenia, Artavasdes offered peace and alliance to Antony, through means of Polemon, king of Pontus. This offer was gladly accepted by Antony, as he too wished to punish the Armenian king on account of his desertion of him in his campaign in Media. After Antony had conquered Armenia in B. c. 34, the alliance between him and Artavasdes was rendered still closer by the latter giving his daughter, Iotape, in marriage to Alexander, the son of Antony. Artavasdes further engaged to assist Antony with his troops against the Parthians. Antony had married Antony's son, Artavasdes, and promised the Median king help against the Parthians. With the assistance of the Roman troops, Artavasdes was for a time enabled to carry on the war with success against the Parthians and Artaxias II., the exiled king of Armenia; but when Antony recalled his forces in order to oppose Octavianus, Artavasdes was defeated by Artaxias, and taken prisoner. Artavasdes recovered his liberty shortly afterwards. Plutarch (Ant. 61) mentions Median troops at the battle of Actium; but these might have been sent by Artavasdes before his captivity. After the battle of Actium, Octavianus restored to Artavasdes his daughter Iotape, who had married Antony's son, Artavasdes, and shortly before B. c. 20. (Dion Cass. xlix. 25, 39, 40, 41, i. 1, i. 16, liv. 9; Plut. Ant. 38, 52.)

ARTAVASDES or ARTABASUS ('Artabasas), emperor of Constantinople, was probably descended from a noble Armenian family. During the reign of Constantine V. Copronymus (a. d. 741—775), he was appointed Cephalus, and married Anna, a daughter of this emperor. Constantine, as his nick-name Caballimus indicates, would have made an excellent groom, but was a bad emperor; excited by fanaticism, he was active in the destruction of images in the churches, and thus acquired the name of the new Mohammed. Artavasdes, an adherent of the worship of images, profited from the discontent of the people against Constantine, and during a campaign of the emperor against the Arabs, prepared a revolt in Phrygia. Constantine, double of his fidelity, demanded the sons of Artavasdes as hostages for the good conduct of their father, who refused to give them up, and suddenly surprised his master at the head of an army. Constantine was defeated, and fled into Phrygia Paucotiana, where he assembled his troops, Menimite, the rebel had won over the patriarch Theophanes Monotes and Anastasius, the patriarch of Constantinople, to his cause. Both these men had great influence among the people, whom they persuaded that Constantine was dead; and thus Artavasdes was proclaimed emperor. He and Constantine both tried to obtain the aid of the Arabs; but they assisted neither, and shewed hostility to both. Artavasdes re-established the worship of images in Phrygia, abolished the destruction of images in the churches, and thus acquired the name of the new Mohammed. Artavasdes, an adherent of the worship of images, profited from the discontent of the people against Constantine, and the Parthian king, Phraates, about the booty which had been taken from the Romans. In consequence of this dispute, and also of his desire to be revenged upon the king of Armenia, Artavasdes offered peace and alliance to Antony, through means of Polemon, king of Pontus. This offer was gladly accepted by Antony, as he too wished to punish the Armenian king on account of his desertion of him in his campaign in Media. After Antony had conquered Armenia in B. c. 34, the alliance between him and Artavasdes was rendered still closer by the latter giving his daughter, Iotape, in marriage to Alexander, the son of Antony. Artavasdes further engaged to assist Antony with his troops against the Parthians. Antony had married Antony's son, Artavasdes, and promised the Median king help against the Parthians. With the assistance of the Roman troops, Artavasdes was for a time enabled to carry on the war with success against the Parthians and Artaxias II., the exiled king of Armenia; but when Antony recalled his forces in order to oppose Octavianus, Artavasdes was defeated by Artaxias, and taken prisoner. Artavasdes recovered his liberty shortly afterwards. Plutarch (Ant. 61) mentions Median troops at the battle of Actium; but these might have been sent by Artavasdes before his captivity. After the battle of Actium, Octavianus restored to Artavasdes his daughter Iotape, who had married Antony's son, Artavasdes, and shortly before B. c. 20. (Dion Cass. xlix. 25, 39, 40, 41, i. 1, i. 16, liv. 9; Plut. Ant. 38, 52.) this battle fell Tigranes, a noble Armenian, the cousin of Artavasdes. The usurper fled to Constantinople. Artavasdes was pursued by the imperial forces; and while this city was exposed to the horrors of famine, Nicetas was taken prisoner near Nicomedia. On the 2nd of November, 743, the besiegers took Constantinople by storm. Artavasdes, his sons, and his principal adherents, had their eyes put out, were conducted through the city on asses, with the tails in their hands, and were afterwards all put to death. Artavasdes was recognized as emperor by pope Zacharias. (Cedreneus, i. pp. 796—8, ed. Bonn.; Zonaras, ii. pp. 107, 108, ed. Paris; Procopius, de Bell. Pers. i. 2, &c.; Theophanes, pp. 347—50, ed. Paris.) [W. P.]

ARTAXERXES or ARTAXERXES (Ἀρτάξερξης or Ἀρτάξερξης) is the name of three Persian kings, and signifies, according to Herodotus (v. 98), "the great warrior" (Ἀρφάκας ἅρματων). The word is compounded of ἀρτος (artos), "honoured" [see p. 284, a.], and ἀρχον (archon), "a king." Consequently Artaxerxes would mean "the honoured king.

ARTAXERXES I., surnamed Longipinnus (Μακρόπνους) from the circumstance of his right hand being longer than his left (Plut. Artax. 1.), was king of Persia for forty years, from b.c. 465 to b.c. 425. (Diod. xi. 69, xii. 64 ; Thuc. iv. 50.) He ascended the throne after his father, Xerxes I., had been murdered by Artabantes, and after he himself had put to death his brother Darius on the instigation of Artabantes. (Justin. iii. 1 ; Ctesias, ap. Phot. Bibl. p. 40, a, ed. Bekker.) His reign is characterized by Plutarch and Diodorus (xi. 71) as wise and temperate, but it was disturbed by several dangerous insurrections of the satraps. At the time of his accession his only surviving brother Hystaspes was satrap of Bactria, and Artaxerxes had scarcely punished Artabantes and his associates, before Hystaspes attempted to make himself independent. After putting down this insurrection and depositing several other satraps who refused to obey his commands, Artaxerxes turned his attention to the regulation of the financial and military affairs of his empire. These beneficent exertions were interrupted in b.c. 462, or, according to Clinton, in b.c. 460, by the insurrection of the Egyptians under Inarus, who was supported by the Athenians. The first army which Artaxerxes sent under his brother Achae- menes was defeated, and Achaeomenes slain. After a useless attempt to incite the Spartans to a war against Athens, Artaxerxes sent a second army under Artabazus and Megabyzus into Egypt. A remnant of the forces of Achaemenes, who were still besieged in a place called the white castle (Αἰγινή τενών), near Memphis, was relieved, and the fleet of the Athenians destroyed by the Athenians themselves, who afterwards quitted Egypt. Inarus, too, was defeated in b.c. 456 or 455, but Anytaeus, another chief of the insurgents, maintained himself in the marshes of lower Egypt. (Thuc. i. 104, 106 ; Diod. xi. 71, 74, 77.) In b.c. 449, Cimon sent 60 of his fleet of 300 ships to the assistance of Anytaeus, and with the rest endeavoured to wrest Cyprus from the Persians. Notwithstanding the death of Cimon, the Athenians gained two victories, one by land and the other by sea, in the neighbourhood of Salamin in Cyprus. After this defeat Artaxerxes is said to have commanded his generals to conclude peace with the Greeks on their terms. The conditions on which this peace is said to have been concluded are as follows:—that the Greek towns in Asia should be restored to perfect independence; that no Persian satrap should approach the western coast of Asia nearer than the distance of a three days' journey; and that no Persian ship should sail through the Bosporus, or pass the town of Phasaelis or the Chelidonian islands on the coast of Lydia. (Diod. xii. 4 ; comp. Thirlwall, Hist. of Greece, iii. p. 57, &c.) Thecysides knows nothing of this humiliating peace, and it seems in fact to have been fabricated in the age subsequent to the events to which it relates. Soon after these occurrences Megabyzus revolted in Syria, because Artaxerxes had put Inarus to death contrary to the promise which Megabyzus had made to Inarus, when he made him his prisoner. Subsequently, however, Megabyzus became reconciled to his master. (Ctesias, ap. Phot. Bibl. p. 50, &c.; comp. Macra- byzus, INARUS.) Artaxerxes appears to have passed the latter years of his reign in peace. On his death in b.c. 425, he was succeeded by his son Xerxes II. (Clinton, Fast. Hell. ii, sub anno, 455, and p. 380.)

ARTAXERXES II., surnamed Athemon (Μηιηομον) from his good memory, succeeded his father, Da- reus II., as king of Persia, and reigned from b.c. 405 to b.c. 362. (Diod. xiii. 104, 108.) Cyrus, the younger brother of Artaxerxes, was the fa- vorite of his mother Parysatis, and she endeavoured to obtain the throne for him; but Dareius gave to Cyrus only the satrapy of western Asia, and Artaxerxes on his accession confirmed his brother in his satrapy, on the request of Parysatis, although he suspected him. (Xenoph. Anab. i. § 3 ; Plut. Artax. 3.) Cyrus, however, revolted against his brother, and supported by Greek mercenaries invaded Upper Asia. In the neighbourhood of Cunaxa, Cyrus gained a great victory over the far more numerous army of his brother, b.c. 401, but was slain in the battle. [Cyrus.] Tissaphernes was appointed satrap of western Asia in the place of Cyrus (Xenoph. Hellen. iii. 1. § 3), and was actively engaged in wars with the Greeks. (Thim- bron; Dercyllidas; Agesilaus.)

Notwithstanding these perpetual conflicts with the Greeks, the Persian empire maintained itself by the disunion among the Greeks themselves, which was fomented and kept up by Persian money. The peace of Antiochus, in b.c. 386, gave the Persians even greater power and influence than they had possessed before. [Antiochus.] But the empire was suffering from internal distur- bances and confusion; Artaxerxes himself was a weak man; his mother, Parysatis, carried on her horrors at the court with truly oriental cruelty; and slaves and eunuchs wielded the reins of government. Tributary countries and satraps endeavoured, under such circumstances, to make themselves independent, and the exertions which it was necessary to make against the rebels exhausted the strength of the empire. Artaxerxes himself was also a sort of beggar against Evagoras of Cyprus, from b.c. 383 to b.c. 376, and yet all he could gain was to confine Evagoras to his original possession, the town of Salamin and its vicinity, and to compel him to pay a moderate tribute. (Diod. xi. 9.) At the same time he had to carry on war against the Cardusians, on the shores of the Caspian sea; and after his numerous army was with great difficulty saved from total destruction, he concluded a peace without gaining any advantage. (Diod. xv. 9, 10; Plut. Ar-

IX. His attempts to recover Egypt were unsuccessful, and the general insurrection of his subjects in Asia Minor failed only through treachery among the insurgents themselves. (Diod.
xv. 90, &c.) When Artaxerxes felt that the end of his life was approaching, he endeavoured to prevent all quarrels respecting the succession by fixing upon Dareius, the eldest of his three legitimate sons (by his concubines he had no less than 115 sons, Justin. x. 1), as his successor, and granted to him all the outward distinctions of royalty. But Dareius soon after fell out with his father about Araspis, and formed a plot to assassinate him. But the plot was betrayed, and Dareius was put to death with many of his accomplices. (Plut. Arax. 26, &c.; Justin. l. c.) Of the two remaining legitimate sons, Ochus and Ariaspes, the former now hoped to succeed his father; but as Ariaspes was beloved by the Persians on account of his gentle and amiable character, and as the aged Artaxerxes appeared to prefer Arsames, the son of one of his concubines, Ochus contrived by intrigues to drive Ariaspes to despair and suicide, and had Arsames assassinated. Artaxerxes died of grief at these horrors in B. c. 362, and was succeded by Ochus, who ascended the throne under the name of Artaxerxes III. (Plut. Life of Artaxerxes; Diod. xv. 93; Phot. Bibl. pp. 43-44, ed. Becker; Clinton, Fast. Hellen. ii. p. 381, &c.) Artaxerxes III. also called Ochus, succeeded his father as king of Persia in B. c. 362, and reigned till B. c. 339. In order to secure the throne which he had gained by treason and murder, he began his reign with a merciless extirpation of the members of his family. He himself was a cowardly and reckless despot; and the great advantages which the Persian arms gained during his reign, were owing only to his Greek generals and mercenaries, and to traitors, or want of skill on the part of his enemies. These advantages consisted in the conquest of the revolted satrap Artabazus [Artabazus, No. 4], and in the reduction of Phoenix, of several revolted towns in Cyprus, and of Egypt, x. 350. (Clinton, Fast. Hellen. ii. p. 381.) From there he proceeded to the Hellespont and Alexander's the hero Protesilaus, which existed at Elacus near the part of his enemies. This sacrilegious act was felt by his subjects only in the bloody commands which he issued. At last he was killed by poison by Bagoas, and was succeeded by his youngest son, Artaxerxes (Diod. xxi. 5; Plut. De Leotalt, 11; Allain, V. H. iv. B, vi. B, H. a.x. 28;

Justin. x. 3; comp. Clinton, Fast. Hellen. ii. p. 382,
&c.) Respecting Artaxerxes, the founder of the dynasty of the Sassanides, see SASSANIDAE. [L. S.]

ARTAXIAS (Ἀρταξιας), or ARTAXES (Α-

IGNALS), was one of the generals of Antiochus the Great, but rvoted from him soon after his peace with the Romans in B. c. 188, and became an independent sovereign. (Strab. xi. pp. 529, 531, 532.) Hannibal took refuge at the court of Artaxias, when Antio-

chus was no longer able to protect him, and he superintended the building of Artaxata, the capital of Armenia, which was so called in honour of Ar-taxias. (Strab. xi. p. 528; Plut. Lucull. 31.) Ar-taxias was included in the peace made between Ummens and Parmelles in B. c. 179 (Polyb. xxvi.

6), but was conquered and taken prisoner by Antiochus IV. Epiphanes towards the end of his reign, about B. c. 165. (Appian, Syr. 45, 66.)

II. The son of Artavasdes I., was made king by the Armenians when his father was taken pris-ehmer by Antony in B. c. 34. He risked a battle against the Romans, but was defeated and obliged to fly into Parthia. But with the help of the Parthians he regained his kingdom soon afterwards, and defeated and took prisoner Artavases, king of Media, who had opposed him. [ARTAVARSHIUS.] On his return to Armenia, he put to death all the Romans who had remained behind in the field and in consequence of that, Augustus refused to restore him his relatives, when he sent an embassy to Rome to demand them. When the Armenians in B. c. 20 complained to Augustus about Artaxias, and requested as king his brother Tigranes, who was then at Rome, Augustus sent Tiberius with a large army into Armenia, in order to depose Ar-taxias and place Tigranes upon the throne; but Artaxias was put to death by his relatives before Tiberius reached the country. Tigranes was now proclaimed king without any opposition; but Tiberius took the credit to himself of a successful expedition: whence Horace (Epist. ii. 12. 25) says, "Claudi virtute Neronis Anncnius cecidit." (Dion

Caes. xix. 39, 40, 44, B. c. 18, liv. 9; Tae. Ant. ii. 3; Vell. Pnt. ii. 94; Joseph. Ant. xiv. 4. § 3; Suet.
Tiber. 9.) Velleius Paterculus (l. c.) calls this king Artavases, and Dion Cassius in one passage (liv. 9) names him Artabazes, but in all the others Artaxas.

III. The son of Polemon, king of Pontus, was proclaimed king of Armenia by Germanicus in A. D. 18, at the wish of the Armenians, whose favour he had gained by adopting their habits and mode of life. His original name was Zenon, but the Armenians called him Artaxias on his succession. Upon the death of Artaxias, about A. D. 53, Araxes, the son of the Parthian king, Artahmanus, was placed upon the Armenian throne by his father Tigranes. (Plut. Tigr. vi. 528, 531, 532.)

ARTAYCTES (Ἀρταγότητας), a Persian, the son of Cherasmus, commanded the Macrones and Mosynocci in the expedition of Xerxes into Greece. He was at the time governor of the town of Sestus and its territory on the Hellespont, where he ruled as an arbitrary and reckless tyrant. When Xerxes passed through Sestus, Artayctes induced the king by fraud to give him the tomb and sacred land of the hero Proteuslaus, which existed at Elacus near Sestus; he then pillaged the tomb, and made profane use of the sacred land. This sacrilegious act was not forgiven him by the Greeks. He did not expect to see an enemy at such a distance from Athens; when, therefore, in B. c. 478, Xanthippus appeared in the Hellespont with a fleet, Artayctes was not prepared for a siege. However the town was strongly fortified and able to resist a besieging army. Xanthippus continued his siege during the whole winter, but on the approach of spring the famine in the town became insupportable; and Artayctes and Ocobazus, a Persian of high rank, succeeded in making their escape through the lines of the besiegers. As soon as the Greek inhabitants of Sestus heard of the flight of their gover nor, they opened their gates to the Athenians. The two fugitives were pursued, and Artayctes and his son were overtaken and brought before the Athenians. Artayctes offered 100 talents to the inhabitants of Elaeus as an atonement for the outrages committed on the tomb of Protesilaus, and 200 more as a ransom for himself and his son. But the inhabitants would not accept any other atonement than his life, and Xanthippus was obliged to give him up to them. Artayctes was then nailed to a cross, and his son stoned to death before his eyes. (Herod. vii. 33, 70; x. 116, 118—120; Pass. i. 4 § 5)

[II. S.]

ARTAYNTE (Ἀρταγντη), a daughter of Maæstis, the brother of Xerxes I. Xerxes gave her in marriage to his son Dareius, but he himself was in love with her, and on one occasion was obliged, by his own imprudent promise, to give her a robe which he had received as a present from his wife Amastis. Thus the king’s paramount became known, and Amastis, fancying that the love affairs were due to the work of Maæstis, took the most cruel vengeance upon her. (Herod. ix. 108—110.) Maximus Tyrius (xxvii. 7) confounds the two women, Amastis and Artaynte. (Comp. Tzetz. Chil. ii. 6.)

ARTAYNTES (Ἀρταγντης), one of the generals in the army of Xerxes. When Xerxes had returned to Asia after the battle of Salamis, Artaynte, Ithamitres, and some other generals, sailed to Samos in order to watch the Ionians, and in the hope that the land-force under Mardonius in northern Greece might still be successful. But after the battles of Platanea and Mycale, in b. c. 479, Artaynte and Ithamitres took to flight. While Artaynte was passing through Asia, he was met by Maæstis, the brother of Xerxes, who accused him severely for his cowardly flight. Artaynte, enraged, drew his sword and would have killed Maæstis, had he not been saved by Xenogamns, a Greek, who seized Artaynte at the moment and threw him on the ground, for which act he was liberally rewarded. (Herod. viii. 130, ix. 102, 107.)

ARTEMBARES (Ἀρταμβαρής), a Median of noble rank, whose son, according to the story about the youth of the great Cyrus, was one of the playmates of Cyrus. Cyrus chastised him for his want of obedience in their play; and Artembares, indignant at the conduct of Cyrus, who was believed to be a mere shepherd’s boy, complained to king Astyages, and thus became the means of discovering that Cyrus was the son of Mandane and the grandson of Astyages. (Herod. i. 114—116.) Two Persians of this name occur in Herodotus (ix. 122), and Aeschylus. (Poes. 29, 294.)

ARTEMICHA. [CLEINIS.]

ARTEMIDO’RUS (Ἀρτεμίδωρος). 1. Surnamed Aristophanus, and also Pseudo-Aristophanes, from his being a disciple of the celebrated grammerian Aristophanes, of Byzantium at Alexandria. Artemidorus himself was, therefore, a contemporary of Aristarchus, and likewise a grammarian. He is mentioned by Athenaeus (iv. p. 182) as the author of a work περὶ Δαρδανοῦ, the nature of which is not clear, and of Αἰτίμεις ἢ γαλαντερίων, that is, a dictionary of technical terms and expressions used in the art of cockery. (Athen. i. p. 5, in p. 387, xiv. pp. 662, 663; Suidas, s. v., Ἀρτεμίδωρος καὶ Τυμίας; Ennian in ἄρωτης.) Some Mss. of Theocritus contain, under the name of Artemidorus, an epigram of two lines on the collection of bucolic poems, which perhaps belongs to our grammarian. (Theocrit. p. 896, ed. Kiesling; Anthol. Græc. i. n. 205.)

2. Of Ascalon, wrote a history of Bithynia, and is mentioned by Stephanus of Byzantium (s. n. ‘Ἀσκαλών’) as one of the distinguished persons of that place.
